Henry having appointed the queen regent of the kingdom, during his abſence, took the road to Champagne, where his army was aſſembled. It conſiſted of fifteen thouſand French infantry; nine thouſand Lanſquenets; ſeven thouſand Swiſs; fifteen hundred lances; two hundred gentlemen, and four hundred archers of the king's houſhold-troops; twelve hundred horſe-arquebuſiers; two thouſand light-horſe; two thouſand militia, and five hundred Engliſh knights, ſent by Edward to the aſſiſtance of his intended father-in-law†. As ſoon as the troops were ready to march, Henry publiſhed a manifeſto, in which, after taking notice of the ancient alliance between the French and German nations, both deſcended from the ſame anceſtors, and, after mentioning the applications which, in conſequence of this, ſome of the moſt illuſtrious of the German princes had made to him for his protection; he declared that he now took arms to re-eſtabliſh the ancient conſtitution of the empire, to deliver ſome of its princes from captivity, and to ſecure the privileges and independence of all the members of the Germanic body.

So early as the fifteenth of March, the French, having entered Lorraine, laid ſiege to Toul, which opened its gates at their approach; Verdun followed the example. Their forces next appeared before Metz, and that city, by a fraudulent ſtratagem of the conſtable Montmorenci, who having obtained permiſſion to paſs through it with a ſmall guard, introduced as many troops as were ſufficient to overpower the garriſon, was likewiſe ſeized without bloodſhed. Henry, who had hitherto been detained at Joinville by the illneſs of his queen, now joined the army. He left a ſtrong garriſon in Metz, under the command of the lord of Gonnor, brother to the mareſchal de Briſſac, with orders to repair and ſtrengthen, without delay, the fortifications of that city. From thence Henry advanced into Alſace, as far as Straſburg, and demanded leave of the ſenate to march through the city. But the Straſburgers, inſtructed and put on their guard by the credulity and misfortunes of their neighbours, ſhut their gates, and having aſſembled a garriſon of five thouſand ſoldiers, repaired their fortifications, raſed the houſes in their ſuburbs, and determined to defend themſelves to the utmoſt. At the ſame time they ſent a deputation of their moſt reſpectable citizens to the king, in order to divert him from making any hoſtile attempt upon them. The Swiſs cantons ſeconded them with zeal, ſoliciting Henry to ſpare a city which had long been connected with their community in friendſhip and alliancé.

Powerful as this united interceſſion was, it would not have prevailed on Henry to forego a prize of ſo much value, had he been in a condition to ſeize it. The French, though not far removed from their own country, began already to ſuffer from ſcarcity of proviſions, and had not ſufficient magazines collected to ſupport them during a ſiege, which muſt neceſſarily have been of great length. At the ſame time, the queen of Hungary, governeſs of the Low Countries, had aſſembled a conſiderable body of troops, which, under the command of Martin de Roſſem, laid waſte Champagne, and threatened the adjacent provinces of France. Theſe concurring circumſtances obliged the king, though with reluctance, to abandon the enterpriſe. But being willing to acquire ſome merit with his allies by this retreat, which he could not avoid, he pretended to the Swiſs that he had taken the reſolution merely in compliance with their requeſt*; and then, after giving orders that all the horſes in his army ſhould be led to drink in the Rhine, as a proof of having puſhed his conqueſts ſo far, he marched back towards Champagne.

Maurice had publiſhed his manifeſto, and taken the field at the ſame time with Henry, and after a variety of ſucceſsful manœuvres, compelled the emperor, who was unable to check the rapidity of his progreſs, to evacuate Inſpruck with a ſlender train, and under cover of the night; and that monarch fled with precipitation before the arms of Maurice as far as Villach in Carinthia, on the frontier of the Venetian territories.

While the king and the main army of the confederates were thus employed. Albert of Brandenburg was entruſted with the command of a ſeparate body of eight thouſand men, conſiſting chiefly of mercenaries, who had reſorted to his ſtandard rather from the hope of plunder, than the expectation of regular pay.

Meantime the emperor, alarmed at the powerful confederacy which had been formed againſt him, and wholly unprepared to reſiſt the united efforts of his enemies, expreſſed a willingneſs to liſten to terms of accomodation; and conferences were accordingly opened at Paſſau, at which moſt of the proteſtant princes and deputies from the free cities attended, and where Charles was repreſented by his brother, Ferdinand, king of the Romans. After much diſcuſſion, during which the emperor had raiſed up numerous obſtacles to the concluſion of a peace, Maurice left Paſſau abruptly, and joining his troops, which were encamped at Mergenthein in Franconia, he put them in motion, and renewed hoſtilities. At three thouſand men in the emperor's pay had thrown themſelves into Frankfort on the Maine, and might from thence infeſt the neighbouring country of Heſſe, he marched towards that city, and laid ſiege to it in form. The briſkneſs of this enterpriſe, and the vigour with which Maurice carried on his approaches againſt the town, gave ſuch an alarm to the emperor, that he lent a favourable ear to the arguments which his brother advanced in behalf of an accomodation. Firm and haughty as his nature was, he found it neceſſary to bend, and ſignified his diſpoſition to make conceſſions on his part, if Maurice, in return, would abate ſomewhat of the rigour of his demands. Maurice, equally deſirous of an accomodation, complied with the propoſal, and after a long conſultation with his aſſociates, he ſigned, on the ſecond of Auguſt, the treaty of peace, of which the chief articles were---That the confederates ſhall lay down their arms, and diſband their forces; that the landgrave of Heſſe ſhall be ſet at liberty, and conveyed in ſafety to his caſtle of Rheinfels; that the proteſtants ſhall not moleſt the catholics, either in the exerciſe of their eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, or in performing their religious ceremonies; that the Imperial chamber ſhall adminiſter juſtice impartially to perſons of both parties, and proteſtants be admitted indiſcriminately with the catholics to ſit as judges in that court; that Albert of Brandenburg ſhall be comprehended in the treaty, provided he ſhall accede to it, and diſband his forces before the twelfth of Auguſt*.

Such was the memorable treaty of Paſſau, that overturned the vaſt fabric, in the erection of which Charles had employed ſo many years, and had exerted the utmoſt efforts of his power and policy; that annulled all his regulations with regard to religion; defeated all his hopes of rendering the Imperial authority abſolute and heriditary in his family: and eſtabliſhed the proteſtant church, which had hitherto ſubſiſted precarioufly in Germany, through connivance, or by expedients, upon a firm and ſecure baſis.

The intereſts of Henry had been little attended to during the negociations at Paſſau. Maurice and his aſſociates having attained their object, diſcovered no great ſolicitude about an ally, whom, perhaps, they deemed overpaid for the aſſiſtance he had afforded them, by his acquiſitions in Lorraine. But how much ſoever Henry might be enraged at the perfidy of his allies, or at the impatience with which they haſtened to make their peace with the emperor at his expence, he was perfectly ſenſible it was more his intereſt to keep well with the Germanic body, than to reſent the indignities offered him by any particular members of it. For that reaſon he diſmiſſed the hoſtages which he had received from Maurice and his aſſociates, and affected to talk in the ſame ſtrain as formerly, concerning his zeal for maintaing the ancient conſtitution and liberties of the empire.

On the other hand, the empire had now loſt as much, in point of ſecurity, as France had acquired, and being ſtripped of the defence which thoſe cities afforded it, lay expoſed to invaſion on a quarter, where all the towns having been conſidered as interior, and remote from any enemy, were but ſlightly fortified. Charles was influenced by theſe conſiderations to attempt the recovery of the three towns which Henry had reduced; and the preparations which he had made againſt Maurice and his aſſociates, enabled him to carry his reſolution into immediate execution.

* Recueil des Traites, tom. ii. p. 261.

The peace therefore, was no ſooner concluded at Paſſau, than he left his inglorious retreat at Villach, and advanced to Augſburg, at the head of a conſiderable body of Germans which he had levied, together with all the troops which he had drawn out of Italy and Spain. To theſe he added ſeveral battalions which had been diſmiſſed by the confederates, and prevailed alſo on ſome princes of the empire to join him with their vaſſals. In order to conceal the deſtination of this formidable army, and to guard againſt alarming the French, ſo as to lead them to prepare for their defence, he gave out that he meant to march to Hungary, in order to ſecond Maurice in his operations, who had engaged in an expedition againſt the Turks. When he began to advance towards the Rhine, and could no longer employ that pretext, he had recourſe to new artifices, and ſpread a report, that he took this route in order to chaſtiſe Albert of Brandenburg, whoſe deſtructive incurſions and cruel exactions in that part of the empire, called loudly for his interpoſition.

But Henry immediately diſcerned the true object of his vaſt preparations, and reſolved to defend the important conqueſts which he had gained with vigour equal to that with which they were about to be attacked. As he foreſaw that the principal efforts of the Imperialiſts would be directed againſt Metz, by whoſe fate that of Toul and Verdun would be determined, he nominated Francis of Lorraine, duke of Guiſe, to take the command of that city during the ſiege. The character and conduct of this nobleman fully juſtified his choice; he repaired with joy to the dangerous ſtation aſſigned him; while the martial genius of the French nobility, which led them to diſdain a life of inactivity, when an opportunity occurred for the acquiſition of honour, prompted great numbers to follow a leader. Several princes of the blood, many noblemen of the higheſt rank, and all the young officers who could obtain the king's permiſſion, entered Metz as volunteers. By their preſence they added ſpirit to the garriſon, and enabled the duke of Guiſe to employ, on every emergency, perſons eager to diſtinguiſh themſelves, and fit to conduct any ſervice.

But with whatever alacrity the duke of Guiſe undertook the defence of Metz; he found every thing, upon his arrival there, in ſuch a ſituation, as might have induced any perſon of leſs zeal and intrepidity to deſpair of defending it with ſucceſs. The city was of great extent, with large ſuburbs; the walls were in many places feeble and without ramparts; and the ditch was narrow, and the old towers, which projected inſtead of baſtions, were at too great diſtance from each other to defend the ſpace between them. For all theſe defects he endeavoured to provide the beſt remedy which the time would permit. He ordered the ſuburbs, without ſparing the monaſteries or churches, not even that of Saint Arnulph, in which ſeveral kings of France had been buried, to be levelled with the ground; but, in order to guard againſt the imputation of impiety, to which ſuch a violation of ſo many ſacred edifices, as well as of the aſhes of the dead, might expoſe him, he executed it with much religious ceremony.

He then pulled down ſuch houſes as ſtood near the walls, cleared and enlarged the ditch, repaired the ruinous fortifications, and erected new ones. As it was neceſſary that all theſe works ſhould be finiſhed with the utmoſt expedition, he laboured at them with his own hands; the officers and volunteers imitated his example, and the ſoldiers ſubmitted with chearfulneſs to the moſt extreme fatigues, when they ſaw that their ſuperiors did not decline to bear a part with them. At the ſame time he compelled all uſeleſs perſons to leave the place; he filled the magazines with proviſions and military ſtores; burnt the mills, and deſtroyed the corn and forage, for ſeveral miles round the town. Such were his popular talents, as well as his art of acquiring an aſcendant over the minds of men, that the citizens ſeconded him with no leſs ardour than the ſoldiers; and every other paſſion being ſwallowed up in the zeal to repulſe the enemy, with which he inſpired them, they beheld the ruin of their eſtates, together with the havock which he made among their public and private buildings, without any emotion of reſentment*.

The emperor, meantime, having collected all his troops, continued his march to Metz. As he paſſed through the cities on the Rhine, he ſaw the diſmal effects of thoſe deſtructive depredations which Albert had committed in thoſe parts. Upon his approach, that prince, though at the head of twenty thouſand men, withdrew into Lorraine, as if it were his intention to join Henry, whoſe arms he had quartered with his own in all his ſtandards and enſigns. Albert was not in a condition to cope with the Imperial troops, which amounted to upwards of ſixty thouſand men, forming one of the moſt numerous and beſt-appointed armies which had been brought into the field during that age, in any of the wars between the princes of Chriſtendom.†

The chief command, under the emperor, was committed to the duke of Alva, aſſiſted by the marquis of Marignano, together with the moſt experinced of the Italian and Spaniſh generals. Theſe officers repreſented the danger of beginning at ſuch an advanced ſeaſon—the month of October being nearly expired—a ſiege which could not fail to prove very tedious. Charles, however, rejected their advice; and, relying on the ſtrength of his preparations, and the efficacy of his precautions, he ordered the city to be inveſted. As ſoon as the duke of Alva appeared, a large body of the French ſallied out and attacked his van-guard with great vigour, threw it into confuſion, and killed or took priſoners a great number of men. The place, notwithſtanding this check, was completely inveſted by the Imperialiſts, the trenches were opened, and the other works begun.

The attention both of the beſiegers and beſieged was turned, for ſome time, towards Albert of Brandenburg, and they ſtrove, with emulation, which ſhould ain that prince, who ſtill hovered in the neighbourhood, fluctuating in all the uncertainty of reſolution natural to a man, who, being ſwayed by no principle, was allured different ways by contrary views of intereſt. He marched in triumph to Metz, and joined his army to that of the emperor. Charles, in reward for this ſervice, and the great acceſſion of ſtrength which he brought him, granted Albert a formal pardon of all paſt offences, and confirmed him in the poſſeſſion of the territories which he had violently uſurped during the war.

The duke of Guiſe harraſſed the beſiegers by frequent ſallies, in which his officers were ſo eager to diſtinguiſh themſelves, that his authority was ſcarcely ſufficient to reſtrain the impetuoſity of their courage. He repaired in the night whatever damage the enemy's artillery had affected during the day. The Imperialiſts, on their part, puſhed on the attack with great ſpirit, and carried forward approaches againſt different parts of the town at the ſame time. The beſiegers, after the unwearied labour of many weeks, found that they had made but little progreſs; and although breaches were effected by their batteries in various places, they were aſtoniſhed by the ſudden appearance of works, the demolition of which would require a renewal of all their dangers and fatigues. The emperor, enraged at the obſtinate reſiſtance which his army experienced, left Thionville, where he had been confined by a violent fit of the gout, and, though ſtill ſo infirm that he was obliged to be carried in a litter, he repaired to the camp, that, by his preſence, he might animate the ſoldiers, and urge on the attack with greater ſpirit. Upon his arrival, new batteries were erected, and new efforts were made with redoubled ardour.

The winter, however, had by this time ſet in with extreme rigour. Diſeaſes began to ſpread among the ſoldiers, eſpecially among the Italians and Spaniards, unaccuſtomed to ſuch inclement weather; ſo that great numbers were rendered unfit for ſervice, and many died. Charles reſolved to hazard a general aſſault, in ſpite of the remonſtrances of his generals, concerning the imprudence of attacking a numerous garriſon, conducted and animated by the moſt gallant of the French nobility, with an army weakened by diſeaſes, and diſheartened with ill ſucceſs. The duke of Guiſe, ſuſpecting the enemy's intentions, from the extraordinary hurry he obſerved in their camp, ordered all his troops to their reſpective poſts. They immediately appeared on the walls and behind the breaches, with ſuch a determined countenance, ſo eager for the combat, and ſo well prepared to give the aſſailants a warm reception, that the Imperialiſts, inſtead of advancing to the charge, when the word of command was given, ſtood motionleſs, in a timid dejected ſilence. The emperor perceiving the impoſſibility of truſting troops whoſe ſpirits were ſo much broken, retired abruptly to his quarters, complaining that he was now deſerted by his ſoldiers, who no longer deſerved the name of men*.

Deeply as Charles was mortified and affected by the conduct of his troops, he would not conſent to abandon the ſiege, though he perceived the neceſſity of changing the mode of attack. He ſuſpended the fury of his batteries, and propoſed to proceed by the more ſecure but tedious method of ſapping. But as it ſtill continued to rain or ſnow inceſſantly, ſuch as were employed in this ſervice endured incredible hardſhips: and the duke of Guiſe, whoſe induſtry was equal to his valour, diſcovering all their mines, counterworked them, and prevented their effect. At laſt, Charles, finding it impoſſible to contend any longer with the rigour of the ſeaſon, and with enemies whom he could neither overpower by force, nor ſubdue with art; while at the ſame time, a contagious diſtemper raged among the troops, and daily cut off great numbers of the officers as well as ſoldiers, yielded to the ſolicitations of his generals, who conjured him to ſave the remains of his army by a timely retreat: "Fortune,"—ſaid he—"I now perceive reſembles other females, and "chooſes to confer her favours on young men, while ſhe forſakes thoſe who are "advanced in years."

On the twenty-ſixth of October, Charles gave orders to raiſe the ſiege, and ſubmitted to the diſgrace of abandoning the enterpriſe, after having continued fifty-ſix days before the town, during which time he loſt upwards of thirty thouſand men, who died of diſeaſes, or were killed by the enemy. The duke of Guiſe, as ſoon as he perceived the intention of the Imperialiſts, took meaſures to moleſt them on their march, and ſent out ſeveral bodies of cavalry and infantry to infeſt them on their rear, to pick up ſtragglers, and to ſeize every opportunity of attacking them with advantage. Such was the confuſion with which they made their retreat, that the French might have annoyed them in the moſt cruel manner. But when they ſallied out, a ſpectacle preſented itſelf to their view, which extinguiſhed at once all hoſtile rage, and melted them into tenderneſs and compaſſion. The Imperial camp was filled with the ſick and wounded, with the dead and dying. In all the different roads by which the army retired, numbers were found, who, having made an effort to eſcape, beyond their ſtrength, were left, when they could go no farther, to periſh without aſſiſtance. This they received from their enemies, to whom they were indebted for all the kind offices which their friends had not the power to perform. The duke of Guiſe immediately ordered proper refreſhments for ſuch as were dying of hunger; he appointed ſurgeons to attend the ſick and wounded; he removed ſuch as could bear removal into the adjacent villages; and thoſe who would have ſuffered by being carried ſo far, he admitted into the hoſpitals which he had fitted up in the city for his own ſoldiers. As ſoon as they recovered, he ſent them home under an eſcort of ſoldiers, and with money to bear their charges. By theſe acts of humanity, which were uncommon in that age, when war was carried on with greater rancour and animoſity than at preſent, the duke of Guiſe completed the fame which he had acquired by his gallant and ſucceſsful defence of Metz, and engaged thoſe whom he had vanquiſhed to vie with his own countrymen in extolling his name*.

In Italy the Sineſe threw off the Imperial yoke, and placed themſelves under the protection of France, ſo that this was the moſt diſaſtrous year in the life of Charles the Fifth, and the moſt glorious in that of Henry.

* Pere Daniel, Hiſt. de France, tom. iii. p. 392.—Natalis Comes.

A. D. 1553.] Maurice and his aſſociates were inclined to liſten to the overtures of the king of France, from the perfidious conduct of the emperor at this period, who encouraged the deſtructive depredations and other violent proceedings of Albert of Brandenburg.—That prince's troops having ſhared in the calamities of the ſiege of Metz, were greatly reduced in number; but the emperor, leſs from gratitude for his ſervices on that occaſion, than from his deſire to foment diviſions among the princes of the empire, having paid all the money due to him, he was enabled with that ſum to hire ſo many of the ſoldiers diſmiſſed from the Imperial army, that he was ſoon at the head of a body of men as numerous as ever.

The Imperial chamber now iſſued its decree againſt this dangerous uſurper, Albert, and required the elector of Saxony, together with ſeveral other princes, to take arms in order to enforce its execution. Maurice, and thoſe aſſociated with him, were not unwilling to undertake this ſervice, ſince they were convinced that the emperor encouraged Albert in his extravagant and irregular proceedings, and ſecretly afforded him aſſiſtance, that, by raiſing him up to rival Maurice in power, he might, in any future broil, make uſe of him to counterbalance and controul the authority which the other had acquired in the empire*.

The confederacy formed againſt Albert wrought no change in his ſentiments; but as he knew that he could not reſiſt ſo many princes if he ſhould allow them time to aſſemble their forces, he endeavoured, by his activity, to deprive them of all the advantages which they might derive from their united power and numbers; and, for that reaſon, marched directly againſt Maurice, the enemy whom he dreaded moſt. It was happy for the allies, that the conduct of their affairs was committed to a prince of ſuch abilities. He, by his authority and example, had inſpired them with vigour; and having carried on their preparations with greater rapidity than could have been expected, he was in condition to face Albert, before he could make any conſiderable progreſs.

Their armies, which were nearly equal in number, each conſiſting of twenty-four thouſand men, met at Sieverhauſen, in the duchy of Lunenburgh; and the violent animoſity againſt each other, which poſſeſſed the two leaders, did not ſuffer them to continue long inactive. The troops, inflamed with the ſame hoſtile rage, marched fiercely to the combat; they fought with the greateſt obſtinacy; and, as both generals were capable of availing themſelves of every favourable occurrence, the battle remained long doubtful, each gaining ground upon the other alternately. At laſt, victory declared for Maurice, who was ſuperior in cavalry, and Albert's army fled in confuſion, leaving four thouſand dead in the field; and their camp, baggage, and artillery, in the hands of the conquerors.

The emperor, meanwhile, impatient to efface the ſtain which his ignominious repulſe at Metz left upon his military reputation, took the field early in the ſpring, and entering the Low Countries with a powerful army, laid ſiege to Térouenne.

* Sleidan, p. 585—Memoires de Ribier, tom. ii. p. 442—Arnolpi vita Mauritii apud Menken, tom. ii. p. 1242—

Though the town was of ſuch importance, that Francis uſed to call it one of the two pillows on which a king of France might ſleep with ſecurity, the fortifications were out of repair, and the garriſon conſiſted of only one troop of light-horſe, under the command of the lord of Loſſes, who was governor of the place, and three companies of foot. The conſtable jealous of the glory acquired by the duke of Guiſe in the defence of Metz, procured for his eldeſt ſon, Francis Montmorenci, the appointment of lieutenant-general of Térouenne; and the celebrated d'Eſſé, who had ſignalized his courage and military conduct in the expulſion of the Engliſh from Scotland, was given him as an aſſiſtant in the arduous enterpriſe. D'Eſſé was afflicted with the jaundice, and when he went to take leave of the king, Henry expreſſed his concern at the languid and debilitated ſtate to which he ſeemed to be reduced; to which the gallant vetran replied —"When your majeſty ſhall receive intelligence of the reduction of Térouenne, you "may ſafely affirm that d'Eſſé is cured of the jaundice." D'Eſſe conducted a ſtrong reinforcement, and ample ſupplies, which entered the town without loſs or moleſtation; and from this firſt ſucceſs it was generally believed at court, that the emperor was preparing for himſelf at Térouenne the ſame affront which he had ſuſtained at Metz.

The ſiege of Térouenne ſtill continued: d'Eſſé when he entered the town, found the enemy's batteries completed, and all the poſts ſo well fortified that it was impoſſible to attack them with any proſpect of ſucceſs. The trenches were opened, and extended to the very walls of the place: in vain did d'Eſſé make continual ſallies, by day and night; in vain did he effect a partial deſtruction of their works, and bring off in triumph ſeveral pieces of artillery which greatly incommoded the garriſon; inconveniences were ſpeedily remedied by the Imperialiſts; and the emperor had ſuch a prodigious quantity of artillery at his command, that one piece was no ſooner taken or deſtroyed, than three or four others appeared in its place, owing to the zeal of the Flemings, who were ſo anxious to have the town reduced, that ſooner than ſuffer the army to be in want of pioneers, they would have deſerted their cities, and left their fields untilled. A practicable breach being effected, the Imperialiſts, on the twelfth of June, delivered a general aſſault, which laſted four hours, when they were repulſed with the loſs of twelve or fifteen hundred men: the beſieged loſt only three hundred, but among the ſlain was their brave commander d'Eſſé, who cloſed a life of millitary toil in the field of honour. Young Montmorenci, who, though his equal in rank, had chearfully conſented to fight under his orders, now became commander in chief: he immediately aſſembled Loſſes, Fumel, Contai, Renti, Warti, la Chapelle, and all the principal officers, who unanimouſly agreed to follow the example of d'Eſſé, and bury themſelves beneath the ruins of the place. They were confirmed in the heroic reſolution by the unexpected arrival of three hundred arquebuſiers, ſent by the duke of Vendome, and of thirty young noblemen, who had obtained permiſſion to ſerve as volunteers in this choſen band: among theſe gallant gentlemen, hiſtory has preſerved the names of Baugé, Dampierre, la Roue, Bailleul, Vieuxmaiſons, and Rambure.*

Elated with ſucceſs, the Imperialiſts immediately inveſted Heſdin, which, though defended with great bravery, was likewiſe taken by aſſault, and ſuch of the garriſon as eſcaped the ſword was taken priſoners. Charles entruſted the conduct of this ſiege to Emanuel Philibert of Savoy, prince of Piedmont, who, on that occaſion, gave the firſt diſplay of thoſe great talents for military command, which ſoon entitled him to be ranked amongſt the firſt generals of his age.

The loſſes which France had ſuſtained, and by which the emperor had aſſumed his wonted ſuperiority in the field, were aſcribed to the extreme jealouſy and precaution of the conſtable, in refuſing to appoint a commander in chief of the troops, or to put the army in motion, till he had ſecured a deciſive ſuperiority.†

In Italy the French arms were more ſucceſsful; Charles having exerted himſelf to the utmoſt to make a great effort in the Low Countries, his operations on the other ſide of the Alps were proportionably feeble. The viceroy of Naples, in conjunction with Coſmo di Medicis, who was greatly alarmed at the introduction of French troops into Sienna, endeavoured to become maſter of that city; but inſtead of reducing the Sienneſe, the Imperialſts were obliged to retire with precipitation, in order to defend their own country, upon the appearance of the Turkiſh fleet, which threatened the coaſt of Naples; and the French not only eſtabliſhed themſelves more firmly in Tuſcany, but, by the aſſiſtance of the Turks, conquered a great part of the iſland of Corſica, ſubject, at that time to the Genoeſe.

A. D. 1554, 1555.] Henry obſerved the progreſs of the emperor's negociation in England with much uneaſineſs. The great acceſſion of territories as well as reputation which his enemy would acquire by the marriage of his ſon with the queen of ſuch a powerful kingdom, was obvious and formidable. For this reaſon the king gave it in charge to Anthony de Noailles, his ambaſſador at the court of London, to employ all his addreſs in order defeat or retard the treaty of marriage; and as there was not, at that time, any prince of the blood in France whom he could propoſe to the queen as a huſband, he inſtructed him to co-operate with ſuch of the Engliſh as wiſhed their ſovereign to marry one of his own ſubjects. But the queen's ardour and precipitation rendered all his endeavours ineffectual.

The duke of Nevers reduced and demoliſhed the fort of Jodiner, with the caſtles of Orcimont, Beaurain, Fument, and Hierges; while the mareſchal de St. Andreé, with a detachment of ſix thouſand Swiſs and two thouſand cavalry, laid ſiege to Mariemburgh, a town which the king of Hungary, governeſs of the Low Countries, had fortified at a great expence; but being deſtitute of a ſufficient garriſon, it ſurrendered in ſix days. Henry, elated with this ſucceſs, put himſelf at the head of his army, and inveſting Bouvines, took it by aſſault, after a ſhort reſiſtance. With equal facility he became maſter of Dinant; and then turning to the left, bent his march towards the province of Artois. The vaſt ſums which the emperor had remitted into England, for the purpoſe of ſecuring the leading men in his intereſt, with regard to the marriage of his ſon, had ſo exhauſted his treaſury, as to render his preparations at this juncture ſlower and more dilatory than uſual. He had no body of troops to oppoſe the French at their firſt entrance into his territories; and though he haſtened to collect all the forces in the country, and gave the command of them to the duke of Savoy, they were in no condition to face an enemy ſo far ſuperior in number. The duke, however, by his activity and good conduct, made up for his want of troops. By watching all the motions of the French at a diſtance, and by chuſing his own poſts with ſkill, he put it out of their power either to form any ſiege of conſequence, or to attack him. Want of ſubſiſtence ſoon obliged them to fall back towards their own frontiers, after having burnt all the open towns, and having plundered the country in the moſt cruel and licentious manner.

The emperor had reſolved, if poſſible, to avoid a deciſive action, but, notwithſtanding all his precautions, a diſpute about a poſt, which both armies endeavoured to ſeize, brought on an engagement, on the thirteenth of Auguſt, which proved almoſt general. The object of diſpute was a wood, which commanded one part of the French camp, and in which the duke of Guiſe, foreſeeing the emperor's intentions, had judiciouſly poſted, in an advantageous ſituation, ſeveral companies of arquebuſiers, who ſucceſsfully repelled the firſt body of troops that were ſent to diſlodge them. Charles, however, being reſolved to carry his point, detached from his army three thouſand Spaniſh arquebuſiers, under the conduct of Gonzaga, and two thouſand light horſe, headed by the duke of Savoy. The duke of Guiſe, thus overawed by a ſuperior force withdrew the troops he had ſtationed in the wood, and ſent word to the king to prepare the army for action, while he endeavoured to retard the enemy's march as much as poſſible, he placed himſelf at the head of his company of one hundred lances. The count of Schwatzemberg, meantime, continued to advance at the head of two thouſand foot, all vetrans. This formidable corps was twice attacked by the French light horſe, under the conduct of the dukes of Aumale and Nemours, who were ſpeedily repulſed: but Gaſpard de Saulx Tavannes, at the head of his company of fifty lances, charged them with ſuch fury, both in front and flank, that he made them give way, and then, by mixing among them compleated their diſorder; being firſt ſupported by the duke of Guiſe, and afterwards by the dukes of Aumale and Nemours, who, having rallied, their men, returned a third time to the charge, he was enabled to purſue his advantage; and the Germans falling back on a regiment of Lanſquenets which had been ſent to their ſupport, fled for ſhelter to the wood. Meanwhile the admiral de Coligny, at the head of the French and Swiſs infantry, after receiving the firſt fire of Gonzaga's arquebuſiers, ordered his men to charge with their pikes, by which means the enemy were routed, and purſued to the farther extremity of the wood. In this action two hundred of the French were ſlain, the loſs of the Imperialiſts amounted to fifteen hundred or two thouſand men.* Both armies paſſed the night under arms: that of the emperor, from the expectation that the conqueror would be induced to purſue his advantage; and that of Henry, becauſe, as they were ſituated in an open field, and deſtitute of entrenchments, they had every thing to dread from an attack during the night. The conſtable, who went to reconnoitre it the next morning, declared the impoſſibility of attacking it, with any proſpect of ſucceſs; and as it would have been extremely imprudent to make an aſſault upon the town of Renti, in ſight of a numerous army, it was determined, in a council of war, that the troops ſhould return to Picardy; and, in order that this retreat might not wear the appearance of a flight, the king ſent a herald to inform the emperor that he would wait for him the next day on the field of action, during four hours; and that, on his arrival at the firſt place where forage could be procured, he would again wait for him during four days.

The campaign of 1555 was neither conducted with ſpirit nor effect; both parties being too much exhauſted to bring any conſiderable army into the field. During the ſiege of Metz, Leonard, father guardian of a convent of Franciſcans in that city, had inſinuated himſelf into the eſteem of the duke of Guiſe, by his attachment to the French; and the duke, in return for the ſervices he had rendered him, in procuring intelligence of the motions and deſigns of the enemies, had ſtrongly recommended him to Vielleville, who was appointed to the government of Metz. This monk, from the levity natural to bold and projecting adventurers, or from reſentment againſt the French, who had not rewarded him according to his own opinion of his deſerts, or tempted by the unlimited confidence which was placed in him to imagine that he might carry on and accompliſh any ſcheme with perfect ſecurity, formed a deſign of betraying Metz to the Imperialiſts.

Leonard accompliſhed, with great ſecrecy and diſpatch, every thing which he had undertaken to perform; but, happily for France, Vielleville, an able and vigilant officer, received information from a ſpy, whom he entertained at Thionville, that certain Franciſcan friars reſorted frequently thither, and were admitted to many private conferrences with the governor, who was making great preparations for ſome military enterprize. This intelligence having awakened Vielleville's ſuſpicions, he inſtantly viſited the convent of Franciſcans, and detected the ſoldiers who were concealed there; the father-guardian was alſo ſeized, on his return from Thionville; and he, in order to eſcape the rack, revealed all the circumſtances of the conſpiracy.

Vielleville, not content with having fruſtrated the nefarious machinations of theſe traitors, was ſolicitous to avail himſelf of the diſcoveries which he had made, ſo as to be revenged on the Imperialiſts. For this purpoſe, he marched out with the beſt troops in his garriſon, and placing theſe in ambuſh near the road, by which the father-guardian had informed him that the governor of Thionville would approach Metz, he fell with great fury upon the Imperialiſts, who, confounded at this ſudden attack, by an enemy whom they expected to ſurprize, made little reſiſtance; and a great part of the troops employed in this ſervice, among which were many perſons of diſtinction, was killed or taken priſoners before next morning, Vielleville returned to Metz in triumph.

On the twenty-third of March, this year, pope Julius the Third died, and was ſucceeded in the papal throne, by Macellus Cervino, cardinal of Santa Croce, who enjoyed his new dignity only twenty days. All the refinements in artifice and intrigue peculiar to conclaves, were diſplayed in that which was holden for the election of a ſucceſſor to Marcellus; the cardinals of the French and Imperial factions labouring, with equal ardour, to gain the neceſſary number of ſuffrages for one of their own party. But, after a ſtruggle of no long duration, though conducted with great warmth and eagerneſs, they united in chuſing John Peter Caraffa, the eldeſt member of the ſacred college, and the ſon of count Montorio, a nobleman of an illuſtrious family in the kingdom of Naples. In order to teſtify his reſpect for the memory of Paul the Third, by whom he had been created cardinal, he aſſumed the name of Paul the Fourth. The new pontiff, at the inſtigation of his nephews, propoſed an alliance, offenſive and defenſive, with the king of France, and the treaty was accordingly concluded on the fifteeth of December: the conditions were much the ſame as had been propoſed by the pope's envoy at Paris; and it was agreed to keep the whole tranſaction ſecret until their united forces ſhould be ready to take the field.

During the negociation of this treaty at Rome and Paris, an event happened, which ſeemed to render the fears which had given riſe to it vain, and the operations which were to follow upon it unneceſſary. This was the emperor's reſignation of his hereditary dominions to his ſon Philip; together with his reſolution to withdraw entirely from any concern in buſineſs or the affairs of this world, in order that he might ſpend the remainder of his days in retirement and ſolitude. At Bruſſels this extraordinary renunciation was made; and Charles only retained for himſelf the Imperial dignity, which, about a year afterwards, he reliquiſhed to his brother Ferdinand, the king of the Romans.

A. D. 1556.] Charles ſenſible of the importance of peace, at the commencement of a reign, he was anxious to conclude an accommodation with Henry. By a long truce, during the ſubſiſtence of which, and without diſcuſſing their reſpective claims, each ſhould retain what was in his poſſeſſion. Charles declared warmly for cloſing with the overture, though manifeſtly diſhonourable as well as diſadvantageous; and ſuch was the reſpect due to his wiſdom and experience, that Philip, notwithſtanding his unwillingneſs to purchaſe peace by ſuch conceſſions, did not preſume to urge his opinion in oppoſition to that of his father.

Henry could not have hefitated one moment about giving his conſent to a truce on ſuch conditions as would leave him in quiet poſſeſſion of the duke of Savoy's dominions, together with the important conqueſts which he had made on the frontiers of Germany. But it was no eaſy matter to reconcile ſuch a ſtep with the engagements which he had recently contracted, by his late treaty with the pope. The conſtable Montmorenci, however, repreſented, in ſuch ſtrong terms the imprudence of ſacrificing the true intereſts of his kingdom to theſe raſh obligations, and took ſuch advantage of the abſence of the cardinal of Lorraine, who was anxious to maintain his alliance with the Caraffas, that Henry, naturally fluctuating and unſteady, and apt to be influenced by the advice laſt given him, authorized his ambaſſadors to ſign, on the fifth of February, a treaty of truce for five years, on the terms which had been propoſed: * but that he might not ſeem to have altogether forgotten his ally the pope, whom he foreſaw would be highly exaſperated, he, in order to ſoothe him, took care that he ſhould be expreſsly included in the truce.

Under theſe circumſtances, Paul had recourſe to the arts of negociation and intrigue: he affected to approve highly of the truce, as an happy expedient for putting a ſtop to the effuſion of human blood: and he offered, as their common father, to be mediator between them. Under this pretext, he appointed cardinal Rebiba, his nuncio to the court of Bruſſels, and his nephew cardinal Caraffa to that of Paris. The public inſtructions given to both were the ſame; that they ſhould exert themſelves to the utmoſt to prevail on the two monarchs to accept of the pope's mediation, that, by means of it, peace might be re-eſtabliſhed, and meaſures taken for aſſembling a general council. But Caraffa received a private commiſſion to ſolicit Henry to renounce the treaty of truce, and to renew his engagements with the holy ſee; and he was empowered to ſpare neither entreaties nor promiſes, nor bribes in order to gain that point.

Caraffa made his entry into Paris with extraordinary pomp; and having preſented a conſecrated ſword to Henry, as the protector, on whoſe aid the pope relied in the preſent exigency, he beſought him not to diſregard the entreaties of a parent in diſtreſs, but to employ that weapon which he gave him in his defence. This repreſented not only as a duty of filial piety, but as an act of juſtice. As the pope, from confidence in the aſſiſtance and ſupport which his late treaty with France entitled him to expect, had taken ſuch ſteps as had irritated the king of Spain, he conjured Henry not to ſuffer Paul and his family to be cruſhed under the weight of that reſentment which they had drawn on themſelves merely by their attachment to France.

Theſe arguments made a deep impreſſion on Henry; but reverence for the oath, by which he had ſo lately confirmed the truce of Vaucelles, together with the extreme old age of the pope, whoſe death might occaſion a total revolution in the political ſyſtem of Italy; kept him for ſome time in ſuſpence. The cardinal, however, had expedients ready for removing theſe obſtacles. To obviate the king's ſcruple with regard to his oath, he produced powers from the pope to abſolve him from the obligation of it.

The cardinal having had the art to ſecure in his intereſt not only the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorraine, but even Catharine of Medicis and her rival, the ducheſs of Valentinois, they, by their ſolicitations, eaſily ſwayed the king, whoſe ſecret inclinations were favourable to their deſign. The prudent remonſtrances of Montmorenci were treated with neglect; the nuncio abſolved Henry from his oath; and he ſigned a new league with the pope, which kindled the flames of war both in Italy and in the Low Countries.

A. D. 1557.] Preparations, meanwhile, had been making in France for affording effectual aſſiſtance to Paul; and on the twenty-fifth of January the duke of Guiſe arrived at Turin, and ſtrengthened his army with fifteen hundred foot and three hundred light horſe, part of the forces commanded by the mareſchal de Briſſac, he proceeded to Regio, where he had a conference with the duke of Ferrara and the cardinal Caraffa, after which he accompanied the latter to Rome. On his arrival at that city he found the pope profuſe in profeſſions, but ſlow in the performance of his promiſes; neither the pecuniary nor military aids which he had engaged to furniſh, were ready. The duke of Guiſe ſoon perceived that his hopes of ſucceſs muſt entirely depend on his own exertions: he took the field with an army conſiſting of five hundred men at arms; eight or nine hundred light-horſe, and from thirteen to fourteen thouſand foot; * he opened the campaign by the reduction of Campoli, which he reſigned to pillage, and then advancing to the Neapolitan frontiers, laid ſiege to Civitella. Twice he made a general aſſault on the town, and as often was repulſed; the neglect or treachery of the Caraffas had rendered him deſtitute of the means of prolonging the ſiege, and the unexpected approach of the duke of Alva compelled him to reſign all hopes of conqueſt, and to confine himſelf to the defence of the capital.

Henry, meanwhile, had recalled a part of the veteran troops which ſerved under the mareſchal de Briſſac in Piedmont, and had ſent repeated orders to the duke of Guiſe to bring back his army, with all poſſible expedition, to France. Alarmed at the progreſs of the enemy, he had ordered the citizens of Paris to take arms, and when they were reviewed by the prince de la Roche-ſur-Yon, they were found to amount to forty thouſand men, properly equipped for the field. Fortifications were alſo begun to be erected for the protection of the capital; but the arrival of the lord of Termes, a veteran officer, from Italy, put a ſtop to the works. After viewing the ſtate of the frontiers, he was of opinion, that Paris was ſecure from inſult, and that the money about to be expended there, might be better employed in Picardy. The metropolis was ſtill covered by three towns of great ſtrength; La Fére, Compiégne and Loan; and by an entrenched camp on the river Oiſe, capable of containing one hundred thouſand men, and in which the troops assembled by the duke of Nevers were supposed to be in greater safety than in any town in the kingdom.

The duke of Guise was received in France as the guardian angel of the kingdom. His late ill-success in Italy seemed to be forgotten, while his former services, particularly his defence of Metz, were recounted with exaggerated praise; and he was welcomed in every city through which he passed, as the restorer of public security, who, after having set bounds, by his conduct and valour, to the victorious arms of Charles the Fifth, returned now, at the call of his country, to check the formidable progress of Philip's power. The reception which he experienced from Henry was no less cordial and honourable: He was appointed lieutenant general in chief, both within and without the kingdom, with a jurisdiction almost unlimited, and little inferior to that which was possessed by the king himself. The duke of Nevers, who had, for a time, enjoyed the dignity of commander in chief, resigned, without a murmur, his station to his rival. After having, during several months, by his exertions, his prudence, and the voluntary sacrifice of his property, sustained the falling fortunes of the state, he saw another preparing to reap the fruits of his labours; but, so far from being actuated by envy, he consented to serve under the duke of Guise.

By the arrival of ten thousand Germans, as many Swiss, the vetran bands from Piedmont, and the troops which had served under the duke of Guise in Italy, Henry had collected an army so formidable, he was resolved it should not remain inactive during the winter. A secret council was therefore called to settle the plan of operations, when Henry, to the surprise of all present, proposed the reduction of the city of Calais. The duke of Guise at first exclaimed against the scheme as impracticable. The plan, however, was not hastily conceived, nor was Henry the author of it. Sênarpont, governor of Boulogne, a man of great knowledge in the art of fortifying towns and taking plans, had availed himself of the short interval of peace between France and England, to visit Calais, and to examine the fortifications as closely as he could, without laying himself open to suspicion. What information he was unable to procure himself, he obtained by means of his emissaries. He had particularly observed that it was the custom of the English to dismiss the greater part of the garrison towards the end of autumn, and to replace it in the spring, in order to save expence; and he judged, therefore, that the winter would be the only season to make any attempt on it. The duke of Guise consented to make the experiment, but without being answerable for the event, from the conviction, that in an operation so complicated, the smallest accident might overturn the whole plan.

A. D. 1558.] While the duke of Guise was employed in making preparations for his intended expedition, the states-general assembled in Paris, and after some deliberation consented to grant the king three millions of crowns of gold, one third of which the clergy agreed to advance as a free gift. The duke of Guise having, at length, assembled his troops, sent the duke of Nevers, with the greater part of the army, towards Luxembourg, as if his intention had been to penetrate into that province; while he placed himſelf at the head of a ſecond diviſion, and took the road to Picardy, under pretence of viſiting the different towns, and reinforcing the garriſons. After amuſing the enemy with threatning ſucceſſively different places on the frontiers of Flanders, the two diviſions joined, when the duke of Guiſe ſuddenly turned to the left, and inveſted Calais with his whole army. As the country adjacent to the city was overflowed during the winter, the marſhes around it became impaſſible, except by one avenue, which the forts of Saint Agatha and Newnham-bridge commanded. The duke, ſenſible that the ſucceſs of his enterpriſe depended on conducting his operations with ſuch rapidity as would afford the Engliſh no time for throwing relief into the town by ſea, and prevent Philip from giving him any interuption by land he puſhed the attack with a degree of vigour little known in carrying on ſieges during that age. He drove the Engliſh from fort Saint Agatha at the firſt aſſault; he obliged them to abandon the fort of Newnham-bridge, after defending it three days; he took the caſtle which commanded the harbour by ſtorm; and, on the eighth day after he appeared before Calais, compelled the governor to ſurrender, as his feeble garriſon, which did not exceed five hundred men, was worn out with fatigue of ſuſtaining ſo many attacks, and defending ſuch extenſive works.

The duke of Guiſe, without allowing the Engliſh time to recover from the conſternation occaſioned by this blow, immediately inveſted Guiſneſs, the garriſon of which, though more numerous, defended itſelf with leſs vigour, and, after ſtanding one briſk aſſault, gave up the town. The caſtle of Hames was abandoned by the troops poſted there, without waiting the approach of the enemy.

Henry imitated the policy of its former conquerer, with regard to Calais. He commanded all the Engliſh inhabitants to quit the town, and giving their houſes to his own ſubjects, whom he allured to ſettle there by granting them various immunities, he left a numerous garriſon, under the gallant officer the mareſchal de Termes, for their defence. After this, his victorious army went into quarters of refreſhment, and the uſual inaction of winter returned.

By this event the duke of Guiſe acquired new conſideration and importance; but though the marriage of his niece to the heir apparent of the crown raiſed him ſo far beyond the condition of other ſubjects, as ſeemed to render the credit which he had gained by his ſplendid atcheivements no leſs permanent than it was extenſive, yet he ſoon perceived the difficulty of inſinuating himſelf into the confidence of the king, which ſeemed to be monopolized by the conſtable. The faults and the misfortunes of Montmorenci, far from weakening Henry's eſteem and attachment for that miniſter, had only ſerved to give them additional energy. Henry even ſubmitted to the voluntary degradation of ſerving his friend in the capacity of a ſpy; informing him daily of every thing that was ſaid and done to his prejudice. The ducheſs of Valentinois, enraged at the conduct of the Guiſes, who began to treat her with diſdain, in order to obtain the good graces of Catharine of Medicis, ſupported, to the utmoſt of her power, the tottering faction of the conſtable, and contributed, in no ſmall degree, to the preſervation of his influence. Some letters, forming a part of this ſecret correſpondence, are ſtill extant in the royal library at Paris, written partly by the king and partly by the ducheſs, and ſubſcribed "*Your old and beſt friends Diana and Henry."

When the campaign opened, however, ſoon after the dauphin's marriage, the duke of Guiſe was placed at the head of the army, with the ſame unlimited power as before. Henry had received ſuch liberal ſupplies from his ſubjects, that the troops under his command were both numerous and well appointed; while Philip, exhauſted by the extraordinary efforts of the preceding year, had been obliged to diſmiſs ſo many of his forces during the winter, that he could not bring an army into the field capable of making head againſt the enemy. The duke of Guiſe did not loſe the favourable opportunity which his ſuperiority afforded him; urged by Vieilleville, governor of Metz, who had long entertained ſpies in the town, and obtained every neceſſary information, he inveſted Thionville, in the duchy of Luxembourg, one of the ſtrongeſt towns on the frontier of the Netherlands, and of great importance to France, by its vicinity to Metz; and notwithſtanding the obſtinate valour with which it was defended, he forced it to capitulate on the twenty-ſecond of June, after a ſiege of three weeks.

But the ſucceſs of this enterpriſe, which it was expected would lead to other conqueſts, was more than counterbalanced by an event that happened in another part of the Low-Countries. The mareſchal de Termes, governor of Calais, having penetrated into Flanders without oppoſition, with an army conſiſting of ſix hundred light-horſe, and from ſix to ſeven thouſand infantry†, ſeized and pillaged the town of Bergue-Saint-Vinoch, and then inveſting Dunkirk, took it by ſtorm, on the fifth day of the ſiege. The mareſchal perceiving that the ſoldiers, ſolely intent on preſerving the rich booty they had acquired, neglected all military diſcipline, took the precaution to ſend it to Calais; and at the ſame time wrote to the king, to inform him that Dunkirk, from its advantageous ſituation, might, in a ſhort time, and at a little expence, be rendered a place of importance. Unhappily for France, Henry had, at this period, no perſon near him with whom he could adviſe on the buſineſs; for the cardinal of Lorraine, who officiated as prime miniſter, was totally ignorant of all military concerns. At the expiration of twelve days the king's anſwer arrived, containing a permiſſion to the mareſchal to fortify Dunkirk, for which purpoſe the ſum of two thouſand crowns were remitted to him. But it was now too late; Lalain, lord of Bénicourt, had entered Gravelines with four thouſand men, while the count of Egmont, the moſt active of all Philip's generals, having received a regiment of cavalry from the duke of Savoy, and having aſſembled all the garriſons of the neighbouring towns, advanced to the banks of the river Aa, in order to cut off the retreat of the French. At this critical conjuncture de Termes was ſeized with a violent fit of the gout that nearly deprived him of the uſe of his limbs; he therefore gave up the command of the troops to John d'Eſtouteville, lord of Villehon with orders to retreat along the ſea-coaſt, and to profit by the falling of the tide to ford the Aa, by which means he would get the ſtart of the count of Egmont, who lay in wait for him at that part of the river which the army had croſſed on their road to Dunkirk. The mareſchal, however, followed the next day in a litter, and overtook his troops juſt as the baggage and rear guard were paſſing the ſtream; but he had no ſooner gained the oppoſite bank than he deſcried the enemy, who, fearful leaſt he ſhould eſcape them, had left all their artillery behind. Finding an action unavoidable, de Termes now drew up his army in the moſt advantageous manner; with the ſea at their backs, their right wing extended along the banks of the river, and their left covered by the baggage-waggons. In this poſition, the French ſuſtained the impetuous attack of an enemy whoſe numbers were double their own; repulſed, with conſiderable ſlaughter, their foremoſt battalions, and were on the point of obtaining a victory, when one of thoſe accidents which human foreſight cannot anticipate, nor human prudence avert, gave a different turn to the conteſt. A ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips of war, which were cruizing on the coaſt, being drawn by the noiſe of the firing towards the ſcene of action, entered the river Aa, and turned its great guns againſt the right wing of the French with ſuch effect, as immediately broke that body, and ſpread terror and diſmay through the whole army. The Flemings, to whom aſſiſtance ſo unexpected and ſo ſeaſonable gave freſh courage, redoubled their efforts, that they might not loſe the advantage which fortune had preſented them, or give the enemy time to recover from their conſternation; and the rout of the French ſoon became general. Near two thouſand of them were killed on the ſpot; and the reſt were taken priſoners, together with the mareſchal de Termes, Villebon, Annebaud, Morvilliers, and the count of Chaunes.

The victory obtained by the count of Egmont over the mareſchal de Termes, obliged the duke of Guiſe to relinquiſh all other ſchemes, and to haſten towards the frontier of Picardy, that he might oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy in that province. This diſaſter reflected new luſtre on his reputation, and once more turned the eyes of his countrymen towards him, as the only general on whoſe arms victory always attended, and in whoſe conduct, as well as good fortune, they could confide in every danger. Henry reinforced Guiſe's army with ſo many Germans and Swiſs, that it ſoon amounted to forty thouſand men, whom Guiſe encamped on the banks of the Somme, from Amiens to Pont-Remi. The enemy's army, after the junction of the count of Egmont with the duke of Savoy, was not inferior in number, and they pitched their camp at the diſtance of ſix leagues from the French. Each monarch having joined his army, it was expected that a deciſive action would, at laſt, determine which of the rivals ſhould take the aſcendant for the future, and give law to Europe. But though both had it in their power, neither of them diſcovered any inclination to bring the determination of ſuch an important point to depend upon the uncertain and fortuitous iſſue of a ſingle battle. Who made the firſt overtures for a peace, however, it is not known, nor is it of any conſequence to aſcertain.

Henry and Philip beheld Elizabeth's elevation to the throne with equal ſolicitude. As during Mary's jealous adminiſtration, under the moſt difficult circumſtances, that princeſs had conducted herſelf with great prudence and addreſs, they had conceived a high idea of her abilities, and already formed expectations of a reign very different from that of her ſiſter. Equally ſenſible of the importance of gaining her favour, both monarchs ſet themſelves with emulation to court it, and employed every art, in order to inſinuate themſelves into her confidence. Each of them had ſomething meritorious, with regard to Elizabeth, to plead in his own behalf. Henry had offered her a retreat into his dominions, if the dread of her ſiſter's violence ſhould force her to fly for ſafety out of England. Philip, by his powerful interceſſion, had prevented Mary from proceeding to the moſt fatal extremities againſt her. Each of them now endeavoured to avail himſelf of the circumſtances in his favour. Henry wrote to Elizabeth ſoon after her acceſſion, with the warmeſt expreſſions of friendſhip and regard. He repreſented the war which had unhappily been kindled between their kingdoms, not as a national quarrel, but as the effect of Mary's blind partiality to her huſband, and fond compliance with all his wiſhes. He entreated her to diſengage herſelf from an alliance which had proved ſo unfortunate to England, and to conſent for a ſeparate peace with him, without mingling her intereſts with thoſe of Spain, from which they ought now to be altogether disjoined. Philip, on the other hand, unwilling to loſe his connection with England, the importance of which, during a rupture with France, he had recently experienced, not only vied with Henry in declarations of eſteem for Elizabeth, and in profeſſions of his reſolution to cultivate the ſtricteſt amity with her, but, in order to confirm and perpetuate their union, he offered himſelf to her in marriage, and undertook to procure a diſpenſation from the pope to that effect.

Elizabeth weighed the propoſals of the two monarchs with all the attention that their importance deſerved. She gave ſome encouragement to Henry's overture for a ſeparate negociation, becauſe it opened a channel of correſpondence with France, which ſhe might find to be of great advantage, if Philip ſhould not diſcover ſufficient zeal and ſolicitude for ſecuring to her proper terms in the joint treaty. But ſhe ventured on this ſtep with the moſt cautious reſerve, that ſhe might not alarm Philip's ſuſpicious temper, and loſe an ally in attempting to gain an enemy. In order to give her time to come to a deciſion on this point, it was agreed to ſuſpend the conferrences for two months, and to aſſemble, either at Cercamp, or at ſome more convenient place, towards the end of January.

Henry, in the courſe of this buſineſs, conducted himſelf with a degree of meanneſs and duplicity, wholly unworthy a monarch. The Guiſes, appriſed by one of their emiſſaries of the tranſaction which had paſſed between the king and the conſtable, during their late interview at Beauvais, were enraged at the idea that a man, whoſe imprudence had brought the ſtate to the brink of deſtruction, ſhould reap the rewards which had been refuſed to thoſe whoſe conduct and courage had reſtored it to its former ſplendour: for the duke himſelf had been anxious to obtain the place of grand-maſter of the houſhold, which gave a conſiderable influence to the perſon who held it, by ſubjecting to his will almoſt all the principal officers of the court. Having reſolved to come to an explanation with Henry, he begged that monarch to believe that the humble requeſt which he was about to prefer was not, in the ſmalleſt degree, influenced by jealouſy ; but that been choſen, by his majeſty himſelf, to act as grand-maſter of the houſhold, on the marriage of the dauphin with the queen of Scotland, he could not but feel ſenſibly mortified at ſeeing any other perſon veſted with that dignity : that he had, therefore, experienced the moſt lively concern on hearing that his majeſty had promiſed it to the conſtable's eldeſt ſon, becauſe the whole kingdom would believe that nobody would have received a preferrence over himſelf, unleſs he had given cauſe for diſpleaſure, or had been deemed unworthy of the office. The king, embarraſſed, at firſt denied that any converſation had paſſed between him and the conſtable on the ſubject ; but obſerved that if the conſtable had aſked the place for his ſon, he was ſo ſtrongly attached to the young man, and his father had rendered ſuch eſſential ſervice to the ſtate, that he could with difficulty have refuſed him. The duke of Guiſe preſſed the matter no farther ; and the king, after denying, in the moſt poſitive manner, that he had diſpoſed of the place in queſtion, did not dare to inveſt young Montmorenci with the promiſed dignity*.

The conſtable, on giving ſecurity to the king of Spain for the payment of the ſum ſtipulated for his ramſon, was releaſed from priſon, whence he haſtened to court. During his captivity, he had formed the project of an alliance which was calculated to confirm his influence, and ſecure him a ſuperiority over his rivals : this was the marriage of his ſecond ſon, Danville, with Antoinette, de la Mark, grand-daughter to the ducheſs of Valentinois. Danville, who had ſignalized his courage in the wars of Italy, whence he had been recalled after the fatal battle of Saint-Quintin, had made ſuch an impreſſion on the heart of his intended bride, and had ſo far ingratiated himſelf with her relations, that, though a younger ſon, he obtained a preference over the moſt opulent noblemen who frequented the court, and even over ſome of the princes of the blood, who aſpired to obtain her hand. Appriſed of theſe circumſtances, the conſtable went to ſign the marriage contract, and to aſſiſt at the nuptials, which were celebrated at his caſtle of Ecouen.

The Guiſes, on their ſide, availing themſelves of the favour they now enjoyed, and for the poſſeſſion of which they were ſolely indebted to their recent ſervices, preſſed the concluſion of the marriage of Charles the Third, duke of Lorraine, the head of their family, with the princeſs Claude, ſecond daughter to the king : the young duke, who, for the laſt ſeven years, had been brought up with the dauphin, received, as a marriage-portion with his wife, the ſum of one hundred thouſand crowns, and the town of Stenay, one of the keys of the province of Champagne, which formerly belonged to the dukes of Lorraine.

A. D. 1559.] Elizabeth, meanwhile, had inſtructed the Engliſh plenipotentiaries to act in every point in concert with the plenipotentiaries of Spain, and to take no ſtep until they had previouſly conſulted with them. But though ſhe deemed it prudent to aſſume this appearance of confidence in the Spaniſh monarch, ſhe knew preciſely how far to carry it; and diſcovered no inclination to accept of that extraordinary propoſal of marriage which Philip had made to her. The Engliſh had expreſſed ſo openly their deteſtation of her ſiſter's choice of him, that it would have been highly imprudent to exaſperate them by a renewal of that odious alliance. She was too well acquainted with Philip's harſh and imperious temper, to think of him for a huſband: nor could ſhe admit a diſpenſation from the pope to be ſufficient to authorize her marrying him, without condemning her father's divorce from Catharine to Arragon, and acknowledging, of conſequence, the nullity of her mother's marriage, and the illegitimacy of her own birth. But, though ſhe determined not to yield to Philip's addreſſes, the ſituation of her affairs rendered it dangerous to reject them; and ſhe returned in anſwer, therefore, in terms which were evaſive, but ſo tempered with reſpect, that though they gave him no reaſon to be ſecure of ſucceſs, they did not altogether extinguiſh his hopes.

By this artifice, as well as by the prudence with which ſhe concealed her ſentiments and intentions with regard to religious concerns, for ſome time after her acceſſion, ſhe ſo far gained upon Philip that he warmly eſpouſed her intereſt in the conferences which were renewed at Cercamp, and afterwards removed, on the ſixth of February, to Cateau-Cambreſis. A definitive treaty, which was to adjuſt the claims and pretenſions of ſo many princes, required the examination of ſuch a variety of intricate points, and led to ſuch infinite and minute details, as ſpun out the negociations to a great length. But the indefatigable exertions of the conſtable Montmorenci, who alternately repaired to the courts of Paris and Bruſſels, in order to obviate or remove every difficulty, the chief points in diſpute were at length adjuſted.

The claims of England remained as the only obſtacle to retard the treaty. Elizabeth demanded the reſtitution of Calais, in the moſt peremptory terms, as an eſſential condition of her conſenting to peace; Henry refuſed to give up that important conqueſt; and both ſeemed to have taken their reſolution with unalterable firmneſs. Philip warmly ſupported Elizabeth's pretenſions to Calais, not merely from a principle of equity towards the Engliſh nation, that he might appear to have contributed to their recovering what they had loſt by eſpouſing his cauſe; nor ſolely with a view of ſoothing Elizabeth by his manifeſtation of zeal for her intereſt; but in order to render France leſs formidable, by ſecuring to her ancient enemy this eaſy acceſs into the heart of the kingdom. The earneſtneſs, however, with which he ſeconded the arguments of the Engliſh plenipotentiaries ſoon began to relax. During the courſe of the negociation, Elizabeth, who now felt herſelf firmly ſeated on her throne, began to take ſuch open and vigorous meaſures, not only for overturning all that her ſiſter had done in favour of popery, but for eſtabliſhing the proteſtant church on a firm foundation, as convinced Philip that his hopes of an union with her had been from the beginning vain, and were now deſperate.

Pending the negociation, the mareſchal de Briſſac, who commanded in Piedmont, appriſed of the ſacrifices which France was about to make, and fearful of being deprived of his government, ſent his ſecretary, Boivin, to the king: he obſerved to Henry, that the country propoſed to be ceded to the enemy was equal in value to any one of the beſt provinces in his dominions; and would, in time of peace, produce a revenue of five hundred thouſand crowns, three hundred thouſand whereof, or even more, would be paid into the treaſury, every year; that the finances of the Spaniſh monarch were in ſuch a deplorable ſtate, that the continuance of the war for another year would ſuffice to make him alter his tone, and ſubmit to ſuch conditions as France might chooſe to exact. "Do not be offended, Sire,"—ſaid the duke of Guiſe, who was preſent at the time—"if I declare that the conduct you "are made to purſue proves the contrary; and that a ſingle ſtroke of your pen is "about to take from you more than you could poſſibly loſe by an unſucceſsful war "of thirty years. Put me in one of the weakeſt places which you are adviſed to "reſign, and let your enemies diſlodge me if they can. In the offer I now make, "I ſhall be joined by hundreds of your ſervants, as well on this as on the other "ſide of the Alps." Henry remained ſilent, and exhibited evident marks of confuſion: and the duke believing him to be ſhaken, told him to truſt to his brother and him for providing the requiſite funds for raiſing and ſupporting an army of equal ſtrength to that of the preceding year; that they would even, he ſaid, ſave him the trouble of convening the ſtates-general a ſecond time, having already opened a negociation with certain bankers who had conſented to advance as much money as would be wanted; and he had formed a plan of operations for the enſuing campaign, the ſucceſs whereof appeared to him to be infallible, and would put him in a ſituation to give law to the enemy.

Theſe offers, from a man who had always been accuſtomed to perform more than he promiſed, ſeemed to decide the king; who, to give an apparent ſatisfaction to the duke of Guiſe, immediately diſpatched Boivin with orders to his plenipotentiaries to exerciſe their power with great diſcretion; but, in a private letter which he ſent, at the ſame time, to the conſtable, he gave him an account of this converſation, which he repreſented as a new ſcheme of the Guiſes in order to keep the reins of government in their own hands; and he therefore urged Montmorenci to accelerate the treaty as much as poſſible*.

The treaty of peace between France and England contained no article of real importance, but that which reſpected Calais. It was ſtipulated, that Henry ſhould keep poſſeſſion of that town, with all its dependencies, during eight years; that, at the expiration of that term, he ſhould reſtore it to England; that in caſe of nonperformance, he ſhould forfeit five hundred thouſand crowns, for the payment of which ſum ſeven or eight wealthy merchants, who were not his ſubjects, ſhould grant ſecurity; that five perſons of diſtinction ſhould be given as hoſtages until that ſecurity were provided; that, although the forfeit of five hundred thouſand crowns ſhould be paid, the right of England to Calais ſhould ſtill remain entire, in the ſame manner as if the term of eight years were expired; that the king and queen of Scotland ſhould be included in the treaty; that if they, or the French king, ſhould violate the peace by any hoſtile action, Henry ſhould be obliged inſtantly to reſtore Calais; that, on the other hand, if any breach of the treaty proceeded from Elizabeth, then Henry, and the king and queen of Scots, were abſolved from all the engagements which they had contracted by this treaty.

The expedient employed by Montmorenci for the purpoſe of facilitating the concluſion of peace between France and Spain, was the negociating two treaties of marriage, one between Elizabeth, Henry's eldeſt daughter, and Philip, who ſupplanted his ſon, the unfortunate Don Carlos, to whom that princeſs had been promiſed in the former conferrences at Cercamp; the other between Margaret, Henry's only ſiſter, and the duke of Savoy. Henry having, by this means, ſecured an honourable eſtabliſhment for his ſiſter and his daughter, granted, in conſideration of theſe marriages, terms both to Philip and the duke of Savoy, of which he would not, on any other account, have ventured to approve.

The principal articles in the treaty between Henry and Philip were, that a ſincere and perpetual amity ſhould be eſtabliſhed between the two crowns and their reſpective allies; the two monarchs ſhould labour in concert to procure the convocation of a general council, in order to check the progreſs of hereſy, and reſtore unity and concord to the Chriſtian Church; that all the conqueſts made by either party on this ſide of the Alps, ſince the commencement of the war, in 1551, ſhould be mutually reſtored.

Thus, by this famous treaty, peace was re-eſtabliſhed in Europe. All the cauſes of diſcord which had ſo long embroiled the powerful monarchs of France and Spain, which had tranſmitted hereditary quarrels and wars from Charles to Philip, and from Francis to Henry, ſeemed to be wholly removed or finally terminated.

Soon after the concluſion of the treaty, the duke of Savoy repaired, with a numerous, retinue, to Paris, in order to celebrate his marriage with Henry's ſiſter. The duke of Alva was ſent to the ſame capital, at the head of a ſplendid embaſſy, to eſpouſe the princeſs Elizabeth, in the name of his maſter the king of Spain; the ceremony was performed, on the twenty-ſixth of June, by the cardinal of Bourbon, at the church of Notre Dame. The greateſt rejoicings and feſtivities took place on this occaſion, and on the twenty-ninth of June a grand tournament was holden in the Rue Saint-Antoine, at which the king bore away the palm of victory. But as he was retiring from the circle, he perceived two lances, at one end of the liſts which were unbroken; one of theſe he took himſelf, and the other he ſent to Montgomery, the captain of his guards, a man eminently ſkilled in all martial exerciſes, inviting him to break it with his ſovereign in honour of the ladies. Montgomery heſitated for ſome time, and even twice refuſed to obey the ſummons; the queens of Scotland and France too, who were preſent, ſent to entreat the king to content himſelf with the glory he had already acquired, and to run no farther riſk; Henry, however, perſiſted, and, at length, ſent a poſitive order to Montgomery to prepare for the aſſault: he obeyed; the attack was violent; their lances were ſhivered in pieces: but the king's vizor having been deranged by the ſhock, one of the broken pieces of his adverſary's lance pierced his forehead, juſt above the left eye, and he fell ſenſeleſs on the ground. He was immediately conveyed to his palace, and the ſurgeons, after examining the wound, declared it, though dangerous, not incurable; but an abceſs having unexpectedly formed in the head, their utmoſt ſkill proved ineffectual, and, on the 10th of July, Henry expired, in the forty-firſt year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign.

The character of this monarch may be traced in a few words: he had more in his diſpoſition of the warrior than the ſtateſman; active and intrepid in the field, but weak and irreſolute in the council: better formed for obedience than command, a culpable facility of temper ſubjected him to perpetual impoſition, and betrayed him into ſituations by which he was not only degraded as a monarch, but diſgraced as a man. The beſt feature in his character was his conſtancy in friendſhip, and the worſt, his cruelty in religion.

The doctrine of the Reformers began to ſpread with great celerity in France, during the reign of Henry the Second; and from a principle, juſtly applied to religious ſectaries, in whom oppoſition begets perſeverance, the perſecuting ſpirit of that monarch, who piqued himſelf upon the orthodoxy of his religious tenets, far from ſtemming the torrent it was intended to check, only ſerved to encreaſe the rapidity of its progreſs. The French Reformers being chiefly Calviniſts, and their principles, of courſe, being farther removed from thoſe of the eſtabliſhed church, than the principles of the more moderate Proteſtants, could not fail to be highly diſguſting to ſuch as were firmly reſolved to adhere to the religion of their country.

A ſyſtem of perſecution was accordingly entered upon and purſued with unrelenting ſeverity, by Henry and his principal miniſters, who publickly declared war againſt heretics of every denomination. The cognizance of the crime of hereſy had been ſometimes entruſted to the parliaments, and ſometimes to the biſhops' courts; and theſe rival juriſdictions had, from a ſpirit jealouſy, generally contrived to thwart the operations of and impoſe a reſtraint upon each other. With a view to remedy the inconveniences ariſing from the jealouſy, and to enforce the execution of the laws againſt heretics, Henry the Second, in the year 1551, iſſued the famous edict of Châteaubriand, by which two courts were ſtrictly enjoined, in all ſimilar proſecutions, to act in conjuction, and to afford each other all poſſible aſſiſtance. The preſidials—tribunals eſtabliſhed in the different provinces during this reign—were empowered to decide definitively in matters of hereſy, and even pronounce ſentence of death on the perſons convicted of that crime, provided not leſs than ten judged were preſent at the time; and, in order to effect the expulſion of the Reformers from the kingdom, all lords high-juſticiaries were ſtrictly enjoined to inform againſt ſuch as were ſuſpected of hereſy, throughout their reſpective lordſhips, and to ſend their informations to the neareſt preſidial, that the culprits might be proceeded againſt without delay.

Many of thoſe who favoured the new doctrines, and were afraid of being expoſed to the dangers of a trial, extended by every circumſtance of prejudice and partiality, fled to Geneva or to Switzerland, after transferring his property and eſtates to their friends who remitted them the produce thereof. Some, indeed, really ſold their eſtates at a very inferior price, from the idea that it was better to ſave a part than to run the riſk of loſing the whole. All the property belonging to theſe fugitives was ordered to be ſeized; and if the officers employed in executing this commiſſion met with any obſtacle from perſons who pretended to have purchaſed ſuch property, the judges were ſtrongly enjoined by the edict to inveſtigate, with the utmoſt vigour, the validity of their titles, and, in caſe they ſhould diſcover any colluſion between the purchaſer and vender, not only to ſeize the property in diſpute, but to impoſe a heavy fine upon the purchaſer: whoever gave information, and ſubſtantiated ſuch information by proof, that any of the king's ſubjects ſent money to Geneva, was entitled to a third of the amount: any perſon informing againſt a heretic was alſo entitled to a third of his property, but, in ſome meaſure to check the abominable oppreſſions which ſuch a regulation would neceſſarily occaſion, it was decreed that if the informer failed to convict the perſon he had accuſed, he ſhould be ſubjected to the ſame puniſhment as that perſon would have incurred, had his guilt been confirmed.

The executions, in conſequence of this rigorous and oppreſſive edict, were numerous; but ſtill the number of proteſtants, as well in the capital as in the provinces, continued to encreaſe. Enraged at the inefficacy of their meaſures, and ſtimulated by the proſpect of confiſcations, the produce whereof the king had reſigned to his favourite courtiers. The magiſtrates themſelves, were infected with the new opinions, and far from enforcing the execution of his edicts, acted in concert with the proteſtant miniſters: that the preſidials, through fear of being engaged in a diſpute with the ſovereign courts, ſeldom exerciſed the power which had been conferred on them of trying heretics in dernier reſort; that the eccleſiaſtical tribunals in vain cauſed the culprits to be apprehended and proceeded againſt with becoming ſeverity, ſince, by means of an appeal which the judges were compelled to reſpect, they were taken from their juriſdiction, when the ſecular judges always diſcovered ſome mode of clearing them from the accuſation: that religion would be deſtroyed in France, unleſs reſource were had to the only remedy which preſerved it pure and unpolluted, throughout Spain, and the greater part of Italy: that for this purpoſe, it was only neceſſary to make two alterations in the edict of Châteaubriand, which the calamity of the times rendered indiſpenſable; that the firſt of theſe alterations conſiſted in putting a ſtop to all appeals from the ſentences of the eccleſiaſtical courts, which ought to be ſent to the neareſt ſecular judge, who ſhould be compelled to enforce their execution: the ſecond in confiſcating the property of all perſons, indiſcriminately, who ſhould leave the kingdom, through the dread of perſecution, in order to ſettle in foreign countries; and in ſeizing ſuch property, for the king's uſe, wherever it might be found, even though it were in poſſeſſion of a perſon who had given a valuable conſideration for the ſame. As ſoon as this reſolution had been adopted by the council, a ſecret conference was holden at the houſe of Bertrand, keeper of the ſeals, at which certain magiſtrates, who were ſworn enemies to the new doctrines, were invited to attend; and two new edicts were there drawn up, which were preſented to the parliament to be regiſtered, at a time when moſt of the judges were abſent. This attempt, however, being foiled, the matter was argued on the eleventh of September; when Denis Riant, advocate-general, in ſupport of the edicts, obſerved, that they were the reſult of the deliberations of the moſt enlightened men in the kingdom; that the king had been led to paſs them from the conviction that there was no other preſervative to be found againſt the progreſs of a contagion which infected the capital and ſpread over the provinces: that if any objections could be raiſed againſt the edicts, it was the too great extenſion of its juriſdiction of the ſpiritual courts, by ſubjecting to them, indiſcriminately, all orders of citizens: but it could not be denied that it was highly expedient with regard to apoſtate monks, and other fanatics, who, aſſuming the right of dogmatiſing, perverted the conſciences of his majeſty's ſubjects, and diffuſed trouble and confuſion throughout the realm: that the court, as might be proved from the regiſters, did not diſapprove of the inquiſition, provided it were directed by the rules laid down in the canons: that he was therefore juſtified in his expectation, that the court would, after making ſuch reſtrictions as it might think proper with regard to the too great extenſion of the power of the ſpiritual tribunal, proceed to regiſter the edict in queſtion. It was however decided in the parliament, by a very conſiderable majority, that the edict ſhould not be regiſtered, but that the court would addreſs the king, and indicate ſome other means of promoting the extirpation of hereſy, more conformable to the ſpirit of Chriſtianity.

Accordingly, on the ſeventeenth of October, 1555, the preſident Séguier, and the counſellor Dudrac had an audience of the king at Villers-Cuterets, when the former thus addreſſed his majeſty, in the name of the parliament;

"Sire, The difficulties naturally attending the commiſſion with which we are entruſted, are conſiderably augmented by the ſiniſter impreſſions which your majeſty has been led to encourage againſt your parliament. Were the ſole object of our commiſſion the juſtification of thoſe by whom we are ſent, it would ſuffice to obſerve that the edict which they refuſed to regiſter is preciſely the ſame as that which was rejected by a part of the court ſome months ago; and that it would be impoſſible to act otherwiſe without making your parliament fall into a contradiction with itſelf, and without introducing into the kingdom, and into the ſame ſanctuary of juſtice, two tribunals oppoſed to each other. But this reaſon, powerful as it was with regard to ourſelves, is not that which we mean to employ, ſince it would only juſtify us at the expence of our brethren, and would rather conſtitute an excuſe than form an apology. In fact, it is not, becauſe the edict has before been rejected that we have thought proper to reject it alſo, but becauſe, after a cloſe examination, it appeared to us, as it did to our brethren, that it could not be admitted without depriving your ſubjects of their liberty, and your majeſty of the nobleſt rights of that ſovereignty which we are conſtitutionally bound to defend and protect. But before I enter on the reaſons by which our conduct has been influenced, let me be permitted to offer one previous reflection.

"Your parliament, Sire, is compoſed of one hundred and ſixty magiſtrates, who were not admitted as members of the court, until they had furniſhed ſatisfactory proofs of their capacity, and ample atteſtations of the purity of their lives and manners; who are, in ſhort, men of that deſcription, that your majeſty would ſcarcely find it poſſible to replace them throughout the whole extent of your dominions: what mortal, then, can be ſo preſumptuous as to oppoſe his private judgment to that of ſo large a body of men, devoted, from their infancy to the ſtudy of the laws, and employed, from morning to night, in diſtinguiſhing what is juſt and lawful, from what is unjuſt and prohibited? As for me, I have formed ſo high an opinion of the integrity and knowledge of that auguſt ſenate, that if it had pronounced a ſentance of death againſt me, I ſhould be led to doubt my own innocence, and, in ſome degree, to reject the teſtimony of my conſcience. Thoſe men who wiſhed to perſuade your majeſty to eſtabliſh the inquiſition, were aware they could only ſucceed in their attempt, by rendering the religion of your magiſtrates ſuſpected; by repreſenting them either as heretics in diſguiſe, or as men floating between error and truth, and perfectly indifferent on the article of faith. That, Sire, is an accuſation, ever eaſy to hazard, but which no honeſt man would ever advance unleſs he were able to ſubſtantiate the charge by clean and convincive proofs. The orthodoxy of your magiſtrates has been proved, and they are obliged to give a certificate with regard to the ſtability and purity of their faith; it muſt, therefore, be ſuppoſed, either that they have been perverted ſince their reception, or that they have given falſe certificates; if a door be once opened to ſuſpicions of that nature, what man will be free from them, or in whom can you place your confidence? we know our brethren much better than thoſe who ſpeak of them with ſuch diſreſpect; and if your majeſty will give credit to our oaths, we ſhall not heſitate to ſwear by all that we hold ſacred, that we have never perceived any thing in the conduct of the parliament, that could poſſibly occaſion or juſtify ſimilar ſuſpicions. Not that we pledge ourſelves that, in a ſociety ſo numerous, there are no fantaſtical nor whimſical minds, which entertain peculiar ſentiments on the article of faith; God is the the ſole judge of men's conſciences; and it would be wonderful indeed if, in an age when the rage for reaſoning is become an epidemic diſorder, not a ſingle man could be found among us who, impelled by prejudice and preſumption, had ſtrayed from the right road; but will venture to aſſert, that we do not know any one magiſtrate but what profeſſes and practiſes the true religion; in ſhort, I ſhould ſooner be made to believe that anti-Chriſt is arrived, and the world is juſt at an end, than to give credit to any of the abſurdities which have been related to you. It is you, Sire, who appoint magiſtrates: when you choſe the preſent members of your parliament, you deemed them worthy your confidence; to that confidence, then, they have an undoubted right, until it ſhall have been proved that they deſerve to loſe it; and you cannot deprive them of it, either wholly or partially, without prejudice to your own authority and power. For how can their deciſions be reſpected by the inferior judges, and by the reſt of your ſubjects, if it be ſuſpected that they are the deciſions of men of doubtful characters, and who are themſelves acting in oppoſition to the laws of the realm? it is evident therefore, that the perfidious and malicious inſinuations which have been conveyed to you have a direct tendency to ſubvert all order, and expoſe your authority to contempt.

"Such, Sire, are the real motives by which we have been deterred from paying obedience to your orders, and we never doubted but that, as ſoon as we ſhould be permitted to explain them to you, they would make the ſame impreſſion on your mind as on our own. Your parliament laments the rapid progreſs of hereſy, and has long preceived the neceſſity of oppoſing it with ſtrength and efficacy; but cannot this be done without ſhaking the foundations of the monarchy? Grant, if you will, permiſſion to the biſhops and Inquiſitors to inflict capital puniſhments on men of their own profeſſion—though even with regard to them it would be infinitely more juſt to leave open the way of appeal—but never ſuffer your lay-ſubjects to be tried except by your own tribunals, and by men who hold of you alone their commiſſions and their powers. To this firſt expedient, ſuggeſted by the court, another muſt be added, of much greater efficacy.

As for you, gentlemen," addreſſing himſelf to the miniſters and courtiers who were preſent, "who liſten to me with ſo much tranquillity, and who think, propably, that the matter does not concern you, it is proper that you ſhould be undeceived. As long as you are in favour, you wiſely make the moſt of your time; honours and rewards are laviſhed on your heads: you are reſpected by all who approach you; and no one thinks of attacking you: but the higher your ſtation, the nearer you are to the thunder, and a man muſt be ignorant of hiſtory not to know on what trivial circumſtances the diſgrace of a courtier frequently depends. Formerly, however, when this diſaſter befell you, you could, at leaſt, retire with a fortune, that conſoled you, in a certain degree, for the loſs you had ſuſtained, and that enabled you to enrich your heirs. But were this edict to paſs, from that moment your ſituation would be altered; yon would, as before, be ſucceeded by needy men, of hungry minds, who, knowing not how long they may remain in office, will burn with the deſire of making a ſudden fortune, and will find it a very eaſy matter to gratify that deſire: certain of obtaining from the king the confiſcation of your property, it will only be neceſſary to ſecure in their intereſt one Inquiſitor and two witneſſes, and though you were ſaints, you would be burned as heretics.

At theſe words, the conſtable Montmorenci, who had not forgotten his own diſgrace, in the preceding reign, knitted his brows and changed colour; and the other miniſters ſhuddered with horror. The king himſelf exhibited evident marks of confuſion, and thanking the parliament for their remonſtrances, promiſed to pay attention to them. Nothing farther, however, was done in the buſineſs, till the year 1557, when the number of Calviniſts having conſiderably encreaſed, the king, by his letters-patent, enjoined all prelates to repair to their dioceſes, and either to diſcharge the duties of their office in perſon, or to appoint grand-vicars of approved virtue and rigid principles, who were worthy to act as their ſubſtitutes: in caſe of diſobedience, the king authorized the parliament to proceed againſt them, by ſeizing their temporalities, and applying the produce thereof to the purpoſe of paying enlightened miniſters who might preach the Word of God to the people.

In the year following, after the return of the cardinal of Lorraine from Rome, a bull was publiſhed, by which Paul the Fourth, at the king's requeſt, eſtabliſhed an Inquiſition in France, after the model of that which ſubſiſted at Rome; and the cardinals of Lorraine, Bourbon, and Chatillon, were appointed preſidents of this new tribunal, with the power of chuſing vicars, either from among the biſhops, or doctors of divinity; conferring, as well on theſe inquiſitors, as on their delegates, a full power to arreſt, impriſon, and condemn all perſons, of whatever rank or quality, convicted or ſuſpected of the crime of hereſy.

This attempt to eſtabliſh the Inquiſition had been preceded, though not influenced, by a tumult in the Rue Saint-Jacques, where about four hundred Calviniſts had aſſembled, in a private houſe, in order to perform divine ſervice*: the neighbours, alarmed, or pretended to be ſo, at this unuſual aſſemblage of people, at ſuch a late hour—for it was night—ſurrounded the houſe; and, having collected a mob, aſſailed the congregation, on their attempt to leave the place after ſervice was over with ſtones and other miſſile weapons. The Calviniſts held a conſultation among themſelves, and as they knew that death would be their portion if taken, the boldeſt of them reſolved to cut their way through the mob, ſword in hand. This they eaſily effected; the cowardly rabble fled before them; but they were no ſooner out of danger, than they ſpeedily re-aſſembled, and prepared to vent their rage on the old men, women, and others, who had been reſtrained by fear from following their companions. The timely arrival of the miniſters of juſtice ſaved the unhappy victims—among whom were ſeveral females of high diſtinction—from immediate aſſaſſination; though, as they were conducted to priſon, they were expoſed to the blows and licentious inſolence of a brutal populace. To complete the miſery of their ſituation, by adding a calumny to perſecution, a report was induſtriouſly propagated, that, immediately after the celebration of their infernal orgies, the Calviniſts extinguiſhed the lights, and, mixing together indiſcriminately like brutes, each man ſeized, as the partner of his crimes, the firſt woman he could lay hold of, even though ſhe were his mother, daughter or ſiſter. Theſe atrocious calumnies were repeated from the pulpit†, and the king, prone to credulity, gave eaſy credit to tales that flattered his religious prejudices. Muſnier, a man of infamous character, who had been convicted of ſubordination of perjury, was appointed, by the cardinal of Lorraine, to try the culprits, but the parliament remonſtrated with ſuch warmth on the inſult offered to them by that appointment, that the cognizance of the cauſe was left to themſelves. Five of the wretched Calviniſts were publickly burned at the Place de Gréve, but the judge purpoſely prolonged the trials of the reſt, and, by that means, afforded them an opportunity to eſcape.

The remonſtrance, which was rather intended as an appeal to the public, than as an addreſs to the king, produced but little effect: but the unhappy priſoners found more able advocates in the proteſtant cantons of Switzerland, and the elector palatine, who ſolicited their releaſe with uncommon earneſtneſs; and the king, who was, at that time, raiſing troops in their dominions, did not think it prudent to reject their application. The calm, however, which enſued on their releaſe, was but of ſhort duration. Many princes of the blood, who favoured the new doctrines, and among others, Anthony of Bourbon and his conſort Jane d'Albret, king and queen of Navarre, with the prince and princeſs of Condé, having repaired to Paris, to be preſent at the marriage of the dauphin with the young queen of Scotland, frequented the private aſſemblies of the Calviniſts, careſſed their miniſters, and encouraged them to redouble their zeal and activity.

Calvin had, for ſome time paſt, reproached them, in his letters, with their timid circumſpection, or rather puſillanimity; and, convinced that any exploſion muſt prove advantageous to the propagation of his doctrine, which had already taken ſuch deep root in the kingdom, that it was deemed impoſſible to eradicate it, he inceſſantly exhorted them to act with firmneſs and deciſion, and boldly to publiſh their profeſſion of faith wherever they went*. Piqued at theſe reproaches, and encouraged by the preſence and exhortations of the princes of the blood, they appointed two or three ſucceſſive meetings, in a meadow, called Le Pré aux Clercs, where three or four thouſand perſons aſſembled, and ſang the Pſalms of Marot, ſet to muſic: they then marched in proceſſion through ſeveral ſtreets in the ſuburbs of Saint-Germain, attended by a great number of armed gentlemen, who threatened to cut down all that ſhould attempt to oppoſe their paſſage. The magiſtrates, alarmed at this unexpected tumult, ordered thoſe gates to be ſhut which led to the univerſity and the ſuburb of Saint-Germain, and ſent their officers to take informations on the ſpot. The biſhop of Paris immediately ſent the particulars of this tranſaction to the king, without, however, naming the principal perſons concerned in it. Henry, having compared this intelligence with the notice that Granvelle, biſhop of Arras, had recently given to the cardinal of Lorraine, of a conſpiracy on the point of breaking out, diſpatched, without delay, the cardinal Bertrand keeper of the ſeals, with three maſters of requeſts, to inveſtigate the buſineſs. Bertrand, after he had read the informations already taken by the officers of the Chatelet, went to the parliament, where he obſerved, that the cardial of Lorraine, having had a freſh conferrence with the Biſhop of Arras, prime miniſter to the king of Spain, on the ſubject of peace, had received intelligence from that prelate of a conſpiracy then forming by the proteſtants, which would ſoon break out: that the day after the cardinal's return to the court, the king had received a letter from the biſhop of Paris, in which he was informed that ſome of the inſurgents had been heard to ſay—"That they "would do as they pleaſed in ſpite of every body:—they cared not who diſapproved of "their conduct—it would ſoon be ſeen who was the ſtrongeſt:"—that there could be no doubt but this inſolent challenge was addreſſed to the king, and announced a regular plan for overthrowing the ſtate.

The firſt preſident, Le Maitre, replied that the little lights which they had been able to procure on the ſubject, rather reſembled intelligence imparted in confidence, than evidence delivered on oath, becauſe the witneſſes had no ſooner evinced a diſpoſition to enter into explanations, than they had been threatened by perſons in diſguiſe to be maſſacred in the ſtreets, or to have their houſes reduced to aſhes; fear, therefore, had rendered them ſilent: that Truth was the daughter of time, and as ſoon as it was known that the king would ſpare none of the criminals, however, elevated their rank in life, depoſitions would flow in apace: that, if it was intended to trace the evil to its ſource, it would be found to originate in the Concordate; and that the people had only been led aſtray ſince they had ceaſed to hear the voices of their lawful paſtors: that, at that time, there were forty biſhops at Paris, who did nothing but excite diſguſt: that, formerly, at leaſt they never appeared in public but in the canonicals, whereas now they ſtrutted about the ſtreets in court dreſſes: that the edict, publiſhed at the requeſt of the parliament, for compelling biſhops and curates to reſide, had been ſpeedily abrogated: that all the abbies in the kingdom were ſucceſſively expoſed to the degredations of the commendataries, who laid waſte the woods, ſuffered the buildings to go to ruin, and endeavoured to aboliſh the little regularity which ſtill ſubſiſted in the monaſteries.

Still the doctrines of Calvin continued to be propogated with great ſucceſs; the parliament themſelves were divided in their ſentiments; for while the Grand Chamber, preſided by Le Maitre, Saint André, and Minart, conſigned to the flames almoſt every heretic that was brought before them, the chamber of the Tournelle, preſided by Harlai, de Thou, and Seguier, generally contrived to acquit them, or, at moſt, made them pay a trifling fine.

This indulgence excited an univerſal clamour throughout the capital, and the crown-lawyers received inſtructions to remonſtrate with the court on the impropriety of their conduct, and to convene one of thoſe meetings—called Mercuriales—at which every member of the parliament was compelled to anſwer all queſtions that ſhould be put to him on religious matters. The parliament accordingly met, at the beginning of June, in a great room at the convent of the Auguſtine friars, when they ſpoke with ſo much force and vehemence, that the firſt preſident, alarmed at the commotion which prevailed in the court, ſent word to the miniſters, that the king muſt either diſſolve the aſſembly, or repair thither in perſon, or order to preſerve a proper decorum. Accordingly, on the tenth of June, at an hour when he was leaſt expected, Henry entered the room, accompanied by the cardinals of Lorraine and Guiſe; the princes of Montpenſier and La Roche-ſur-Yon; the dukes of Guiſe and Montmorenci; and Bertrand, keeper of the ſeals. As ſoon as he was ſeated, he ſaid, that ſince it had pleaſed God to grant him a durable peace, he thought he could not make a better uſe of his time than in endeavouring to put a ſtop to thoſe diſſentions which began to prevail among his ſubjects with regard to religion.

If, on the one ſide, this ſudden appearance of the king, and the number of his guards, who had taken poſſeſſion of the doors, alarmed the judges; on the other, the ſerenity of his countenance, the tone of impartiality he had aſſumed, and more than that, the undoubted right which every member of the court enjoyed to deliver his ſentiments without reſtraint or moleſtation, encouraged the moſt timid. Some of thoſe who favoured the Proteſtants inſiſted on the neceſſity of allowing them ſix months, in order to procure inſtruction, and to return to the right path, which if they failed to do, they ſhould then be baniſhed from the kingdom; while others voted for the convocation of a council, which would be authorized to decide on all points of controverſy, and for ſuſpending, till the deciſions of the council ſhould be known, all proſecutions againſt thoſe who were improperly called heretics, ſince they had neither been tried nor even heard in their own defence. This laſt opinion was broached by Lewis Dufaur and Anne Dubourg; the former an eminent lawyer and ſtateſman; the latter a good divine and a pious chriſtian. Dufaur, tracing all civil puniſhments to their ſource, and laying it down as a principle that they could only be juſt and uſeful ſo long as they were proportioned to the nature of thoſe diſorders which it was the intereſt of ſociety to repreſs, deſired to know by what ſubverſion of ideas the crimes of homicide and adultery, which ſap the very foundations of ſocial order, came to be puniſhed with leſs rigour in France, and excited public cenſure in a leſs degree, than a few ſpeculative opinions, which were almoſt indifferent to the ſupport and welfare of ſociety? why men, branded with thoſe crimes, were received, and even honoured, both at court and every where elſe, while Inquiſitors were paid, and every ſpecies of cruelty exerciſed, in order to torture a few unhappy men, who injured no one, who practiſed the precepts of the Goſpel, and ſerved God according to the dictates of their own conſciences? That, being at a loſs to account for this rage, he aſked thoſe who perſecuted them with the greateſt virulence, what they had to reproach them with; and the only anſwer he had ever received was, that they were peſts to ſociety, though how or in what they had never been able to explain to him. That it might be expected the Calviniſts would anſwer their perſecutors, as a prophet formerly anſwered king Ahab—"'Tis thou who troubleſt Iſrael."—After returning thanks to God for having inſpired the king with the reſolution to enquire into the merits of the queſtion, and to act in conformity to the rules of juſtice, he obſerved, that the only mode of forming a juſt opinion of a thing, was to conſider it by itſelf, laying aſide all thoſe collateral circumſtances with which prejudice and paſſion were apt to clog it.

The preſidents Seguier, Harlai, and de Thou, juſtified the conduct of the parliament, without entering into the merits of the queſtion: Minart voted for the ſtrict execution of the laws againſt heretics; and the firſt-preſident, Le Maitre, in ſupport of the ſame opinion, quoted the example of Philip Auguſtus, who, in one day, had cauſed ſix hundred heretics to be burned in his preſence, and beſtowed the greateſt eulogies on the various cruelties which had been exerciſed, at different times, againſt the Vaudois*.

The king retired, with the princes of the blood and the noblemen who had accompanied him, into an adjoining apartment, where he ordered the liſt to be brought to him, on which were inſcribed the names and opinions of all the judges who had ſpoken before his arrival. After he had read it he returned to his ſeat, and ſaid—That it was but too true, though he had hitherto refuſed to believe it, that there was a great number of heretics in his parliament; that though he had a right to puniſh the whole body, for having ſo long ſuffered them to remain on the bench, yet he would not confound the innocent with the guilty. The conſtable, after approaching the throne to receive the king's orders, ſeized Dufaur and Dubourg, and delivered him over to the captain of the guards, who conducted them to the Baſtille: orders were iſſued for the apprehenſion of ſix other judges, who had delivered their opinions with candour and freedom; three only were taken, Anthony Fumée, Euſtache de la Porte, and Paul de Foix: the others, having received timely notice, effected their eſcape.

By an edict, publiſhed in 1557, at the inſtigation of the conſtable Montmorenci, whoſe ſon had contracted a marriage, in oppoſition to the will of his father, it was enacted, that all children of diſtinction, under the age of thirty, if males, and under twenty-five, if females, who ſhould marry in a clandeſtine manner, againſt the will and conſent of their parents—excepting only the caſe in which the father was dead, and the mother married again—ſhould forfeit their inheritance; and it was left at the option of the parents to make any or no proviſion for them; all ſuch marriages were likewiſe declared null, unleſs conſummation had taken place.

Another edict, leſs oppreſſive in its nature, and more ſalutary in its effects, though ſtill too rigorous and ſevere, was publiſhed about the ſame time. Young women and widows, who had ſacrificed their honour to the gratification of their paſſions, in order to conceal their diſgrace, not unfrequently delivered themſelves in private, and put the wretched offſpring of their illicit amours to death as ſoon as it was born; if they were apprehended and proſecuted, they did not fail to alledge that the infant had given no ſigns of life, and provided they did not contradict this declaration, when applied to the rack, they were acquitted, and, emboldened by their eſcape, often repeated the ſame crime. To remedy this evil, any girl or woman, duly convicted of having concealed her pregnancy and delivery, and who ſhould fail to produce her child, on being ſummoned ſo to do, was, by this edict, declared guilty of murder, and puniſhed accordingly.

FRANCIS THE SECOND.

A. D. 1559.] HENRY was ſucceeded by his ſon, Francis the Second, who, though the eldeſt of ſeven children, had but juſt entered his ſixteenth year, when he was called to the throne. His education had been neglected, not from inattention or deſign, but from neceſſity; for frequent ſickneſs and habitual langour rendered him equally unfit for mental exertions, and for thoſe martial exerciſes which by invigorating the body, give ſtrength and energy to the mind. His mother, Catharine of Medicis, had remained ſterile for a conſiderable time after her marriage, and ſhe was in danger of being divorced on that account, when the ſkilful efforts of Fernel, a celebrated phyſician, effected an alteration in her conſtitution, and removed the cauſe of her ſterility; but the violent remedies ſhe employed, as well before as during the period of her pregnancy, had a fatal effect on her firſt offspring, at his birth, he exhibited every ſymptom of debility, and never enjoyed more than a paſſive exiſtence: without deſires, without vices, without virtues, pronounced of age by the law, but condemned by nature to a perpetual minority, he was deſtined to become a blind inſtrument in the hand of the firſt perſon who ſhould take poſſeſſion of him.

No ſooner were the eyes of Henry cloſed by death, than the Guiſes entered the dauphin's chamber, accompanied by the duke of Ferrara, their brother-in law, and the duke of Nemours, and hailed him as their ſovereign. They then conducted him to his mother's apartment, who was eaſily perſuaded to remove him from the palace of the Tournelles to the Louvre, where he received the deputies from the parliament, to whom he announced his intention of taking the reins of government into his own hands, aided by the advice of his mother, and aſſiſted by the experience of the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorraine, to the former of whom he had aſſigned the military department, and to the latter the finances.

Bertrand, the keeper of the ſeals, was diſmiſſed from his office, and retired to Rome; but the mareſchal de Saint André, who had amaſſed an immenſe fortune during the laſt reign, courted the friendſhip of the duke of Guiſe, and ſecured it by marrying his only daughter and heireſs to one of the duke's younger ſons. The conſtable Montmorenci ſeemed better entitled to reſpect, and better calculated to give uneaſineſs to the new miniſtry: independent of a property ſuperior to that of almoſt any ſubject in France, and the degree of conſideration which long ſervices command, he oppoſed to the Guiſes, through himſelf and his numerous relations, a maſs of power which it appeared difficult, and infinitely dangerous to attack.

Montmorenci received a viſit from the ſecretary of ſtate, Aubeſpine, who, in the king's name, deſired him to deliver up the PRIVATE SEAL which Henry had entruſted to his care. Although this meſſage ought clearly to have convinced him that his reign was at an end, yet he could not reſiſt the temptation of having auricular conviction of the king's diſpoſition towards him; rather chuſing if he found it unfavourable, to take a voluntary leave, than to wait for his diſmiſſion. Having, accordingly, aſſembled his ſons and nephews, he went with them to the palace before the king had riſen from table; Francis took him by the hand, and led him to his cloſet, whither he was followed by the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorraine, who never loſt ſight of him. The conſtable preſenting his family to the king, expreſſed a wiſh that his majeſty would confirm them in the poſſeſſion of their places, and continue to favour them with the ſame ſpecial protection with which they had been honoured by his father: as he was proceeding to explain his wiſhes with regard to himſelf, the king, who was better tutored than Montmorenci had ſuppoſed, ſuddenly interrupted him, and ſaid—That he was well appriſed of the merits and ſervices of thoſe whom he had recommended to his protection, wherefore he confirmed them in the poſſeſſion of their reſpective offices, and would certainly employ them, whenever an opportunity ſhould occur, in preference to all others: that being equally ſenſible of the length and utility of his own ſervices, in the two preceding reigns, and of the perfect confidence repoſed in him by his father, he ſhould ſettle all his ſalaries and penſions on him for life; but that wiſhing to ſave him for particular occaſions, and to releaſe him, in his old age, from the cares of government, he had divided the adminiſtration between the cardinal of Lorraine and the duke of Guiſe, to the former of whom he had entruſted the management of the revenue, and to the latter the military department: that all he had to requeſt of him was, that he would aſſiſt him with his knowledge, and attend, as often as he could, at the council, where he ſhould preſerve his ancient rank.

To this the conſtable replied, that the favour his majeſty had voluntarily offered, of releaſing him from the cares of ſtate, he had come purpoſely to ſolicit, but that, as his great age rendered it abſolutely neceſſary that he ſhould be wholly unmoleſted in his retirement, he muſt farther requeſt that his majeſty would diſpenſe with his attendance at the council. He then quitted the king, and repaired to the apartment of the queen-mother, in order to inform her of what had paſſed. Catharine, conſidering the diſdain with which the conſtable refuſed the ſeat that had been reſerved for him at the council board as an affront offered to the king and to herſelf, adviſed him to act with more caution and prudence; and, in a tranſport of paſſion, reproached him with the artifices he had employed in order to deprive her of her huſband's confidence, and particularly with one expreſſion, ſo imprudent, that it is inconceivable how a man of Montmorenci's ſagacity could have ſuffered it to eſcape him: he had aſked the king how it happened that none of his children reſembled him except Diana, his natural daughter, who was widow to the duke of Caſtres, and had afterwards married the conſtable's eldeſt ſon. Montmorenci, however, ſtrongly denied the fact.

Mortified with the reception he had experienced, the conſtable haſtened to complete the preparations for Henry's funeral, and after he had attended the corpſe of his late ſovereign to the royal vault at Saint Denis, he followed the court to Saint Germain, ſtill uncertain whether he ſhould purſue the advice of Catharine of Medicis, or adhere to his firſt reſolution; but here his mortification was encreaſed, for the young monarch did not even deign to ſpeak to him. Enraged at a treatment to which he had been ſo little accuſtomed, he reſolved to retire without farther delay; and that the foreign ambaſſadors who had witneſſed the inſult might be convinced that though his credit was loſt at court, his influence with the nobility remained undiminiſhed, he ſet out from Saint Germain with ſuch a numerous train of friends as gave to his retreat the appearance of a triumph, and left the court almoſt wholly deſerted that day.

Of the Guiſes, who acted ſuch a conſpicuous part during this reign, there were ſix brothers—the duke of Guiſe, the cardinal of Lorraine, the duke of Aumale, the marquis of Elbeuf, the cardinal of Guiſe, and the grand prior—but the two firſt only appear in the foreground of the political picture. The duke had ſecured the attachment of the troops, by the repeated proofs he had given of his ſkill and courage in the field; while his liberality, magnificence, and courteſy endeared him to the people. The cardinal was chiefly indebted for the extent of his influence to the ſtrength of his oratorical talents, and the orthodoxy of his religious principles.

Still the king of Navarre remained, and, as the firſt prince of the blood, he was indiſputably entitled to the firſt ſeat at the council, and, in caſe the king were incapable of holding the reins of government in his own hands, he might have preferred well-founded pretenſions to the high poſt of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. The conſtable, aware of this, had offered him his ſupport; but Anthony, conſidering him as a ſworn enemy to the princes of the blood, doubted his ſincerity, and paid no attention to his propoſal. Naturally timid and irreſolute, he was long at a loſs how to act; but finding the Guiſes aimed at a monopoly of power, he, at length, determined to repair to court. The news of his departure excited a general commotion in all the ſouthren provinces; men of the firſt families mounted their horſes and attended by their neighbours, their relations and friends, met him on the road, and offered to accompany him. But they ſoon became ſo numerous, that, through fear of alarming the Guiſes, he was compelled to reject their offers, at the ſame time thanking them for their zeal, and requeſting them to reſerve it for a future opportunity.

Anthony had appointed a general rendezvous of all who were diſcontented with the preſent government at Vendome, the chief city of his appanage. They accordingly attended on the appointed day, except the conſtable, who ſent Dardois, his confidential agent, to repreſent him. As ſoon as the king of Navarre propoſed the ſubject for deliberation, every body agreed in conſidering the domination of the Guiſes, whom they called foreigners, as an inſult not only to the princes of the blood, but to the whole order of French nobility, whoſe honour and whoſe privileges were materially affected thereby; but though they were unanimous on this point, they differed eſſentially as to the means of repreſſing the uſurpation of which they complained. The moſt violent, ſuch as the prince of Condè, d'Andelot, and the count of Rochefoucaud, obſerved that, there were but two means eſtabliſhed by nature for one man to obtain of another the object of his deſires—perſuaſion and force;—the firſt of which ought undoubtedly to be preferred, and always to be tried, whenever you had to deal with men who were juſt and enlightened; but, that with men of a different diſpoſition, ſuch a mode of proceeding would only be productive of ſhame, ridicule, and contempt; were the mode of perſuaſion to be adopted, they aſked to whom they were to apply?—certainly either to the Guiſes themſelves, to the king, or to the queen-mother; could any one ſuppoſe then, that by proving clearly to the Guiſes that they were uſurpers, he could perſuade them to reſign that authority which they had diſputed with ſo much violence during the preceding reign, and which they had juſt taken ſuch pains to ſecure?

In oppoſition to theſe arguments it was urged by the admiral and Dardois, that celerity was not more requiſite in the execution of a great undertaking, than prudence and deliberation in the formation of a ſcheme: that thoſe who had juſt adviſed them to fly immediately to arms, evidently acted on two ſuppoſitions, which appeared, at leaſt, doubtful:—firſt that the Guiſes would be taken by ſurprize; ſecondly, that almoſt the whole order of nobility would eſpouſe the quarrel of the princes with the ſame ardour by which they themſelves were actuated: that, by this calculation, they ran an evident riſk of being deceived both as to their friends and their enemies. It was therefore, thought time enough to have recourſe to more violent methods: that, in the mean time, they might ſound their friends, watch their enemies, and avail themſelves of all the faults that might eſcape them.

This laſt opinion met the approbation of the king of Navarre, inaſmuch as it correſponded to his natural deciſion, and differed but little from the advice he had previouſly received from his own miniſters: he accordingly repaired to Saint-Germain, where the court then was, but having received the moſt pointed inſults, as well from the Guiſes as from the king himſelf, he did not dare to take his ſeat at the council, but departed, with precipitation, for the capital, in concert with the prince of Condé, and others of the ſame party. The Guiſes, meanwhile, apprifed of their attempts, perceived the neceſſity of ſending the princes from the capital, as ſoon as poſſible; they therefore haſtened the preparations for the king's coronation, which ceremony was performed at Rheims on the twelfth of October, by the cardinal of Lorraine. Emboldened by the preſence of the great officers of the crown, the king of Navarre now ventured to take his ſeat at the council; and his ſuggeſtions began to meet with attention, when an artifice of the Guiſes again made him change his reſolution. They read, in his preſence, a letter from Philip the Second to Francis, in which that prince offered, in conſequence of the information he had received that ſome turbulent men had formed a plan for overthrowing the adminiſtration which had been ſo happily eſtabliſhed, and for encroaching on the authority of the king, although he was of age, and perfectly in a condition to govern his kingdom, to ſend him, as his friend and brother-in-law, an army of forty thouſand men, which he might diſpoſe of at his pleaſure for the purpoſe of reducing the inſurgents to obedience. Anthony, hearing at the ſame time, that Philip, after ſettling his affairs in the Low Countries, intended to embark for Spain, began to tremble for his principality of Bearn: reſigning all his projects of grandeur, he only ſought for an honourable pretext for retiring; and this his adverſaries were careful to afford him, by propoſing that he ſhould, himſelf, execute the commiſſion which had been entruſted to his brother the cardinal of Bourbon, and his couſin the prince de la Roche-ſur-Yon, and conduct the princeſs Elizabeth to the frontiers of Spain. He was afterwards detained in Bearn, with the vain hope of recovering his former dominions by a negociation, with which he was amuſed by the queen-mother and the duke of Alva.

While the court were at Rheims, the duke of Guiſe, in a private converſation which he had with the admiral, told him in confidence that a man, whoſe name he would not mention, but who paſſed for a friend of Coligni's, wiſhed to deprive him of the government of Picardy, by repreſenting that the inceſſant care and attention which the adminiſtration and defence of a frontier province required, were wholly incompatible with the duties of an admiral. Coligni could not miſtake the perſon to whom the duke alluded, becauſe the prince of Condé had been his competitor for the poſt, and he alone could form pretenſions to an office which had been ſucceſſively holden by his father and elder brother; he therefore entered into an explanation with the prince on the ſubject, and after expreſſing his concern, in the moſt affectionate manner, at his having applied to any other than himſelf, in order to obtain what he was juſtly entitled to, he offered to give up the government immediately. Condé proteſted, with great truth, that he had no concern whatever in the buſineſs, nor could he eaſily forgive the admiral for having thought him capable of an action ſo dark and treacherous. Coligni, however, ſtill perſiſted in his determination to reſign his poſt; for conſidering that he ſhould be unable to keep the frontier towns in a proper ſtate of defence, if the cardinal of Lorraine, who had the ſole management of the finances, ſhould refuſe him the neceſſary ſupplies for that purpoſe; and that he ſhould thereby run the riſk of receiving an affront, either from the enemy in caſe of war, or from the king himſelf, on his viſit to the provinces, he rather choſe to anticipate his adverſaries, than to wait till they choſe to diſmiſs him. He therefore gave in his reſignation, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the queen-mother, and ſtrongly recommended the prince of Condé as his ſucceſſor, whoſe pretenſions to that office were, he ſaid, anterior to his own, and whom he never would have conſented to deprive of it, but for the deference which he owed to the commands of the late king. But his recommendations were diſregarded, and the government of Picardy was conferred on the mareſchal de Briſſac.

The prince of Condé was juſtly offended at the preferrence given, under ſuch circſtances, to a private gentleman over a prince of the blood: and his reſentment on this account probably induced him to pay greater attention to the ſuggeſtions of his mother-in-law, the lady of Roye, and to his wife, the princeſs of Condé, who being ſtrongly attached to the new doctrines, and ſurrounded by enthuſiaſtic miniſters, had long exhorted him to open his ears to inſtruction, and to take under his immediate protection the numbers of unhappy men who were perſecuted on account of their religious principles.

This party was in a very different ſituation from that to which it had been reduced but a few years before; it no longer conſiſted of a few fortuitous aſſemblies of obſcure individuals, whom the publication of an ordonnance, or the ſight of a commiſſary, put to flight, and frequently diſperſed never more to meet: it now formed an immenſe corporation of citizens of all ranks and conditions, who held aſſemblies political and religious*, and who began to calculate their ſtrength: From Boulogne to Bayonne, from Breſt to Metz, France was crouded with churches, whoſe enthuſiaſtic miniſters, long accuſtomed to brave the dangers of impriſonment and torture, inſpired their proſelytes with the ſame degree of audacity, and the ſame reſolution; connected together by one common danger, they maintained a cloſe correſpondence with Calvin, and through his means, with ſome of the Swiſs cantons, the Elector Palatine and the Landgrave of Heſſe, who having embraced the ſame religion, thought themſelves intereſted in procuring its ſolid eſtabliſhment in a neighbouring kingdom. If, notwithſtanding theſe advantages, the Hugonots ſtill continued to keep themſelves concealed, and to hold their aſſemblies in the night, even in thoſe places where they were nearly as numerous as the Catholics, indignant at the reſtraint impoſed on them, they took proper precautions for repelling any violence that might be offered them, and clearly evinced, by their conduct, that they only waited for a leader to make them act in concert with each other, in order to extort a toleration which they regarded as their right, but which they knew would never be voluntarily granted. The prince of Condé, who enjoyed but little credit at court and in the council, naturally inclined to the adoption of violent meaſures, but to this mode of proceeding an obſtacle accurred, which, at firſt, they knew not how to ſurmount.

* Garnier, tom. xxviii. p. 58.

It was firſt aſked—Whether, when a ſovereign, either from extreme youth, or any other natural defect, was rendered incapable of governing, it did not belong to the nation to form a council of adminiſtration? and whether they who, without conſulting the nation, had, by ſtratagem, taken poſſeſſion of the ſupreme authority, and meant to maintain it by force, might not be regarded as uſurpers and plunderers?

II. Whether the principal nobility of the kingdom, headvd by one or more of the princes of the blood, had not a right to demand a convocation of the ſtates-general, and to procure for the three orders, by lawful means, the liberty of aſſembling? What were the means which it was lawful to employ for that purpoſe, as well with regard to the ſovereign, as to the other orders of the ſtate?

III. Whether, if convinced that their humble requeſt and their juſt complaints could not reach the ears of the king, without exciting the rage and provoking the reſentment of thoſe violent men who ſurrounded his throne, and impoſed on his youth and inexperience, and without expoſing the lives of their deputies to extreme danger, they would not be authoriſed in ſending with them an eſcort of armed men, not for the purpoſe of attacking nor even of threatening any one, but merely to guard their deputies from all violence, as well on the road, as during their reſidence at court?

IV. Whether the proviſional regulations which this aſſembly might be induced to adopt, would not have the force of law until the aſſembly of the ſtates-general ſhould meet, when they ſhould be duly examined?

V. In what manner they ought to conduct themſelves towards the oppreſſors of public liberty, and whether it was permitted to kill them, in caſe they could not ſeize their perſons and bring them to a formal trial?

Such were the principal queſtions which the Hugonots wiſhed to be propounded, before they proceeded to the execution of their plan. The prince of Condé was appointed their leader; and John de Barri, lord of La Renaudie, of an ancient family in the Perigord, but of a ruined fortune, was choſen for his lieutenant and repreſentative.

The Guiſes knew nothing of this tranſaction; content with watching the king of Navarre and the conſtable, and thinking themſelves rid of them, at leaſt for a time, they laboured, in concert with the chancellor Olivier, to repair the diſorders which had crept into the adminiſtration, and to reſcue the ſtate from the ruin which ſeemed to threaten it. Though the treaſury was exhauſted, the nation conſiderably in debt, and demands were daily encreaſing, yet the dreadful ſituation to which the farmers and peaſants were reduced, rendered a conſiderable diminution of the taxes a matter of neceſſity.

They began by reducing the intereſts of the ſums which had been borrowed of the bankers, as well in France as in other countries, during the late reign; and thoſe bankers were compelled either to reimburſe, or carry to account all the money they had received above the rate of intereſt as now arbitrarily ſettled*. This meaſure was both unjuſt and impolitic: unjuſt, as it violated, without the conſent of one of the parties, an engagement voluntarily contracted and ſolemnly confirmed: and impolitic, ſince it ſhut up thoſe ſources to which the nation had been accuſtomed to apply in the hour of diſtreſs.

But the moſt difficult, and not the leaſt neceſſary taſk, yet remained to be accompliſhed; viz. The reduction of the army. It had been reſolved in the council, after the treaty of Cateau-Cambreſis, to reduce the national forces to fifteen hundred lances, and ſix or ſeven thouſand infantry; but many obſtacles occurred to the execution of this plan. During the war, which had continued for nearly thirty years, a new generation of men had been formed, who knew no other profeſſion than that of a ſoldier, and no other patrimony than their pay, and the contributions they levied: by ſuddenly depriving them of their ſituation in life, without affording them any other means of ſubſiſtence, the government would almoſt reduce them to the neceſſity of living by plunder. Nor was the ſituation of the officers much better than that of the ſoldiers: moſt of them were gentlemen, born with ambition, who had abandoned the care of their domeſtic concerns, and ſacrificed the greater part of their fortune, in order to obtain promotion in the ſervice, and to procure rank or penſions. Theſe were not only debarred any kind of recompence for the loſs they ſuſtained by the reform, but were even deprived of their ſalaries for ſeveral quarters that were due to them; this violent and unjuſt plan had been adopted towards the concluſion of the laſt reign, and was purſued under the preſent. The commiſſioners appointed to ſuperintend its execution had been expoſed to the greateſt danger; in order to get rid of the ſoldiers, they had divided them into different corps, arming thoſe who were retained againſt thoſe who were diſbanded, and cutting to pieces ſuch companies as were moſt untractable; numbers of them entered on board the fleet which Philip was fitting out againſt the ſtates of Barbary. The officers inſiſted on being treated with greater delicacy and reſpect; and it was not poſſible to call in queſtion their right to make a direct application to the king and his miniſters, in order to ſolicit what was lawfully due to them; they accordingly repaired in crowds to Fontainbleau, where the court then reſided.

Though the enemies of the Guiſes were already ſufficiently numerous, yet do they ſeem to have ſtudied the means of encreaſing their number. Anne Dubourg, one of the members of the parliament, who had been committed to priſon by Henry for delivering his ſentiments with freedom on the ſubject of religion, was now proceeded againſt with the utmoſt rigour; in vain did he proteſt againſt the irregularity of the proceeding, againſt the competency of the court to try him, and againſt the admiſſion of men who were his avowed enemies to ſit as his judges; all his remonſtrances were diſregarded, and after a trial, which, from the injuſtice and partiality that marked it, could ſcarcely be called a trial, he was ſentenced to be hanged; he was accordingly executed at Paris, and died with the ſame firmneſs and fortitude that had diſtinguiſhed his conduct through life; the other magiſtrates who had been impriſoned at the ſame time were releaſed, on making on apology for their imprudence.

Meanwhile the aſſembles of the Hugonots became more frequent, and a number of ſatires and libels, calculated to inflame the minds of the people, and to excite an inſurrection, was diſtributed by their emiſſaries, throughout the capital*. The Guiſes, on the their part, not content with renewing the ancient ordonnances, and with encouraging informers, by the hope of reward, cauſed a new edict to be publiſhed, by which it was ordained that, all the houſes in which ſuch aſſemblies ſhould be holden, ſhould be razed to the very foundation, without even excepting thoſe which belonged to religious communities, or to proprietors ſettled in the country, who, in this inſtance, were made reſponſible for the conduct of their tenants.

Two young apprentices, the one a painter, and the other a muſical inſtrument-maker, had been initiated, by their maſters, into the doctrines of Calvin, and taken to thoſe nocturnal aſſemblies at which the Hugonots received the ſacrament. Being afterwards driven on account of their miſconduct, from their maſter's houſes, they returned home, and going to confeſſion, were ſent, by the director of their conſciences, to the preſident Saint-André, and the inquiſitor Démocharés, who, after beſtowing on them many careſſes, took their depoſition, in which they ſwore, that they had frequently attended the aſſemblies of the Calviniſts, in the Place Maubert, at the houſe of an advocate, named Trouillas, who had a wife, and two daughters grown up: that, at a numerous aſſembly holden on the night of Holy Thurſday, after the ſervice was over, the lights were extinguiſhed, when each man laid hold of a woman, and that one of them had one of the advocate's daughters whom he knew very well, notwithſtanding it was dark, and with whom he paſſed the remainder of the night. Catharine enraged at the peruſal of this depoſition, acknowledged the juſtice of the cardinal's proceedings, and meeting, juſt after, with ſome of her maids of honour, whom ſhe knew to be attached to the Hugonots, ſhe repeated to them what ſhe had read, and declared, that if ever they attended thoſe aſſemblies, ſhe herſelf would inform againſt them, and abandon them to all the rigour of the laws.

A. D. 1560.] At the commencement of this year, the king, whoſe general debility was greatly encreaſed, and in whoſe face ſeveral reddiſh ſpots had lately appeared, was adviſed by his phyſicians to repair to Blois, where the air was more ſalubrious and temperate than at Saint-Germain, and there prepare himſelf, by moderate exerciſe, for the uſe of the aromatic baths. Some evil deſigning perſons, appriſed of his intentions, had ſpread a report that the king was afflicted with the leproſy, and that the only remedy which could be of ſervice to him was to bathe in the blood of young children. A number of emiſſaries had viſited all the villages within twenty leagues of Blois; and while ſome, without entering into any explanation, took an exact liſt of the moſt healthy and beatiful children; others, who followed them at ſome diſtance, revealed the ſecret, and promiſed the parents, for a trifling reward, to procure the eraſure of their childrens' names from the fatal liſt. By this abominable manœuvre, the report, abſurd as it was, obtained ſuch credit with the common people, that, inſtead of the acclamations of joy with which they were wont to hail their ſovereigns, alarm, ſorrow and deſolation marked the progreſs of the court. Moſt of the towns and villages were abandoned, while ſuch as had courage to remain in their houſes, had ſtrongly barricaded the doors, and did not even dare to look through the windows: troops of peaſants, carrying off their children, were deſcried in the fields, at a diſtance from the high roads; and when purſued, they fell on their knees, and in the moſt pitious accents implored mercy for their children. The king, at this unuſual ſpectacle, burſt into tears, and inſiſted, with ſuch eagerneſs, on knowing the cauſe of it, that his attendants were under the neceſſity of telling him the truth; he endeavoured to diſpel the fears of the wretched fugitives, and ordered the ſtricteſt ſearch to be made after the authors of ſuch an infamous report; but they had all diſappeared except one, who was apprehended at Loches. This man, when applied to the rack, had the audacity to maintain that he had only acted in obedience to the orders of the cardinal of Lorraine.

During theſe tranſactions, the queen of England had concluded a treaty with the Scottiſh rebels, and prepared a manifeſto in juſtification of her conduct.—Having publiſhed her manifeſto, ſhe ſent ſeveral copies of it to her ſecret partiſans on the continent.

The preparations were carried on with rapidity, and the Guiſes, notwithſtanding their numerous ſpies, and notwithſtanding the advice they had received from foreign courts, would have been taken by ſurpriſe, if the man who was moſt intereſted in the ſucceſs of the ſcheme had not himſelf betrayed the ſecret*. La Renaudie, who had aſſumed the name of Le Forêt, went to Paris in order to inform the prince of Condé of what had paſſed at Nantes, and to confer with Chandieu, the miniſter, and the elders of the reformed church in the capital, on the ſubject of the contributions they were to ſupply on the preſent important occaſion. He took up his reſidence at a houſe in the ſuburb of Saint Germain, belonging to one Peter des Avenelles, an advocate, who ſecretly profeſſed the reformed religion. This man perceiving, from the numbers of people that viſited La Renaudie at all hours of the day and night, from the anxiety viſible in their countenances, and from certain expreſſions which eſcaped them, that ſome great enterpriſe was in agitation, reproached him with his want of confidence in a perſon who was ſo firmly attached to the party, and by that means extorted from him a confeſſion of all the reſolutions adopted by the aſſembly at Nantes. But though Avenelles had ſolemnly ſworn to obſerve the moſt inviolable ſecrecy, either the dread of puniſhment or the hope of reward operated ſo powerfully on his mind, that, as ſoon as La Renaudie had left his houſe, he went to de Vouze, a maſter of requeſts, and Millet, ſecretary to the duke of Guiſe, to whom he revealed the whole ſecret. The Guiſes immediately communicated the matter to Catharine of Medicis, who in the midſt of her alarms, recollecting a letter ſhe had received two months before from the miniſters of the reformed church at Paris, in which they warned her of the danger to which the government would be expoſed, ſhould they perſiſt in perſecuting the Hugonots, could not forbear obſerving that thoſe ſectaries were men of their words. The chancellor Olivier, deeply affected at the news, reproached, with great bitterneſs, the Guiſes, for having neglected to follow his advice, for the violence of their adminiſtration, the tone of authority, and the threats, which, in ſpite of his remonſtrances, they had ſubſtituted for the language of confidence and affection, ſo proper to proceed from the mouth of a king of France, and a monarch of ſixteen; and he declared, that to their own obſtinacy alone they ought to aſcribe the dreadful ſituation to which they were now reduced.

But while the duke of Guiſe endeavoured to inſpire others with confidence, he was not without inquietude himſelf: knowing the talents of the three Châtillons, and particularly of the admiral, formerly his comrade in the field, but now his moſt inveterate enemy, he foreſaw that if they were the conductors of the enterpriſe, they muſt have taken their meaſures ſo well that he ſhould not be able to foil them without great difficulty and conſiderable danger. In order to learn whether this was the caſe, he had recourſe to Catharine of Medicis, who preſerved an appearance of intimacy and confidence with them. The queen-mother accordingly wrote to requeſt their immediate attendance at court, as ſhe wiſhed to have their advice on a matter of the utmoſt importance. Although it does not ſeem probable that the three brothers, who were avowed partiſans of the new religion, and inſeparable friends of the prince of Condé, ſhould not have been appriſed of the conſpiracy, yet the whole of their conduct tends to demonſtrate that they had taken no immediate part in it, that they had not attended any of the aſſemblies at which the plot was formed, and that, following the example of the king of Navarre and the conſtable, they had determined to wait the iſſue of the buſineſs before they had declared themſelves. They obeyed the ſummons from Catharine without the ſmalleſt heſitation, and that princeſs having conducted them to her cloſet, where they found the chancellor, informed them of the diſcovery that had been made, and conjured them by the friendſhip they bore her, not to abandon her at ſuch a dreadful conjuncture: then addreſſing herſelf to the admiral, ſhe deſired him to declare, with that frankneſs and candour which ſhe had ever remarked in him, whence the evil proceeded, and what remedy ſhould be applied.

Coligni, after aſſuring her that he and his brothers would never forſake her, but would ſhed the laſt drop of their blood in her defence, were ſuch a ſacrifice neceſſary, obſerved that the only cauſe of the inſurrection was the exceſſive rigour with which all who profeſſed to live according to the purity of the Goſpel were perſecuted, without being permitted to juſtify themſelves, or without any attention being paid to the offers they had ſo repeatedly made, of ſubmitting to the deciſions of a council, either general or national: that it was infinitely dangerous to reduce a great number of men to the neceſſity of chuſing between the ſervice which in their opinion, they owed to God, and the obedience and duty they owed to the king.

This opinion was diſcuſſed in the council, and was ſo ſtrongly ſupported, that the Guiſes did not dare to oppoſe it; but they took care, under pretence of preſerving the royal authority from encroachment, ſo to word the edict, as to render it wholly inadequate to the purpoſe it was intended to promote. The king was made to declare, that, on his acceſſion to the throne, having found ſeveral provinces of his kingdom already infected with the poiſon of hereſy, as well through a crowd of preachers imported from Geneva, as from a profuſion of dangerous publications read without precaution, he had thought it his duty to have recourſe to exertions of vigour in order to check the progreſs of the contagion.

The edict was publiſhed at Paris on the eleventh of March; and on the preceding day the principal conſpirators had aſſembled, according to agreement, at the caſtle of Fredonniere, ſituated at a ſmall diſtance from Blois*. From the ſudden removal of the court, and various other circumſtances, they had no longer any doubt but that their ſecret was diſcovered, and that they ſhould find their enemies prepared to receive them.

The duke of Nemours, leaving Amboiſe in the night with a company of light horſe, took poſt near the caſtle of Noizai, where the troops from Gaſcony and Bearn were ſtationed. He ſurpriſed and carried off captains Raunai and Mazeres, as they were walking in one of the avenues, while the baron de Caſtelnau was left to defend the fortreſs. Nemours, leaving the greater part of his company before the gates of the caſtle, to prevent the garriſon from eſcaping, conducted his two priſoners to Amboiſe. Caſtlenau ought to have taken this opportunity to have cut his way through the enemy; but as the caſtle of Noizai was one of the principal magazines for arms and ammunition in the poſſeſſion of the conſpirators, and as the loſs of it would have rendered uſeleſs a great number of ſoldiers, who were to repair thither unarmed, in order to eſcape obſervation, he was loth to abandon it, and, therefore, contented himſelf with ſending ſeveral meſſengers to La Renaudie, to adviſe him of the capture of his two companions, and of the danger which threatened him, unleſs he were ſpeedily relieved. Nemours, however, ſoon returned with ſuch a ſuperior force, that Caſtelnau, finding his men totally diſheartened, and deprived of all means of eſcape, at length conſented to a conference. Nemours aſked them what was the object of their taking arms, and whether they wiſhed to rob the French of the glory they had ever enjoyed, of being more faithful to their ſovereign than any other people upon earth?

Caſtelnau replied, that ſo far from renouncing that glory, they were labouring, in imitation of their anceſtors, to deſerve it; that informed of the danger to which the king was expoſed, they were going to preſent a petition to him, and to expoſe the perfidious machinations of two foreigners, who had already uſurped his authority, and who carried their pretenſions ſtill farther.—"Ought ſubjects," ſaid Nemours, "to preſent a petition to their ſovereign ſword in hand?" Theſe "ſwords," returned Caſtelnau, "were only deſtined to open us a paſſage to "the throne; our petition would have been preſented on our knees, in the "poſture of ſupplication." "If that be all you deſire," returned Nemours, "you may ſpeedily be ſatisfied; give up your arms to me, and I pledge myſelf "to conduct you, in ſafety, to the foot of the throne, where you ſhall have full "liberty to prefer your complaints." The duke's propoſal being accepted, the ſoldiers delivered up their arms, and were conducted to Amboiſe, where they were all thrown into priſon. The other captains employed by the duke of Guiſe, were equally ſucceſsful with Nemours; laying concealed in ravines and among the buſhes, in places by which the conſpirators were to paſs, they carried them off with little reſiſtance, and conducted them, in bands, to the town of Amboiſe. The moſt diſtinguiſhed were put in priſon; but the ſubalterns and privates were proceeded againſt in a ſummary manner, and hanged, either on the parapets, or elſe on long poles, fixed in the walls of the caſtle.

After a blow thus deciſive, it was preſumed that the conſpirators would ſpeedily return, provided a paſſage was left open for them. The chancellor Olivier, already deeply afflicted at the ſight of ſo many executions, and perceiving that the town was ſtill crowded with a multitude of unfortunate men, whoſe only crime was the too eaſy belief they had paid to ſome of their miniſters, who had really perſuaded them that it was only intended to preſent a ſupplicatory addreſs to the king, remonſtrated with great energy on the injuſtice of treating them as criminals, and on the danger of reducing them to a ſtate of deſperation. He deſired that the king would grant freſh letters of remiſſion to all who ſhould return peaceably to their homes, and even promiſed to lend a favourable ear to their complaints and remonſtrances. But the king, notwithſtanding his devotion to their will, appeared reſtleſs and unhappy. In a tranſport of grief, he had one day ſhed tears, and exclaimed, with acrimony, in preſence of the cardinal; "What injury have "I done to my people, that they ſhould ſeek my life? I am willing to hear their com- "plaints, and to render them juſtice: I no longer know what to think, but I am told "that you are the only object of their reſentment; I wiſh you were abſent for a "time, that I might know whether 'tis againſt you, or againſt me, that their rage is "directed."

Young Ferriere-Maligni, knowing that La Bigne was a priſoner, and not doubting but that he would reveal the whole myſtery, choſe the beſt horſe in the prince of Condé's ſtable, and with the aſſiſtance of Deſvaux, the prince's equerry, who accompanied him for four or five leagues, left Amboiſe and took the road to Lyons. La Bigne, in fact, thinking himſelf releaſed from his oath, by the death of the perſon at whoſe requeſt he had taken it, decyphered all the manuſcripts that had been found in his poſſeſſion, declared that the prince of Condé was the ſecret leader of the conſpiracy, and that La Renaudie was only his lieutenant. He neither concealed the project for ſeizing or maſſacreing the Guiſes, nor any of the meaſures which had been adopted for the execution of that deſign. He even added—either becauſe ſuch was the fact, or becauſe he wiſhed to pleaſe thoſe on whom his life depended, and who were deeply intereſted in not appearing to have been the real objects of the conſpiracy.

Although this depoſition, of a man perfectly well-informed of the whole buſineſs, preciſe in all its circumſtances, and exactly conformable to all thoſe which had been before taken, was deemed of great weight, yet it did not appear ſufficient to juſtify the proſecution of a prince of the blood. The king ſent an order the next morning to the prince to attend his levee, accompanied by a prohibition to leave Amboiſe: at the ſame time the grand-provoſt arreſted Deſvaux, the prince's equerry, who, being interrogated on the ſubject of Maligni's eſcape, replied that, as that gentleman had the honour to live on terms of friendſhip with his maſter, who even acknowledged him for his relation, he had not thought it neceſſary to apply for permiſſion to let him have a horſe, and to accompany him as far on the road as he wiſhed.

The prince, in obedience to the order he had received, attended the king's levee, when Francis told him, with an air of ſeverity, that ſeveral of the conſpirators had made oath that he was their leader; and ſhould that prove to be the caſe he would teach him how dangerous it was to attack a king of France. The prince, without betraying any ſymptoms of fear or ſurpriſe, replied, that he had already learned from public report what his majeſty had juſt revealed to him; that he only requeſted he would aſſemble that very day the members of his council, ſuch of the princes of the blood, and of the knights of the order of Saint Michael, as were then at court, and all the foreign miniſters and ambaſſadors, ſince finding himſelf publicly defamed by the malice of his enemies, he wiſhed his juſtification to be equally public. While the prince was at the levee, the grand-provoſt went, by the king's orders, to ſearch his houſe, where it was ſaid a vaſt quantity of arms were concealed, and to examine his papers. No arms, however, were found, and the provoſt declared, that the papers contained nothing that could ſubſtantiate the accuſation. The reſidence and papers of the king of Navarre's ſecretary were likewiſe ſearched and examined, by command of the cardinal of Lorraine, but with no better effect.

The prince of Condé went to the caſtle a few minutes before the council had aſſembled, and paid a viſit to the queen-mother, with whom he found the cardinal of Lorraine: Catharine, deeply affected at the ſight of the prince, told him that ſhe did not believe a ſyllable of what ſhe had heard to his prejudice.

As ſoon as the council was aſſembled, the prince entered the apartment, and in a manly ſpeech juſtified himſelf from the accuſations that had been preferrd againſt him by men of ſuſpicious characters, ſtimulated, no doubt, by the ſuggeſtions of his ſecret enemies, or intimidated by the threats of torture; if, he ſaid, there were one man in the whole world who would accuſe him, not by indirect means, but in an open manner, of having ſhaken the fidelity of the people, of having urged towns to revolt, or of having either ſaid or done any thing which could tend to excite a ſedition, he would throw off his quality of prince of the blood to fight him on equal terms, till he ſhould extort from him a confeſſion that he was a lyar and a coward. The duke of Guiſe, to whom this challenge ſeemed to be directed, although he had vehemently oppoſed the preſent proceeding, the event of which he foreſaw, artfully obſerved, that the king ought not to ſuffer the reputation of a prince, ſo nearly related to the throne, to be affected, in the ſmalleſt degree, by the intereſted accuſations of a few miſerable wretches, who ſought to diminiſh their own crime by transferring the principal guilt to perſons of high diſtinction.

The baron de Caſtelnau-Chaloſſe, the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſonage of the whole party, as well by his birth as his perſonal merit, was the laſt whoſe fate remained to be decided: Being called upon to anſwer the queſtions that were put to him, and threatened with the rack, he appeared confuſed, and, for an inſtant, remained ſilent; upon which the duke of Guiſe told him that he ſeemed to be frightened. "I do not deny it," replied Caſtelnau, "for what man, who was not totally deprived of ſenſation, could ſay that he was exempt from fear, when ſurrendered to the diſcretion of enemies implacable in their hatred, and thirſting for his blood? But give me my arms again, and then dare to repeat the ſame expreſſion; or ſuppoſe yourſelf in my place, and then candidly tell me whether you would not tremble in every limb? The fear, however, with which you reproach me, will not, I hope, deprive me of the judgment and preſence of mind neceſſary to enſure my juſtification."

Being known to have paſſed the greater part of his life at court or in the field, they could not imagine that he was in the leaſt qualified for theological diſputations. But here they were again diſappointed, for in the queſtions which were put to him in regard to his religion, his anſwers were ſo oppoſite, and his replies ſo pointed, that his adverſaries were completely foiled. The chancellor aſtoniſhed, could not forbear the exclamation, that it was eaſy to perceive the baron had well ſtudied his leſſon. "Yes, Sir," replied Caſtelnau, "I have ſtudied it well; you would be authoriſed to deſpiſe me, and I ſhould think myſelf truly deſpicable, if I had embarked in a cauſe, in the event of which the ſalvation of my ſoul and the happineſs of my country were intereſted, without previouſly ſatisfying all my ſcruples."—"But how happens it," ſaid Olivier, "that you have thus ſuddenly become ſuch an experienced theologiſt; for at the time that you frequented the court, you did not pay much attention to thoſe controverſies?" "That's true," returned the baron, "but does it become you to put ſuch a queſtion to me? Recollect the viſit I paid you at your eſtate at Leuville; you then aſked me how I had paſſed my time in priſon; and when I anſwered, in ſtudying the ſcriptures in order to underſtand the merits of thoſe diſputes which made ſo much noiſe, you expreſſed your approbation of my labours, and diſpelled the few doubts that ſtill remained on my mind: if my memory do not fail me, we then perfectly agreed in our ſentiments: how happens it that in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time, one of us has ſo far changed his opinion, that we no longer underſtand each other? but you was then in diſgrace, and really ſpoke what you thought: wretched ſlave to courtly favour, how dare you, merely to pleaſe a man by whom you are, probably, deſpiſed, thus betray God and your conſcience?"

As Olivier betrayed the moſt unequivocal marks of confuſion at this reproof, the cardinal of Lorraine, came to his aſſiſtance, anxious to confound a man who appeared ſo firmly fixed in his principles; but, contrary to his expectation, he ſuffered an acknowledgment to be extorted from him, which Caſtelnau called on the duke of Guiſe to witneſs. The duke replied, that it was not conſiſtent with his profeſſion to enter into diſputes of that nature, and that he gloried in his ignorance on religious concerns. "I am ſorry for that," returned Caſtelnau—"for I have ſo good an opinion of you, that I durſt ſwear that were you as well informed as your brother in theſe matters, you would make a better uſe of your knowledge."

The preſence of mind, the determined courage and unſhaken firmneſs which Caſtelnau diſplayed during his trial, had fixed the eyes of the whole court upon him; and great as was the danger of appearing his friend at ſuch a conjuncture, three noblemen of the firſt rank, the duke of Longueville, the admiral Coligni, and the duke of Aumale himſelf, who, though a ſtrong Catholic, bore not that hatred to the Hugonots which his brothers did, ventured to intercede in his favour; and Catharine of Medicis joined in the ſame petition; but the young monarch, tutored no doubt by the Guiſes, diſplayed a pertinacity unnatural at his age, and, remaining inflexible to their intreaties, confirmed the ſentence. When that ſentence was read to Caſtelnau, by which he was declared guilty of leze-majeſty, he exclaimed—"I call my judges to witneſs that the declaration "is falſe; unleſs to have oppoſed the tyranny of the Guiſes to the utmoſt of my "power, be deemed an act of leze-majeſty; but, in that caſe, they ſhould have "begun, by declaring them kings." He ſuffered decapitation, and met his fate with coolneſs and intrepidity: Raunai and Mazeres experienced a ſimilar puniſhment: Briquemaut de Villemongis, another of the conſpirators, when brought to the ſcaffold, dipped his hands in the blood of his aſſociates, and raiſing his eyes towards heaven, exclaimed—Heavenly Father, behold the blood of thy children, which thou wilt revenge.

The prince of Condé, hurried away towards the place of execution by ſome pretended friends, who had undertaken to watch his words and motions, was not ſufficient maſter of himſelf to conceal his emotions; being reproached with this, he replied, "I freely confeſs, that I feel for the fate of thoſe brave officers who have done ſuch ſignal ſervice to the ſtate under the two laſt reigns: I will even acknowledge that I am at a loſs to conceive why none of the miniſters ſhould have repreſented to the king the prejudice which the ſtate would ſuſtain by ſuch a loſs: for if it ſhould be attacked by any foreign power, they will probably repent the having deprived him of its beſt defenders." Theſe expreſſions were carefully repeated to the cardinal of Lorraine, who never forgot them: but the grief of the chancellor, who had been compelled, by his ſtation, to become an inſtrument of vengeance to the Guiſes, was exceſſive: inconſolable, at having neglected to oppoſe, with ſufficient vigour, the violent adminiſtration of the cardinal of Lorraine, he felt more deeply the reproaches of his own conſcience, than thoſe of the unfortunate victims whom he had conſigned to execution: the acuteneſs of his feelings brought on a deep melancholy, attended with the loſs of ſleep, and followed by a burning fever, which, in a few days, reduced him to the brink of the grave. The cardinal, appriſed of his ſituation, went to pay him a laſt viſit, but Olivier, tired of conſtraint, turned his back on the miniſter, and in a few moments breathed his laſt.

The removal of the court to Tours, gave an opportunity to the prince of Condé to leave Amboiſe, and, notwithſtanding the inſidious attempts of the cardinal of Lorraine again to allure him to court, and his ſecret orders to arreſt him on the road, he effected his eſcape into Gaſcony. The kingdom, meanwhile, was thrown into a ſtate of anarchy and confuſion: the Hugonots, in different places, ſeized on the churches and convents, and in contempt of the prohibitory edicts, publickly celebrated divine ſervice: at Nimes they drove the prieſts from the church of Saint-Stephen, during the celebration of maſs, broke the images, and trod the conſecrated wafer under foot.

The enmity entertained by the Hugonots againſt the Guiſes ſeemed daily to acquire freſh ſtrength: ſatires and libels were diſtributed in great abundance, and one, in particular againſt the cardinal of Lorraine, attracted the public attention; it was entitled the TIGER, and contained a liſt of the acts of cruelty and perfidy perpetrated by that prelate, together with a ſcandalous account of his amours with a lady of diſtinction, his near relation, who, according to Brantome, had nearly died of grief in conſequence of this publication.

The intelligence which the Guiſes continued to receive from the different provinces, where the minds of the people ſeemed ripe for revolt, and the adverſe ſtate of affairs in Scotland, induced them to renounce all the projects they had formed upon that kingdom, and to recall, with all poſſible expedition, the troops they had ſent thither, whoſe preſence in France had now become neceſſary to their own defence.

By the treaty of peace concluded with Elizabeth, it was ſtipulated, that the king and queen of France and Scotland ſhould henceforth abſtain from bearing the arms of England, or aſſuming the title of that kingdom: that all titles and public acts in which that title had been employed, ſhould either be altered or abrogated; that the farther reparation demanded by Elizabeth for the injury ſhe had ſuſtained in that particular ſhould be referred to the deciſion of commiſſioners, to be appointed at a future period; and, laſtly, that the king and queen ſhould perform the promiſes they had made to their ſubjects in Scotland.

Meantime the Guiſes, reſolved to engage the king and the queen-mother to convoke, at Fontainebleau, not the ſtates-general, nor even an aſſembly of notables, but an extraordinary council, which the princes of the blood, the great officers of the crown, the ſtate counſellors, knights of the order of St. Michael, and maſters of requeſts, ſhould be ſummoned to attend, in order that thoſe perſons who were moſt intereſted in the welfare of the ſtate would concur, if poſſible, in the adoption of ſome efficacious means for the reſtoration of public tranquillity, and in the determination to enforce the execution of ſuch meaſures as they ſhould deem neceſſary for that purpoſe.

The king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, convinced that this meaſure was only adopted for the purpoſe of bringing them to court and ſecuring their perſons, wiſhed to have the advice of the conſtable; they accordingly ſent a meſſenger to him to ſay, that as all their captains were engaged in an expedition againſt Lyons, which they had every reaſon to expect would prove ſucceſsful, they thought it would be dangerous to accept the king's invitation. The conſtable exhorted them to deſiſt from their projected attempt upon Lyons, adviſed them rather to direct their efforts againſt the towns of Limoges and Poitiers, which would ſerve to cover the provinces in their poſſeſſion, and might be defended with greater eaſe and convenience; but, he obſerved, that they ſhould not have recourſe to this violent proceeding until all other means had failed: he conjured them to attend the aſſembly, and to ſend word to their partiſans to meet them on the road; at all events, he ſaid, they would find their friends at Fontainbleau ſo well attended that nobody would dare to moleſt them. This advice, however, was rejected by the king of Navarre, from the conviction that, if the Guiſes intended to ſecure their perſons, they would take care to prevent them from reaching Fontainebleau, the two princes, therefore, ſent a courier with letters to the king and queen-mother, to excuſe, on account of the ſhortneſs of the notice, and the length of the journey, their attendance at the council.

The council, however, met on the appointed day, when the debates were warm and animated: the admiral Coligni, preſented a petition from the Hugonots of Normandy, profeſſing their attachment to the king, and demanding a toleration of their religion; this petition, defended with zeal and ability by Coligni, was oppoſed with violence by the cardinal of Lorraine, who, in the courſe of his ſpeech, obſerved that the king could not comply with the requeſt of the Hugonots, without riſking the ſalvation of his ſoul, and incurring the guilt of perjury: the final reſult of this meeting was the diſtribution of two circular letters: the firſt was addreſſed to the ſeneſchals and bailiffs, who were ordered by the king to aſſemble without delay the provincial aſſemblies, for the purpoſe of electing deputies to the ſtates-general, which were appointed to meet at Meaux, on the tenth of December; the ſecond, to the biſhops, enjoyning immediate reſidence, and commanding them to meet at Paris on the twentieth of January to hold a national council, unleſs the pope ſhould, in the interval, be induced to convoke, (agreeably to the promiſe he had made the king,) a general council.

The meaneſt and moſt diſhoneſt artifices were now employed by the Guiſes to get the prince of Condé into their power; and in this attempt they were ſeconded by Catharine of Medicis, who exerted all thoſe arts of hypocriſy in which ſhe was ſo eminently verſed*. At length they ſucceeded in extorting from the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé a promiſe to repair to court, attended only by their uſual retinue; and as the violent meaſures they meant to purſue would naturally excite great diſcontent among the nobility, they fought to ſecure their friendſhip, by the diſtribution of honours and rewards: the government of Touraine, Anjou, the Blaiſois and Vendomois, was conferred on the duke of Montpenſier; and that of the Orleanois, the Chartrain and Berry, on the prince of la Roche-ſur-Yon: eighteen new knights of the order of Saint-Michael were created at the ſame time, and for the ſame purpoſe; and from this Era may be dated the decline of that illuſtrious order, which had ſubſiſted, with great glory, for a whole century.

About the middle of October, the king, with an army of ten thouſand diſciplined troops, repaired to Orleans, and ſtruck terror and conſternation into the inhabitants of that town, who were ſtrongly attached to the Hugonots. Meanwhile the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé ſet out on their journey, and Francis iſſued orders to the Catholic gentlemen who reſided in the provinces through which they were to paſs, to levy troops, diſperſe all aſſemblies, political or religious, and kill, without mercy or diſcrimination, all who ſhould attend them.

Notwithſtanding the prayers and ſolicitations of the princeſs of Condé, who threw herſelf at the king's feet, and implored his mercy in favour of her huſband, Francis, with an unfeeling perſeverance, unnatural at his age, purſued the neceſſary meaſures for bringing the prince to trial. A commiſſion, compoſed of Chriſtopher de Thou, preſident of the parliament of Paris; of James Viole and Bartholomew Faye, judges of the ſame court; Bourdin, attorney-general: and the ſecretary du Tillet, was appointed to interrogate him in priſon; but the prince proteſted againſt the competency of the ſubſerviant tribunal, and appealed to the king in parliament. The appeal, however, was rejected by Francis; and the chancellor, with ſome members of the council, and all the knights of Saint-Michael and maſters of requeſts who were then at Orleans, being added to the commiſſion, the trial was purſued and the prince, being found guilty of leze-majeſty, was ſentenced to loſe his head. The count of Sancerre, one of his judges, peremptorily refuſed to ſign the ſentence, and, when preſſed to it by the king, replied, that any other command from his majeſty ſhould meet with inſtant compliance from him, but that he would rather loſe his own head, than tranſmit to his children the ſhame of reading their father's name annexed to a ſentence of death pronounced againſt a prince, whoſe deſcendants might poſſibly become their ſovereigns. But the refuſal of this honourable old man made no impreſſion on the king, who confirmed the ſentence, and appointed the tenth of December, the day on which the ſtates general were to meet, for the execution of the prince.

On the nineteenth of November, Francis, as he was attending veſpers at the Jacobins, fainted in the church, whence he was conveyed ſenſeleſs and motionleſs to his apartment; on the recovery of his ſenſes, he complained of a violent pain in his ear, which was ſpeedily followed by a burning fever, attended with ſymptoms of the moſt alarming nature. The Guiſes, thrown into the utmoſt conſternation by this unexpected event, aſſembled their friends, ſome of whom were of opinion that they ſhould extort from the king an order for the immediate execution of the prince of Condé, and the impriſonment of the king of Navarre, as the beſt means of ſecuring a preponderance to their own party, but this advice was overruled by the cardinal of Tournon, not on the plea of juſtice or humanity, but from conſiderations of policy.

The king of Navarre, meanwhile, embraced the opportunity to court a reconciliation with the queen-mother, who, at the inſtigation of the ducheſs of Montpenſier and the chancellor, concluded an accomodation with that prince, and conſented to receive him and his brother into favour, on condition that he ſhould renounce all pretenſions to the regency in the event of the king's demiſe, and ſubmit to a reconciliation with the Guiſes, who ſhe aſſured him, had been nowiſe inſtrumental to the impriſonment of his brother; falſe as this aſſurance inconteſtibly was, ſhe promiſed Anthony that he ſhould hear it confirmed by the king himſelf. He was accordingly conducted to the royal apartment, where the feeble Francis, docile to the laſt, declared, in the preſence of ſeveral witneſſes, that he had cauſed the prince of Condè to be impriſoned of his own accord, and contrary to the advice of his uncles, the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorraine*.

The king's diſorder proved to be an abceſs in the head, which, burſting, put an end to his exiſtence on the fifth of December, in the eighteenth year of his age and the ſecond of his reign. His body was privately conveyed to the royal vault at Saint-Denis, attended only by Lanſac and La Broſſe, who had been his governors.

CHARLES THE NINTH.

A. D. 1560, 1561.] ON the death of Francis the crown devolved on his next brother Charles, then only in the eleventh year of his age, who accordingly received the oaths of the magiſtrates and great officers of the court, whom he confirmed in the poſſeſſion of their places and privileges. The early age of the infant monarch incapacitating him from holding the reins of government, his mother, Catharine of Medicis, at firſt, aſſumed the authority, though not the title, of Regent, but after a ſhort time ſhe was compelled to relinquiſh a conſiderable portion of her power to to the king of Navarre, who was created lieutenant-general of the kingdom.

The ſtates-general, ſummoned by Francis to aſſemble at Orleans on the thirteenth of December, were ſuffered, in conſequence of a deciſion that the king never died, to meet on the appointed day*.

In the preſent temper of the kingdom it could not be ſuppoſed that an aſſembly ſo numerous, compoſed of members of different ſects, would act with concord, uniformity, and effect: the gratification of private reſentment, roſe ſuperior to concern for the public welfare; and party contentions, with all their baſe concomitants of haſty accuſations and petulent invective, were permitted to diſgrace the proceedings of a convention aſſembled for the nobleſt purpoſe—to reſcue the nation from diſtreſs, by giving ſtrength and ſtability to the laws, and happineſs and relief to the people. The Hugonots complained of the injuries they had ſuſtained, the perſecutions they had experienced, and the hardſhips to which they were expoſed; demanded a repeal of all the penal laws paſſed in the preceding reigns, and claimed a free and perfect toleration of their religion. The clergy of the eſtabliſhed church were not leſs loud in their complaints, nor leſs urgent in their applications for redreſs; they accuſed the ſectaries of miſrepreſenting their conduct, of defaming their characters, and of ſowing diſſentions between the paſtors and their flocks: they reproached them with exerting their ſuperiority, in thoſe places where they were ſtrongeſt, to compel the Catholics to attend their meetings, to beat and mutilate the prieſts, to take forcible poſſeſſion of the churches, to overturn the altars, to profane the ſacred vaſes, and to inſpire ſuch terror into the regular clergy, that they did not dare to appear in public with any of the external marks of their profeſſion. To redreſs theſe grievances, it was required, that all the penal laws againſt heretics ſhould be rigidly enforced: that a religious teſt ſhould be impoſed, as an indiſpenſable qualification for holding any office judicial, municipal, or political: and that the introduction of the money and inhabitants of Geneva into the kingdom ſhould be ſtrictly prohibited.

During the interval between the diſſolution of the ſtates and the meeting of the new convention, the kingdom was alike agitated by religious diſputes and political intrigues. The queen-mother, anxious to ſecure the attachment of the Hugonots, cauſed letters-patent to be iſſued, by which the king forbade all his ſubjects, under the ſevereſt penalties, to inſult each other on account of religion, and ordered all thoſe to be releaſed from priſon whoſe only crime was that of having attended the conventicles, or complied with the other forms of the new religion, exacting only from ſuch perſons a promiſe to live Catholiquement in future; and in caſe they ſhould refuſe to make that promiſe, they were ſtill to be releaſed, but on condition that they ſhould leave the kingdom within a given time: the parliament was enjoined to re-publiſh the edict of Romorentin, without any reſtrictions whatever.

The Hugonots, meanwhile, held a ſynod at Poitiers, where they decided, that as the king was a minor, the ſtates could take no meaſures for paying his debts, nor contracting any valid engagements whatever with him, until a council, choſen by the ſtates lawfully aſſembled, ſhould have been appointed to aſſiſt him with their advice: that thoſe who now called themſelves members of the council, had no right to aſſume that dignity, ſince their commiſſion had expired with the monarch from whom they received it, and could not be renewed either by the new king, who was a minor, or by the queen-mother, to whom the law gave no ſuch authority: that the chancellor himſelf ſhould be warned to abſtain from the exerciſe of his functions, as he did not hold his office either with the approbation of the ſtates, or the conſent of the princes of the blood: that, if government ſhould refuſe to comply with theſe demands, the deputies ſhould abſtain from all diſcuſſion whatever, and prefer an appeal to the future ſtates-general, lawfully aſſembled.

This deciſion gave freſh vigour and energy to the intrigues of the court, where the partiſans of either religion endeavoured to acquire a ſuperiority; the arrival of the prince of Condé, at this critical period, ſeemed to turn the ſcale in favour of the Hugonots: that nobleman had refuſed to leave the place of his confinement until the Guiſes were removed from court, but the cardinal of Lorraine having voluntarily retired to his dioceſe of Rheims, and the duke of Guiſe conſenting to expreſs his diſapprobation of the violent proceedings againſt the prince, and his belief of his innocence, Condé repaired Fontainebleau, where he was publicly juſtified from the charges which had been preferred againſt him, by a decree of the council; and he afterwards obtained a deciſion of the parliament of Paris, ſanctioning that decree*.

The conjuncture appeared favourable for the promulgation of an edict that had been ſome time projected by the council; in which the king forbade all his ſubjects, under pain of death, without any hope of pardon, to inſult each other by uſing the injurious appellations of Papiſts and Hugonots: or to violate the ſafety which every individual ought to enjoy in his own houſe, under pretence that unlawful aſſemblies were holden there; it ordained, that all priſoners confined on account of religion ſhould be releaſed; and that all exiles and fugitives ſhould be permitted to return to France, where no one ſhould be ſuffered to moleſt them, either in their perſons or property, ſo long as they lived Catholiquement, and without giving offence; and if they violated theſe conditions, they ſhould then be allowed to ſell their effects, and retire whereſoever they pleaſed. The chancellor, knowing the diſpoſition of the parliament of Paris, foreſaw that they would oppoſe the regiſtering of the edict; and in order to obviate this difficulty, he addreſſed it immediately to the magiſtrates of the inferior courts, who, by the edict of Romorentin, were appointed judges in dernier reſort in all ſimilar caſes. The parliament were greatly incenſed at this conduct, and, after proteſting againſt ſuch an irregular mode of proceeding, attacked, with greater violence than juſtice, the edict itſelf, and maintained the propriety of acting with vigour againſt the Hugonots, and of promoting their extirpation by encouraging informers†.

In the midſt of theſe diſorders Charles repaired to Rheims, where the ceremony of his coronation was performed, on the fifteenth of May, by the cardinal of Lorraine‡; who, availing himſelf of the opportunity when the king had juſt ſworn, on the altar, to maintain the Catholic religion, and preſerve the privileges of the clergy, repreſented to the queen-mother, in energetic terms, the ſtate of oppreſſion to which the church was reduced, and the neceſſity of immediately extricating her from a ſituation which foreboded her ſpeedy ruin. At an extraordinary council holden at Rheims, on this ſubject, it was unanimouſly agreed that the beſt mode of providing a remedy for the evil complained of, would be to appoint an aſſembly of the prelates, to correct all the abuſes which had crept into the Gallican church; and to admit, into ſuch aſſembly, the moſt celebrated divines of the new ſect, who ſhould be at full liberty to defend their doctrine againſt the attacks of the Catholic theologians, in preſence of the king himſelf.

But as it would be ſome time before this meaſure could be accompliſhed, it was deemed prudent to paſs an edict that might, in the interval, keep the ſectaries within bounds. One was accordingly iſſued—diſtinguiſhed in hiſtory, by the appellation of The July Edict—by which all aſſemblies, public or private, at which ſermons were preached, and the ſacrament was adminiſtered, in a manner contrary to the rites of the Romiſh church, were prohibited, under pain of confiſcation of property, to all who ſhould attend them. This edict, ſo different from the laſt, far from being adapted to the prevention of diſorders, was calculated to promote them*.

On the twentieth of July, the prelates, in obedience to the ſummons they had received, aſſembled at Poiſſy, and ſoon after ten proteſtant miniſters arrived at St. Germain, attended by two of the moſt celebrated divines of that age—Peter Martyr and Theodore de Bezé or Beza. The firſt had been a regular canon in the Romiſh church, then a profeſſor at Straſburgh, where he married a nun; under the reign of Edward the Sixth, he was invited to England, whence he was baniſhed on the acceſſion of Mary; after which he returned to Germany, and was, at this time, firſt paſtor of the church of Zurich. Bezé was by birth a Frenchman, of a noble family in Burgundy; being deſigned for the church, his parents had procured for him, at a very early age, two valuable livings†. At the age of thirty-two, ſatiated with voluptuous gratifications, and rouſed by a dangeous fit of ſickneſs, he aſpired to a different kind of celebrity, and openly eſpouſed the doctrines of the reformed, which he had ſecretly imbibed at an early period of his life.

While the clergy were aſſembled at Poiſſy, the two other orders of the ſtate had met at Pontoiſe, and, after various debates, on the ſubject of the revenue, it was at lenght ſettled, that the clergy ſhould pay ſixteen hundred thouſand livers a year, till ſuch time as the redemption of the king's domains, which were pledged for fifteen millions, ſhould be completed. The admiral and d'Andelot experienced much greater difficulty in purſuading the nobility and the commons to conſent to an adequate contribution: at laſt, however, by repreſenting how important it was to all who were intereſted in the progreſs of the reformation not to alienate, by a refuſal, the mind of the queen, who, anxious to favour them, had promiſed to abrogate the July Edict, to grant the free exerciſe of the new religion throughout the whole of the kingdom, and ſpeedily to make the neceſſary arangements for bringing up the king, and her other children in that purſuation, they brought them to conſent to the eſtabliſhment of a new duty upon liquors, for ſix years, the annual produce whereof was eſtimated at twelve hundred thouſand livers.

Thus, in order to accompliſh her deſigns, Catharine made no ſcruple to contract two contradictory engagements in her ſon's name, at the ſame time; ſhe retained Bezé and his companions near her perſon, and ſuffered them to preach within the precincts of the palace of Saint-Germain, whither an immenſe concourſe of people flocked to hear them. She appointed the prince de la Roche-ſur-Yon, who ſecretly favoured the new doctrines, to the office of ſuperintendant of the king's education; and that nobleman encouraged Charles and his brothers to read books publiſhed by the Hugonot's, and not only to be preſent at indecent farces, in which the ceremonies of the church of Rome were turned into ridicule, but to play parts in ſuch exhibitions themſelves.

† Beſides his Latin Poems, Beze wrote ſeveral polemical works, moſt of which have long ſince been conſigned to oblivion. The only one of theſe, which has been much noticed in later times, is his Treatiſe, "De Hereticis a Magiſtratu Puniendis," written on occount of the excution of Michael Servet, a phyſician, who, in 1553, was condemned by the magiſtrates of Geneva, at the inſtigation of Calvin, to be burnt, for having written a book againſt the Trinity. The Calviniſts, who could beſtow commendation on the founder of their ſect, for having procured the execution of a man, who differed from himſelf in one point of religion, could ſurely have no right to complain of the perſecutions they experienced from the Catholics on the ſame accouut.

As things could not poſſibly remain in this violent ſituation, it was determned, in the council, to begin by diſarming indiſcriminately all the citizens in the principal towns, and then to convene a certain number of deputies from the different parliaments, who, conjointly with the princes of the blood, the great officers of the crown, and other counſellors of ſtate, ſhould deviſe, for the prevention of inſurrections, ſome means alike applicable to all the provinces. The prince of La Roche-ſur-Yon was ordered to enforce the execution of the letters-patent, by which the Pariſians were ordered either to carry their arms either to the Hotel de Ville, or to the arſenal; and the only reſiſtance to be experienced was on the part of the Hugonots, who being objects of averſion to the inhabitants, and greatly inferior to their adverſaries in number, expreſſed a reluctance to rely for protection on the faith of the public. But aſſured that their ſafety would be effectually provided for by other means, they at length complied, and their example was followed by the citizens of Lyons, and ſome other places.

The Guiſes, averſe from theſe meaſures, and having no means of preventing them, ſince they were debarred all acceſs to the king of Navarre, and ſince the queen-mother was entirely devoted to their enemies, once more reſolved to retire from court: but their departure was attended with a circumſtance which furniſhed their adverſaries with arms againſt them, and left a ſtrong impreſſion on the mind of Catharine.*

The ſermons of the Catholic clergy at Paris were, at this time, filled with invective againſt government, and with other inflammatory remarks, that ſtrongly tended to the ſuſcitation of diſcord, the prieſts inveighed, in particular, againſt the patience of the citizens, in ſuffering the municipal guard, which was paid by themſelves, to be employed in eſcorting the Hugonots, whom they repreſented as alike enemies to God and man.† The moſt violent of theſe fanatics, a monk, named John de Han, preacher of the church of Saint-Bartholemew, was ſeized in his convent during the night, by an order from the prince de la Roche-ſur-Yon, but the citizens, having aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, haſtened to Saint-German, and compelled the king to releaſe him.

A. D. 1562.] While the minds of the people were in this ſtate of fermentation, the deputies from the different parliaments aſſembled at Saint-Germain, when the chancellor, in a long and able ſpeech, remarkable for moderation of ſentiment, and admirably calculated for the purpoſe of conciliation, explained the object of the convention: "You muſt not forget,"—ſaid that magiſtrate—"that you are not met to examine which of the two religions is beſt, but to enſure the public tranquillity, by removing the uſual pretexts for tumults. Ought the exerciſe of the new religion to be tolerated agreeably to the requeſts of the nobility and commons, at the ſtates of Pontoiſe? Or are we to regard, as a thing impoſſible, that men of different perſuaſions may live in peace with each other, and that a heretic can fulfil the duties of a citizen? Theſe are the queſtions on which you are to decide."

After many debates, in the courſe of which no new arguments were employed, the queen-mother made a propoſal, which was adopted by both parties: ſhe declared that it was both her ſon's intention and her own, to live and die in the profeſſion of the eſtabliſhed faith, and not to ſuffer any attack to be made on it: that the king, therefore, meant that wherever the partiſans of the new religion had ſeized upon the churches, they ſhould reſtore them to the Catholics, without being permitted to build any others for their own uſe; that in conſideration, however, of the offer they had conſtantly made of ſubmitting to the deciſions of a general council, and from a wiſh to give them time for reflection, he would conſent that they ſhould aſſemble unarmed, and in a peaceable manner, without the walls of the towns, in order to perform divine worſhip, under the immediate inſpection of a magiſtrate: that this permiſſion ſhould only remain in force until the publication of the decrees of a general council, which ſhould be conſidered as laws for all his ſubjects. The Catholics, inferior in numbers at this aſſembly, acceded to Catharine's propoſal, in order to avoid a greater evil; and the reformed acquieſced, in order to acquire a civil exiſtence, which, though reſtrained for the preſent, they hoped ſoon to be able to extend.

But notwithſtanding this reſerve on the part of the Proteſtants, Catharine was aware that ſhe had already advanced too far to retreat, and ſhe accordingly purſued with warmth the publication and execution of the late edict. It was regiſtered by the parliaments of Rouen, Bourdeaux, Toulouſe and Grenoble, without difficulty, becauſe in thoſe provinces where the commotions were moſt violent, and where the number of Hugonots almoſt equalled that of the Catholics, an immediate remedy was deemed indiſpenſable*. At Dijon, on the contrary, it was unanimouſly rejected by the parliament, becauſe the reformed religion had made leſs progreſs in Burgundy; and Tavannes, the governor, had taken upon himſelf to enforce the execution of the July-Edict. Catharine, however, perſiſting in her determination, appointed commiſſioners, whom ſhe armed with all the plentitude of ſovereign authority, to make all the refractory provinces comply. The reſiſtance was ſtrongeſt from the parliament of Paris, who made repeated remonſtrances to the king, which, though founded on erroneous principles, containing maxims both falſe and pernicious, were not wholly deſtitute of wiſe and judicious obſervations. In one of theſe they remark that—the magiſtrates, who are the repreſentatives of the prince in the diſcharge of his moſt dignified functions, ought to be of the ſame religion with him, and there never exiſted a government in which this maxim was not inviolably obſerved. Even among the Turks, where Chriſtians and Jews are tolerated, every public officer is a Mahometan. But after a violent oppoſition, the parliament was, at length, compelled to yield, and decreed—*That, in conſideration of the urgent neceſſity of the caſe, and in obedience to the king's will, the edict ſhould be regiſtered and publiſhed, without approbation of the new religion.

It was next agreed between Anthony and the duke of Alva, that the Spaniſh ambaſſador ſhould, in his maſter's name, require the diſmiſſion of the Chatillons from the council, and that this demand ſhould be ſupported by the king of Navarre, and all the Catholics. The queen-mother was ſoon appriſed of this reſolution by the biſhop of Limoges, the French ambaſſador at the court of Spain, and from the diſpleaſure ſhe evinced on the occaſion it was ſuppoſed that the admiral might eaſily have perſuaded her to reject ſuch a propoſal with all the contempt it deſerved, and to come to an open quarrel with the king of Navarre. He deemed it, however, more prudent to make a voluntary retreat; and he according aſked and obtained, not without much apparent difficulty, permiſſion to paſs ſome time at his own ſeat, under the uſual pretext of ſettling ſome family affairs. She expreſſed her diſpleaſure in ſtrong terms to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, obſerving that ſome one muſt have prejudiced her ſon-in-law againſt her, or he never would have ventured on a meaſure ſo contrary to a conduct he had been accuſtomed to obſerve towards her. She added, that ſhe had granted permiſſion to the admiral Coligni, and to d'Andelot, at their particular requeſt, to abſent themſelves from the council, in order to attend to their own private affairs.

The duke of Guiſe, who had left the court towards the end of November, had recently accompanied his brother the cardinal to Saverne, where they had agreed upon a conference with the duke of Wertemberg, who had promiſed to bring with him ſome of his moſt expert theologians. The real object of this interview was to engage the duke and his colleagues, who were followers of Luther, to renounce all alliance with the French Hugonots, and thereby to diſappoint the admiral and the queen-mother of the aſſiſtance they expected to receive from that quarter.

As the duke of Guiſe paſſed through the ſmall town of Vaſſi, in Champagne, on his road to Paris, he ſtopped to attend the celebration of divine ſervice: and being informed that a Proteſtant-meeting had, in contradiction to the late edict, been eſtabliſhed in a barn, within the town, and very near the pariſh-church, he ſent one of his officers, attended by two pages, to deſire the miniſter would come to ſpeak to him. On the approach of the officers, the door of the meeting-houſe was ſhut againſt them, and, on their knocking with conſiderable violence, ſome of the Hugonots, who were then aſſembled at their devotions, went out to chaſtiſe them for an interruption which they deemed unſeaſonable and improper: a ſuffille enſued, and the duke of Guiſe, being appriſed of it, haſtened to the ſpot, attended by his troops. He was immediately aſſailed with a volley of ſtones, whence he received a ſlight contuſion on the arm, and De Broſſe, one of his officers, was ſeverely wounded on the head: the ſoldiers, enraged at the ſight, immediately fired on the Hugonots, then entering the barn, put numbers of them to the ſword, before the duke of Guiſe could repreſs their violence; Some authors aſſert that only thirty of the reformed were ſlain, and about double that number wounded*; but others, with greater probability, maintain that the number of the killed and wounded amounted to two hundred and ſixty†. The miniſter, wounded in ſeveral places, was conveyed to Saint-Dizier, where the duke preferred his complaint, and demanded juſtice againſt thoſe who had commenced the attack. Having received information that the reformed were preparing to diſpute his paſſage, and that captain Vaudrai-Saint-Phalle, was laying wait for him at Vitri, with ſix hundred men, he quitted the Paris road for that of Rheims, where he was not expected.

The news of the maſſacre of Vaſſi, as it was called by the Hugonots, was ſoon ſpread over Europe, and the party endeavoured, by means of this event, to render the duke of Guiſe an object of general execration.

As a religious proceſſion was to take place on Palm Sunday, at which it was expected the duke of Guiſe would be preſent, ſome gentlemen of diſtinction among the reformed attended the conſiſtory, and offered to poniard him, provided the church would avow the enterpriſe; but the miniſters expreſſed their diſapprobation of ſuch a mode of proceeding, obſerving that acts of violence were only authoriſed in matters which concerned the public ſafety, and when the courts of juſtice were ſhut againſt them: that they had denounced the author of the maſſacre at Vaſſi to the queen, who had promiſed that juſtice ſhould be done them; and nothing, therefore, ſhould be attempted, till that buſineſs was brought to a concluſion.

The prince of Condé, finding his enemies ſo greatly ſuperior, reſolved to quit Paris; and he accordingly repaired to his ſeat near Meaux, where he was ſoon after joined by the admiral and his friends. The firſt object of the Hugonots, after failing in their attempt upon Paris, ſhould have been to ſecure the king's perſon, which would have given them a great advantage over their enemies, who, in that caſe, would have been reduced to the neceſſity, either of acting ſimply on the defenſive, or of committing the crime of rebellion, in attacking their ſovereign. This attempt would have been attended with no difficulty, as the queen herſelf would have favoured its execution. But the Hugonots were averſe from the adoption of a ſcheme that would have worn the appearance of violence; and thinking it better to provide a place of ſafety to which the queen and her ſon might voluntarily retire, they fixed their eyes on the city of Orleans, which d'Andelot, with his three hundred veterans, undertook to take by ſurpriſe.

The prince of Condé, intent on the reduction of Orleans, marched from Meaux, the ſame day on which the Catholic noblemen left Paris, and had occaſioned a great alarm in the metropolis. The ſudden appearance of a numerous body of cavalry, near the gate of Saint-Honoré, made the citizens fear that the prince had been ſecretly invited thither by the reformed, who had not yet diſcontinued their aſſemblies; and in this perſuaſion they flew to arms, and prepared to ſuſtain a ſiege. The prince's object, however, was only to ſecure the bridge of Saint-Cloud, which commanded the road to Orleans; which city he did not reach till after d'Andelot had taken poſſeſſion of it.

The conſtable had no ſooner entered Paris, than he ſeized and impriſoned Ruze, who was general agent to the reformed churches. The king, on his arrival in the capital, promiſed the citizens to forbid all exerciſe of the new religion within their territory: the prohibition indeed was ſuperfluous, for all the Hugonots immediately left Paris, and retired to Orleans.

That city now became a ſecond capital in the kingdom, or rather the metropolis of an extenſive and well-organiſed ſtate, which was neither an oligarchy nor a democracy, although it partook of the nature of both thoſe ſpecies of governments. The admiral was the founder of this ſtate. The prince of Condé was unanimouſly choſen chief of the aſſociation, under the title of protecter and defender of the crown: and the aſſociates all ſwore obedience and ſubmiſſion to him, ſo long as he ſhould continue to act as their chief, and to follow the advice of the councils, three of which were formed; the firſt, compoſed of the principal nobility, had the conduct of all military enterpriſes, negociations, and other affairs in which ſecrecy and celerity were required: the ſecond, conſiſting of miniſters, elders, and officers of the ſecond rank, was deſtined to regulate the police and all matters ſubject to a long diſcuſſion: the third, was formed of all ſuch as were excluded from the two firſt, and its province was to deliberate on objects which concerned the whole community, ſuch as the acceptance of a treaty of peace, or the approbation of a new regulation.

All theſe regulations, however, muſt have proved of little avail, unleſs ſome means had been deviſed for ſupporting and encreaſing the army they had on foot. The private fortunes of the leaders were the more inadequate to this purpoſe, as they were now deprived of all their penſions and ſalaries, and even their eſtates were liable to be confiſcated by an arrét of the parliament. Four or five different modes of raſing the neceſſary ſums ſuggeſted themſelves to the reformed: the firſt was a general contribution of the churches, to which the prince of Condé had recourſe when he attempted to ſecure the capital; but their zeal had perceptibly diminiſhed ſince the publication of the laſt edict, which granted them nearly all they deſired: the church of Paris had, indeed, continued her ſupplies, though with ſuch a ſparing hand, that the prince's firſt military cheſt contained only ſixteen hundred crowns. He now diſpatched couriers to the different provinces, and addreſſed circular letters to the two thouſand five hundred churches in the name of which he acted, to appriſe them of the change which had taken place in the ſituation of affairs, and to requeſt a ſpeedy ſupply of men and money: the ſecond mode was to ſeize on the produce of the taxes, whenever they ſhould find themſelves ſufficiently ſtrong: the third, to pillage all the abbies and monaſteries.

As there could be little doubt, however, that the government, in the embarraſſment to which it would ſpeedily be reduced, would accept the offers repeatedly made by the pope and the king of Spain, and as it would be highly imprudent to defer taking precautions till reduced to the laſt extremity, it was determined to ſend agents to the different courts whence aſſiſtance might be reaſonably expected, but with orders not to urge their ſolicitations until they ſhould receive farther inſtructions; the prince, keeping only his wife and eldeſt ſon with him at Orleans, had the precaution to ſend his other children, with the lady of Roye, his mother-in-law, into Germany, to ſecond the efforts of his negociators, and to ſerve as hoſtages for the repayment of any money that might be advanced him.

The prince's affairs were, at this time, in a proſperous ſituation, for he had no ſooner made himſelf maſter of Orleans, than the inhabitants of Beaugenci, Blois, Tours, Angers, and Maus, immediately flew to arms, maſſacred or expelled the clergy and all the Catholics, who made any reſiſtance: and as there were many rich abbies and monaſteries within the precincts of theſe towns, the Hugonots found means not only to maintain the garriſons, but even to pour conſiderable ſums into the military cheſt of the prince of Condé.* Some larger towns, ſuch as Poitiers, Bourges, and Angouleme, followed the ſame impulſe, and their defection would have been ſucceeded by that of all the ſouthern provinces, had not chance, rather than foreſight, placed at the head of the civil and military adminiſtration of Guienne, a man, in diſpoſition ardent, impetuous, violent and mercileſs; but vigilant, active, and indefatigable, a friend to order and ſubordination, and ſincerely attached to his king and country.

This man was Blaiſe de Montluc, who had been bred up in the Piedmonteſe wars, and, after paſſing a conſiderable time in the camp, was ranked among the moſt valiant and able captains in the army.

In Dauphiné, where the revolution was almoſt general, the reformed were headed by a man, who proved himſelf a worthy rival of Montluc. This was the baron des Adrets, who had alſo ſerved in Piedmont, where he had been tagen priſoner by the Spaniards: after his releaſe he preferred a complaint againſt the vidame of Pecquigni, to whoſe negligence or cowardice he aſcribed his capture; but the authority of the Guiſes being interpoſed to deprive him of that redreſs which he demanded, he enliſted with their enemies, and retired to his eſtate in Dauphiné, where Montbrun and Mouvans appointed him to the chief command of the Hugonots. He placed himſelf at the head of ſome of the gentlemen of that country, who, with ſome citizens of Valence, conſpired againſt La Motte Gondrin, the lieutenant of the province under the duke of Guiſe, and revenged their hatred of his ſeverities by his death. While the queen-mother inclined to the Proteſtant-party, oppoſition to the power of their antagoniſts was, in inſtances of this kind, ſecretly connived at by her. The authority of Des Adrets being confirmed by the prince of Condé, and that officer having enliſted numbers of gentry and common people under his ſtandard, he took the field with a conſiderable army. His very menaces terrified the city of Grenoble, which ejected its Catholic partiſans, and deſtroyed the altars and images of the churches. All the other towns of Dauphiné, except Ambrun and Arainçon, followed this example. His name, already terrible, became every day more dreadful by his actions. Audacious in enterpriſe, and following cloſe the terror of his firſt victories, he aſſaulted and took the town and caſtle of Pierreenlatte, ſtormed Bourg, obliged the town of Pont St. Eſprit to open its gates to him, and made himſelf maſter of Boulenes. In almoſt every one of theſe places, the garriſons were put to the ſword without quarter, and many of the ſoldiers hanged on the walls, or thrown headlong from the top of the rocks. Avignon trembled at his approach, but he turned back to Grenoble, which had made a treaty with Maugiron, the Catholic lieutenant of the province. Though it ſurrendered at diſcretion he for once ſhewed mercy. Abſolute as he was tremendous in his army, he lodged ſix thouſand troops in the city and ſuburbs, without any of the inhabitants having cauſe to complain of their violence; and boaſted that he could turn them into lions, or ſheep, at his pleaſure. When Monbrizon was taken, and the caſtle capitulated, he drenched the ſtreets with blood, and precipitated, or made ſeveral ſoldiers, along with the governor, Moncelar, toſs themſelves from the ſummit of the tower. His officers remonſtrated againſt theſe cruelties, but could not prevent them. One of the unfortunate captives, whom he had ordered to jump from the top of a precipice, ran twice to the brink and there ſtopped ſhort—Des Adrets reproved him for his ſlowneſs, and aſked him why he ſhould take two runs when his companions had only taken one—"Brave as you are, baron," replied the ſoldier, "I'll give you ten runs to it." This unexpected anſwer extorted a ſmile from the baron, and ſaved the man's life. The aſſiſtance he gave to the proteſtant commanders in Provence, by the defeat of a conſiderable body of forces, under the count De Suz, at Vaurias: the reduction of numbers of forts and caſtles upon the Rhone, and a variety of other enterpriſes, rendered the baron's military ſervices as important as thoſe of Montluc, and his renown in arms more remarkable. Perceiving, however, that the prince of Condé, inſtead of applauding him, had transferred to Soubiſe the chief command in Lyons, and that his reputation with his party declined, he entered into a treaty with the duke of Nemours; but, before the terms of accommodation could be ſettled, he was ſurpriſed and taken priſoner by Montbrun.

and Mouvans, and kept in cuſtody till the termination of the firſt civil war. Lyons, in vain beſieged by Nemours, remained in the power of the Proteſtants; and the count of Cruſſol preſerved their footing in Languedoc.

In Champagne and Picardy the Catholic party prevailed, and at Sens, Amiens and Abbeville the proteſtants were maſſacreed without mercy, in return for the cruelties they had exerciſed in other parts, and for the plunder and profanation of the churches. In Normandy theſe violences were retaliated on the Catholic inhabitrnts: at Rouen the Hugonots expelled the parliament, and proſcribed the eſtabliſhed religion; while the ports of Havre and Dieppe, having followed the example of the capital, were entruſted, by the admiral, to the care of experienced officers, in whoſe zeal and fidelity he could confide.

The Catholic chiefs having ſecured Catharine in their intereſt, ſuffered her to paſs the ſummer, with her ſon, at Monceaux, that the unfavourable impreſſions excited by the idea of their being kept in the ſtate of captivity, might be effectually removed. The mareſchal de Briſſac ſuperceded the cardinal of Bourbon in the government of Paris, which he divided into different quarters, nearly equal in extent, leaving the citizens the choice of their officers, and aſſigning to each quarter its particular departmnt and hours of ſervice. By this judicious arrangement he juſtifid the idea that had been formed of his military talents, though, at the ſame time, he did aſſential injury to the ſtate, by giving a too vigorous conſtitution to a multitude, difficult to govern, and prone to revolt. It is certain, that after this eſtabliſhment, the Pariſians, enabled to calculate their ſtrength, became more turbulent and untractable than before; and that from this epoch may be dated the origin of that offerveſcence which raged, with more or leſs energy, for nearly two centuries. At the firſt review of the city militia, the mareſchal counted four-and-twenty thouſand men, completely armed, and moſt of them fit to rank with regular troops.

The Catholic army being aſſembled, and ſuperior in numbers to that of the confederates, Catharine once more reſolved to try the effect of negociation, and for that purpoſe requeſted an interview with the prince of Condé, at the village of Thuri; but when preſſed to explain what freſh terms ſhe had to propoſe, ſhe made a poſitive declaration, that the edict of January ſhould never be re-eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, and that her ſon was determined to allow the public exerciſe of no other religion than the Catholic. The conference was, of courſe, broken off. Another interview between the chiefs of the Hugonots, the queen-mother, and the king of Navarre, at the village of Talſi, was productive of no better effect; a letter from the duke of Guiſe to the cardinal of Lorraine, which fell into the hands of the prince of Condé, ſufficiently proved the treachery of the triumvirs, who only ſought to ſeparate the aſſociates, in order to cruſh them with greater facility.

On the twenty-ſeventh of July, the parliament of Paris pronounced an arret, which amounted to a general proſcription of the Hugonots, by permitting all the Catholics in towns and villages to aſſemble in arms at the ringing of the bells, to purſue and deſtroy them: this arret was tranſmitted to the curates of pariſhes to be read every Sunday in the churches; and its publication occaſioned exertions of cruelty diſgraceful to humanity. In Tourain, the peaſants ruſhed in the towns of Liquiel on the Indre, Cormeri, Loches, and other villages, where they committed every ſpecies of depredation; and after tearing out the eyes of a Proteſtant miniſter, they burnt him at a ſlow fire. Theſe barbaraties, however, were frequently retaliated. When the prieſts and monks of Saint Carlais, taking advantage of the ſlender guard kept there by the Hugonots, rang their bells, and cut them in pieces; De Coignée aſſaulted them on the retreat of their aſſociates, deſtroyed moſt of them, and hanged two of their ringleaders in the church, where the ſignal had been given at the veſpers.

The Catholic confederates having atchieved the conqueſts of ſeveral towns that, from the ſouth-weſt, communicated by the Loire with Orleans, determined to cut off its intercourſe with the Lyonnoiſe, and the provinces in a different quarter. The reduction of Bourges was their particu'ar aim. Elevated with their ſucceſsful progreſs, they were deſirous, in ſetting out on this attempt, to make the utmoſt diſplay of all their civil authority; for which purpoſe they prevailed with the queen-mother to bring the young king to the camp. Before they left the Bois de Vencennes, Catharine acquainted the prince of Condé, by a meſſenger, that he ought now to take his final reſolution for an accommodation, on the terms propoſed, when the king was ready to ſhew himſelf along with her in the Catholic army, when the foreign auxillaries had entered the kingdom for his ſervice, and the parliament of Paris had declared the prince's party guilty of high treaſon. The prince's reply was ſpirited and firm: after recapitulating all the argments he had before urged, on the ambition of the triumvirs, and the perſecution of the Proteſtants, he obſerved, that it could not be forgotten by her, by whoſe order and entreaties he had raiſed his military forces, when the triumvirate were diſpoſed to ſtrip her of all authority, and the ambaſſador of Spain joined them in this deſign; and that the whole world ſhould ſoon know, by the publication of the letters under her hand, to which of the confederacies the name of rebels to the ſtate could, with propriety, be applied. Though in the parliament's judicial condemnation of his adherents, by a gradation of arrets, the prince was always perſonally excepted, under the feigned notion of his involuntary detention from the court; it did not prevent him from treating the exception as an inſult, and from proteſting, in a formal writ, againſt the legality of the whole judgment.

But the proceedings of the parliament had conſiderable effect on many of the prince's adherents, who, fearful of loſing their eſtates, expreſſed an inclination to viſit their native provinces. That Condé might have appeared to form a reſolution which he could not avoid, he determined to ſend ſeveral of the chieftains with detachments of troops, into thoſe countries whither they wiſhed to withdraw, and to retire himſelf, with the remainder of his army, to Orleans. In conſequence of this reſolution, the count of Rochefoucaud was appointed to march into Angouléme and Saintonge, Soubiſe into the Lionnoiſe, Duras into Guienne, Montgomery into Normandy, and the prince of Porcein into Champagne.

The Catholic chieftains now had it in their power to carry on their military operations to the utmoſt advantage. The provinces where their adverſaries we e moſt formidable, had been already attended to by them: the duke of Aumale being ſent into Normandy; Montpenſier to Tourain; the count de Cruſſol into Languedoc; the chevalier de Montre, into Guienne and Gaſcony. While the king of Navarre went to eſcort their majeſties to the camp, the army, under the conduct of the duke of Guiſe, had moved to Bourges. Being joined by the Swiſs, it conſiſted of three thouſand cavalry, and fifteen thouſand foot. Ivoy, brother to Genlis, commanded the garriſon of the city, which, being reinforced by the prince of Condé, amounted to two thouſand infantry, and three troops of Arquebuſiers*. The defence was conducted with no leſs courage and vigour than the attack: frequent ſallies were made from the town; and, when a conſiderable breach was effected in the wall, a rampart of earth, raiſed in one night's time, ſurpriſed and baffled the aſſailants. Having conſumed the greater part of their ammunition, a convoy of artillery and military ſtores from Paris was expected, for the conduct of which the duke of Guiſe had detached four troops of horſe, and ſix companies of infantry. The admiral Coligni having intelligence of its approach, marched in the night from Orleans, and attacked it near Chateaudun. Having ſurrounded the troops, he became maſter of the whole convoy; but the artillery horſes having been carried off by their drivers, at the firſt onſet, he was compelled to ſet fire to the powder and demoliſh the guns. Among others, Throgmorton, the Engliſh ambaſſador, was taken priſoner, on his way to the camp, and conducted to Orleans, where the prince of Condé treated him with the greateſt reſpect. Meanwhile, the duke of Guiſe began to induce Ivoy, by promiſes, and an offer of the moſt honourable terms, to ſurrender; and, having no information of the defeat of the convoy, he liſtened too eaſily to the propoſals. By obtaining a moſt preciſe and formal capitulation for the ſafety and free exit of himſelf and the troops, and even for liberty of conſcience to the Proteſtants in the town, he thought to obviate all reflections againſt his honour; but this precaution proved inſufficient to ſcreen him from the reproaches of his party; upon preſenting himſelf at Orleans, he was refuſed admittance to the prince, and was compelled to hide his diſgrace in a private retreat.

When the Catholic chiefs had thus added the reduction of Bourges to that of the other towns whence Orleans might be ſupported, the capital undertaking of the ſiege of that city ſeemed to many, in point of expediency, preferable to all others, and not diſproportioned to their military ſtrength. But the opinions, in the council of war, were divided upon this head. It was urged on the one ſide, that Orleans being the main fortreſs of the adverſe party, and their arſenal of war, occupied by the body of their gentry, and their two principal chieftains, a ſucceſsful blow directed againſt it would at once cruſh the root of oppoſition; and that, from preſent circumſtances, it appeared liable to ſuch a deciſive ſtroke, from the diſaſters that had befallen the circumjacent towns, from the diſperſion of many of the leaders, and from the preſent imperfect ſtate of its fortifications.

* De Thou—D'Aubigne.

It was known from the computation of their troops, compared with the extent of the bulwarks of the place, that they were ſufficient to environ and aſſault the whole. It was added, that the ſiege of Orleans would not only ſtrike the Proteſtants, in the provinces with terror, but diſturb the route, and perhaps cauſe the deſertion of their German auxiliaries, who would not be forward to expoſe themſelves by ſupporting a party which would appear reduced to extremity. On the other hand, it was alledged, that the military force of Orleans, conſiſting of four thouſand veteran troops, twelve hundred horſe, and three thouſand militia, trained to diſcipline, and inured to arms, would prove equal to half of the beſieging army, and, though they might receive ſome reinforcements, that their want of many of the materials neceſſary for a regular ſiege rendered it an unſeaſonable and dangerous enterpriſe: that it became them rather to turn their thoughts upon Normandy.

That province had been embroiled by the contention of three factions for the ſuperiority; one being headed by the duke of Bouillon, who inclined to favour the Proteſtants, without renouncing his connexions with the court; another by Matignon, the king's lieutenant in Lower Normandy, who was employed in ſupporting the duke of Aumale, appointed to ſupercede Bouillon in his government; and a third, which was the moſt powerful, conſiſting of the prince of Conde's partiſans, and the determined Hugonots guided by the count of Montgomery. The duke of Aumale had already attempted the ſiege of Rouen, but his forces were inſufficient for the undertaking. Matignon being obliged to retire to Cherbourg, applied to the duke of Eſtampes and Martigues, in Brittany, for their aſſiſtance, and obtained it. The parliament of Rouen, having retreated to Louviers, publiſhed its decrees, in imitation of that of Paris, for condemning all the Hugonots that could be ſeized, and for confiſcating their property, which created a particular ſcene of animoſity and cruel repriſal between the people of Rouen and thoſe of Louviers.

The forts and poſts in the vicinity of Rouen had been repeatedly taken and re-taken by the oppoſite parties. Thoſe of Oire and St. Lo, of Caudebec, Quillebeuf, and Harfleur, upon the Seine, which were the moſt important, had, after the arrival of Eſtampes, ſurrendered to the Catholics. Meanwhile all practicable means for the defence of Rouen had been taken by Montgomery.

It would be foreign from the purpoſe of general hiſtory to record the particular events of every ſiege; in that of Rouen equal gallantry was diſplayed by either party, and the ſlaughter was dreadful on both ſides: after an obſtinate reſiſtance, Mount St. Catharine was taken by ſurpriſe, which greatly facilitated the reduction of the town. Its capture, however, was retarded for ſome time, by the arrival of a reinforcement of Engliſh troops, who, in repelling the aſſailants, diſplayed the moſt obſtinate valour; at length, the ſiege having continued a month, and the propoſals to ſurrender being treated with contempt, the place was taken by aſſault.

The taking of Rouen, which is computed to have been attended with the de-ſtruction of four thouſand men on each ſide, was followed by the death of the king of Navarre, who, during the ſiege, had received a muſket-ſhot in the ſhoulder. Through his impatience of the neceſſary operation, or the unſkilfulneſs of the ſurgeons, the ball remained unextracted from the wound: and he expired a few days after the ſurrender of the town. Henry, who was born at Peau in Berne, was only, at this time, nine years of age. He was educated by the queen his mother at Nerac, who, with her ſon and an infant daughter, had retreated from the court about the time her huſband had declared himſelf a Catholic*, The queen-mother was apprehenſive the king of Navarre's death might produce ſome diſadvantage to the Catholic party, by his immediate vaſſals and pertiſans falling off to the other ſide. In the preſent minority of the king, and of the firſt prince of the blood, the prince of Condé might indeed have been ſuppoſed to ſtand in the room of his brother, and to be the only acting guardian of the blood-royal. But, when the political confederacies were already formed, and cemented by the animoſities of the civil war, this conſideration could have little influence to make a change.

As ſoon as the reduction of Rouen had appeared inevitable, Dieppe and Caen ſurrendered to the Catholics, who, after detaching a part of their army to blockade Havre, retired with the remainder to the vicinity of Paris. The general ſucceſs of the Catholics elevated them with the hopes that the entire ſubjection of the Proteſtants would ſoon be accompliſhed. But the intelligence received, during the ſiege of Rouen, of the ſucceſs of D'Andelot in his miſſion for German levies, gave a different aſpect to the condition of that party, and appears to have been the principal inducement for drawing the army nearer the metropolis, and the center of the kingdom.

The exertions of Spifame, biſhop of Nevers, and D'Andelot, the prince of Condé's agents in Germany, in conducting the difficult negociation with which they had been entruſted, deſerved and obtained the warmeſt thanks of their party. At the diet of Frankfort, where Maximilian, ſon to Ferdinand, was elected king of the Romans, Spifame, having obtained three ſeveral audiences of the emperor and his ſon, and of the electors, got the letters written by the queen-mother to the prince of Condé, the originals of which he produced, entered into the archives of the imperial chamber; and, by his addreſs afterwards, the Rhingrave and count Rokendolf, who were in the ſervice of France, were both put to the ban of the empire. The production of queen Catharine's letters, though neceſſary for the prince's vindication, excited her indignation againſt him, and fixed her more immovably in the intereſt of the oppoſite faction. The affected delays of two German captains, who had private reaſons for ſpinning out the time of the levies, being overcome by Spifame, and the landgrave of Heſſe engaged to exert himſelf in the buſineſs; D'Andelot was enabled to bring them to a rendezvous at Bacara in Lorraine, about the middle of October. His vigilance in keeping them from deſertion for want of regular pay; his well-concerted marches; and his indefatigable labours (notwithſtanding his violent attacks of a quartan ague contracted in the mountains) in directing and guiding the frequent and long circuits he was obliged to make in them, ſhewed the ſpirit of the man, and the abilities of the officer. Having feigned an intention of penetrating the direct way through Lorraine, he turned ſuddenly towards the left, and ſtretching over the difficult roads of Burgundy, he avoided an encounter with the mareſchal de St. Andrê and the duke of Nevers, who had been ſent to oppoſe his paſſage. He brought his whole compliment of three thouſand foot in nine companies, and four thouſand horſe in twelve troops, to Montargis, and the neighbourhood of Orleans, in the middle of November. This reinforcement, augmented by a body of French gentry, who joined D'Andelot in his march, and fifteen hundred ſoldiers, collected by the count of Rochefoucaud and Duras, was not only ſufficient to enable the prince of Conde to take the field, but occaſioned his undertaking an enterpriſe no leſs injudicious in itſelf than it appeared to be diſproportioned to his ſtrength. This was an attempt to beſiege Paris, which, it was evident, could neither be taken, nor forced to a capitulation, by his army.

The abſence or diſperſion of the Catholic forces in different quarters was thought ſufficient to juſtify this hazardous ſtep.

But the interruption he met with at Corbeil was more unfortunate. This town, ſituated on the Seine, almoſt equally defenceleſs with the others, made reſiſtance, and obliged him to begin a kind of regular ſiege of it, until ſome ſuccours being thrown into it by the mareſchal St. André, the prince embraced the pretext of a conference propoſed by the queen to withdraw from the aſſault. The Catholic forces were, by this time, aſſembled in great numbers, and the two armies, ſeparated by the Seine, marched ſometimes in ſight of each other. That of the Catholics was drawn around the city and ſuburbs, while the prince purſued his route to Ville-juif, within two leagues of Paris. Though the hopes of gaining any advantage was now almoſt vaniſhed, yet, reſolved upon ſtriking ſome intimidating ſtroke before he retired, he prepared for attacking the ſuburb of St. Victor. The effect it produced at firſt ſurpaſſed expectation. Six hundred light-horſe, who had advanced beyond the ramparts, were driven back in ſuch diſorder, that carrying their terror along with them, the ſoldiers began to fly into the city, throughout which a vaſt conſternation was immediately ſpread. The firſt preſident of the parliament, La Maitre, died of the fright, while the populace in confuſion called on the troops to abandon the ſuburbs and ſhut the gates. The alarm, however, was ſoon compoſed by the diſpoſition made by the duke of Guiſe for repelling the enemy. The prince drew off his forces, and divided them into three bodies, for the ſake of lodging them in covered quarters. Their number amounted to eight thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe. The Catholic chiefs, ſatisfied with guarding againſt their attack of the ſuburbs, anſwered their defiances to battle only by ſome cannonading and ſlight ſkirmiſhes.

By the departure of Genlis from the camp, who had reſented the diſgrace of of his brother Ivoy, for the ſurrender of Bourges, the prince of Condé believed his deſigns betrayed to the enemy, and therefore determined on a retreat.

He was purſued, for ſome days, by the Catholic army, and at length believing an engagement to be unavoidable, he made a forced march, with his main body, towards Dreux, a town on the confines of Normandy, with the view of making himſelf maſter of this poſt, which was admirably calculated for promoting the plan he had formed of preſerving a communication betweeen Havre and Orleans. The Catholic chiefs, who now approached the plains of Dreux, and ſaw, that, by a little expedition, they could oblige the enemy to fight, diſpatched Caſtelnau to the queen to inform her that they had it in their power to bring the Hugonots to action, and only waited for orders. It was the unanimous opinion of the council that the deciſion of the queſtion ſhould be left to the prudence of the commanders.

The conſtable Montmorenci, who had brought the Catholic army to the oppoſite ſide, and encamped there unperceived by the enemy, forded the Eure in the night; and favoured by the moon, got his whole artillery moved to the unguarded villages. The noiſe of the drums and trumpets, which was heard when the prince's army began to be put in motion, ſerved as a ſignal for the conſtable to range his forces in order of battle.

Such was the diſpoſition of the catholic forces, when firſt preceived by the commanders of the adverſe army, which now conſiſted of from eight to nine thouſand infantry, and from four to five thouſand horſe*. While, in the utmoſt hurry, the latter prepared for an action quite unexpected, D'Andelot, diſabled by the attack of his ague from taking his poſt, moved forward on a baggage-horſe, and reconnoitred the enemy. His opinion was to endeavour to paſs without fighting, which might be done by leading to the left, and gain the village of Tréon, on the road to Chateauneuf. Immediately the prince of Condé, having joined his main battle with the van, conducted by the admiral Coligni, began to move forward according to his direction: But having now the enemy in full view, he advanced two or three hundred paces before he made his declination. The diſcharge of the conſtable's artillery, from the left wing, reached his foremoſt ranks, made ſome of his horſe give way, and forced a part of the German Reiters to wheel into declivity. The prince, intent on their motions, no ſooner preceived them thus expoſed, than, without diſcovering what was before him, and leaving the count Grammont with his foot he turned with all his cavalry, and fell on the flank of the Swiſs. Their battallion was ſucceſſively pierced by Moui, and D'Avaret, who gave the firſt charge; by the prince's own ſquadron, and by the Reiters of his diviſion. His brother, Gabriel de Montmorenci Montberon, the conſtable's fourth ſon, fell in this charge. In the mean time the admiral having marched forward with more delibration, directed his attack againſt the conſtable's cavalry, and that part of his centre that ſtood firm. The vollies of cannon he received in advancing having occaſioned no diſorder, his vigorous charge proved effectual to vanquiſh all that oppoſed him. A total confuſion enſuing, the conſtable being unhorſed, and having his jaw-bone broken by a muſket-ſhot, was made priſoner by ſome Reiters, from whoſe hands the prince of Porcien received him. No part of his main battle now remained unrouted but a few Swiſs, who, at laſt, were obliged to retreat. The prince of Condé having rallied two hundred of the German troops, could not induce them to charge the enemy, but taking the ſame route the others had done, they left him in their rear, wounded in the hand, and diſmounted, to be taken priſoner by Damville.

Though the battle was reſtored by the admiral, and the prince of Porcien, who, at the head of three hundred horſe, aud a thouſand German Reiters, ſuſtained the combat with ſuch reſolution, that the duke of Guiſe was left for a ſhort ſpace of time, with not a hundred cavaliers around him; the advantages gained by the Proteſtant chiefs were irrecoverably loſt. Martigues advancing with an old battallion of foot which had not yet engaged, the admiral was obliged to draw off his French horſe, who had broken or loſt moſt of their lances. He made his retreat with ſo much compoſure, that he carried off his artillery, and moſt of his baggage to Neufville, about a league diſtance from the field of battle, where he paſſed the night. The duke of Guiſe, being in no condition to follow him, took up his lodging at Bleville. The ſlaughter of the Catholic army exceeded that of of the Proteſtants, and the field was more fatal to the officers of rank. The mareſchal Saint André was ſhot by Mezieres, whom he had induced to kill a kinſman of his own, that he might proſecute him, and obtain the confiſcation of his fortune*. The duke of Nevers received a ſhot in the thigh, from the careleſſneſs of his own equerry, in holding a piſtol with the muzzle towards him, of which he died in a few days. Varicarville, equerry to the duke of Guiſe, underſtanding that the enemy intended to direct their principal efforts againſt his maſter, had obtained permiſſion to wear his arms, and to mount his charger; an inſtance of fidelity that coſt him his life.

By the flight of the right wing of the Catholics at the battle of Dreux, the ſpeedieſt intelligence was conveyed to Paris of the total defeat of their army. The appearance of D'Oſſun (an officer who had, in Piedmont, acquired the appellation of The Bold Soldier) among theſe ſwift couriers, confirmed it beyond all contradiction. The Pariſians were thrown into the greateſt conſternation, which continued to encreaſe, until the arrival of De Loſſes, who had been diſpatched by the duke of Guiſe, with the certain accounts of his having turned the fate of the battle, and obtained a victory. Public proceſſions were appointed, and bonfires ordered to celebrate the happy event: and the commiſſion of commander in chief of the army, in abſence of the conſtable, was immediately ſent to the duke, with twenty-five collars of the order of Saint Michael, to be diſpoſed of by his direction. Though from a ſenſe of the reproach he incurred, D'Oſſun ſtarved himſelf to death, his boldneſs became an ironical proverb.

* De Thou, p. 682.

The Proteſtant chiefs, who had beat one half of the Catholic army, taken the conſtable priſoner, and carried off ſome ſtandards and booty from the field, were as much mortified at the diſcredit of being obliged to retire before their enemies, as at the diſcomfiture they had ſuſtained. The admiral, who had, with ſignal bravery and conduct, diſputed the honour of keeping the field with the duke of Guiſe, propoſed, in a council of war, to attack him again the next morning. But the Germans, who had ſuffered leaſt in the battle, declined ſuch a ſudden renewal of the combat. To prevent, however, in ſome meaſure, the unfavourable report of a defeat, the admiral drew up his troops in order of battle, and marched half a league towards the enemy, before he turned off to Gallardon and Anet, on the borders of La Beauſſe. His high reputation immediately eſtabliſhed him, by unanimous conſent, in the principal command of the army, during the captivity of the prince.

While the queen-mother, for many weighty reaſons, was deſirous of a peace, the duke, in the midſt of winter, urged the undertaking of the ſiege of Orleans. To avert or diminiſh the force of this impending blow, the admiral determined on an expedition into Normandy, with part of his forces, while the remainder might form a garriſon ſufficient for the defence of Orleans. Upon a review of the troops, he found that fourteen companies of French and German infantry, and four troops of the oldeſt French cavalry, could be muſtered in the city. The body of the townſmen, too, could be depended on to ſecond the troops with firmneſs and alacrity. D'Andelot, in conjunction with Saint Cyr, the governor, and Feuquiere, an excellent engineer, undertook the defence of that important place. While Coligni made incurſions in Berri and Sologne, where he extended his quarters, the utmoſt attention was paid to the collecting of proviſions, and whatever might contribute to the ſtrength of Orleans.

A. D. 1563.] The ſiege of that city was begun by the duke of Guiſe, on the eighth of February. De Cipiere led on the firſt diviſion of the Catholic army, and, after ſkirmiſhing parties, had proceeded to aſſail a part of the entrenchments defended by four companies of French foot, he was informed that the German Lanſquenets were obſerved to quit their poſt in diſorder. Animated by the intelligence, and the arrival of freſh troops, he puſhed another attack that way, by which the Gaſcon infantry, who made the only reſiſtance, were almoſt ſurrounded, and a general confuſion enſued. The duke of Guiſe having next poſſeſſed himſelf of the Ponterau, proceeded to take meaſures for battering the Tourelles, the beſiegers acquired the command of the bridge, and the approaches to the town were in ſuch a ſtate of forwardneſs, that the duke of Guiſe had fixed on the morning of the nineteenth of February for delivering a general aſſault, when his death was ſought and accompliſhed by the ignominious de Merei Poltrot. As the duke returned from the works, on the evening of the eighteenth, to his quarters, at the caſtle of Cornei, accompanied only by Roſtaing, one of the queen's domeſtics, the aſſaſſin, watching his opportunity, ſhot him from behind with a piſtol. The ball entering his body above the right ſhoulder, the duke fell forward on his horſe's neck, but did not loſe his ſeat. The duke with difficulty reached his quarters, while Roſtaing, in vain purſued the murderer, who was quickly out of ſight. But the terrors that ſeized him, joined to the darkneſs of the night, rendered him incapable of effecting his eſcape. Having tired his horſe with wandering, he was taken in the morning, at no great diſtance from the place where the murder was committed. As he immediately confeſſed it, and threw out aſperſions againſt ſome of the Proteſtant chiefs, as having inſtigated him to the deed, it is requſite to explain the grounds of this calumny.

When Poltrot, who had been bred a Catholic, and turned Proteſtant, heard, at a conference holden near Vienne, by the baron des Adrets, that the king of Navarre was killed at Rouen, he ſighed deeply, and ſaid, "this one victim is "not ſufficient to atone for the public miſeries; there ſtill remains a greater "ſacrifice to be made." When aſked what ſacrifice he meant—"The mighty "Guiſe himſelf," replied he; and ſtretching forth his right arm, and elevating his voice, "and here it is,"—added he—"that ſhall be raiſed to finiſh, by one "act the ſcene of our calamities."

The confeſſion extorted from him when put to the queſtion, exhibited a confuſed maſs of contradictions. There was not a ſingle perſon he had named in his firſt confeſſion, whom he did not, by turns, exculpate and accuſe; and, in the midſt of his torture, at laſt concluded with ſaying, that if the deed were yet uncommitted he would not ſcruple ſtill to be the actor of it; he being conveyed to Paris, in a few weeks underwent the puniſhment appointed by the law for traitors.

The duke of Guiſe ſurvived his wound ſix days, and, during that interval, diſplayed the moſt dignified compoſure and manly fortitude, which juſtified the repreſentation given of his exit by the Catholic authors, as worthy of a Chriſtian hero.

As the reins of government had now fallen entirely into the queen's hands, the reſolution ſhe had already formed for concluding a peace, could be proſecuted without reſtraint. The prince of Condé himſelf being favourably inclined to it, was farther inſtigated by various arguments ſhe had uſed with him to promote the meaſure.

After various conferences, a treaty was at length reſolved on. In the place of the edict of January, a more limited rule of toleration was accepted by the Hugonots. In all fiefs, holding directly of the crown, and which had the privilege of Haubert, or high juſtice, the barons and nobillity were allowed the free and public exerciſe of the Proteſtant religion, for themſelves and their vaſſals. In other fiefs, the proprietors, when they did not reſide in towns or villages, ſubject to higher juriſdictions, were permitted to enjoy the ſame liberty in their own houſes. In every bailiwick, having an immediate privilege of appeal to the court of parliament, a city or town was to be appointed, in the ſuburbs of which the Proteſtants might aſſemble for public worſhip; and in the places where they enjoyed it at the time of ſigning the convention, the free exerciſe of it was alſo to be retained. In the city and liberties of Paris, and in all other parts of the kingdom not ſpecified, they were prohibited to meet publicly; but private liberty of conſcience was univerſally allowed them. The other articles reſpecting indemnities for the cival war, were conceived in the moſt preciſe and expreſs terms. The whole particular ſtipulations, reduced to the form of an edict, ſigned by the king, and dated from Amboiſe, on the nineteenth of March, was ordered to be regiſtered by the parliaments.

The treaty of peace, thus concluded by the prince, without being communicated to any of the foreign powers who had embraced the cauſe of the Hugonots, became the ſubject of ſome animadverſions and complaints. The admiral, in whoſe abſence the whole affair had been conducted, had great reaſon for diſſatisfaction; but unwilling to appear as an enemy to the public peace, he not only deſiſted from his objections, but declared, that the treaty being brought to an iſſue, every one ſhould acquieſce in it*.

The prince of Condé returned to court, where Catharine now reigned with unrivalled ſway. Upon the death of the duke of Guiſe, the conſtable expected to have the office of grand-maſter of the houſhold reſtored to him, and ſhewed ſome diſguſt at its being conferred on the young duke, by abſenting himſelf a while from court; but he, at length, conſented to accept the transfer of his government of Languedoc to his ſon D'Amville as an equivalent for the diſappointment. Nothing now remained for the perfect reſtoration of tranquillity but the expulſion of the Engliſh, by the reduction of Havre-de-Grace.

Elizabeth teſtified her chagrin at the treaty of Orleans, by demanding from France the reſtitution of Calais, and declaring ſhe was entitled to keep poſſeſſion of Havre, until that important article of the general peace was fulfilled. The French court replied, that the clauſe of the ſame treaty obliged her to commit no acts of hoſtility againſt France, during the ſpace of eight years; at the expiration of which time, the reſtitution of Calais, or a pecuniary redemption, had been, on that condition, promiſed. When the neceſſary preparations for a ſiege were made, the French troops marched from all quarters into Normandy; and, on the fifteenth of July, encamped before Havre.

The Engliſh troops in that town, commanded by the earl of Warwick, conſiſting, at firſt, of ſix thouſand men beſides ſeven hundred officers, had been already thinned by the ravages of a peſtilental diſeaſe: the heat of the weather, and a dearth of proviſions, encreaſed the fatal effects of this dreadful diſorder, and ſoon reduced Warwick to the neceſſity of capitulating on the honourable condition of retiring with the remnant of his forces. The whole terms of the treaty were ſettled, and hoſtages delivered for the performance of them, when ſixty ſail of Engliſh ſhips, under lord Clinton, appeared in the bay, ſteering towards the harbour. But Warwick having given notice to the admiral that Havre had ſurrendered, Clinton caſt anchor in the road; and, having embarked the troops, immediately ſet ſail for England.

Tranquillity being now reſtored to the nation, no means appeared to the chancellor ſo effectual for its preſervation, as well as for the ſupport and intereſt of royalty, as that of accelerating the ſolemn declaration of the king's majority. By Catharine's ready compliance with de l'Hopital's advice, and the aſſiduous application ſhe gave to the ſettling both the domeſtic and foreign affairs of the ſtate, it muſt be owned, that, at this time, ſhe ſhewed herſelf abundantly capable of exerciſing, and not altogether unworthy of, that ſupreme authority in the government, to which, with exceſſive eagerneſs, ſhe always aſpired. By her prudence and addreſs, the emperor's demands for the reſtitution of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, were eluded in a manner that created no miſunderſtanding with the Imperial court. An opportunity was taken to retaliate the affront offered to the French ambaſſador, by ſeizing Throgmorton, who ventured, along with another envoy from Elizabeth, to return to France without paſſports. But in this ſtep the manner of proceeding was ſuch, as rather indicated an intention to puniſh the inſolence of an obnoxious envoy, than to teſtify indignation againſt the court of England. There was a diſtinction made in the treatment of the two ambaſſadors, and the advantage was gained of excluding Throgmorton from the negociation, a point of no ſmall importance to the commencement and happy progreſs of a treaty of peace.

It was reſolved in the council, in purſuance of the previous determination of the queen-mother and the chancellor, to obtain a formal recognition of the king's majority, who had now entered his fourteenth year, and had conſequently completed the term preſcribed by the edict of Charles the Wiſe. This ceremony was performed, on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, at Rouen, whither the court had repaired after the reduction of Havre. The preference given, on this occaſion, to the parliament of Rouen, over that of Paris, was intended as a mortification to the latter.

When de Lanſac was ſent to demand of the parliament of Paris the regiſtration of the act of majority, and the other edicts, enraged at the ſlight that had been put upon them, they appointed deputies to remonſtrate on this diſparagement of their ſuper-eminent juriſdiction. But they overſhot their mark, it having been determined in the council to prevent a repetition of ſuch conduct, by giving them a firm and authoritative repulſe. The young king, inſtructed how to anſwer the deputies, firſt required the members of the council, who were preſent, to declare whether advice had not been taken about authenticating the act in the parliament of Rouen. When this was avowed, Charles aſſumed a commanding tone, and told them, "he would not bear that the magiſtrates of the parliament of Paris ſhould now behave as they had done in his minority; that "their original and proper function was to diſpenſe civil juſtice, to which it be"came them to confine themſelves, and no longer to cheriſh that ancient preju"dice of being the coadjutors of royalty, the protectors of the kingdom, and "the guardians of the city of Paris; and that, having once remonſtrated to him, "it was their duty to think of nothing more than ſubmiſſion to his will." But this was not ſufficient to intimidate the parliament, which, after hearing the reports of their delegates, ſtill debated the regiſtration, and, being divided in opinion, appointed a new deputation to the king. Their reſiſtance became a direct trial of the authority of the court. A grand council of the ſtate was called to controul their obſtinacy by a decree, which annulled their proceedings, and required them, under the penalty of interdiction from their office, to regiſter the edict without any reſtrictory clauſe, and to eraſe the record of their arrogant procedure. The parliament then deſiſted from the dangerous contention, and ſubmitted (on the twenty-ſixth of September) to the king's command.

A. D. 1564, 1565.] The altercations which had ariſen in the different provinces with regard to the tenor of the late edict, and the difficulties that occurred in putting it in execution, ſuperinduced a determination of the council, that the king and court ſhould make a progreſs through the greater part of the kingdom. It was conceived, that the appearance of the young ſovereign would not only ſerve as a check to ſedition, but verify and confirm the principles of loyalty and obedience to the government. To theſe motives, by which alone the chancellor was actuated, queen Catharine joined other views better ſuited to the political caſt of her own mind: beſides an opportunity of inveſtigating the conduct of the governors of the chief cities and provinces, and making ſuch changes among them as might be judged neceſſary, ſhe had propoſed a conference with her daughter the queen of Spain, on the confines of the two kingdoms, and propoſed to hold interviews with ſome of the German princes. But before the court left Fontainebleau, ambaſſadors arrived from the king of Spain, the pope, and the duke of Savoy, the object of whoſe miſſion was to prefer an unanious requeſt to the king for the publication of the decrees of the council of Trent, which had been cloſed about a month before. This application, ſo ill-timed and precipitate, appeared to the queen and the council to have been effected by the artful intrigues of the cardinal of Lorraine, and the zealous partiſans of the papal power at court, who laboured to ſubvert the peace*. The conduct of the ſovereign pontiff, with reſpect to the queen of Navarre, exhibited a convincive proof of the diſpoſition of the court of Rome to expoſe the principality of Bearn as a prey to the Catholic king.

Though natural ſpirit and political circumſpection induced the queen-mother to reſiſt the concurrence of other princes to impoſe their admonitions on the government; though, perhaps, ſhe was not inſenſible, that the preſent interpoſition of foreign courts was intended to encourage domeſtic faction, the ſcope and aim of her politics were ſo congenial to the principles of their ſyſtem, that all the honour and advantage ſhe contended for, amounted, in fact, only to that of purſuing it in her own way. This, doubtleſs, appeared to her a very material point, who had reaſon to be conſcious and vain of her ſkill, in the artificial management of affairs.

* Receuil de Dupuis—La Laboureur, &c.

Perſuaded that, by the help of time, and the advantage of peace, ſhe would be enabled to ſtrengthen the power of the government, and give it vigour ſufficient to encounter and cruſh all oppoſition from party; ſhe endeavoured to attain her political ends under the appearance of promoting the public tranquillity and good of the ſtate. Before ſhe ſet out with the king on the intended progreſs through the kingdom, the treaty of peace with England was brought to a concluſion, and the articles of it were finiſhed and preſented to the king when he came to Troyes. The renewal of the league with the Swiſs Cantons was alſo purchaſed at this time, with a large pecuniary ſubſidy. But queen Catharine was diſappointed of her hopes of an interview with the king of the Romans on the confines of Lorraine, which was alledged to have been the principal motive of her journey thither. Catharine was equally unſucceſsful in her attempt to bind the duke of Wirtemberg, the count Palatine of the Rhine, and Wolfang, duke of Deux Ponts, who were Proteſtant chieftains, by the civil obligations of penſions from the king, to withhold their aſſiſtance from the Calviniſts in France. There was only the marquis of Baden, and one of the family of Saxe, that condeſcended to become her ſtipendiaries.

In the king's circuit of the provinces of the kingdom, which commenced with the excurſion through Champagne to the territories of the duke of Lorraine, almoſt two years were employed. In moſt places he viſited, he was tormented with the alternate complaints of Catholics and Proteſtants. The deputies of Burgundy harangued the king againſt the extenſion of the late edict of toleration to their province. The Proteſtants preferred a general complaint of the violent oppoſition made in various parts to its eſtabliſhment, and of the injurious treatment they experienced. Theſe differences were ſeized by the court as a pretext for rendering the late edict palatable to the Catholics; and for this purpoſe another edict was paſſed at Rouſſillon, in which the liberty of the Proteſtants was conſiderably retrenched. The allowance of public worſhip to the poſſeſſors of the ſuperior fiefs was interpreted to extend only to their families and immediate vaſſals, and to exclude all occaſional partakers of the benefit thereof. The prince of Condé, who thought his honour concerned in maintaining the articles of it, tranſmitted to the court a remonſtrance on the ſubject of the innovaſions, by which the edict was ſubverted. The anſwer given him, from its amicable and mild tendency, though not ſatisfactory, appeared to be dictated by the chancellor, who, by ſuggeſting thoſe emendations, ſtudied to convince the court, that the Proteſtants might be tolerated, and at the ſame time reſtrained within ſuch reaſonable bounds as the government choſe to preſcribe to them. The procedure upon this maxim ſoothed the queen-mother, gave to the government that air of authority ſhe required, and furniſhed her with a ſpecious anſwer to the Catholic princes, who excepted againſt the pacification as derogatory to the honour of the crown.

Upon intelligence received of a confederacy being formed by the family of Guiſe, and ſome of their partiſans, in conſequence of a conflict that occurred between the cardinal of Lorraine and the mareſchal Montmorenci, at Paris, the weakneſs and tremor of the court appeared. All the nobles preſent, being aſſembled before the king, were required to declare what they knew of ſecret cabals and combinations, which threatened diſturbance to the ſtate; and to ſubſcribe an obligation never to engage in them, or take arms without his majeſty's authority. After paſſing the winter in Languedoc, the court proceeded, in the following ſpring, to Bourdeaux, and from thence to Bayonne, where the queen of Spain was expected to arrive. The interview at Bayonne, took place on the the tenth of June, 1565.

A league of the Catholic princes having been propoſed, a general alarm prevailed among the Proteſtants, who thought they beheld in the congreſs at Bayonne the image of what they dreaded. But what really paſſed there it is impoſſible to aſcertain, as the accounts of contemporary hiſtorians are vague, uncertain, and contradictory. It then took its courſe to Nerac, in the queen of Navarre's dominions, and from thence, by various ſtages, to Blois, where it continued till the commencement of the following year, when an aſſembly of the notables was holden at Moulins, in the Bourbonnois.

A. D. 1566.] At this aſſembly, which met in the month of February, the chancellor, ever attentive to the welfare of the ſtate, ſet forth the various defects and abuſes which prevailed in the political government, and in the adminiſtration of the laws.

The aſſembly of Moulins concluded with the former compromiſe of the contention between the family of Guiſe and the Colignis'. The admiral purged himlelf, upon oath, from the imputation of being acceſſary to the duke of Guiſe's death, and the Guiſes ſhook hands with him in the king's preſence.

Meanwhile the complaints of the Proteſtants, on the inexecution of the edict of toleration, continued to encreaſe; and Bouchet was deputed, by the nobility of that purſuation, to preſent to the king at Angouléme, a particular reſcript of the injuries and grievances they ſuffered, and to enreat the prevention of a fatal recourſe to extremities. No attention, however, was paid to this remonſtrance. The re-eſtabliſhment of the public exerciſe of the Catholic religion in Berne, and the viſcounty of Foix, which the queen of Navarre had there reſtrained, was effected by the king's authority*.

A. D. 1567.] The prince of Condé had ſtrenuouſly remonſtrated againſt theſe proceedings, but the queen-mother found means to lull his ſuſpicions, by profeſſions of favour and marks of regard. It was impoſſible, however, long to deceive the leaders of the Hugonots, jealous of her conduct, and attentive to her motions; and, indeed, her uſage of the prince of Condé himſelf, in his ſuit for the office of conſtable, which Montmorenci deſired to reſign, while it betrayed her averſion from his advancement, ſhowed her partiality to the oppoſite party.

Theſe circumſtances, united with the fears of the Hugonots on account of the late interview at Bayonne, and others occaſioned by the march of the duke of

* De Thou.

Alva, along the frontiers of France, into the Belgic provinces, accelerated the renewal of civil commotions. Senſible of the alarm which this laſt event would excite, the queen-mother was prepared to obviate and ſilence it, by the utmoſt ſtretch of her political craft. Feigning an apprehenſion of the purpoſes of the court of Spain, and appearing to reſent the approach of the Spaniſh forces to the borders of the kingdom, ſhe adopted the language, and ſeemed to concur with the ſentiments of the Proteſtant chiefs, and thoſe who inſiſted on the neceſſity of putting the ſtate in a poſture of defence. A commiſſion for hiring ſix thouſand Swiſs was given, and ſome troops being levied in the Lionoiſe, were ordered to march towards the fronties of Italy.

The ſecurity of the court, at this period, is the more remarkable, as the frequent warnings they received ought certainly to have put them on their guard.—At Lyons, the Proteſtants were ſuſpected of having run a mine, ſome hundred paces under ground, along the principal ramparts of the city. When the duke of Alva began his march from Lombardy, Mouvans had raiſed eight hundred men, and thrown them into Geneva; and an attempt had even been made by him, to introduce, by a ſtratagem, a part of theſe ſoldiers into the ſtrong town of Metz. It is ſaid that Catharine, whoſe obſervations were chiefly directed on the admiral's motions, was the more deceived, by the report of one of her ſpies, with reſpect to the manner in which he ſaw him employed at Chatillon. Clad in a homely frock, with a pruning-knife in his hand, Coligni had mounted a tree in his orchard, and appeared like the peaceful inhabitant of the rural ſhades. The Proteſtant chiefs, convinced that the queen-mother had concerted meaſures for their deſtruction, reſolved to make the firſt aſſault. The conduct of the duke of Guiſe, at the commencement of the late war, was deemed worthy of imitation: and it was accordingly reſolved to make an attempt to ſecure the perſon of the king.

The court reſided at Montceaux, a pleaſure-ſeat of the queen's in Brie, when, (on the twenty-ſixth of September) four years after the pacification of Orleans, this enterpriſe was planned and attempted. From the diſcovery of ſeveral parties of armed men, reſorting to Chatillon, the queen-mother was thrown into the utmoſt conſternation: and retiring with precipitation to Meaux, ſhe diſpatched orders to the Swiſs to advance, without delay, to the aſſiſtance of the court. Roſoy, the place of rendezvous for the prince of Condé and his friends, was not farther from Meaux than Chateau-Thierry, where the Swiſs were quartered, and their horſe could, with greater celerity, perform the march. In this dangerous perplexity, Catharine had recourſe to her uſual ſubterfuge of a conference, during which the Swiſs had time to reach the place of their deſtination.

Their arrival inſpired the court with courage, and induced the queen to accede to the propoſals of colonel Fifer, who offered to conduct the royal family in ſafety to the capital. The exclamations of the Pariſians at the ſight of the king, eſcaped from the hands of the Hugonots, and their reflections on the horror of the attempt, joined to Charles's own ſenſation of the violent indignity, added freſh fuel to the former combuſtions of the ſtate, and heightened the rage of the parties againſt each other. Such were the circumſtances of the commencement of the ſecond civil war in France.

The queen of England deemed this a proper time for diſcovering her inclinations to ſupport the Proteſtant party: ſhe ſent an ambaſſador to renew the old demand of the reſtitution of Calais. To this unexpected requiſition, France, however provoked, found it convenient, at the preſent juncture, to return a decent refuſal. Elizabeth expected no more. It was alſo proper, that ſhe ſhould not appear too forward in engaging with them, who had not adhered to the terms of the league they had made with her; while, by inviting the cardinal of Châtillon to the Engliſh court, it was evident ſhe conſidered this conduct as a pardonable tranſgreſſion.

The bold attempt of the Proteſtant chiefs to ſieze the perſon of the king, was conſidered as a ſignal, by the leaders of both parties, to collect their military forces. The prince of Condé and his aſſociates, inſtead of being diſmayed at the failure of their firſt enterpriſe, not only kept the field, but acted offenſively, with an intrepid ſpirit, that had the ſhew of ſuperior ſtrength. No ſooner had the prince of Condé ſeized a few poſts on the Seine, and burnt a great number of mills between the gates of the Temple and Saint Honré, than the Pariſians began to utter complaints*. This made the queen-mother have recourſe to her uſual expedient of a negociation, which only ended in mutual invectives.

To a train of deluſive negociations ſucceeded the open operations of war.—With about ſix thouſand troops, the prince of Condé, having ſecured the paſſage of the Seine. The alarm had no ſooner been given by the Proteſtants, than the principal Catholic nobility began to muſter their forces, and to conduct them to the metropolis. The different corps of the Swiſs, and of the old and new levies of the French infantry, formed an army of ſixteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe. Beſides volunteers, the city furniſhed a complete regiment. Having detached five hundred picked cavalry to harraſs the enemy for a day and a night, early on the tenth of November he began to move his whole force from the capital. As he paſſed through the gate, turning to thoſe around him, "This "day"—ſaid he—"ſhall acquit me from the detractions of my enemies, and the "calumny of the vulgar; for either I ſhall return alive and victorious, or meet "death in a field revengeful and bloody to the king's foes†."

Unalarmed at the great ſuperiority of the royaliſts, the prince of Conde reſolutely determined to meet them in the field; the Proteſtant chiefs accordingly drew out their troops from their different poſts, choſe their ground in the plain of Saint Denis, and arranged their battalions with all the compoſure and intrepidity of men, about to engage in the moſt equal combat. The conſtable, who moved ſlowly from the city, was aſtoniſhed at ſeeing them ranging their little army in order of battle.‡ The action began on the right by the diſcharge of the conſtable's artillery. Genlis, finding his diviſion galled by the fire, ordered his lieutenant De Vardes to advance with a party, and charge the enemy. The repulſe of this briſk attack having brought moſt of the cavalry to the ſide of the trench, they were there ſaluted with a ſharp fire: at the ſame time Genlis opened his ranks, his foot advanced, and poured their ſhot on the enemy, while he again forming his line in order, proceeded with de Vardes to make a vigorous aſſault on the broken troops of the Catholics. The admiral perceiving that the action on the right had become general, put the troops in motion, and having appriſed the prince of Condé of his intention, began to engage the enemy in the ſame manner as Genlis had done, by advancing his foot before his cavalry. By the regular fire the line of infantry made, and the impetuous charge which followed it, the troops on the left of the enemy were broken, and their horſe wheeling on the regiment of Paris, a general confuſion, approaching to a total rout, enſued. Immediately after this the prince of Condé puſhed forward with his diviſion to attack the conſtable's centre, which on the left lay open and expoſed. He alſo marched his foot before him: but, as he advanced, the mareſchal, Montmorenci obſerving his aim, made a wheel to fall on the flank of his ſquadron. The prince, leaving his foot, and part of his line, to encounter the mareſchal, ruſhed, with great impetuoſity, on the gendarmerie of the centre. Diſorder already begun there, by the rout of the left wing, facilitated the impreſſion of the charge. In a few minutes the main body gave way. The old conſtable, deſerted by his troops, and wounded in the face, was ſeen exerting his utmoſt efforts for rallying the fugitives. Diſdaining to ſurrender, when required by Robert Stuart (the Scotchman who had been accuſed of aſſaſſinating the preſident Minart) and reſiſting, with a vigour of body and ſpirit uncommon at his age, he daſhed the pommel of his ſword, which was broken, in his adverſary's face, and knocked out ſevaral of his teeth: when a piſtol-ſhot from behind pierced him in the reins, and ſoon after he fell to the ground. At no great diſtance, and almoſt at the ſame inſtant, the prince of Condé's horſe being wounded, and falling with him, it was with difficulty he could be extricated from the danger which threatened him*. The mareſchal Montmorenci had, by this time, not only routed the detachment ſent againſt him, but ſome troops of the left wing that were not broken rallying about him, he had already made a conſiderable impreſſion on the admiral's ſquadron. D'Aumale and d'Amville, who had not engaged, being aſſured that the Swiſs on the right ſtill kept their ground, and that the mareſchal Montmorenci was victorious, haſtened to advance their body of reſerve from the rear. But while the hurry on one ſide to reſcue the conſtable, and on the other the attention to recover and remount the prince of Condé, ſuſpended the renewal of the combat, the approach of night put an end to the conflict. The prince drew off his troops to Saint Denis, and the mareſchal

* De Thou. † D'Aubigne, liv. iv. chap. 9. ‡ De Thou—Caſtelnau.

Montmorenci was only anxious to ſave the life of his father, who recovering his ſenſes, aſked why the victory was not aſcertained by the purſuit of the enemy. He expired the ſecond day after the battle.

Not more than three or four hundred men on either ſide periſhed in the action, which may juſtly be termed a draw battle; but the Proteſtants experienced the greateſt loſs, on occount of the number of their officers who were killed: The fall of the count of Saux, the vidame of Amiens, and ſeveral others of eminent fame and dignity, conſiderably aggravated the loſs of the Hugonots. The intrepid bravery of the prince of Condé's troops was witneſſed by the Ottoman ambaſſador, who had taken his ſtation with ſome of the courtiers in an adjacent tower: his ſurpriſe was teſtified by exclaiming—"If my maſter had only two "thouſand of theſe white ſcarfs to place at the head of the different armies, the "univerſe would not ſtand againſt him for two years."

D'Andelot and Montgomery having refitted ſome pontoons on the Seine, and joined the army on the night after the battle, the Hugonots again dared their enemies to meet them in the field: their defiance not being accepted, the prince of Condé inſulted the capital, by beating off the out-guards, ſetting fire to ſome mills, and extending his incurſions into the very ſuburbs of Paris. Though during the blockade of Paris*, La Noue, by a rare inſtance of valour and conduct, had, with ſcarce a troop of ſoldiers, poſſeſſed himſelf of Orleans, and even reduced the citadel.

After ſome days repoſe in their quarters near Paris, they turned off to Montereau-faut-Yonne, whence they meant to proceed towards the confines of Lorraine. The prince of Condé led the van with his main battle, the admiral followed with the left wing; and D'Andelot, with all the muſqueteers they could mount on horſeback, covered the flanks and foraged for the army; De Moui, having the command of the light cavalry, cloſed the rear. After encountering various difficulties, and eſcaping from an attack of the royaliſts, on the ſeventeenth of December, at Sarri near Châlons, the prince of Conde was ſo fortunate as to accompliſh the object of his expedition, by effecting a junction with the German forces.

On the death of Montmorenci, the duke of Anjou was, at the inſtigation of Catharine of Medicis, appointed to the dignity of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, notwithſtanding the repugnance of Charles to ſuch a promotion.

A. D. 1568.] The flames of civil war were ſpeedily enkindled throughout the different provinces of the kingdom, where continual ſkirmiſhes took place between the Catholic and Proteſtant chieftains: towns were reduced and detachments defeated on either ſide, but no conqueſt of importance was either atchieved or attempted, until the prince of Condé, on the twenty-firſt of Pebruary, inveſted the town of Chartres, which was vigorouſly defended by the chevalier de

* D'Aubigne.

Liniers, with a garriſon of four thouſand men. After ſome ineffectual attempts to open a breach, the enterprize of turning off the river near D'Eure, was undertaken and executed by the Hugonots. The ſuſpenſion of the corn-mills, which enſued from thence, and the ſcarcity of other proviſions, would ſoon have reduced the city to the neceſſity of capitulating; but while Linieres, by his courage and conduct, protracted the defence of the place, a treaty of peace was on the twentieth of March concluded with the royal commiſſioners, by the cardinal of Chatillon, at Longjumeau. Upon the point of religion, the articles were reduced to a general head, that of the full reſtoration of the laſt edict of pacification ſigned at Amboiſe, without the reſtrictions afterwards annexed to it. The king being of age, there was no reference made to his future will and pleaſure, but the edict was declared to be ratified until it ſhould pleaſe God to unite France in the bond of one religion*.

Scarce three months had elapſed from the concluſion of this treaty, before an evident diſpoſition in the court to renew the war was evinced. Catharine who delighted in exertions of fraud and diſſimulation, laid a plan for ſeizing the perſon of the prince of Condé and the admiral, whe had retired to their reſpective ſeats: but by the generous probity of the chancellor, and the military honour of the mareſchal de Tavannes, they were warned of their danger, and adviſed to accelerate their eſcape. Encompaſſed by a body of one hundred and fifty horſe, they bent ther courſe towards the Loire, which, by the accident of an uncommon dry ſummer, was found fordable near Sancerre. They had ſcarcely paſſed it, and endeavoured to ſecure their rear by poſting a party commanded by Bois on the banks of the river, when Martinengues came up and attacked this feeble ſquadron, who were obliged to fly into the fortreſs of Boni, where they ſoon ſurrendered. A ſudden ſwell of the river, regarded as providental by thoſe who felt the advantage of it, concurred to prevent all immediate purſuit; and, on the ninteenth of September, having been previouſly joined by great numbers of their adherents, who flocked to them from all quarters, the Proteſtant chiefs entered the city of Rochelle, to the great joy of the inhabitants.

By the ſpeedy arrival of the queen of Navarre, with her infant ſon Henry, the foundation of a firmer aſſociation of the blood royal ſeemed to be laid, and the Proteſtants prepared for war with more than uſual confidence. A declaration was now publiſhed by the court, offering the king's protection to the Proteſtants, and a redreſs of grievences, if they would return peaceably home; but two rigid edicts appeared immediately after (on the firſt of October) in direct contradiction to thoſe moderate profeſſions. Theſe edicts were regiſtered with extravagant ſymptoms of joy, and a voluntary ratification of them, by a new-invented oath, was ſubjoined.

Henry, duke of Anjou, was now employed in preparing his army to march into Saintonge, where that of the Proteſtants, which, after the acceſſion of Henry of

*. De Thou—D'Avila.

Navarre to it, was called the army of the princes, had conſiderably encreaſed in number and ſtrength. D'Andelot, in his march to join the princes, ſeized Parthenay: Niort ſurrendered to his brother, the admiral; and Fontenai, taken by capitulation, added to their conqueſts*.

The duke of Anjou's army, augmented by the bands of the nobility, the Swiſs brigade, and a great train of artillery, now conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot, and about four thouſand horſe. The princes, on their ſide, beſides the troops in garriſon, muſtered in the field to the number of eighteen thouſand infantry and three thouſand cavalry. Never before did the contending parties oppoſe each other with ſuch a formidable force, and appear ſo nearly matched. Though it was the middle of winter, both armies took the field. On the twenty-ninth of November their advanced guards approached each other, in the vicinity of Luſignan, and, by a ſingular accident, the camp-maſter on either ſide met at Pamprau to arrange their reſpective quarters. Both parties refuſed to quit the ground, though no advantage could be reaped by maintaining it: the reſpective leaders entered into the diſpute with great eagerneſs: Martigues was ſoon diſpatched with eight hundred horſe to ſupport the Catholics; while the two Coligni's, with ſomewhat more than half the number, haſtened to oppoſe them. A party, ſent by the admiral to reconnoitre the enemy, precipitately engaged: ignorant of each other's ſtrength, the chiefs declined a general charge; and yet neither would retire. The admiral, firſt apprehending the riſque he run of being attacked by the whole van, ranged his troops on the brow of a hill in order of battle; and their appearance on the eminence, while a party of them ſkirmiſhed on the plain below, deceived Martigues in his opinion of their numbers, and induced him, under favour of the night, to ſecure his retreat. This rencounter was the prelude to the famous ſkirmiſh of Jazeneuil.

Some ſkirmiſhes afterwards occurred between the rival armies, but the extreme rigour of the ſeaſon at length compelled them to put their troops into cantonments, after loſing, each of them, four thouſand men, chiefly from the inclemency of the weather†.

A. D. 1569.] Nothing of importance was attempted during the winter, by the provincial chieftains, who were ſeparated from the main armies, except the ſiege of Sancerre, by a Catholic party under Martigues, and that of the abbey of Saint-Michael, by a body of Proteſtant ſoldiers. In the firſt, three hundred Calviniſts, ill-provided with arms or ammunition, and having only Joanneau, an advocate, for their captain, defended themſelves, for near ſix weeks, againſt a body of three thouſand foot, and a troop of horſe, under the command of Martigues, and other experienced warriors, who battered the walls with eight pieces of cannon. Nine hundred of the Catholics were killed, and, after various aſſaults, the ſiege was raiſed.

* D'Aubigne—De Thou. † De Thou, lib. xliii. p. 878.

At the opening of the campaign, the duke of Anjou, having received an expected reinforcement of two thouſand Rheiters, and a ſtrong body of troops from Provence, was reſolved, if poſſible, to bring the enemy to action; while the prince of Condé, on the contrary, whoſe reinforcement had not yet arrived, determined to avoid an engagement. The Proteſtants directed their march along the bank of the river Charente, which the Catholics, notwithſtanding their utmoſt precautions, found means to paſs unobſerved in the night. There was no diſcovery of their motions till La Noue, before ſun-riſe, on the thirteenth, making the round of the different poſts with fifty horſe, perceived the blue ſtanderd of Martigues waving in the midſt of a ſquadron, which advanced towards him. By his retreat on full gallop, the admiral was ſoon informed of the enemy's approach. The paſs of a rivulet was immediately ſecured, and the different detachments received orders to haſten to their rendezvous at Baſſac*. As Martigues could not, without farther ſupport, venture to puſh beyond the brook, and the ſafe paſſage of it required conſiderable force and caution, there was ſtill ſufficient time to make an orderly retreat with the van. But full three hours paſſed before the captains Montgomery, Pluviaut and others, could draw together their ſtraggled detachments of horſe, which had been previouſly ſtationed in the vicinity of Chateau-Neuf. La Noue, meanwhile, bravely maintaining, with ſome troops of cavalry, the vigorous charge of the count de Briſſac and Martigues, who ſtrove to encompaſs him, was obliged to yield his defence of the rivulet, and, overpowered with numbers, before he could reach Baſſac, was thrown from his horſe and taken priſoner. His ſoldiers, driven towards the village, were rallied by D'Andelot, who, with undaunted courage, advanced to the charge. This daring commander, after this ſhort exhortation to his men—"Act now as I do"—was ſeen, immediately on cloſing with the enemy, to lay hold of the beaver of the duke of Monſalez's helmet with one hand, and with the other to diſcharge a piſtol in his face, which laid him dead on the ground. By his bravery, Martigues was driven out of Baſſac with conſiderable loſs, and an opportunity given to the admiral to range the remainder of the van, when compelled to evacuate the village, in an advantageous ground behind it.

As not only Montpenſier, with the whole left wing of the Catholic army, but alſo de Tavannes, with the German Rheiters, was on the point of charging the admiral, matters were brought to a critical and dangerous extremity, in which the reſolution to ſacrifice a part of his troops, in order to ſave the reſt, hardly afforded the proſpect of eſcaping. It was then a courier was diſpatched to the prince of Condé, with intelligence of the ſituation of the van. That gallant commander, unuſed to linger when ſummoned to the field, and undiſmayed by danger when honour called for his exertions, took the brave and unfortunate reſolution of haſtening to the aſſiſtance of the admiral, with a choice body of cavalry, while the remainder of his army had orders to follow him, with all poſſible expedition. This reinforcement only conſiſted of ſeven troops of horſe, amounting in the whole to about three hundred and fifty men. As they drew up around him, and were told what he expected from the valour of men whom he conſidered as the flower of his army, the duke of Rochefoucaud's horſe reared, and fractured the bone of the prince's leg. Superior to pain, with an undaunted countenance, ſuffered only with the glow of courage—" Remember," ſaid he, " nobility of " France, that Lewis of Bourbon this day verifies his motto, and eſteems the con- " dition in which he now goes to encounter the enemy for the ſake of his religion, " of you, and of France, a circumſtance not unfavourable to his renown." In diſpoſing his troops to the beſt advantage, in fighting with the moſt heroic courage, the prince diſplayed the moſt eſſential qualities of a ſoldier and a general.—After a charge by the prince of Condé, that exceeded any of the former inſtances of reſolution, and by which Montpenſier's van was repulſed, he was attacked on the flank by the duke of Anjou's main body, ſupported by de Tavannes and the Rheiters, which overwhelmed his ſlender battalion. Valour alone prolonged the reſiſtance, till the prince, thrown from his horſe, which was wounded, and able only to raiſe himſelf upon one knee from the ground, ſurrendered himſelf to D'Argens, to whom he delivered his ſword. Being placed under a tree, Monteſquieu, captain of the duke of Anjou's Swiſs guard, coming up, and being told who he was, ſhot him through the head with a piſtol. The infamy of this brutal aſſaſſination, which was generally abhorred in the Catholic army, was not ſolely confined to the perſon who committed it*. Brantome acknowledges that the duke of Anjou's intimates had encouragement to believe, that ſuch a ſacrifice would not diſpleaſe him; and ſo far from concealing his ſatisfaction, he is ſaid, upon hearing Cloud des Saintes' panegyric on his victory, (from which, by the bye, he could derive neither honor nor credit) to have entertained the deſign of erecting a chapel on the ſpot in which the prince of Condé was murdered; but the prudent intelligence of his governor, Carnavalet, prevented him from raiſing ſuch a monument of his own infamy. Robert Stuart, the Scottiſh captain, was alſo killed in cool blood, by Honorat de Savoy, marquis of Villars. The body of the prince of Condé, thrown on an aſs, was carried to the caſtle of Jarnac, and after being expoſed to the view of the victorious army, was delivered to his nephew, who interred it with thoſe of his anceſtors at Vendome†.

Though the battle of Jarnac laſted ſix hours, only four hundred Proteſtants periſhed on the part of the vanquiſhed, but the fourth part of theſe were gentlemen. If, obedience to the orders they had received, the main body of the Proteſtants had marched up to the field, they would inevitably been involved in the defeat. But d'Acier, who commanded the infantry, having advanced to the village of Jarnac, and learned from the fugitives how things were ſituated, judged it proper to proceed no farther, and, having broken down the bridge, made a ſafe retreat to Cognac, a conſiderable part of the cavalry, by the ſame means, gained Saintes. The admiral with his brother, with a reſolute band, taking an oppoſite courſe, made his way to Saint Jean D'Angeli.

* Floge de Condé. † Mezerai, tom. viii. p. 344.

The moment the queen of Navarre was informed of the event of the battle of Jarnac, ſhe haſtened to Cognac, with the two Henry's, her ſon, and the young Condé, the one fifteen years of age and the other ſixteen. Her introduction, ſoon after, at Tonnay Charente, to an aſſembly of the Proteſtant chiefs, her affecting and animating ſpeech to a muſter of the officers and troops in the city, and the tender ſhe made of the two youthful princes to ſucceed to the title and authority of their principal head, ſhewed at once her ardour to ſupport the intereſt of her family, and her knowledge of the diſpoſition of the admiral, and the other commanders, to concur with her wiſhes. An oath of fidelity to the prince of Bearn being taking by the troops at hand, and Saint Jean D'Angeli pitched upon for their retreat, and the ſecurity of their perſons, the councils of war proceeded with little difficulty or interruption. Montgomery was detached to Angouléme, with ſeven troops of horſe; while Piles, who brought a ſmall reinforcement from Perigord, received orders to throw himſelf into Saintes. The duke of Anjou, as was expected, made an attack upon Cognac, in the hope of cruſhing the remaining part of the Proteſtant army, by one ſucceſsful ſtroke; but D'Acier, who commanded in the place, with eight thouſand foot, compelled him to raiſe the ſiege in four days. The duke then entered the Perigord, and reduced ſome trifling places with the loſs of ſeveral of his beſt officers. At the ſige of Mucidan, the gallant count de Briſſac was killed. On the other ſide, after many hazards in the field, various encounters ſuſtained, and military toils undergone, the brave D'Andelot, juſtly deemed one of the firſt commanders of the age, whoſe intrepidity had gained him the ſurname of The Fearleſs, was carried off by an epidemical fever at Saintes.

The hopes of the Proteſtants were revived by the arrival of Walfang of Bavaria, duke of Deux-Ponts, with a formidable army of German auxiliaries, amounting to ſeven thouſand ſix hundred Rheiters, and ſix thouſand Lanſquenets; who, marching through the heart of France, reduced the town of La Charité on the Loire, and effected a junction with the forces of the princes on the banks of the Vienne, to the great diſgrace of the Catholic army, which had been recently reinforced by two thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred Rheiters, ſent from Flanders by the duke of Alva. The duke of Deux-Ponts died on the eleventh of June, the day before this junction took place, of a quartan ague, at Chaſtus; having previouſly appointed Volrad, count of Mansfeld, to the chief command of his troops, and exhorted the German officers to perform with fidelity the ſervice expected of them.

Though the royaliſts, independent of the reinforcement we have already noticed, had received, from the pope, a body of five thouſand Italian foot, and a thouſand horſe, under the command of the count of Sanctaſiore, it was determined, in a council of war, that the duke of Anjou ſhould remain on the defenſive. With this view he pitched his camp at La Roche-la-belle, near Saint Irier in the Limouſin, where he formed ſuch entrenchments, as, joined to the natural ſtrength of his ſituation, might be well deemed inacceſſible by a ſuperior force. A deep valley near a rising ground, encompassed with marshes, supplying on one side the place of artificial lines of defence, the greatest part of the artillery was placed there, under the custody of the Swiss battalions. All the troops were protected by the circumvallation, except two regiments of foot, which chose to take their station on the outside of the marsh, on ground only fenced by hedges and trees. Against these regiments the admiral, who had unexpectedly approached the camp directed his attacks, and thereby occasioned the combat of La Roche-la-belle, (on the twenty-fourth of June) which was reckoned among the most signal skirmishes in the civil wars. Begun by the brave Piles, who threw himself, with some light troops into the midst of the enemy's infantry, and sustained, on the ather side, by Strozzi, who then first acted as general of the French foot, the conflict soon became vigorous and of doubtful issue. Four hundred Catholic soldiers, and no less than two-and-twenty of their officers slain on the field, shewed the advantage their antagonists had gained, and the little quarter that had been given.

The count of Montgomery was now detached, with a small body of forces, to effect the reduction of Bearn, which had been seized by the count of Terride, the king's governors of Quercy; and he fulfilled his commission with such intrepidity and address, as greatly enhanced his military fame.

The siege of Poitiers was the first enterprise of importance attempted by the main army of the Protestants, after the battle of Jarnac; but the young duke of Guise, emulous of his father's fame, threw himself into the town, and by his resolute conduct inspirited the garrison to an obstinate and successful defence. After losing two thousand men before the place, by wounds and an epidemical disorder, the admiral drew off his troops, and compelled the duke of Anjou to raise the siege of Chatelleraud, which he had recently formed. Conscious, however, of the superiority of the enemy's forces, he was studious to shun a decisive engagement; but the two armies meeting, on the thirtieth ef September, at a short distance from the small town of Montcontour, his design was defeated by the impatient and uneasy temper of his own troops*.

Already had Coligni, with his vanguard, reached Saint Cler, within two leagues of Montcontour, and the chieftans La None and La Nore, detached with seven troops of horse and a party of foot, had taken possession of that village, when the duke of Montpensier, commander of the Catholic van, informed that La Noue, who brought up the admiral's rear with two hundred cavalry, and without apprehensions of an attack, redoubled his pace to fall upon him. La Noue, contrary to his usual diligence, had both deceived himself with respect to the distance of the enemy, and misinformed the admiral, who had charged him with the business of intelligence. Confident of the certainty of the report he had made, that there were only some flying parties of the enemy at hand, he received the firſt charge of Montpenſier's troops as if he had been wholly a match for them, and boldly ſtood his ground, till Martigues came up, and cut off a fourth of his party, and put the reſt to flight. But the duke of Montpenſier neglecting to puſh his advantage with ſpirit and reſolution, allowed the admiral time to form his van, and recover from the conſternation into which his troops were viſibly thrown. One error generated another. Montpenſier's irreſolution was miſtaken for weakneſs, and it was preſumed that he had not ſtrength enough to reſiſt an attack, if urged with vigour. In the firſt charge, which was well ſuſtained, a conſiderable repulſe was given to Martigues; but the duke of Montpenſier being reinforced by the freſh troops of the main battle, the retreat became difficult and perilous. Clermont D'Amboiſe, unrecovered from ſickneſs, and without his armour, and with only twenty horſe, diſtinguiſhed his valour, by defending the paſs of a rivulet for a conſiderable ſpace of time, againſt a great body of the Catholics. The action was now changed into a cannonade by the latter, which galled the German Rheiters, who kept their poſt on the bank. When their attempts to force a paſſage failed, and the fire of the cannon ceaſed, the admiral, under favour of the night, drew off his troops, and encamped between the rivulet and the Dive; thence he next day extended his quarters to Montcontour and the adjacent villages, where he was covered by the Dive, a narrow river, but not every where fordable. Such were the previous movements and combats of the two armies in the interval of three days before the general engagements enſued.

The two armies were drawn up in an open plain, deſtitute, on either ſide, of any natural advantages, and interſected only, at unequal diſtances, by a few eaſy declivities. The Catholics amounted to twenty-ſeven thouſand men; the Proteſtants to eighteen. The former appeared to derive confidence from the ſuperiority of their numbers, the latter from their hardy and determined courage. Compoſed to obedience and unanimity, and touched with the pathetic admonitions of the young princes, the German lanſquenets, according to their conſtant cuſtom, on the eve of battle, kneeled on the ground, and promiſed to fight and die like men of honour. Each of the armies was ranged in two great diviſions, but ſo diſpoſed, that they could all engage at the ſame time. The admiral's main battle, under count Naſſau, was rather advanced towards Ervaux, before the left wing, which he commanded himſelf, and which ſtood more directly oppoſed to the enemy, as if he had ſtill aimed at cutting ſhort the combat by a retreat. To his uſual practice of interlining his ſquadrons of horſe with ſome foot of arquebuſiers, he added that of covering the flanks of the diviſions of the Rheiters, with a troop of French cavalry. The Germans, after their firſt rank had fired their long piſtols, uſed the method of wheeling to the rear, in order to charge them again, which expoſed them to be more eaſily thrown into diſorder by the enemy. The ſide-long line of French horſe, who ſtood firm, and fought chiefly with their lances and their ſwords, was a well-contrived remedy for this inconvenience. The troops, on both ſides, equalled the bravery of their ſeveral commanders. After the firſt charge, given by a part of the left wing of the Catholics, under the duke of Montpenſier, by which La Mouy's horſe were driven back on ſome of the infantry advanced before the admiral, the action on the left became general. The body of Catholic Rheiters, led by the Rhingrave, puſhed forward in the opening made, and endeavoured to break the line of foot. Coligni, who had ſent to count Naſſau for a ſquadron of Rheiters to oppoſe them, led on, in the mean time, ſome French arquebuſiers to the charge. The Rhingrave turned and faced him, and both of them advancing near thirty paces before their troops, diſcharged, at the ſame inſtant, their piſtols at each other. The admiral's jaw was ſhattered by the Rhingrave's ſhot, while his own laid his adverſary dead on the ground. Coligni concealed the hurt he had received, till being almoſt ſuffocated by the blood, he ſuffered himſelf to be led off the field. This accident did not prevent the total defeat of the Rheiters, which was accompliſhed by Volrad, count Mansfield, at the head of his Germans. Nearly the whole of the left wing of the Catholics was thrown into confuſion notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance of the duke of Aumale, and the marquis of Baden, who were detached from the main body to ſupport them. The troops of both theſe generals were routed by Mansfield, and the latter of them was killed in the charge. As count Naſſau now advanced againſt the duke of Anjou, the battle became furious and bloody: the duke's horſe was wounded, his ſquadrons began to give way, and the Proteſtant troops repeated their ſhouts of victory. But the efforts of their courage, now ſtrained beyond their numbers and ſtrength, required that ſupport which the Catholics ſtill had in a body of reſerve. It was the arrival of the Swiſs, brought forward by the mareſchal de Coſſe, that changed the fate of the day. While three freſh regiments of the reſerve withſtood and repelled the thinned and drooping ſquadrons of the counts Naſſau and Mansfield, they moved in cloſe files to aſſault their hated rivals, the German Lanſquenets. The broken Rheiters, having rallied around them, firſt pierced the ranks of the Germans, when the Swiſs ruſhed in like a torrent, and completed their ruin. Here was the principal ſlaughter; of four thouſand Germans, not four hundred were ſpared by the mercileſs Swiſs, who continued to maſſacre them after they had thrown down their arms. A ſimilar fate would have befallen a body of French infantry, that ſtood their ground beſide the lanſquenets, but for the timely interpoſition of the duke of Anjou, who, after ſome hundreds of them had been ſlain, called out, "Spare the French." After ſeveral vain attempts made by the chief commanders of the Proteſtants to reanimate their ſcattered troops, and to renew the fight, they found themſelves compelled to provide for their own ſafety. While the fugitives fled to Parthenai and Niort, count Naſſau, having collected a body of three thouſand Rheiters, faced and repulſed the purſuers; then proceeded to Ervaux, where he croſſed the river Thoue. The admiral's prudence, in ſecuring, by ſome detachments, placed there before the battle, the paſſes of the defiles on that road, proved the ſafety of a conſiderable part of the routed army.

This was the only battle of the four they had now fought, in which the Proteſtants could be ſaid to have been completely vanquiſhed. By a moderate computation, near ſix thouſand of their ſoldiers periſhed in the field, beſides the havock made among the ſuttlers and followers of the camp, who were in arms. All the baggage waggons of the Germans, which were numerous, and almoſt all the equipage of the infantry, fell into the hands of the victors. La Noue and D'Acier were among the priſoners. The one was with difficulty reſcued from ſlaughter in cold blood; and Sancta-Fiore was blamed by the pope for taking the other alive. About ſix hundred of the Catholic cavalry, chiefly Germans, were ſlain, and nearly as many wounded*; but they loſt few of their infantry.

It was the peculiar characteriſtic of Coligni's mind, that it ever acquired freſh fortitude in adverſity, and its ſpirit and ſagacity invariably encreaſed in proportion to the dangers it had to encounter. The parliament of Paris had recently publiſhed an arret, calculated to ſtimulate the hand of the aſſaſſin, by which they offered a compenſation of fifty thouſand crowns, to any man who ſhould produce the admiral, dead or alive.† Deſpiſing theſe ungenerous proceedings, Coligni was only intent on extricating his party from the difficulties in which their late defeat had involved them. He immediately ſent off diſpatches to England, to the Proteſtant princes of Germany, and to the Swiſs cantons, with a repreſentation of the iſſue of the battle, that leſſened the idea of the diſaſter of the Proteſtants, while it implied a want of aſſiſtance in their preſent circumſtances. It was reſolved to garriſon the three towns of Niort, Angouléme, and Saint Jean D'Angeli; while the chief commanders, conducting the young princes, along with the remains of the army, directed their courſe to Rochelle.

The duke of Anjou advancing, with his victories army, met with no oppoſition till he came to Niort, the defence of which was entruſted to La Mouy. That gallant officer exerted his uſual courage on this occaſion, but, on his return from a ſally, he received a mortal wound from the hand of an aſſaſſin, Louvriers Maurevel, who ſhot him in the reins with a piſtol, and eſcaped, on a horſe which Mouy had given him, to the Catholic camp. This blow had been deſigned for the admiral; but the wretch who undertook it having failed of his aim, endeavoured to make ſome amends for his diſappointment, by transferring it to La Mouy, eſteemed the next to Coligni in authority and intereſt among the Proteſtants. It occaſioned the ſurrender of Niort, and the death of that intrepid chieftain, who expired, ſoon after, at Rochelle, whither he had retired for his cure. Aggravated with the circumſtances of perfidious villainy and baſe ingratitude, the atrocious deed expoſed the public ſanction given to ſuch attempts, by the parliament's arret againſt the admiral, the count of Montgomery, and the vidame of Chartres. The family of Guiſe, whoſe creature Maurevel was, acknowledged that, from motives of private vengeance againſt Coligni, they had inſtigated the aſſaſſin. It will afterwards appear, that the gratification of that revenge correſponded to the cabinet policy of the court, and that Maurevel was introduced to perform his part in the tragedy of Saint Bartholomew.

In the month of November the royaliſts came to the reſolution of beſieging the town of Saint Jean D'Angeli, and, in order to encourage the ſoldiers, the king made his appearance in the camp. Envious of his brother's military fame, Charles could not be hindered from ſhewing himſelf in the trenches, and from partaking of the labour and danger of the common ſoldiers. "With all my "heart,"—ſaid he—"would I conſent, that my brother and I ſhould reign by "turns, and that he ſhould wear the crown for ſix months in the year, while "I took the command of the army." At Saint Jean D'Angeli the Catholics experienced a moſt daring reception: the town, the fortifications, and the garriſon were of moderate ſtrength*, but the reſolution of the inhabitants, who were Calvaniſts, the preſence of ſeveral valiant officers, and of Piles, who was chief commander, ſupplied the want of numbers and other defects. Though breaches were frequently made, yet the beſiegers gained no ground, for entrenchments, at which men and women laboured continually roſe to baffle the aſſault. An honourable capitulation was at length propoſed, but Piles would hearken to no terms, till ſome aſſurances were given that a general treaty was on foot. That he might have an opportunity of knowing the reſolution of the princes, with reſpect to peace or ſuccours, a truce for ten days was agreed on.—In the night of its expiration, forty ſoldiers were introduced into the town, and Piles anſwered, to the demand of ſurrendering according to the conditions, that he was reinforced. The attacks were now renewed with additional fury: more than ſix weeks had elapſed, while the beſieged ſtill reſiſted, amidſt the ruins; and the Catholics ſeverely felt what their victory at laſt would coſt them, by the fall of Martigues from a ſhot, and the carnage of many of their beſt ſoldiers. When Piles and valour could do no more, of a garriſon which conſiſted of near two thouſand men, nine hundred marched out, with their arms, colours and baggage. By the terms of ſurrender, they were bound not to appear in arms for four months; but the Catholic ſoldiers, in ſpite of their officers, having plundered their baggage, Piles, when eſcorted to Angouléme, declared himſelf acquitted of the capitulation, and ſoon marched to join the princes. The ſiege protracted to December occaſioned diſeaſes and epidemical ſickneſs to ravage in the Catholic army; and when the town was reduced, the duke of Anjou found his loſs amounted to full ſix thouſand men. The troops immediately went into winter-quarters, and the duke of Anjou retired, with the court, to Angers.

As ſoon as the ſiege of St. Jean D'Angeli, was begun, the admiral had marched with expedition from Saintes into Quercy, paſſed the Dardonne, and placed himſelf in a poſition to co-operate with the advancement of the count of Montgomery, from Bern, on the other ſide of the Garonne, to join him*. By the ſeizure of Aiguillon at the confluence of the Lot with this laſt river, and the poſſeſſion of Pont St. Marie upon it, he not only defied and bridled the excurſions of the enemy from the confines of Guienne and Languedoc, but having, by his previous march to Montauban, firſt compelled the mareſchal D'Amville to raiſe the ſiege of Mazeres, and then forced Montluc to ſhut himſelf up in Agen, he began, and, in a ſhort time, completed the conſtruction of a large bridge of boats, over the Garonne. It was ſecured by piles and chains, and rendered paſſable to cavalry. But the troops, under Montgomery, laden with the ſpoils of the Catholics in Bearn, advanced ſo ſlowly, that the bridge, by the contrivance of a mechanic, was deſtroyed before their arrival. After Montgomery appeared, ſo much time was loſt in ferrying over his troops, that the admiral ſaw it neceſſary to drop his deſign on Guienne, and turn back towards Montauban, in order to penetrate through Languedoc.

Meanwhile an attempt was made, by a ſtrong detachment of royaliſts, to blockade Rochelle, which produced innumerable ſkirmiſhes. The honour of defeating this project was due to the gallant chieftain La Noue, who, after various atchievements, in which he ſignalized his ſkill and courage, marched to beſiege a fort, lately erected to cover Luçon, and cut off the communication of Rochelle with that quarter of Poitou. Puy-Gaillard, fluſhed with ſome recent advantages, and eagerly wiſhing for ſuch an opportunity to fall on the main body of the Proteſtants, had formed the ſcheme of ſurpriſing them on their march. But La Noue diſcovered his deſigns, and turned them to his ruin. His little army, compoſed of ſeveral old battalions, and the flower of various garriſons, amounting to full ſix thouſand men, was totally vanquiſhed, with the ſlaughter of five hundred men and the captivity of a greater number. This victory paved the way to the re-eſtabliſhment of the Proteſtants in the Pays d'Aunis, in Saintonge, and the borders of Poitou, though the brave atchiever of it, in beſieging Fontenay ſoon after, received a ſhot in his arm, which, to prevent the effects of a gangrene, he ſuffered to be cut off. De Thou, in his deſcription of the battle of Luçon, obſerves that La Noue, no leſs remarkable for modeſty than courage, had altogether ſunk, in his commentaries, the exemplary figure of his valour and humanity on this occaſion. When the Lanſquenets, in revenge for the cruelty they experienced at Moncontour, were putting all who fell in their way to the ſword, he obliged them to give quarter. When Luçon capitulated, and a complaint was made by the Catholic commander of ſome baggage being taken, contrary to the terms agreed on, he made good the damage out of his own private fortune. Such behaviour was then as rare among the warriors, as reſerve, equal to that of La Noue, in the diſplay of their own actions, has proved uncommon in modern authors of memoirs†.

A. D. 1570.] The admiral, having been diſappointed of fixing his quarters in Guienne, undertook, in the midſt of winter, to traverſe the kingdom by a march from Mantauban, through Languedoc, to the mouth of the Rhone, and from thence, along the courſe of that river, and that of the Saone, to the entrance of Burgundy and the head of the Seine. This arduous undertaking he ſucceſsfully accompliſhed, and, ſurmounting every obſtacle that oppoſed his paſſage, after pillaging above fifty, and burning a hundred places, he aſtoniſhed the court, which believed him entangled in a train of inextricable difficulties, and totally incapacitated from giving them annoyance, by the news of his arrival in the confines of Burgundy. He gradually approached to La Charité on the Loire, ſtill occupied by a Proteſtant garriſon; but his army, by diſaſters, deſertion and diſeaſe, in a march of more than four hundred French leagues, during the courſe of eight months, with ſcarcely a week's intermiſſion of fatigue, was worn out and reduced to half its former number. Recruited with ſome companies from Dauphiné and Geneva, and a party brought from La Charité by Briquemaut, it amounted not in foot and horſe to five thouſand men. Yet this ſmall number of combatants, under the conduct of bold and experienced commanders, preſerved the honour of their party, and forced peace to themſelves and to France, by defeating the mareſchal de Coſſe, who attacked them, at Arnay-le-Duc, on the twenty-third of June, with thirteen thouſand men, and twelve pieces of cannon. The attack laſted ſeven hours, at the expiration of which the Catholics allowed the admiral to march forward with his army, and pitch his camp between La Charité, Sancerre and Vezelai, three towns garriſoned by his confederates, which was the ſtation he ſought for the repoſe of his troops; the re-aſſemblage of the ſcattered forces of the Proteſtants, and the revival of the war in the heart of the kingdom.

During theſe operations ſome overtures for a negociation had been made by the court, but the refuſal to allow the public exerciſe of the reformed religion, had hitherto prevented the concluſion of a treaty. When, however, the admiral's troops began to extend their excurſions to the vicinity of the metropolis, a ſudden alteration took place, and a ſolicitous diſpoſition to peace, on the part of the court, appeared. A treaty was accordingly concluded, in the month of Auguſt, at St. Germain-en-Laye, containing forty-ſix articles. Beſides the public exerciſe of the Proteſtant religion, unconfined by the reſtrictions of the edict of Rouſſillon, and an amneſty conceived in the moſt ample terms, with a declaration of the nullity and repeal of all proſcriptions, civil and criminal of the Proteſtants during the war, and a recognition of their privileges of admiſſion into all employments and dignities civil and military; the Hugonots were allowed, in proceſſes before the provincial parliaments, to except, without aſſigning any reaſon, againſt three judges in each chamber. In the parliament of Bourdeax they could object to four; and with reſpect to that of Thouloufe, on account of its moſt notorious bigotry and prejudice againſt the Proteſtants, authority was granted them to decline its juriſdiction, and carry their cauſes to any other parliament, or to the court of requeſts in Paris. But what diſtinguiſhed this edict of pacification from every preceding one, was the assignment of the four cities of Rochelle, Cognac, Montauban, and La Charité, to the Protestants, to be holden by them, for the security and the fulfilment of the articles of peace, for two years. It was not only published by registration in the court of parliament, but its punctual observance and execution were to be sworn to, by the lieutenants and presidial magistrates of the provinces. Such was the conclusion of the third civil war, and the tenor of the peace obtained by the Protestants in France, who having experienced, as Sully says*, several hard reverses of fortune, yet through the wise conduct of their chiefs, and the auspicious genius of Henry, king of Navarre, supported themselves with reputaion and honour till this period, at which that instructive and valuable piece of history, his memoirs begin.

Soon after this peace, Charles united himself to the archduchess Elizabeth, daughter of the emperor, Maximilian the Second; an amiable princess, who, with the hand, obtained not the heart of her royal consort, which had been long engaged to his mistress, the beautiful Mary Touchet. Foreign states and princes considered the choice of the daughter of Maximilian for his consort, as a happy presage of the termination of the natural broils about religion, by a conformity to the wise policy and pacific conduct of that prince. Among other congratulations the king received one, presented by the envoys of the princes of the Augsbourg confession, lately met at the Diet of Spiers, which was remarkable for turning chiefly on the propriety of the late edict of peace, and the benefit of religious toleration. Charles's answer was decent, and not unfavourable to act with vigour in maintaining the treaty, which he chose to call his own peace.

A. D. 1570, 1571.] The advantageous terms of this treaty, and the solemn professions which Catharine and Charles made to maintain it inviolably, did not soon throw the Protestant princes and chiefs off their guard. Experience had taught them circumspection, and they scarcely dared encourage the hope of finding sincerity where they had so often met with deceit. Willing, however, to judge of the truth of those amicable declarations from facts, they kept together in a body, and chose Rochelle for a retreat, and the place of their common consultations†. During their residence there a variety of circumstances occurred to rouze their apprehensions and prove their jealousy. It afforded them grounds for reflection, that the secret articles of the pacification were not yet registered in the parliament; that the marquis of Villars, an inveterate foe to the Protestants, was appointed to the lieutenancy of the province of Guienne, of which the prince of Navarre was governor; and that queen Jane, his mother, was excluded from the possession of one of her towns. Other complaints which presently arose on the opposition made by the Catholics in some places to the freedom of the Protestant worship, and the renewal of former insults by them, would soon have made an additional impression, that might not have been so eaſily effaced. But the king appeared peculiarly anxious to remove every ſubject of diſcontent: he ſent the mareſchal de Coſſe and La Proutiers, maſter of requeſts, to Rochelle, with ample inſtructions to obviate conteſts about the explication of the edicts, and to conſult with the Proteſtant chiefs about the propereſt methods of enforcing its general obſervance. Such obſequious attention, which they had never before experienced, tended to blunt the edge of their complaints. De Coſſe performed his commiſſion to more advantage, from the favourable idea the Proteſtants entertained of his character: the encouragement he gave them to hope for every equitable conceſſion from the king, and the repreſentation he made of the favourable turn of the politics of the court, were credited; and that part of his meſſage, which reſpected the marriage of the king of Navarre to Margaret, Charles's ſiſter, appeared to be a confirmation of thoſe aſſurances. Having, by this introduction, ſmoothed the way to friendly intercourſe, the mareſchal returned to court, whither he was ſoon followed by Teligni, Briquemaut, and the counſellor de Cavagne, whom the princes had appointed to ſound the diſpoſitions of the miniſtry, and to proſecute the full execution of the articles of the edict.

Theſe deputies had every reaſon to be contented with the reception they experienced from the king, whom they found employed in checking the reſtleſs ſpirit which the civil war had engendered by the moſt vigorous and determined meaſures. When intelligence was received that the Proteſtants at Rouen had been attacked by the ſoldiers as they were going to the conventicle, Charles waited not for ſolicitation, but directly proceeded to do juſtice againſt the offenders. The mareſchal Montmorenci, attended by a preſident and other judges of the parliament of Paris, being diſpatched, on purpoſe to take cognizance of the riot, the ringleaders of it were puniſhed with death; others fined; and a capital ſentence was denounced againſt all who fled. On ſeveral other occaſions the ſame favourable diſpoſition appeared: De Villars's commiſſion of lieutenancy was ſuſpended, and aſſurances were given that the queen of Navarre, and the prince her ſon, ſhould be allowed the full exerciſe of all their rights and privileges.

Of the ſincerity of theſe proceedings the propoſed marriage of the king's ſiſter to Henry the young king of Navarre, and the alledged deſign of entering into a war with Spain, ſeemed to afford plain and inconteſtible evidence. De Biron grand-maſter of the artillery, whoſe conduct during the war, as well as his general character, rendered him an acceptable negociator, was commiſſioned by the king to repair to Rochelle, and make the formal propoſition of the firſt of theſe points to the queen of Navarre, and to declare his intentions about the ſecond. The arguments he was inſtructed to inſiſt upon, with reſpect to the match, were ſuch as not only tended to remove difficulties, and ſubdue ſcruples, but to produce a conviction, in the minds of the Proteſtant chiefs, that the king's aim and motive in it were entirely amicable. Charles, indeed, expreſsly declared that he beſtowed his ſiſter upon the prince of Navarre with a view to render the connubial tye a general one, to attach all the Hugonots to his government, and to baniſh their apprehenſions concerning the immutability of his edicts of peace. The refuſal of Pius the Fifth to grant a diſpenſation for the conſanguinity, inſtead of ſlackening his intention, ſerved rather to move his ſpleen againſt the court of Rome. Even the princeſs Margaret's known inclination for the duke of Guiſe, animated Charles to a pitch of reſentment againſt the favoured lover, whoſe preſumption he thought might lead him to offer an indignity to the houſe of France*. In a fit of indignation he preſented two ſwords to baſtard of Angouléme, requiring him to take one of them and kill the duke of Guiſe, or expect his own death by the other. His rage however was calmed by the ſpeedy marriage of the duke to the widow of the prince of Porcien. The chief pretence urged for breaking with the court of Spain, was the recent death of Elizabeth, ſiſter to Charles and wife to Philip, whom that inhuman monſter, after he had cauſed his ſon, the unhappy Don Carlos, to be poiſoned, was ſtrongly ſuſpected of having ſacrificed to his jealouſy. Queen Catharine perſuaded the Proteſtant chiefs that ſhe had thus an intereſting motive to concur with them in hating the Spaniſh monarch, and revenging upon him the miſerable death of her daughter.

The articles of the contract of marriage between Henry and the princeſs Margaret were ſpeedily arranged: the dowry to be given with the princeſs was three hundred thouſand crowns, valued at fifty-four ſous each; and the queen of Navarre reſigned to her ſon the rents of the county of Armagnac, and twelve thouſand livres out of her own jointure lands. On the part of the king every thing was facilitated. A brief conceived in fuller terms, to remove the objections of the cardinal of Bourbon, was obtained from Gregory the Thirteenth, who now ſucceeded to the pontificate, upon the death of Pius the Fifth. It was even known to be the king's intention, that part of the nuptial ceremony, required by the Roman ritual, ſhould be diſpenſed with.

In conſequence of the nuptial compact, the intercourſe of the Proteſtant chiefs with the court, became more unreſerved and frequent; and even the admiral, and the more prudent leaders, who were ſtill inclined to circumſpection and reſerve, began to be moved to confidence by other conſiderations. The connection which Charles affected to enter into with the court of England, where queen Elizabeth's marriage with the duke of Anjou was ſolicited, firſt by the cardinal of Châtillon, and then by mareſchal Montmorenci; his employment of Gaſpar Schomberg in Germany, to court the alliance of duke Caſimir and ſome other princes, and to ſolicit levies for the war in the Low Contries; and ſome military preparations that ſeemed to be made both by ſea and land, for a rupture with Spain, were conſidered as unequivocal demonſtrations that the king was determined to ſhake off the fetters of the bigotted party at court, and laboured earneſtly to aſſert his own independent authority in the government of the ſtate, and to conſult the intereſt and honour of the nation. It was upon this judgment of Charles's intentions that Count Lewis of Naſſau repaired in diſguiſe, along with ſome of the Proteſtant chiefs, to Blois, where the court then was, in order to inform the king of the ſtate of the war in the Netherlands, and to perſuade him with what advantage he might now engage in it. His reception was favourable; and the anſwer given by Charles about the war, artfully ſerved as a proof that he wanted not inclination, but encouragement and freedom to act in the manner the count and his partiſans wiſhed him to do. Charles ſignified, that however well diſpoſed he might be to adopt their political plan, not only the difficulties that might attend the enterpriſe of the Spaniſh war, but his own ſituation with reſpect to proper confidents in that buſineſs, embarraſſed him; and therefore, as a previous and neceſſary ſtep to his final reſolution, he deſired to have the aſſiſtance and counſel of the admiral Coligni. The peculiar circumſtances of this chieftain required that ſuch addreſs ſhould be uſed with him. As the pillar of his party, during the whole courſe of the cival war, more the object of reſentment, and more dreaded than any other, and one againſt whom the family of Guiſe ſtill maintained an avowed enmity, he had the ſtrongeſt reaſons to be cautious how he ventured his perſon at court and in the capital. Eſteemed and reſpected by foreign princes, he had inducements, both from ambition and intereſt, not to be precipitate in engaging himſelf with the court; but to preſerve during the public peace, a kind of independency, which while it was moſt conſiſtent with his perſonal ſafety, would ſecure the attachment of the Proteſtants to him, and ſtrengthen their party. But in circumſtances thus critical the admiral was ſwayed by his principles of patriotiſm, which rendered him ever anxious to ſerve his king and country. He yielded therefore to the concurring entreaties of his friends, the mareſchal de Coſſe and Montmorenci, who joined with count Naſſau in perſuading him to diſmiſs his remaining apprehenſions. Having taken his reſolution, he left Rochelle and repaired to the court at Blois, in the month of September; whither the queen of Navarre, ſoon after, prepared to follow him, in order to put the finiſhing hand to the marriage treaty.

The queen of Navarre, her children, and all the Proteſtant chiefs, experienced from Charles and his mother, the moſt flattering reception; the king in particular ſpoke of the noblemen of that party in the higheſt terms of commendation. The admiral he always addreſſed by the endearing appelation of father, and took upon himſelf the taſk of reconciling him with the princes of the houſe of Guiſe: nor were his actions leſs expreſſive of friendſhip than his words: a hundred thouſand livers, as an indemnification for his private loſſes in the late war, were aſſigned to Coligni, and, by a ſpecial grant, he was allowed a year's revenue of the rich benefices that belonged to his brother, the cardinal of Châtillon, who had recently died in England. The admiral's ſeat and rank at the council table was alſo reſtored to him, and the king ſeemed to depend on his advice both with regard to the alliances to be formed and the meaſures to be taken, in conſequence of the pretended reſolution to declare war againſt Spain:" ſuch was the deep laid-ſcheme of deception now practiſed by Catharine and her ſon, that Sully juſtly calls it, "an almoſt incredible prodigy of diſſimulation:" and ſuch indeed it muſt have been to have completely impoſed on a man of Coligni's ſagacity and penetration.

A. D. 1572.] In the midſt of theſe auſpicious appearances, the queen of Navarre was ſeized (at Paris, whither ſhe had repaired to provide for the ſolemnity of her ſon's nuptials) with a diſorder, which, in the ſhort ſpace of five days, put a period to her exiſtence: her death is, by all the Proteſtant hiſtorians, aſcribed to the effects of poiſon, adminiſtered in a pair of ſcented gloves, prepared for the purpoſe, by Rene, a Florentine, perfumer to the queen mother; but this is ſtrenuouſly denied by the Catholics, and the teſtimony of De Thou and Matthieu, who mention an internal abſceſs as the cauſe of her diſſolution, appears to be concluſive.

While Charles, who had ſecretly permitted the levying ſoldiers, under Genlis, and La Noue, for the ſervice of the prince of Orange, ſtill, under various pretences, evaded an open declaration of hoſtilities with the Spaniſh monarch, accounts were brought of the entire defeat of that auxiliary band, by the duke of Alva's forces. Affected with this intelligence, and believing that, in ſuch a criſis, he might puſh the king to an abſolute determination for war, the admiral repaired to Paris, whither he had been ſolicited to come by letters from his majeſty.

But Coligni was unable to impart to many of his aſſociates the confidence he himſelf repoſed in the ſincerity of Charles; to their vague admonitions, however, conveyed both in words and writing, the gallant veteran replied, in a manner that evinced at once the fortitude and integrity of his heart. "The peace is made," ſaid he, "and I have taken my reſolution to truſt the faith of the king; and will "rather be dragged through the ſtreets of Paris than have recourſe again to a "civil war." Credulity, influenced by ſuch ſentiments, muſt command our admiration, while it encreaſes our abhorrence of the wretches who were ſo baſe as to impoſe on it. In one of the remonſtrances, ſent to the admiral by ſome of his adherents, he was called upon to reflect on that authorized maxim of the church of Rome—that faith was not to be kept with heritics. Queen Catharine was repreſented as the true progeny of Rome, and the diſciple of Machiavel: her ſon, trained up in the ſame principles, was ſaid to emulate her vindictive ſpirit, and to have ſworn never to forget the attempt of the Proteſtants at Meaux, that in ſpite of their ſubtle conduct, it was alledged, they had ſometimes betrayed their diſſimulation; of which, what was heard to paſs between Catharine and the king, upon the queen of Navarre's arrival at Blois, was a manifeſt proof. "Have I not"—ſaid Charles—"acted my part well?"—"Admirably!"—replied his mother—"you have begun, but you muſt continue it to the end."—"I will not finiſh."

—returned Charles, with horrid execrations, to the uſe of which he was greatly addicted—" until I bring them all into the toils."—Coligni, excuſing the violent ſtile of theſe remonſtrances, gave a calm reply, while the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, to whom they were alſo addreſſed, treated them with a degree of ſcorn and contempt.

The brief granted by Gregory the Thirteenth, for the marriage of the king of Navarre with Margaret of Valois, being arrived, the ceremony was performed, by the cardinal of Bourbon, and according to the agreement was neither altogether after the Popiſh nor the Proteſtant form*. A variety of magnificent entertainments which followed the marriage for ſeveral days, diffuſed the reliſh of ſocial joy and feſtivity, in the participation of which, not only all the ſparks of former diſcord ſeemed to be quenched, but a happy pledge to be given of the future union of the jarring parties, and of the tranquility of the ſtate. But the dark deſigns, for promoting which Catharine and Charles had ſo long bent the efforts of their diſſimulation, were now brought to a criſis. Their ſcheme of drawing the principal leaders of the Proteſtants to Paris, had, by means of the nuptials, and their deluſion of the admiral, ſucceeded almoſt beyond their hopes. Above ſeven hundred of the nobility and gentry of that perſuaſion, the flower of their chieftains, who followed the young king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, and the admiral, to the court, were now lodged in the city or ſuburbs, diſarmed, unprepared, and incapable of reſiſting the force, that might be ſuddenly raiſed againſt them.

The aſſaſſination of the admiral was the firſt ſtroke of vengeance reſolved on by the deteſtable junto of Catharine and her ſon; and the duke of Guiſe, who was known to harbour an inveterate enmity to Coligni, was the perſon appointed to conduct this infamous tranſaction. Louvriers Maurevel, who had already been employed by Guiſe on a ſimilar occaſion, willingly accepted the commiſſion, and repaired to the place appointed by his worthy patrons, for the perpetration of the deed. The admiral, on his return from the Louvre to his own apartments, had to paſs by the cloiſter of the church of Saint Germain L'Auxerrois. At this place, within the houſe of Ville-Mur, one of the canons, who had been preceptor to the duke of Guiſe, the aſſaſſin had fixed his ſtation; and, on the morning of the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, as the admiral paſſed the houſe, at a ſlow pace, (being employed in reading a paper that was preſented to him on the way), Maurevel fired his arquebuſs at him, loaded with two bullets, one of which tore a finger off his right hand, and the other lodged deep in his left arm. While all who attended him were ſtricken with amazement, Coligni coolly pointed to the window whence the ſhot came; and having directed Piles and Monnins to go and acquaint the king with what had happened to him, and got his arm bound up, he walked home, ſupported by his domeſtics. To ſome who expreſſed their apprehenſions that the balls might be poiſoned, he ſaid, with perfect compoſure, " Nothing will befall me but what is the pleaſure of God." The painful operations of wrenching off his ſhattered finger, with a blunt inſtrument, and of extracting the bullet from his arm, he endured with undiſturbed looks, and an admirable firmneſs.

Many of the Catholics expreſſed their utter deteſtation of this atrocious attempt; and the king being informed of it, while playing at tennis with the duke of Guiſe, evinced the ſtrongeſt emotions of rage, and throwing down his racket, exclaimed, "Shall I never have peace? Shall I always be expoſed to new troubles"? Then retiring to the Louvre, he ſwore he would find out the aſſaſſin, wherever he lurked. Maurevel, however, had eluded the ſearch of the admiral's attendants (who had inſtantly forced open the door of the houſe) and having a freſh horſe prepared for him—from the king's ſtables, as Sully aſſerts—at the gate of Saint Antoine, effected his eſcape from the city.

The Proteſtants were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation, and the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, with ſeveral of their followers, repairing to the palace, implored the king's permiſſion to leave the metropolis, where they were hourly expoſed to the mercileſs fury of their unprincipled enemies. But Charles attempted, by execrable oaths, and every expreſſion of reſentment, to convince them how deeply affected he was with the commiſſion of the crime, and how reſolutely bent upon puniſhing every one that might be found acceſſary to it, as well as the perpetrator himſelf; aſſuring them, that the enquiry and acts of juſtice he would inſiſt upon, ſhould be ſuch as might be exemplary in the ſtate, and fully ſatisfy them and the admiral, who was the ſufferer; adding, that it was fit they ſhould ſtay in Paris to be witneſſes of his conduct. The queen-mother was equally loud in her expreſſions of abhorrence, and her threats of revenge. The meaſures taken for the diſcovery of the aſſaſſin, and the king's public declaration of his ſentiments, convinced the princes of his ſincerity, and, though it did not remove the grounds of their apprehenſions, left them no reaſon for inſiſting upon their reſolution of leaving Paris.

Coligni received a viſit from ſome of the Catholic chiefs, and afterwards from the king himſelf, attended by his mother and brothers, when the ſame declarations which had been made to the princes were renewed. A general conſultation of the Proteſtant leaders was holden ſoon after, on the ſubject of providing for their common ſafety; at which the vidame of Chartres and ſeveral others inſiſted on the neceſſity of their immediate removal from Paris, to ſome place of greater ſecurity*. But this reſolution was too ſucceſsfully oppoſed by Teligni, whoſe arguments prevailed with the majority. A meſſage, however, was ſent, in the admiral's name, to the king, informing him, that the temper of the Pariſians, which was always violently biaſſed againſt him and his friends, now appeared to be ſuch as to render ſome extraordinary precaution neceſſary for reſtraining them from acts of violence; and the appointment of a guard about Coligni's lodgings was propoſed as a proper expedient. This imprudent propoſal, which tended to put the admiral in the immediate power of his enemies, was chearfully acceded to by the king and the duke of Anjou. Coſſeins, captain of the royal guard, attached to the duke of Guiſe, was ordered to take his ſtation, with a company of picked men, before the houſe where the admiral lodged, (at an inn in the Rue Betiſy) and, to prevent ſuſpicion, a few Swiſs belonging to the king of Navarre's body guard, were intermixed with them. A farther advantage was yet taken of this injudicious requeſt: it was deſired by the king, that for the better protection of the admiral, the Proteſtant nobility ſhould be lodged in the neighbourhood. The city officers were appointed to provide apartments for them, and public proclamation was made, prohibiting all Catholics, under pain of death, from approaching them.

A ſecond conſultation, however, was holden by the Calviniſts, and the admiral again preſſed to retire, but, ſteady to his purpoſe, Coligni rejected the ſolicitations of his friends; and to their arguments replied, "By a retreat, I muſt diſcover "either my fear or my diſtruſt. By the one my honour would ſuffer, by the "other, an injury be done to the king. I ſhould be again compelled to have "recourſe to a civil war; and my choice is, to die rather than behold the miſeries "I have witneſſed, or endure the diſtreſſes I have already ſuſtained." The conference about quitting Paris being thus reſumed, the vidame of Chartres, and many others of his opinion, having declared their fixed reſolution to retire to the ſuburbs; intelligence of the debate among them, and of the uncertainty how it might conclude, was carried to the queen-mother, by one of the Proteſtant chiefs, ſuppoſed to be Bouchvananes, on accouut of his intimacy with her.

In conſequence of this intelligence, a ſecret council was immediately holden at the palace, at which the propoſal for the horrid maſſacre which enſued, is ſaid to have been made; but being ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the count de Retz, who painted it in its proper colours, no reſolution was adopted, and the council broke up. But, after ſome private conſultation between Charles and his mother, the former called back his counſellors from the gate, and told them, that there was an end of his government, unleſs the propoſal that had been made was adopted, and that he ſhould hold all ſuch as diſapproved the meaſure, to be diſloyal.

The meaſures already taken facilitated the execution of this abominable enterprize, the accompliſhment of which was fixed for the next day, which was the feaſt of Saint Bartholomew. The duke of Guiſe, whoſe retreat from court after the admiral was wounded, together with the king's affected indignation againſt him, had been made uſe of to deceive the Proteſtants, was again called upon to act his part*. In the mean time, to irritate the populace, a report was induſtriouſly circulated through the city, that the king had ſent for the mareſchal Montmorenci from Chantilly, whither he had retired, and that he was expected in Paris with a large body of horſe to quell the citizens. Their agitation became perceptible in the ſtreets, where they aſſembled in crowds; while the loads of arms, and bands of ſoldiers that paſſed to the Louvre, provoked their commotions. The king of Navarre was told by Charles, with the utmoſt ſhew of amity and confidence, that in the preſent ſtate of affairs, it was neceſſary to be upon their guard againſt the turbulence of the people; and that it was fit he ſhould not only keep all his domeſtics about him in the Louvre, but that he ſhould call others of his moſt truſty attendants to lodge there in caſe of any tumult. Teligni, who heard various alarming reports, interpreted every thing favourably, concealed part of them from the admiral, and confirmed him in his fatal ſecurity. After Coſſein's guard was doubled, and the night was far advanced, the duke of Guiſe, having permiſſion from the king, called ſome captains of the Swiſs and French companies of guards, and informed them that the hour was come, in which the king was determined to avenge himſelf of a race of men, odious to God and his church, and offenſive to human ſociety; that a ſmall exertion of their obedience and courage was neceſſary to the accompliſhment of this object, which would atchieve what numerous battles had failed to effect*. He then ordered them to range their ſoldiers on both ſides of the palace, and to ſuffer none of the prince of Bourbon's ſervants to paſs without the gates. A command was then delivered by Guiſe to Charron, preſident of the chamber of accounts, and lately admitted to the office of provoſt of the merchants, to aſſemble the officers of the city militia in the town-hall, and, after iſſuing orders for arming their people, there to wait for farther inſtructions. The late provoſt-marſhall was employed to communicate the import of the king's orders to the aldermen and burgeſſes, who were told "That it was his majeſty's will and decree to make an utter extirpation of the rebellious Hugonots, againſt whom they had now full liberty to uſe their arms: that orders would be immediately diſpatched, for the ſame purpoſe, to the other cities of the kingdom, to which the Pariſians ought to ſet an example, by neither ſparing nor concealing any of the impious tribe: that, to avoid confuſion, and to diſtinguiſh themſelves from their adverſaries, ſleeves of white linen ſhould be worn on their left arms, and croſſes of the ſame in their hats: that torches and lanthorns ſhould be lighted in the windows of every houſe; and that they ought to proceed quietly, and avoid all noiſe, until the ſignal to begin the work ſhould be given, by ſounding the great bell at the palace." All the neceſſary orders being thus iſſued, the murderers, at the dead hour of midnight, took the ſtations aſſigned them; and the files of ſoldiers, drawn up in the different ſtreets and croſs-ways, only waited for the expected ſignal to fall with fury on the Proteſtants.

As the fatal hour drew nigh, Charles is ſaid to have been goaded by the ſtings of remorſe, and to have betrayed ſuch fear and irreſolution, that all the art of his mother was requiſite to extort from him an order of the aſſaſſins to begin their dreadful buſineſs. "Shall the occaſion"—ſaid the blaſphemous Catharine—"that God preſents, of avenging the obdurate enemies of your authority, be "ſuffered to eſcape through want of courage? How much better is it to tear in " pieces thoſe corrupt members, than to rankle the boſom of the church, the " ſpouſe of our lord?" This impious exhortation expelled from his boſom every ſentiment of humanity, and, his eyes glared with rage, he thus pronounced the horrid mandate—" Go on and let none remain to reproach me with the " deed.* Having thus obtained her aim, Catharine anticipated the fixed hour of the ſignal, which was given by ringing the bell of the church of Saint Germain de L'Auxerrois.†

The duke of Guiſe immediately iſſued forth, with a ſelect party, to perpetrate the murder of the admiral, and meeting ſome Proteſtants in the ſtreets, who had been alarmed by the ſound of the bell, a firing of piſtols enſued, which being heard in the palace, Charles's terror and irreſolution returned, and a meſſage was diſpatched by Catharine to countermand the duke of Guiſe, which ſhe well knew would arrive too late, and be totally diſregarded. Already had that princely aſſaſſin beſet the admiral's lodgings, the gate of which being ſhut and guarded would have required ſome time to force open; but Coſſeins having demanded admittance in the king's name, La Bonne, who kept the keys, having no ſuſpicion of what was going forward, admitted him, and was inſtantly ſtabbed. Some of the king of Navarre's Swiſs ſoldiers flew to the inner gate, and endeavoured to barricade it. The noiſe awakened the admiral, who, unuſed to apprehenſion, believed it to be only ſome riot of the populace, which the guard would ſoon quell. But the clamour encreaſing, and ſeveral ſhots being fired in the court, he roſe from his bed, and covered himſelf with his night-gown, when he was ſoon convinced, by his attendants, who hurried to his chamber, that the worſt was to be feared. Being few in number, and moſt of them only domeſtics, their pale looks and trembling geſtures denounced the immediate fate they expected. " This inſtant,"—exclaimed one of them—" God calls us to meet " death." " It is enough"—ſaid Coligni—" that I know it." He leaned for ſome moments againſt the wall, while the miniſter Merlin prayed. Then with a countenance undiſmayed, " Away," ſaid he, " my friends, ſave yourſelves, if " poſſible: now I have no need of your help; to that of God I have commended " my ſoul. But let not your unprofitable ſtay be mourned by your wives and " children, as a ſad infelicity, occaſioned by your attendance upon my exit." All but two of them, whoſe fidelity to their maſter roſe ſuperior to the fear of death, fled into the upper rooms of the houſe. In a few minutes the door was burſt open, and a groupe of ſeven armed ruffians entered the apartment. Beſme, a German, ſtept before the reſt, and flouriſhing his ſword, exclaimed " Art " thou Coligni?" " I am," replied the admiral, with a ſteady voice and firm countenance, " and you, young ſoldier, ought to reſpect my grey hairs. But " come on," ſaid he to Beſme, " do what thou wilt, thou canſt ſhorten my life " but little." At that inſtant he received the villain's ſword in his breaſt, which rather courted than ſhunned the blow, and a repitition of ſtabs ſoon deprived him of life, which he yielded up without uttering a groan. The aſſaſſins themſelves were ſtricken with the invincible intrepidity of his ſpirit; and one of them, whoſe name was Attin, declared, that never had a man been ſeen to brave ſuch a death, with ſo much magnanimity. His body was thrown from the window into the court-yard, where the duke of Guiſe waited to enjoy his daſtardly triumph. Having wiped the blood from the face, he exclaimed, in a tone of exultation, "We have begun well, my friends, let us proceed to complete the reſt with courage; it is the king's command, we obey." Immediately the alarm-bell of the palace was rung, and the populace were rouzed to ſpread the maſſacre. The admiral's body being found by theſe Pariſian blood-hounds, it was maimed, gored, and dragged through the kennels, and, after ſerving at intervals as the paſtime of their fury, for two days was ſuſpended on the gibbet of Montfaucon. But neither the inhuman maſſacre of Coligni, nor the horrid indignities committed on his corpſe, have, ſays Le Gendre, effected the ſmalleſt diminution of his fame, or tarniſhed in the leaſt the merit of a character, illuſtrious for thoſe qualities and virtues, which have formed the heroes and the patriots of all nations. The body of Coligni, half conſumed with fire, was, under favour of the night, conveyed to the vault of the Montmorencies at Chantilly, and from thence transferred to the family vault of Chatillon.

The maſſacre continued, with unrelenting fury, among the Proteſtant chiefs, who were aſſaulted by the aſſaſſins, when deſtitute of all means of defence, and were inhumanly butchered by a daſtardly crew who had often fled before them in the field. The count de Rochefoucaud had paſſed the early part of the night with the king at the Louvre, where the pleaſant ſallies of his wit and facetious humour had entertained the courtiers, and diſpoſed Charles to ſave him*. Believing, when the chief of the aſſaſſins knocked at the door, and ſaid he had a meſſage to deliver from the king, that it was ſome frolick intended by his majeſty, he opened it, and ſpoke in a humorous ſtrain to thoſe who anſwered him by drawing their poniards, and plunging them into his boſom. Teligni, unſuſpicious to the laſt, endeavoured now to eſcape over the roofs of the houſes; but being diſcovered, he was dragged down, when the ſweet engaging form which nature had given him, made a momentary impreſſion on the aſſaſſins, who ſtood, with looks of ſuſpence, before they gave the fatal blow. At the ſame time periſhed the counts of Revel and Quellenec, with the barons de Lavardin, Beaudiſner, and Pluviaut, and others of diſtinguiſhed valour, driven through the ſtreets by the duke of Anjou's guards, and maſſacred in the view of the windows of the Louvre.

The king of Navarre and the prince of Condé were awakened, about two hours before day-break, by a band of ſoldiers, who ruſhed into their chamber in the palace, and inſolently commanded them to dreſs themſelves, and attend the king, unarmed. They were, by Catharine's orders, led through vaults and dark paſſages, lined with troops, who ſhook their ſpears at them as they paſſed along. In the mean time, the cries from without were diſmal and terrifying; while all that party of their friends and followers, who were invited to take up their abode in the Louvre, were precipitated from the windows, or dragged forth in crowds to be aſſaſſinated in the court-yards. Here, Saint Martin, Pardaillan, Beauvois, and the gallant Piles, with many others, ſuffered death; while the indignant expreſſions of the laſt, as he caſt a look on his murdered companions, were thus uttered aloud. "Are theſe the teſtimonies of the king's faith; of the "peace he hath ſworn; and of all the gracious promiſes he hath made? But "the Almighty God will revenge ſuch monſtrous perfidy.*" Leiran, beſmeared with blood, and deſperately wounded, found his way into the queen of Navarre's chamber, and threw himſelf upon the bed of that princeſs, who ran forth ſcreaming, and met with ſuch objects in her way, as made her fall into fits, from which ſhe was with difficulty recovered, and conducted by Nanſey, captain of the guards, into the apartment of the ducheſs of Lorraine. Her huſband and the prince of Condé, after whom ſhe enquired with great eagerneſs, had been introduced into the king's chamber; when they were thus addreſſed by Charles, in a tone and accent fierce and imperious—"To day, I revenge myſelf of my "enemies, and ſuch I may juſtly reckon you to be, who have ſupported them "by the authority of your names, and your preſence among them. Nothing but "a reſpect to my blood deters me from inflicting the ſame puniſhment on you. "But this regard hath its conditions. When I pardon your paſt conduct, I re-"quire and inſiſt on your immediate renunciation of that impious faith which "contradicts mine, and teaches you to affront heaven, and inſult my authority." The king of Navarre's was given in a low and embarraſſed voice, but in terms that promiſed ſubmiſſion. But the prince of Condé boldly teſtified his diſcontent at the indecent violence uſed with them; complained of the breach of honour in this treatment; and declared, that his fear of death was not ſo great as to render him an apoſtate from his religion. Charles, provoked by his reſiſtance, called him obſtinate, ſeditious, a rebel, and the ſon of a rebel; and threatened that he ſhould ſuffer the death of a traitor, if, in three days, he did not yield obedience. "Remember"—ſaid the mercileſs tyrant—"It is Maſs, Death, or "Baſtile." Upon the apparant compliance of the king of Navarre, Charles granted him the lives of the count de Grammont, de Duras, and Bouchavannes; and a few others were ſaved at the earneſt application of his ſiſter of Navarre.

* Brantome, tom. iv. p. 10.

In a former part of our hiſtory we have ſhewn of what horrid acts of barbarity the Pariſians, when inſtigated by hatred, bigotry, malice, or revenge, could be guilty. Their preſent rage and ferocity had nothing human in them. Wherever their ruffian bands were led by the municipal officers, their track was marked by violence, bloodſhed, and brutality: neither age nor ſex was ſpared: pregnant women and helpleſs infants were alike ſacrificed to their barbarous fury. Brion, the venerable preceptor of the prince of Conti, was murdered, while claſped in the arms of his infant pupil: Francis Nonpar de Caumont was maſſacred in his bed between his two ſons, one of whom was ſtabbed by his ſide, but the other, concealing himſelf under the bodies of his father and brother, fortunately eſcaped.* Briſſonet, niece to the biſhop of Meaux, a woman of examplary manners, projected an eſcape from the city in diſguiſe, with her young daughter in her hand, and followed by Epina the miniſter, in the habit of a domeſtic: but being diſcovered in the attempt, and refuſing to abjure her religion, ſhe was ſtabbed with iron rods, and thrown, half-dead, into the river, where floating on the ſurface, the watermen purſued her as their prey, and put her to a ſlow and lingering death.

Upon the firſt noiſe of the tumult, a report was carried to that party of the Proteſtant chiefs, who, by the advice of the vidame of Chartres, had fixed their quarters in the ſuburbs of Saint Germain, that the populace had taken up arms. The ſound of the bells and the ſhouts of the mob confirmed the intelligence. Anxious and doubtful what might be the ground of the inſurection, they continued long in ſuſpence, and from ſome perſuaſion that it was promoted by the Guiſes, againſt the will of the king, they were on the point of paſſing the river, to aſſiſt in ſupporting his authority and defending their friends. The morning, however, ſoon diſpelled their error, and ſhewed them the river covered with boats full of ſoldiers coming to attack them, and Charles himſelf, from the windows of the Louvre, firing his carabine upon ſome wretched fugitives; and ſcarce did time and aſtoniſhment permit them to eſcape with precipitation from their blood-thirſty purſuers.

For three days the maſſacre was continued with unabated fury: it is certain that the populace would have readily proceeded to the deſtruction of thoſe who were ſaid to favour the Hugonots, as well as of the Hugonots themſelves; and that the queen-mother might have conſummated her diabolical ſcheme, by inſtigating them to aſſult the Montmorencies, as friendly to the admiral; but intimidated from proceeding ſo far, on account of the mareſchal Montmorenci, and other obvious reaſons, ſhe allowed the popular outrage to take its courſe. From the dread of it many Catholics had to be on their guard; and de Brion who commanded in the arſenal, ordered two culverins to be placed at the gate, and put himſelf in a poſture of defence.

After various inſtances of violence and ſlaughter committed upon the Catholics, and when the carnage became noiſome, an order was publiſhed by the king, requiring all the citizens to retire to their houſes, and not to ſtir from them under pain of death. What remained ſtill to be executed was intended to be performed by a more regular proceſs of the king's guard through the city. But the ſanguinary rage of ferocious people were more eaſily excited than reſtrained; and the violence and plunder on the ſecond day, nearly equalling thoſe of the firſt, it only ſubſided by degrees. The deſtruction of about ſix thouſand Proteſtants, of which five hundred were nobility, may be reckoned the fatal iſſue of this dreadful maſſacre, which called was by ſome, The Pariſian Matins as the maſſacre in Sicily, in 1281, had been denominated The Sicilian Veſpers.

That the maſſacre of the Hugonots was the reſult of premeditation will ſcarcely admit of a doubt, though the hiſtorians differ moſt eſſentially in their accounts of its origin. Some maintain that the plan of it was concerted between the queen-mother and the duke of Alva, at the conferences at Bayonne: others fix the period of its concluſion immediately previous to the laſt peace made with the Hugonots after the battle of Amai-le-duc; and the third claſs ſay that no reſolution had been taken on the ſubject till a few days before the deed was perpetrated. The different ſtatements and opinions have been carefully collected and impartially diſcuſſed by father Griffet, who thus concludes his reſearches:—"Let what will be ſaid to the contrary, men will with difficulty be brought to believe that this horrible maſſacre was not a premeditated buſineſs, and that the peace concluded with the Hugonots, the profeſſions and marks of confidence laviſhed on the admiral de Coligni, were not ſo many ſnares and artifices employed with a view to deceive and deſtroy them. It is poſſible that the laſt meaſures adopted for their extermination, may have been reſolved on only a few days before their execution; it was then that the number of victims, the choice of the aſſaſſins, and the day of the maſſacre, were fixed in the ſecret councils (holden at the Louvre); but it appears certain that the project was formed at the time of the peace and of the propoſal for marying the ſiſter of Charles the Ninth to the king of Navarre.

The king vainly hoped to retrieve his honour by the pitiful ſubterfuge of a diſavowal. In the letters patent which he ſent into the provinces he endeavoured to throw the whole of the blame upon the Guiſes, and aſcribed the maſſacre to their hatred of the admiral. The private letters he wrote on this ſubject to England, Germany, and Switzerland, and other neighbouring ſtates, were all conceived in the ſame terms. The Guiſes, however, having obtained their chief aim, began to be ſenſible of the diſhonour and danger attending ſuch an accuſation, which, at a future period, might render them obnoxious and accountable, and poſitively refuſed to acquieſce in this determination. The duke of Guiſe, indeed, after the murder of the admiral, had rather repreſſed the king's rage*, and inſtead of imitating his ferocity, had ſaved D'Acier, brother to the count de

* D'Aubgine,

Cruſſol, and ſome others of the nobility. Having exerted this political lenity, while Charles had expoſed himſelf by the natural violence of his temper, the Guiſes now left him to find what pretence he could, to extenuate the infamy of a ſcene, to which they, with the aſſiſtance of Catharine, had chiefly promoted him.

There is no doubt but the queen mother and her council made the king comprehend the bad conſequence of his diſavowal; for, at the expiration of eight days, his ſentiments and language were ſo much changed, that he held a bed of juſtice in the court of parliament, and ordered the regiſtration of other letters-patent, by which it was declared, that nothing was done on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt but by his expreſs commands, iſſued for the purpoſe of puniſhing the Hugonots, to the principal leaders of which party a capital crime was imputed, in order, if poſſible, to give the name and colour of a juſt execution to that deteſtable butchery. As Coligni's papers had been ſeized by the queen-mother's orders, hopes were entertained of finding ſome memorial on which to ground an article of impeachment againſt him; but his manuſcripts only ſerved as an honourable teſtimony of his integrity. In the brief he had drawn up on the ſubject of the Spaniſh war, he remarked to the king the evident intereſt which England had to undertake the defence of the revolted provinces of the Netherlands; and the danger that would accrue to France, by the Engliſh, her ancient enemy, gaining footing in that country. To provoke the ſpleen of queen Elizabeth, who had maintained a cloſe correſpondence with the admiral, and to incenſe the duke of Alençon at his memory, theſe private notes were communicated to them. The anſwer made by Elizabeth and by the duke was much the ſame: "It was manifeſt"—they ſaid—"whatever they might object to the admiral on account of theſe advices, that the king had no reaſon to complain, ſince they had marked his attachment and zeal for his majeſty's intereſt and ſervice." The king when requeſted by Pibrac, the attorney-general, to paſs a formal edict upon the point, only declared he would iſſue his orders about it. But the proceſs againſt the admiral and his accomplices was immediately inſtituted, and the ſentence of high-treaſon was, ſoon after, executed upon his effigy with all the appointed forms of infamy. A jubilee, or public thanksgiving for the happy diſcovery of the pretended plots of the Proteſtants, was two days after proclaimed in the city; and, by another edict, the day of St. Bartholomew was ordered to be anually ſolemnized by religious proceſſions.

The orders diſpatched into the provinces upon the eve of St. Bartholomew, produced their fatal effects in moſt of the cities and great towns in the kingdom. At Meaux, Orlains, Troyes, Lyons, Bourges, Rouen, and Thouloufe, and many other places, the cruelties of the Pariſians were emulated; and thirty thouſand people, according to the loweſt computation, were murdered in cold blood. But though the king's infamous orders were too generally obeyed by the commanders and magiſtrates in the different towns, ſome honourable exceptions muſt be made, and the names of thoſe patriots whoſe generous exertions tended to preſerve the lives of their countrymen be recorded in the page of hiſtory. To Eleonor de Chabot, count of Charny, it was owing that only one Proteſtant was killed in the whole province of Burgundy. When the king's letters were brought, by la Mole, to Claud of Savoy, count of Tende, governor of Dauphine, he inſiſted that theſe orders, ſo contradictory to what he had received a few days before from his majeſty, could not come from him: and that he would adhere to his firſt inſtructions as moſt becoming the king. Tho' he died in a few days, his lenity and reſolution, being imitated by Bertrand de Simiance, lord of Gordes, proved almoſt an entire protection to the Calviniſts of the province. In Auvergne, St. Heran, the governor, a man trained up in the violence of civil war, declared, when he looked upon the orders, "that they were ſuch as he could not obey, unleſs "the king himſelf were preſent to give them." Tanneguy-la-Veneur exerted himſelf to the utmoſt to prevent the maſſacre at Rouen, but wanted power to reſtrain the fury of the populace; and ſeveral of the deputies in the governments of the Montmorencies acting with ſimilar moderation from a conformity to the ſentiment of their conſtituents, prevented or controuled the appointed ſlaughter. But the anſwer made by the viſcount de Ortez, governor of Bayonne, to Charles, who had written a private letter to him, is peculiarly worthy of notice: " You muſt "not, on this point, expect obedience from me. I have ſignified the orders ſent "from your majeſty to the inhabitants of the town, and the troops in the garriſon; "and I found them all ready to act like good citizens and brave ſoldiers; but not "one hangman among them". After it was known, by various expreſſes from the lieutenants in the provinces, what confuſion was occaſioned by the maſſacres, the edict to prohibit all inſurrections and violences was publiſhed. As in one clauſe of it, the king's will was ſaid to be not to derogate from the edicts of peace: and in another, that the religious aſſemblies of the proteſtants ſhould be reſtrained, ſeveral of the governors were at a loſs how to interpret its import, and proceeded differently, according to their particular diſpoſitions and attachments.

Charles, thou he occaſionally expreſſed great uneaſineſs at the ſcene he had occaſioned, and though the agitation of his mind had a viſible effect on his conſtitution, was yet incapable of feeling that deep remorſe which proceeds from a full conviction of having acted wrong. He ſtill continued to inſiſt on the immediate converſion of the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, who having made the abjuration of their errors and received abſolution, appeared with their families at high maſs. The king and court rejoiced at their victory, as the ſpecial fruit of Bartholomew. The cardinal of Bourbon, obſerving that the king of Navarre had the appearance of attention while maſs was performed, ſaid to Bellievre, "Think you not that my nephew is ſincerely converted to the church?" No" re"plied the other—"I plainly ſee that he bears, with great difficulty, his preſent "conſtraint."

When inteligence of the maſſacre was received at Madrid, the moſt extravagant ſymptoms of joy were evinced by the court of Spain. Philip wrote a congratulatory letter to Charles on the ſubject, and offered public thankſgivings to Heaven for the deſtruction of his enemies. The courier, who carried the diſmal tidings to Rome, was rewarded by the cardinal of Loraine (who had long reſided in that capital) with a thouſand crowns; and a decree was imediately formed in the conclave for a jubilee to be celebrated throughout Chriſtendom. After a proceſſion had been made to St. Mark's church, and all the cuſtomary demonſtrations of joy were exhibited in the city, the cardinal walked in proceſſion to the church of St. Lewis, where, performing maſs himſelf, he ſaid, "that the prayers and "vows of Gregory the Thirteenth and the members of the ſacred college might "now be ſeen to have produced ſtupendous effects."

The court now believed they had effected the total extinction of the Proteſtant party. There were only four cities in the kingdom that dared to receive ſome diſperſed bodies of the fugitive nobles and their families, who, after the deſtruction of their principal leaders, ſeemed to carry only conſternation and deſpair along with them. Of the four towns granted for the ſecurity of the articles of the pacification, Montauban and Rochelle only remained in the power of the Hugonots. When Reſnier, who had eſcaped the maſſacre, through the lenity of de Veſins, his perſonal enemy, preſented himſelf, with a ſmall troop of horſemen, at the gates of the firſt of theſe places, he found the inhabitants in ſuch confuſion and diſmay, that he could no prevail on them to ſtand on their defence; until he had defeated, by a wonderful effort of deſperate courage, a party of four hundred of Montluc's ſoldiers. Though the flight of the moſt numerous parties being directed to Rochelle, the concourſe of fifty gentlemen, as many miniſters, and about á thouſand ſoldiers, appeared to claim the protection, and animate the courage of the townſmen, yet the fleet commanded by the baron de la Garde, and Strozzi, hovering in their bay, and the land forces drawn together in their neighbourhood by de Biron, convinced them of the dangers they would incur by any act of diſobedience to the court. As la Chaſtre had alſo been ordered with ſome troops to draw near to Sancerre, it was believed by the king's miniſters that the precautions they had taken, joined to the general ſurpriſe and terror, would be ſufficient to obtain the poſſeſſion of theſe towns, from which only reſiſtance was apprehended.

A. D. 1573.] But the expectations of the court were fruſtrated, and both theſe towns prepared for a vigorous reſiſtance. Sancerre, after having ſuffered all the horrors of a famine, never equalled but in the ſiege of Jeruſalem by Veſpaſian, obtained an honourable capitulation, by which the troops were allowed to march out with their baggage, and liberty of conſcience and impunity were ſecured to the inhabitants. Rochelle reſiſted all the efforts of the duke of Anjou, who went in perſon to beſiege it, for ſeven months, during which time many eminent commanders and officers among the Catholics loſt their lives. The duke of Aumale, Coſſeins, Goa, and Vergani, a celebrated engineer, were killed, and in the end ſixty captains were reckoned to have periſhed by wounds or diſeaſes. Though informed of his election to the crown of Poland, and adviſed of the promiſe given by the biſhop of Valence—the French envoy in that kingdom—to grant the Rochellers advantageous terms, the duke of Anjou ſtill thought of ſhewing himſelf, to the laſt, the indiſputable vanquiſher of the Hugonots. Being at laſt required by the king to conclude the military operations on any plauſible terms, and having narrowly eſcaped a mortal wound, which one of his domeſtics warded off at the expence of his own life, a treaty was concluded, in its conditions advantageous to the beſieged; while after the employment of an army of fifty thouſand men againſt them, and the diſtruction of half of them, it could only be conſidered, on the Catholic ſide, as a ſpecious cover to the king's honou and to that of the duke of Anjou. It comprehended, along with Rochelle, the two cities of Niſmes and Mountauban as her confederates. By its articles, reduced to the form of a royal edict, the free exerciſe of their religion was permitted to the Proteſtant inhabitants of theſe towns, together with the reſtoration of the Catholic worſhip in the churches where it had been ſuppreſſed. The gentry, or poſſeſſors of fiefs-nobles, who had born arms in thoſe places, were allowed to celebrate marriages and baptiſms in their houſes, in companies not exceeding ten perſons; and all abjurations forced by penalties being declared null and void, the Proteſtants every where were indulged with liberty of conſcience. The privileges of theſe towns remained ſecure and undiminiſhed; the king only claiming the power of appointing governors, without obliging them to have other garriſons than their own, or inſiſting on building citadels without their conſent. Four hoſtages from each of theſe cities were to be ſent to the king; by whom a general amneſty was granted.

From the paſſionate deſire which queen Chatharine had to ſee her favourite ſon proclaimed a ſovereign, and from the no leſs eager, though more ſecret, wiſhes of Charles to rid himſelf of one, whom he regarded as the rival of his reputation and authority in the kingdom, the conſideration of the public diſquiet was for a time ſuſpended, and all the thoughts of the court and miniſtry were engroſſed by the preparations for the reception of the Poliſh envoys, in a manner ſuitable to the honour of both nations. The biſhop of Langres was diſpatched to receive them at Metz; and, on the fifteenth of Auguſt, they arrived at the gates of Paris. The French court had not, for many centuries, beheld ſo ſplendid an embaſſy. Their whole train of cavalry amounted to near three hundred of which, more than the third part were gentlemen, beſides the twelve chief delegates. Their aſpect, dreſs, and equipage were no leſs a novelty to the Pariſians, who gazed on the large ſize of their bodies, their long beards, their grave and ſtern countenances, the rich furs on their habits, and the brilliant furniture of their arms and horſes. The chief nobility of the court and the magiſtrates of the city went forth, in proceſſion, to meet them, at the gate of St. Martin, which was decorated in the ſame manner as on the king's public entrance into the capital; and through it they were carried in fifty chariots, painted with various devices. It was remarkable that the Poliſh gentlemen could all ſpeak Latin, many of them German and Italian, and ſeveral of them expreſs themſelves with propriety in French; while, among the whole chief nobility of the court of France, there was none who underſtood the Latin language, though, at that time, the foundation of all literature; and the baron de Millau, and Caſtelnau Mauviſſiere, were ordered to attend the court as the only two gentlemen who had this qualification, the want of which now appeared to expoſe the faſhionable ignorance of the courtiers.

After their introduction to the queen-mother, the ambaſſadors, in their moſt pompous equipage, made a proceſſion through the ſtreets, to offer their ſubmiſſion to the duke of Anjou their ſovereign. A courſe of ſumptuous feaſts and entertainments attended theſe viſits, till the grand ceremony of preſenting the decree of their king's election took place. After Henry, in the cathedral of Nôtre-Dame, had ſworn to the conditions enacted by the diet of Poland, it was performed, with the utmoſt magnificence, in the ſpacious hall of the palace, where Charles, being ſeated under a canopy, with his brothers and the royal family at the Marble Table, and all the nobility and officers of the ſtate placed according to their rank, while the trumpets flouriſhed, the Poliſh delegates were introduced, and advanced towards the throne, two of them bearing on their ſhoulders a ſilver cheſt, in which decree, having an hundred and ten ſeals affixed to it, was depoſited. This ſhew of ſtate was followed by another ſtill more coſtly, which was the triumphal entrance of the king of Poland by the gate of Saint Antoine. Upon this occaſion the queen-mother, who gave the entertainment in the garden of the Thuilleries, contrived to embeliſh it with a kind of theatrical repreſentation, ſuited to the taſte of thoſe times. When the tables were removed, ſuddenly, from behind a curtain, appeared, hovering in the air, a hugh rock, cruſted with ſilver. In its niches ſixteen nymphs repreſenting by their different ornaments the ſeveral provinces of France, played upon various muſical inſtuments, and recited harmonious verſes and ſongs in praiſe of the new king, and the enſuing felicity to his reign; then, deſcending to the ground, they preſented Henry with their peculiar tributes, and forming themſelves into rows, exhibited whatever was curious or graceful in the French dances. The Poles, notwithſtanding their natural gravity, ſeemed highly pleaſed with theſe gay diverſions, and had reaſon to be ſatisfied in general, with the grandeur and liberality of the court of France.

The king of Poland left Paris, on his way to his new dominions, on the twenty-firſt of September; while Charles repaired to Villers-Conterez, where he firſt perceived the ſymptoms of freſh tumults in the ſtate. Two ſets of deputies from the provinces followed him thither, and preſented their ſeveral petitions. The Proteſtant commiſſioners from Languedoc were they one, and thoſe of the nobles of Dauphiné and Provence the other. The petition of the former reſpected the toleration of their religion, and the ſecurity of all who profeſſed it; and that of the latter inſiſted on the ſuppreſſion of ſome late taxes. From their conjunction at this time, in demands equally diſagreeable to the court, the prevalence of animoſity and turbulent counſels, both among the Calvaniſts and Catholics, and the confidence thoſe parties had in ſome powerful ſupport, were ſufficiently manifeſt. The import and ſtyle of the demands of the Hugonots ſhewed they were not affraid of offending the court. Though deſtitute of their former conducters, and of the authoritative names of the princes of Bourbon, by which union and good order had been preſerved in their deſigns, the had, in a great meaſure, ſupplied this defect, by the two great confederacies of Niſmes and Montauban, which divided all the power of their adherents in Languedoc into two governments; the viſcount Saint Romain being elected chief of the one, and Paulin of the other. By the communications of their counſels and reſolutions they had ſtrengthened their partiſans; ſo that all important queſtions came to be determined by them as a body. As that of conforming to the capitulation of Rochelle, and other matters conteſted between them and the Catholics, required to be diſcuſſed, the king had permitted a general meeting of their nobility and miniſters at both theſe cities. Elevated with the apparent recovery of their former vigour and importance; flattering themſelves with the reports of the interceſſion of the Poliſh ambaſſadors for them; and believing that the removal of the duke of Anjou from the kingdom would produce a change in the meaſures of the court to their advantage, they had convened at Niſmes, upon Saint Bartholomew's day, to deliberate about the general ſubmiſſion to the terms of the late edict of Rochelle. At this meeting it was not only agreed to teſtify their diſapprobation of the edict, but their remonſtrances againſt it bore all the marks of indignant and reſentful remembrance of that day of the year in which they were framed. No treaty or compoſition with the court, yet inſiſted on by the Proteſtant chiefs during the civil wars, equalled the conditions of their preſent petition. After declaring that the treacherous maſſacre at Paris had ſo far ſapped the foundation of the public faith, that they could not, without particular ſecurities, ſafely rely upon it, they demanded the general and public toleration of their religion, without diſtinction of places or perſons; the retention of the cities they held, with the addition of two more in every province, to be furniſhed with garriſons of their ſoldiers, maintained at the king's expence: the eſtabliſhment of courts, compoſed of judges of their perſuaſion; the reſervation of the tythes paid to the Catholic clergy, for the maintainance of their miniſters; the proſecution and puniſhment of the authors and contrivers of the maſſacres, with various other articles of the ſame nature and tendency; which ſo much amazed the queen-mother, that ſhe declared—"If the prince of Condé had "been alive, and maſter of half the cities in the kingdom, with an army of "twenty thouſand horſe and forty thouſand foot, he would not have preſumed "to propoſe them." This paper was ſigned and delivered to the king by Paulin, Gourdon, Verlac, and Cavagnac Yollet, who now placed themſelves at the head of the Hugonots. Theſe men, who thought themſelves entitled to act upon principles of reſentment againſt the government, which had broken the ties of honour and faith with them, had put the affairs of their party in ſuch a ſtate, in the remote and extenſive quarters they poſſeſſed, as rendered them formidable. Inſtead therefore, of a harſh or imperious reply, as might have been expected, the king thought fit, in the preſent conjuncture, to give them a mild, though eluſive one, by referring them to the mareſchal D'Amville for redreſs in ſome grievances of which they complained. The petition of the Catholic nobles of the other provinces was anſwered much in the ſame manner, by promiſes of a future diminution of the Tailles. From this period may be dated the more general diffuſion of a ſpirit of diſaffection to the government among the Proteſtants, and ſuch a diſregard of all the ties of allegiance as exceeded all former inſtances that occured during the civil wars. Not only were the maſſacres conſidered by them as an apology and a juſtifiable motive for embracing any opportunity of revolt, but the manifeſt diſaffection of a great number of the Catholic nobility proved an inſtigation to it.

A. D. 1574.] By the election of the duke of Anjou to the crown of Poland, the important poſt of lieutenant-general of the kingdom had become vacant: and his brother, the duke of Alencon, who now exchanged his title for that of Anjou, aſpired to the poſſeſſion of it. But his views being fruſtrated by the interpoſion of his mother, that prince entered into a coreſpondence with the Proteſtant chiefs, and projected his eſcape from the court. The latter were, indeed, already in arms; ſome of their old provincial leaders, as Montbrun, Montgion, Le Caſe, and others, having begun their excurſions in the remoter diſtricts, where the truces were ſeldom mantained betwen them and the Catholics. By the confederacy of Languedoc, and La Noue's declaring himſelf convinced of the neceſſity of taking arms the commotions ſoon became more general. Rochelle made ſome ſcruples, which, however were ſpeedily removed by an attempt that was made, by certain adventurers, who were believed to act under the authority of the queen-mother, to ſurprize the town. Though the king—who was now in a very bad ſtate of health—diſavowed any concern in this breach of the peace, the ſuſpicions of the Rochellers were confirmed by the declarations of the priſoners they took. It is certain that, though Catharine could not aſſume all the royal authority, ſhe ventured ſo far, on account of the king's indiſpoſition, to act on her own plan, that the Montmorencies and their party as well as the protcſtants, had every thing to fear from her abſolute ſway in the ſtate, upon the event of the king's death. It was generally credited among the latter, from private informations ſent them from the malecontents about the court, that the maſſacres would be renewed at this juncture. In this temper, and under theſe apprehenſions* the general inſurrection of the Hugonots, called the rebellion of Shrove-Tuesday, took place. Besides what they held in Languedoc, it was attended with the seizure and revolt of many towns and places in Saintonge, Dauphiné, and the Vivarez, and, by the count of Montgomery's return from England into Normandy, extended into that province, and some other districts. It was La Noue's advice to fix upon that festival for the execution of the enterprise, as the pleasures in which the Catholics then indulged themselves afforded an opportunity to attack them unawares, and the event proved the advantage of it. But that part of the design, which connected with the escape of the duke of Anjou, was defeated. Though, in consequence of a determination entered into by Thore, the viscount Turenne and others, who were in habits of intimacy with the duke, to put his resolution to the test, Guitri, an experienced captain, with two hundred of the best appointed cavalry took his station in a neighbourhood of Saint Germain-en-Laye, the mutability of the duke of Anjou was such, that La Molle, either still fearing it, or desirous to augment his credit with the court, in the view of turning it afterwards into the service of his master, thought fit to reveal the circumstance of his intended flight to the queen-mother. Her surprise was great; and to encrease the king's alarm, she effected the utmost consternation. After causing a search to be made through every corner of the castle for hidden assassins, and assuring the king that the astrologers had bid him beware of Saint Germain, she pronounced his stay there to be unsafe, and hurried the whole court to Paris, and from thence to the Bois des Vincennes. Here the king of Navarre and the duke was detained, though not as prisoners, yet under watch, and without the liberty of leaving the castle. They were also obliged to publish their disavowal and detestation of this conspiracy, that their secret friends might believe they were deserted by them. Thore and Meru (brothers to the marescha1 Montmorenci) with some others, privately withdrew; and the prince Condé, being occasionally absent at Amiens, found means of escaping with them afterwards into Germany.

The queen-mother was careful to improve this plot to her purposes. In the languishing condition of Charles's health, the quick and sensible impressions it made upon him were altogether favourable to her procedure, and she so exaggerated the informations she pretended to have received about the nature of the conspiracy, that the presidents of the parliament, Thou and Hanneguin, were commanded by the king to enquire into it, and prosecute, with the utmost deligence and severity, all that could be discovered to have any knowledge in the treasonable design. In the the mean time, the duke of Anjou, repenting of his unsteadiness and facility, which reduced him to the state of a prisoner, and the king of Navarre, justly conceiving apprehensions about Catharine's practises against him, had formed a fresh design in Easter-week of escaping in disguise. A discovery of this being also made, the queen-mother was enabled, by means of Brinon, who had become one of her spies and informers, to give a new turn to the accusations and the whole process. Being introduced as an evidence, he accuſed La Molle, and the count de Conconnas, a Piedmonteſe, who was alſo a favourite of the duke of Anjou's, and a number of other partiſans of the malecontents, ſome of whom were immediately apprehended and brought to trial. The two noblemen above mentioned, with one or two more, after undergoing a ſevere examination, were, upon doubtful evidence, condemned, and immediately beheaded.

But the queen-mother's aims reached higher than to the impeachment and death of ſome of the inferior partiſans of the duke of Anjou and the malecontents. She had an eye to the apprehenſion of thoſe whom ſhe conſidered as the moſt formidable leaders of the faction. Though Thore, Meru, and others had eſcaped, the mareſchals de Montmorenci and Coſſe remained within the graſp of her power; and, notwithſtanding there were only ſuch vague and trivial accuſations againſt them as could not found a plauſible charge, it was enough that they were ſuſpected as abettors of the conſpiracy. Charles, the more liable to miſtruſt, and to yield to her dictates, the more his ſpirits were waſted, was eaſily prevailed on to agree to the meaſures of ſecuring their perſons. To conceal the intention,* they were only ordered to attend the king, and they obeyed without taking the alarm. The quarters aſſigned them in the innermoſt part of the caſtle created ſuſpicion, and they were adviſed by their friends to provide for their ſafety by a retreat, which they could eaſily have accompliſhed: but, reſtrained by a ſenſe of honour, and confident that his enemies could make nothing of their charge againſt him, Montmorenci would not extricate himſelf from the hazard at the expence of his reputation; and De Coſſe adhered to his ſentiments. In three days they were made priſoners by D'Auchi, captain of the king's guard, and carried to Paris, and from thence to the Baſtile, in the midſt of the exultations of the Pariſians; who from enmity to the Montmorencies, and the moderate Catholics, readily agreed to furniſh an additional guard of eight hundred men, during the time of their impriſonment. Upon the ſame day guards were placed about the king of Navarre and the duke of Anjou; and queen Catharine, willing to make every thing ſecure, and to loſe no part of her triumph, had taken meaſures for depriving the mareſchal D'Amville of his government, and ſeizing his perſon; but the grounds of ſuſpicion given him, by the arrival of D'Acier, now duke of Uſez, in the province, who had lately attached himſelf to the court, and was his adverſary, and by ſome packets intercepted, had ſo forwarned him of his danger, that he immediately poſſeſſed himſelf of Montpelier, and three other towns in Languedoc, without making any declarations. Saint Sulpice and the ſecretary Villeroy being ſent by the court to him, under colour of accomodating the diſſenſions of the province, he by various pretexts avoided an interview with them, till Martinengues came with the king's orders to ſeize him, and to forbid the military officers every where to obey him. But being, by this time, adviſed by his friends at court of the fate of his brother, the mareſchal, he prepared to oppoſe the execution of theſe menaces, and to ſtand on his defence.

The meaſures neceſſary to be taken for quelling the inſurection of the Hugonots completed the abſolute ſway of the the queen-mother, by giving her the direction of three armies, which were immediately ordered to be formed in Normandy, Poitou, and Dauphine, and to be commanded by Matignon, the king's lieutenant in the firſt of theſe provinces, by the duke of Montpenſier, and his ſon in the others*. The count of Montgomery's attempts upon Normandy being chiefly dreaded, the attention of the court was directed to fruſtrate his deſign of ſeizing ſome of the maratime towns, the effecting of which would open a paſſage for Engliſh or other foreign ſuccours, and might expoſe the kingdom by the revolt of places ſo contiguous to the capital. Upon that ſide, therefore, the greateſt diligence was uſed to draw together the beſt troops. But Colombiere and Guitri having ſurpriſed Saint Lo and Domfront, the count landed at the former of theſe places, and ſoon made himſelf maſter of Caranten and Valognes. While they were occupied in ſtrengthening the fortifications of theſe places, Matignon, having with the utmoſt expedition aſſembled his forces, advanced into Lower Normandy; and after making a feint of turning towards Valognes, ſuddenly puſhed the van of his army to that ſide of Saint Lo which communicated by the river with the ſea, and ſoon ſhut up all paſſage from the town, either by water or land. Montgomery, unprovided with forage for his cavalry, and ſenſible that his defence of a weak town might fruſtrate all his other projects, reſolved to force one of the enemy's poſts, and to retire to ſome place where he might act with greater effect. Having encouraged Colombiere to make the beſt reſiſtance he could, he ſallied out with a hundred and fifty horſemen in the night, broke through ſeveral guards and entrenchments of the royaliſts, and, with ſcarcely the loſs of a man, reached Carentan, whence he paſſed to Domfront, to meet ſome Proteſtant gentry lately arrived there from the interior parts of the province. His departure cauſed a council of war to be holden by the Catholic commanders, in which it was deliberated whether they ought to continue the ſiege or follow him; and Matignon, whoſe inſtructions directed him to conſider the capture of Montgomery as a main object of his enterprize, procured a determination that, without raiſing the ſiege of Saint Lo, ſuch a large detachment ſhould be made from the army, as would be ſufficient to inveſt Domfront, or any of the other towns to which he might retire. This unexpected meaſure proved ſucceſsful. By the expeditious march of ſix hundred cavalry and two regiments of foot, conducted by Saint Colombe, and followed by another body of troops under Matignon himſelf, the count, having no intelligence of their approach, was ſurpriſed in Domfront, where he had ſcarce two hundred ſoldiers to form a garriſon, and among them ſeveral of the gentry, unwilling to ſhare his hazardous fate, began to parley with the Catholics, and deſert to them. In this extremity, Montgomery performed all that could be expected from his experience and valour, and, after defending the town for ſome days, made his retreat into the caſtle. Here he ſuſtained an aſſault, and repulſed the enemy with conſiderable ſlaughter, and the loſs of Saint Colombe, and ſome other officers of note.

An anecdote recorded of one of them marks the ſpirit and gallantry which prevailed among the warriors of thoſe times. Having received a ſhot in his head, which deprived him of ſpeech, he went into the neareſt tent, and made a ſign to have a pen and paper brought him, and ſitting down to write a letter to his miſtreſs with his blood, he died the moment he had finiſhed it. By this time almoſt every one of Montgomery's companions, as well as himſelf, had received wounds, and their number was daily diminiſhed by deſertion: unable, therefore, to hold out any longer, he, at length, ſurrendered to the enemy. D'Aubigné affirms, that the count had only ambiguous promiſes of life and a ſafe diſmiſſion given him, while other hiſtorians aſſert that the promiſe was abſolute. To truſt the ſmalleſt ambiguity was, in his circumſtances, improper, and unworthy of his fortitude; he had reaſon to be convinced of what he ought to have done when the Catholic forces returned to the ſiege of Saint Lo. Being prevailed on by Matignon to ſolicit Colombiere to avoid the grand aſſault, and accept of honourable conditions, this reſolute chieftain, diſdaining to be reduced to the ſame ſituation in which he ſaw the count, reproached him with not dying like a ſoldier in the breach, rather than be expoſed to ſuffer like a criminal. "It becomes you, indeed,"—ſaid he, in an ironical tone—"to propoſe your behaviour as a pattern to me, when mine "will now be of no ſervice to you. But I ſhall take care to teach my companions "how they ought to die." He, accordingly, took his ſtation in the middle of the breach—now ſeventy paces in length—with his two ſons on each ſide of him; one of them being twelve, and the other ten years old. The character of the man, as well as of the brave commander, was diſcovered in this action. "In yielding "my life to God,"—ſaid he to thoſe around him—"I at the ſame time offer to "him what I hold deareſt in the world. It is better for them to die undiſhonoured "and uncorrupted with their father, than to fall into the hands of the reprobate "tribe, who may pervert them." A ball having pierced his head, he ſoon fell, and the breach was ſpeedily abandoned by his followers. Compaſſion, however, moved the Catholic ſoldiers to ſave the lives of his forlorn offſpring. His death was lamented by his party as a general misfortune; and the reduction of Saint Lo being ſoon followed by that of Carantan and the other forts, the war was terminated in Normandy, and the count of Montgomery carried in triumph to Paris; where he was ſoon after beheaded.

It appears that the queen-mother, at this juncture, had made the ſeizure of the princes and chief lords, whoſe oppoſition ſhe feared, her principal object; and it is alſo ſaid by D'Aubigné—though the frequency of ſuch accuſations requires that they ſhould be received with great caution—that ſhe tried to end her military operations by a recourſe to the baſe methods of aſſaſſination: for which purpoſe it was believed, that Maurevel, and one Saint Martin, were ſent into Poitou, to make an attempt on the life of La Noue, which failed. In this province the duke of Montpenſier having collected a number of Catholic chieftains, with their followers, detached Puy-Gaillard to inveſt Taillemont, while he advanced to form the ſiege of Fontenai. The firſt of theſe places being taken, the duke had the advantage of beſieging the latter with his whole force. But the brave Saint Etienne commanded in it, who, by the bold ſally he made into the Catholic camp, and the repulſe he gave to the firſt aſſault of the beſiegers, cooled their hopes of ſpeedy ſucceſs. At the ſame time La Noue, who had forces ſufficient to make a diverſion in favour of the beſieged, though not to engage the Catholic army, appeared in the neighbourhood. From the alarm taken, it was propoſed to draw off ſome cannon from the batteries againſt the town, to ſecure the camp from an attack; when Montpenſier received letters from the queen-mother, requiring his immediate attendance upon the king, whoſe life was thought every day to be in imminent danger. The ſiege, therefore, was raiſed.

In the mean time, the war was continued with little intermiſſion in Languedoc, where the ſtrength of the Proteſtants was moſt entire; and in Dauphiné, where they had poſſeſſed themſelves of many places of importance. The flight of the prince of Condé to Straſburgh, where he publicly renounced his late forced abjuration of the Proteſtant religion, contributed to maintain the civil commotions, and animate the Hugonots to truſt their fortune to the deciſion of war, rather than to the experienced treachery of the court. He gave them aſſurances that, after his father's example, he would devote himſelf to the ſupport of their cauſe, for which purpoſe he was then endeavouring to procure auxiliary troops from Germany, in hopes that the levy-money promiſed by them would be remitted. Thoré's letters to the mareſchal D'Amville were no leſs calculated to excite him to an open rupture with the court, and to revenge the treatment of their brother as a violent ſtretch of arbitrary power that denounced the intended ruin of their whole family. Though the mareſchal, naturally ſlow, and averſe from appearing in oppoſition to the authority of the government, ſtill employed the language of peace and ſubmiſſion, it was evident from the general aſpect of affairs, that, notwithſtanding all the queen-mother had done for deſtroying the party of the malecontents, and repreſſing the inſurrection of the Proteſtants, the flame of war and diſcord was too far kindled in the kingdom, to be extinguiſhed by the utmoſt exertion of her power and policy.

The moſt unequivocal ſymptoms of the king's approaching diſſolution had, by this time, appeared, and it is evident he was aware of it himſelf, by allowing letters patent to be tranſmitted to the governors of the provinces, requiring them to obey the orders of his mother, as being veſted with his authority, during his preſent indiſpoſition. With this conceſſion, though for ſome time expected by Catharine, he had hitherto declined to gratify her; and by yielding it only in the extremity of his diſorder, he ſhewed a jealouſy and diſtruſt of her uſurpation over him, which ſhe had too long exerciſed. His nomination of her, by a formal deed, to the regency of the kingdom, in the event of his death, and during the abſence of his brother, the king of Poland, was ſtill deferred, till the thirtieth of May, when he was ſeized with the moſt violent pains. The conflict between his youthful ſtrength and the fatal power of his diſeaſe, threw him into the moſt violent convulſions, during which the blood iſſued through the pores of his ſkin, in almoſt every part of his body. He expired in the evening of the day in which the letters of regency were framed, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign.

Impetuous, violent, choleric, vindictive and cruel, Charles diſgraced by his actions the throne of his anceſtors; yet, when the frailty of human nature is conſidered, ſome extenuation muſt be allowed even for the vices of youth. No parent's foſtering hand had ſown the ſeeds of virtue in his infant mind; all thoſe generous feelings which are the ſources of true benevolence, and give dignity to man, were carefully ſuppreſſed by an unnatural mother, whoſe chief object was to render her ſon a prodigy of diſſimulation. In the execution of this deteſtable plan, ſhe, too fatally, ſucceeded; and ſhe lived to behold the dreadful effects of her own wickedneſs.

The negative virtues of ſobriety and temperance Charles certainly poſſeſſed: his apprehenſion was quick: his diſcernment acute: his elocution nervous and maſculine: and in all the martial exerciſes of the age, he is ſaid to have been eminently ſkilled. He had a taſte for the fine arts, which appeared incompatible with the moroſeneſs and cruelty of his temper: he not only rewarded the genius of the poet Ronſard, but wrote verſes in his praiſe, not inferior to thoſe of the maſter he admired. He alſo compiled a book on his favourite amuſement of the chace.

Charles cauſed a ſmith's forge to be erected in his palace, where he amuſed himſelf with the fabrication of gun-barrels, horſe-chains, and other pieces of ſmith's work. He piqued himſelf on his talent of imitating, with the greateſt nicety, the various coins in circulation, ſuch as the crown, the double ducat, and the teſtoon. When he ſhewed one of them to the cardinal of Lorraine for his approbation; "Ah, Sir,"—ſaid the prelate—"you can do whatever you pleaſe, for you always "carry your pardon in your own pocket."

For ſome time before his death he is ſaid to have expreſſed the deepeſt remorſe for the maſſacre of Saint Bartholomew, and for the other acts of violence to which he had been inſtigated by his mother. On his death-bed he diſplayed the ſentiments of a king, anxious for the welfare of his people. He ſpoke feelingly of the ſituation of princes during their minority; and ſaid, "that he was better-pleaſed to die "without an heir, than to leave the kingdom to an infant, at a time when France "ſtood in need of a man to redreſs her numerous calamities." By his queen, Elizabeth of Auſtria, he left a daughter, who ſurvived him but a ſhort time. By his miſtreſs, Mary Toucher, daughter to a lieutenant of the police at Orleans, he had one ſon, who firſt enjoyed the title of grand prior, and afterwards that of count d'Auvergne. Charles was entombed with little ceremony; and before the funeral convoy reached Saint Denis, it was deſerted by all the followers, except Brantome, and four other gentlemen of the bed-chamber, and the guard of archers.

In the laſt year of the reign of Charles the Ninth, the revenues produced only eight millions, ſix hundred thouſand livres; the mark of ſilver being ſeventeen livres, and that of gold two hundred.

HENRY THE THIRD.

A. D. 1574.] CHARLES, by his widow Elizabeth, left only one daughter, who ſurvived him about four years, and Elizabeth herſelf retired into the dominions of her father the emperor Maximilian; while Catharine aſſuming the power which the deceaſed monarch's laſt words had conferred on her, diſplayed thoſe abilities which aroſe in proportion to the emergency of her ſituation. She cloſely guarded the king of Navarre, and the duke of Alençon, with the mareſchals de Montmorenci and de Coſſe; ſhe negociated a truce with the Hugonots, raiſed new levies among the Swiſs and Germans, diſpatched repeated meſſengers to haſten the journey of the king of Poland, and, impatient of delay, ſet out for the city of Lyons to meet him.

On receiving the welcome news of his brother's deceaſe, Henry ſecretly quitted Poland, and haſtily fled from the throne to which he had been ſo lately elected; before the tidings were publicly known, or his deſigns could be impeded, he had reached the frontiers of Germany, and was entertained at Vienna by Maximilian with magnificence; thence he directed his courſe through the territories of the Venetians, reſted a few days in Turin; and a little more than three months from the death of Charles, embraced his mother at Lyons, and received from her hands the reigns of government.

In his early youth Henry had diſplayed the promiſe of uncommon abilities; his manners were inſinuating, his perſon graceful, his countenance beautiful; and his people regarded with the moſt partial expectations the hero of Jarnac and Montcontour; but the meridian of his fame was ill calculated to correſpoud with the luſtre of his dawning glory, and his ſubjects ſoon diſcerned a monarch, irreſolute, inconſtant, indolent, and voluptuous; mingling devotion with ſenſuality, and alternately governed by the licentious minions of his court, or by bigoted prieſts who aſſumed the direction of his conſcience.

Though he releaſed from confinement the king of Navarre, and his brother the duke of Alençon, he ſtill continued to obſerve their ſteps with the moſt vigilant jealouſy: but the cares of government were only conſidered ſecondary to thoſe of love; his paſſion for the princeſs of Condé blazed forth with increaſe of violence. Reaſon, decency, and honour, in vain oppoſed its progreſs, and Henry was already determined to diſſolve the marriage of Mary with the prince of Condé, and to raiſe her to his bed and throne, when his deſigns were broken by the unexpected ſtroke of death; that princeſs, in the pride of beauty and youth, ſuddenly expired; while the royal lover, devoting himſelf to all the luxury of ſorrow, atteſted the ardour of his affection, by remaining ſeveral days inſenſible to the language of conſolation, and obſtinately rejecting whatever food was offered him.

From this trance he was awakened by the repreſentations of his miniſters, and the firſt act of ſovereignty was to reſtore to the duke of Savoy ſeveral places which the French ſtill retained in Piedmont. But the impolicy of this meaſure was forgotten in the ſuperior imprudence of his reſolution to proſecute the war againſt the Hugonots. The cardinal of Lorrain, whoſe fatal counſels influenced the irreſelute mind of Henry, ſurvived not to behold the ſcenes of ſlaughter which he had planned; and the mareſchal D'Amville, informed of the royal determination, boldly erected the ſtandard of oppoſition, and ſupported in Languedoc the principles of Calvaniſm. The prince of Condé previous to the death of Charles the Ninth, had eſcaped to Straſburg, and abjured the Catholic religion; he now returned to join the forces of the confederates; while the duke of Alençon, inflamed by wild ambition, deſerted the court and armed againſt his brother.

A. D. 1575.] Amidſt the ſtorms which threatened his throne on every ſide, the king was crowned at Rheims by the cardinal of Guiſe, and the next day beſtowed his hand on Louiſa, daughter to the count of Vaudemont, of the houſe of Lorrain. The war with the Proteſtants was maintained with various ſucceſs. The duke of Guiſe acquired freſh laurels by the defeat of a conſiderable body of German auxiliaries; but Leſdiguieres eſtabliſhed himſelf in Dauphinè, and the queen mother, alarmed at his progreſs, releaſed the mareſchals de Coſſe and Montmorenci, and prevailed on the latter to negociate a truce. It was concluded for ſix months only, and the towns of Niort, Saumur, la Charité, Meſieres, St. Jean d'Angeli, and Coignac, were ſurrendered to the reformed, as pledges for their ſecurity; while Henry endured a freſh mortification from abroad, by the determination of the Poliſh diet to chuſe a new ſovereign, and to place the crown on the head of the prince of Tranſylvania.

A. D. 1576.] In the late commotions, the king of Navarre had affected to remain an unconcerned ſpectator; he now ſeized the favourable moment of flight, eſcaped to his government of Guienne, and openly profeſſed again the tenets of Calviniſm; the duke of Alençon again reſumed his intrigues; the prince of Condé appeared at the head of a numerous body of Germans; and the boundleſs ambition of the duke of Guiſe, who commanded the Catholic army, was equally formidable to Henry with the daring deſigns of the confederates. Thus alike fearful of victory, or defeat, he ſubſcribed a peace, by which the reformed were allowed the free exerciſe of their religion, with the reſtriction of not preaching within two miles of Paris, or any place where the court reſided; chambers of juſtice were erected in every parliament, conſiſting of equal numbers of Catholics and Proteſtants, the memory of Coligni and his aſſociates were honourably reſtored, and the ſafety of the Hugonots was confirmed by the ceſſion of eight fortified towns.

To gratify his brother, the king had ceded to him the countries of Anjou, Touraine, and Berri, with the title of duke of the former: the prince of Condé was to have the government of Picardy; Leſdiguires, and d'Amville in Dauphiné and Languedoc aſſumed an haughty independency; the Germans, raiſed by prince Caſimir, were permitted to live at free quarters in the biſhopric of Langres; and Henry beheld, with indignation, great part of his dominions parcelled out amongſt his Proteſtant ſubjects, and their formidable allies; but a more fatal blow to his authority originated in the jealouſy of the Catholics, who, irritated by the late favourable conditions granted to the Calviniſts, formed themſelves into a league, and choſe as their protectors the pope and the king of Spain. Henry, though ſenſible of the melancholy degradation, by the advice of his miniſters, declared himſelf the head of this aſſociation, and by the importunities of the leaguers was ſoon compelled to reſcind the late edict of pacification.

A. D. 1577, 1579.] While the king was immerſed in ſenſual enjoyments, his ſubjects experienced all the miſeries which attend a weak and divided adminiſtration. The religious enmity of the Catholics and Hugonots was repeatedly ſuſpended by treaties, which as they were made without faith, were broken without heſitation. But amidſt the ſcenes of dark intrigue and open violence, which for three ſucceſſive years diſhonoured and afflicted the kingdom, the virtues of the young king of Navarre attained to maturity, and burſt forth with an increaſe of luſtre which eclipſed his rivals, dazzled the eyes of the beholders, and confirmed the hopes of the Calviniſts, whoſe religious tenets he profeſſed. In the treaty of Nerac, he had baffled the artifices of the vily Catherine; and on the ſubſequent violation of that treaty, he ſurpriſed the town of Cahors; forced open the gates; and though the governor, with undaunted courage, maintained, during five days, an obſtinate and unprecedented conflict in the ſtreets, the valour of the king of Navarre triumphed over every difficulty, and planted at laſt the banners of his party on the ramparts of that city.

It was not alone in France that religious rancour had kindled the flames of civil war. The gloomy light was beheld with horror through the Netherlands; and the unrelenting Philip, ſeconded by the zeal of the duke of Alva, had involved numbers of his Flemiſh ſubjects in exile, torture, and death. The illuſtrious birth and memorable ſervices of the counts Egmont and Horn, could not preſerve them from an ignominious fate; and the prince of Orange only eſcaped the perfidy of his ſovereign, and the ſtroke of the executioner, by an haſty retreat into Germany. He ſoon returned to arouſe his countrymen to the defence of their civil and religious freedom; and the Flemings, oppreſſed by the ſuperior forces of Spain, ſought new reſources in foreign alliances, and addreſſed themſelves to the duke of Anjou. The ſovereignty of the Low Countries was too ſplendid an allurement to be reſiſted by a prince vain, raſh, and ambitious; his ardour, at the ſame time, was inflamed by the hopes of obtaining the hand of Elizabeth; and the queen of England, deſirous of reſiſting the tyranny of Philip, yet cautious of committing herſelf to open hoſtilities, embraced the opportunity, by the moſt flattering declarations, of exciting the duke of Anjou to the defence of the Flemings.

A. D. 1580.] But before the duke could embark in this enterpriſe, it was firſt neceſſary that he ſhould at leaſt ſuſpend, if not extinguiſh, the flames of civil diſcord which raged through the kingdom of France. His proffered mediation was readily accepted by Henry, who by alternately profeſſing to patroniſe each, had loſt the confidence of both factions, and beheld his Catholic ſubjects range themſelves under the banners of the duke of Guiſe, while the Proteſtants avowed their open attachment to the king of Navarre. Both had exhauſted their ſtrength in various efforts, without either acquiring an aſcendancy; and a treaty was quickly concluded, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the prince of Condé, which confirmed the former edict of pacification, and left the Poteſtants in poſſeſſion of the cautionary towns for ſix years.

A. D. 1581.] The duke of Anjou had ſcarcely unfurled his ſtandard, before it was joined by the flower of French chivalry; and at the head of twelve thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, he marched to the relief of Cambray, which was inveſted by the army of Philip, commanded by the prince of Parma; that prudent general retired at the approach of this new antagoniſt, who entered Cambray in triumph, was ſaluted by the inhabitants as the protector of their freedom; and after reducing Cateau Cambreſis, embarked for England, to ſolicit the hand and ſupport of Elizabeth.

A. D. 1582, 1583.] From that queen he received the moſt gracious reception; and though her prudence afterwards retracted the promiſes which ſhe had been betrayed into by his flattery and importunity, ſhe furniſhed him with a conſiderable ſum of money, and a numerous fleet, to ſecond his enterpriſes in the Low Countries. He was reinforced from France by the duke de Montpenſier, and the mareſchal Biron, with a body of ſeven or eight thouſand men; but his own caprice and perfidy disappointed the ambitious hopes which he had entertained; and he resolved, by making himself master of those towns into which his troops had been admitted, to oppress that liberty which he was summoned to protect. His designs could not escape the penetrating eye of the prince of Orange; his treacherous attempt on Antwerp was repulsed by the valour of the inhabitants; the gates of the other cities were shut against him; his troops were assailed by famine and disease; and though the prudence of the prince of Orange affected an apparent reconciliation, the duke of Anjou, with a broken constitution, retired to France, deserted by his friends, and derided by his enemies.

A. D. 1584.] Though Henry ever afterwards regarded with contempt the abilities and designs of his brother, his own conduct was equally destitute of decency, policy, or judgment. He bestowed on his favourite, the duke of Joyeuse, the supreme direction of affairs, and raised him to an alliance with the throne, by uniting him in marriage to the sister of his queen. Balls, banquets, and religious processions, consumed those treasures which might have been successfully employed in repressing the rising influence of the king of Navarre and the duke of Guise; the latter by his intrigues had drawn from his retirement the duke of Anjou, who, transported with the hopes of retrieving his lost reputation, entered into the views, and engaged to second the plans of the house of Lorraine; but ever fickle and capricious, he soon repented of this new enterprise; he flew to court, prostrated himself at the feet of the king, and revealed the conspiracy in which he had embarked. Henry received him with tenderness, and dismissed him to Chateau Thierri, where a rapid decline soon terminated a life, stained by levity, perfidy, and profligacy.

The death of the duke of Anjou disconcerted, but did not extinguish, the daring projects of the house of Lorraine. The three brothers, the duke and cardinal of Guise, with the duke of Mayenne, openly placed themselves at the head of the league, and inflaming the people with the dread of an heretic sovereign, avowed their resolution to transfer the pretensions of the king of Navarre to his uncle, the cardinal of Bourbon, a zealous papist, but who, incapable from age and weakness of holding the reins of government himself, was to deliver them into the hands of the duke of Guise. Henry was soon apprised of the intentions of the confederates, by the duke d'Epernon, who shared his favour with Joyeuse, he pressed the kiug of Navarre to reconcile himself to the established church, and as next prince of the blood, to remove the only objection that could be urged against his succession; but the king of Navarre was deaf to the arguments of d'Epernon; and though his friend Plessis Mornay, by publishing his sentiments, confirmed the Hugonots in their opinion of his constancy, he unfortunately afforded a plausible pretence to the league, who openly reviled their sovereign as treating with heretics, and entered into a close alliance with Spain; by a treaty, signed at Joinville, they agreed, in return for certain pecuniary supplies, on the death of Henry the Third, to acknowledge the cardinal of Bourbon as king, to enforce the council of Trent through France, and to reduce Cambray to the yoke of Philip.

The court of Rome entered into the views of the confederates, and ſanctioned by her holy authority the ambition of the Guiſes. The impatience of their new ally the king of Spain, compelled them to take the field before they had aſſembled their adherents; with a feeble army, ſcarce exceeding five thouſand men, the duke of Guiſe occupied Verdun, but was repulſed from Metz by the vigilance of the duke d'Epernon. The loyalty of the mareſchal Matignon preſerved Bourdeaux; and though Marſeilles was ſurpriſed by the league, it was next day recovered by the arms of the royaliſts. Had Henry at this moment reſumed that ſpirit which he formerly diſplayed in the fields of Jarnac and Moncontour, he might have eſtabliſhed his tottering throne, and chaſed the duke of Guiſe from his dominions: but alternately the ſlave of pleaſure and ſuperſtition, he was no longer capable of any great or arduous enterpriſe; he concluded a peace on the moſt diſhonourable terms, with thoſe very rebels whoſe preſumption he might have chaſtiſed; and agreed, at the imperious voice of the duke of Guiſe, to compel the Proteſtants to reſtore the cautionary towns that they had received, to annul all edicts in their favour, and to devote his troops and treaſures to the ſervice of the league.

A. D. 1585.] With terror and aſtoniſhment the king of Navarre heard the fatal conditions, which menaced his own ſucceſſion, and placed an empty ſceptre in the hand of Henry. That monarch ſoon experienced that the moſt fatal event of war ought to have been preferred to an ignominious peace. His capital could no longer be conſidered as his own. A council of ſixteen citizens of Paris, nominated by the influence of the duke of Guiſe, inſulted their ſovereign, and filled the ſtreets with confuſion. A gleam of hope broke in from the court of Rome; Sixtus the Fifth, who had ſucceeded to the apoſtolical throne, launched the ſpiritual thunders on the heads of thoſe who had preſumed to arm againſt the crown. But governed only by a temper turbulent and aſſuming, he increaſed the public anarchy by excommunicating ſoon after the king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, and all their adherents. The Proteſtants weakened and oppreſſed ſought ſhelter in Guienne and Dauphinĕ; and the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, embraced as their only means of ſafety the calamities of war. The latter, after having in vain attempted to relieve Angiers, was forced to diſperſe his troops, and with difficulty eſcaped to England.

A. D. 1586.] Five armies levied in the name of the king threatened with their numbers to overwhelm the ſmall band of Proteſtants. The moſt numerous was entruſted to the command of the duke of Mayenne, who entered Guienne, and harraſſed his forces in the fruitleſs purſuit of the king of Navarre; three more, led by d'Epernon, Joyeuſe, and Matignon, were equally unſucceſsful. But the duke of Guiſe extended his fame and conqueſts in Champagne and Burgundy, and confirmed by his exploits the confidence of the league. Yet the people loudly murmured at the new taxes which were impoſed for the continuance of the war. The return of the prince of Condé with troops and money from England, and his ſubſequent ſucceſs in Saintonge, allowed them not to expect a ſpeedy concluſion of it; the mareſchal Biron, indeed, recovered ſeveral places from the reformed, but he maintained at the ſame time an auſtere reſerve towards the leaguers; while d'Amville, who, by the death of his brother, was become mareſchal Montmorenci, aſſumed in Languedoc the tone of independence, declared himſelf the head of a third party attached to the ancient conſtitution in church and ſtate, and while he ſtiled the Proteſtants heretics, he treated the leaguers as rebels.

A. D. 1587.] Each day diminiſhed the remnant of authority which the king continued to poſſeſs, and encreaſed the difficulties of his ſituation; on one ſide the Germans and Swiſs prepared to pour their fources into France and join the troops of the king of Navarre; on the other Henry equally dreaded the leaders of the league, and conſidered the duke of Guiſe his moſt formidable enemy. His favourite Joyeuſe, accompanied by the flower of the French nobility, was defeated and ſlain at Coutras. In that action, which firſt crowned the Hugonots with deciſive victory, the king of Navarre diſplayed all the qualities which diſtinguiſh the ſoldier and the general; but his inability to ſupport his troops prevented him from improving his advantage; he was compelled to diſband his forces; and with the impatience of a lover, he haſtened to lay his laurels at the feet of his miſtreſs.

The prince of Condé ſoon after expired at St. Jean d'Angeli of poiſon: a crime which was imputed to his conſort, but whoſe innocence was vindicated by a public trial.

The Germans and Swiſs, hopeleſs of joining their allies, fixed and received the price of their retreat; and the inhabitants of Paris, delivered from the dread of foreign invaſion, determined to reduce Henry to the moſt mortifying inſignificance, and to veſt the ſole adminiſtration in the hands of the duke of Guiſe. In purſuance of this deſign, they preſented a memorial, in which they required the king to declare openly for the league, to revive the council of Trent, to eſtabliſh the inquiſition, and to extirpate hereſy. Though Henry could not entirely repreſs his indignation, he yet promiſed to conſider their requeſts. But alarmed at their inſolence, he obſerved with a vigilant eye their conduct, and meditated vindicating his dignity by ſurpriſing the whole council at once; from this deſign he was diſſuaded by Catharine; and his imprudence in ſeverely reproaching and boldly menacing a faction which he ſuffered to eſcape with impunity, ſerved only to inflame the enmity of the leaguers, who now ſummoned the duke of Guiſe to their ſupport.

A. D. 1588.] Contrary to the expreſs command of his ſovereign, the duke of Guiſe entered Paris amidſt the acclamations of the citizens, and demanded an audience of the king. Incapable of refuſing, yet deeply wounded by repeated inſults, Henry recalled his former reſolution, and declared that the moment of interview ſhould be the laſt of his preſumptuous ſubject. The tears and remonſtrances of Catharine again interpoſed. The indignant features of the monarch proclaimed the conflict within; he ſternly accuſed the duke of ſedition, treaſon, and the moſt daring deſigns againſt his life and throne. The duke of Guiſe, ſenſible of his danger, endeavoured to diſarm his rage by ſubmiſſion; he was ſuffered to retire in ſecurity; but convinced of the hazard he had incurred, and hopeleſs of any ſincere reconciliation, he immediately determined on the moſt deciſive meaſures.

The angry countenances of the Pariſians betrayed the ſecret emotions of their minds, and foretold the aproaching tempeſt. Six thouſand of the troops, whoſe fidelity Henry could depend upon, had received orders to enter the capital. Their ready appearance was the ſignal of general inſurrection; the citizens by myriads quitted the inſtruments of their peaceful occupations to aſſume the weapons of war. The guards were aſtoniſhed, overwhelmed, and diſarmed; but amidſt the tumult, while Catherine engaged the duke in an artful negociation, Henry quitted his palace, eſcaped through the garden of the Thuilleries, and ſurveying his capital with the eye of offended majeſty, declared he would never enter it again but through a breach in the walls.

From Paris Henry retired to Chartres, and publicly appealed to his ſubjects from the inſolence of the duke of Guiſe, and the tyranny of the leaguers. He was anſwered by manifeſtos which breathed the ſpirit of ſedition inflamed by religious rancour. Yet while the mutual accuſations of both parties ſeemed to allow no other deciſion but that of arms, the mediation of Catherine was again accepted, and Henry was once more in appearance reconciled to a ſubject whom he hated and feared. The firmneſs of the parliament, and the levity of the Pariſians, had influenced the duke of Guiſe to liſten to terms of accomodation; while Henry was impreſſed with dread by the formidable preparations of the king of Spain. By the articles of the new treaty, the duke of Guiſe was conſtituted lieutenant of the French armies; the cardinal of Bourbon was declared firſt prince of the blood; and the ſevereſt penalties were denounced againſt the ſubjects of France who had preſumed to deviate from the ancient and eſtabliſhed church. On the concluſion of the treaty, the duke of Guiſe waited on the king at Chartres, and was received with marks of reſpect and confidence that ſeemed to proclaim the moſt ſincere reconciliation.

Yet amidſt theſe public teſtimonies of regard, Henry continued to nouriſh a latent thirſt of vengeance, and was determined to inflict on the duke the juſt but tardy puniſhment of his preſumption. Exaſperated at the ignominious conceſſions into which the counſels of his mother had betrayed him, he for ever excluded her from his confidence. He aſſembled the ſtates at Blois; and though he beheld himſelf ſurrounded by the partiſans of the league, he addreſſed them in a bold and animated ſpeech, diſplayed the diſtreſs to which he was reduced, and glanced at the ſeditious practices of the houſe of Lorraine. Language ſo unexpected ſtruck the duke of Guiſe with aſtoniſhment; he remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt the inſinuations it conveyed, and Henry was compelled, before it was circulated abroad, to ſoften the moſt obnoxious paſſages.

To this mortification ſucceeded intelligence the moſt alarming: he was informed that his aſpiring ſubject held a ſecret and treaſonable correſpondence with the duke of Savoy; he perceived that the ſtates were determined to declare the king of Navarre by name incapable of the ſucceſſion; and that his own repoſe, and the tranquillity of the kingdom, could only be eſtabliſhed by the death of the duke of Guiſe. He ſummoned in this exigency the few friends in whoſe fidelity and ſecrecy he could truſt; the number and quality of them convey to us ſome idea of his forlorn ſituation; and the cabinet council of the ſovereign of France was compoſed of the mareſchal d'Aumont, Nicholas and Lewis d'Angennes, and Beauvais Nangis. The firſt adviſed the king to arreſt the princes of Lorraine; but Henry was ſenſible that ſuch an attempt would only ſerve to inflame ſubjects too powerful for reſtraint; and the reſt concurred in encouraging him to extinguiſh the ambition of the duke of Guiſe with his life.

In the execution of this deſign, Henry diſplayed the ſame calm diſſimulation as had characteriſed his brother Charles; Grillon, who commanded the royal guards, and who was celebrated for his perſonal courage, was firſt applied to to ſtrike the fatal blow; but with a dignity of mind equal to his valour, he replied that his rank and ſervices allowed him not to play the executioner. "I will chal-"lenge the duke," continued he, "and if permitted, endeavour to kill him "fairly with my ſword." The king received his refuſal with a good grace; and only recommended to him ſecrecy. He now fixed on Loignac, the firſt gentleman of his bed-chamber, who readily accepted the commiſſion, and was joined by a ſelect number of Gaſcons whom the duke d'Epernon had introduced for the immedite protection of the king's perſon.

Yet the adherents of the duke of Guiſe, ever anxious and vigilant were ſoon appriſed that ſome dark deſign was meditated, and their leader was repeatedly admoniſhed that he ſtood on the edge of a precipice. But relying on that fortune which hitherto had invariably attended him, and impreſſed with a ſtrong but miſtaken idea of Henry's timidity, he determined to attend the council he was ſummoned to. As he entered the cabinet of the king, through a long and gloomy paſſage, he was aſſailed by the daggers of Loignac and his aſſociates. Six poniards at once were plunged in his boſom; and exclaiming with a deep groan, "My God, have mercy on me!" he fell breathleſs on the floor.

Thus periſhed Henry duke of Guiſe the victim of his own inordinate ambition. Though his talents appear not to have equalled thoſe of his father, his courage, magnanimity, and inſinuating addreſs endeared him to the citizens of Paris, over whom his influence was uncontrouled. His brother the cardinal of Guiſe, more violent, but leſs enterpriſing, was involved in his deſtruction; and Henry the moment he was informed of the fate of the former, paſſed into the apartment of the queen mother, and acquainting her with the event, added, "I am now a "king, madam, and have no competitor, for the duke of Guiſe is no more." Catherine, without blaming or commending the action, only coldly aſked, if he had conſidered the conſequences.

A. D. 1589.] That princeſs had been for ſome time confined to her bed by a ſevere indiſpoſition; accuſtomed to the ſupreme direction of affairs, her haughty temper could ill brook the reſerve that for ſome time the king had maintained towards her: the pangs of diſeaſe were rendered more intolerable by the agitation of her mind: As her end approached, her eyes were opened to a juſt ſenſe of the inſidious policy which ſhe had ſo long and ſo fatally purſued; in her laſt moments ſhe exhorted Henry to reconcile himſelf to the princes of his blood, particularly the king of Navarre, whoſe ſincerity ſhe declared ſhe had conſtantly experienced; and to reſtore the tranquillity of France, by allowing the free exerciſe of the Proteſtant religion. In her ſeventieth year ſhe ſunk into the grave, and eſcaped by a timely death beholding the deſtruction of her laſt and favourite ſon.

The king was ſoon convinced how neceſſary it was for him to adopt the dying councils of Catherine. On the fate of the Guiſes, the crowd that had attended him to Blois haſtily diſperſed; the multitude abhorred him, the majority of his nobles were combined againſt him, his favourites on whom he had profuſedly laviſhed his treaſures deſerted him, and the clergy whom he had blindly reverenced publicly reviled him. All zealous Catholics were armed againſt him; the citizens of his capital rejected his authority, and choſe the duke of Aumale as their governor; the doctors of the Sarbonne openly abſolved his ſubjects from their allegiance; and the council of union, compoſed of forty members, aſſuming a ſovereign power, conſtituted the duke of Mayenne, brother to the late duke of Guiſe, lieutenant-general of the ſtate royal and crown of France: a dignity pompous, abſurd, and before unknown; their zeal would even have extended to him the title of king, had not this caution induced him to decline the dangerous pre-eminence. Rouen, and the greateſt part of Normandy declared for the league; Lyons, Thouloufe, Marſeilles, Arles, and Toulon, with the provinces of Brittany and Auvergne embraced the ſame party; the Spaniſh ambaſſador repaired to Paris, and nouriſhed by his gold the factious councils of the capital; while pope Sixtus the Fifth fulminated his thunders againſt the aſſaſſins of the duke of Guiſe, and involved the king in the ſentance of excommunication.

While Henry forlorn and deſponding contemplated the gloomy and diſtracted proſpect before him, a ray of hope broke in from the honourable and diſintereſted attachment of the princes of the blood; theſe haſtened to devote to his ſervice their lives and fortunes; and their example was followed by the dukes d'Epernon and Nevers, and the mareſchal Montmorenci; a reconciliation was effected between the kings of France and Navarre; and the former inveſted in Tours by the duke of Mayenne, after defending the ſuburbs with the ſame gallantry as he had diſplayed in early life, was relieved by the latter, who preſſed forwards with his troops to his aſſiſtance, and diſdained when he joined the royal ſtandard to extort from the neceſſities of the king any conditions for his own advantage. Large levies were diligently raiſed in Switzerland and Germany; yet the mind of Henry, amidſt the hope of returning fortune, ſeemed continually oppreſſed by the ſpiritual cenſures of the court of Rome; and it required the utmoſt addreſs of the king of Navarre to animate his drooping ſpirits: "Let us, ſire," ſaid that prince with his uſual vivacity, "march to Paris, and if we are victorious, we ſhall be "eaſily abſolved." The council was approved—their ſuperior forces, joined by the Swiſs and Germans, ſwept the revolted towns in their progreſs; and ſwelled by ſucceſs to near forty thouſand men, on the laſt of July they inveſted the capital of France.

The duke of Mayenne, with four thouſand regular ſoldiers, endeavoured to confirm the courage and conſtancy of the inhabitants; but Henry urged the ſiege with inceſſant ardour; within the walls the royaliſts were ſtill numerous; and Paris muſt ſoon have been reduced to acknowledge the authority of her ſovereign, had not the puniſhment which her ſeditious and turbulent citizens had ſo long provoked been averted by the dagger of aſſaſſination. James Clement, a Jacobin friar, and native of Sens, of ſtrong paſſions but weak intellects, had eagerly liſtened to the treaſonable and daring diſcourſes which the popular preachers of the league daily thundered from their pulpits. A diſpoſition, naturally gloomy and fanatical, was inflamed to deſperation by theſe intemperate harangues; and either impelled by that ſanguinary ſuperſtition that ſtrongly marks the times, or prompted by perſons of ſuperior rank, who viewed in the return of Henry their own deſtruction, he determined by one fatal ſtroke to extinguiſh the enemy of the pope, and of the Catholic religion. With a paſſport procured under falſe pretences from the count de Brienne, one of the king's generals then a priſoner, and a letter forged from the preſident Harlay, who at that time was confined in the Baſtile, he ſet out from Paris for St. Cloud, the royal quarters; on the road he met the attorney-general, and informing him that he had ſome important intelligence to communicate to the king in perſon, he was entertained by that officer at his houſe, who alſo engaged to procure him an audience of Henry.

The next morning he was accordingly introduced to the king, to whom he preſented his letters; but while Henry was attentively occupied in the peruſal of them, Clement ſuddenly plunged a knife, that he had concealed in his ſleeve, in the bowels of his unhappy ſovereign. The wounded monarch inſtantly drew it out, and twice ſtruck with it the aſſaſſin; the attorney-general, with a blow of his ſword, extended him on the floor; and the imprudent zeal of two of the royal guards immediately diſpatched him.

Henry at firſt had flattered himſelf that his wound was not mortal; but frequent faintings ſoon convinced him of his approaching end, and he prepared to meet it with a fortitude and compoſure worthy of his high ſituation. He ſummoned to his preſence the king of Navarre, whom he tenderly embraced and declared his lawful ſucceſſor; he exhorted the nobility to acknowledge and ſupport their new ſovereign—and expired the next morning in the ſixteenth year of his reign, and the thirty-ninth of his age. In him was finally extinguiſhed the race of Valois; and his widow Louiſa, of the houſe of Lorrain, after lamenting the untimely fate of her conſort, whoſe tenderneſs ſhe had invarably experienced, retired, amidſt the diſtractions of her bleeding country, to linger through a life of twelve years of blameleſs obſcurity.

HENRY THE FOURTH.

BY the death of Henry the Third, the ſceptre of France was transferred from the houſe of Valois to that of Bourbon, and placed in the hand of Henry the Fourth, the firſt monarch of that family. The religious commotions which ſo long had agitated France, had afflicted alſo great part of Europe. The prudence of Elizabeth had, indeed, ſecured the internal tranquillity of England—but the tempeſt had raged with redoubled violence in Scotland—the amiable, but unfortunate Mary, who had ſought ſhelter in Britain from the fury of a rude, haughty, and turbulent people, inflamed with ſanguinary zeal for the doctrines of Calviniſm, had, after the farce of a public trial, periſhed on the ſcaffold the victim of the female jealouſy of Elizabeth. To avenge her death, the king of Spain filled his ports with naval preparations; but his fleet, which from the ſize of his ſhips, and the ample manner in which they were equipped, obtained the name of the Invincible Armada, was defeated by the lighter veſſels and ſuperior dexterity of the Engliſh; and the remnant of an armament, on which the treaſures of the Indies and America had been profuſely laviſhed, ſhattered by the winds and waves, and purſued by the triumphant navy of Elizabeth, eſcaped with difficulty into the ports of Spain.

To the vaſt continet of America, diſcovered by the daring genius of Columbus, and reduced to ſubjection by the arms of Cortez and Pizarro, Philip had ſome time ſince added the dominions of Portugal. The people of that country had firſt of all the Europeans deſpiſed the narrow and beaten tract of navigation, boldly committed themſelves to the wide expanſe of the ocean, eſtabliſhed their colonies on the coaſt of Africa, founded new cities in Aſia, and planted Brazil, in America, a valuable ſettlement of which they ſtill retain poſſeſſion. But their monarch Sebaſtian, impelled by frantic zeal and romantic valour, had periſhed waging a fruitleſs war in Africa againſt the diſciples of Mahomet; his crown paſſed to his uncle Don Henry, a cardinal and a prieſt; and on the death of Henry, the pretenſions of Philip, ſeconded by the armies of Spain and the experience of Alva, triumphed over the feebler efforts of his competitors, and annexed the kingdom of Portugal to the dominions of Spain.

But this acceſſion of ſtrength had not enabled that monarch to ſubdue the revolted provinces of the Netherlands, and to bend to the yoke the ſtubborn minds of the Flemings. A people naturally obſtinate and perſevering, were confirmed in their oppoſition by that very cruelty which had been exerted to reduce them; their habitual phlegm was quickened by the fire and commanding genius of William prince of Orange; ſeveral years had now been conſumed in the important conflict; and Philip, exaſperated by reſiſtance, extended his enmity to the reformed beyond the limits of his own dominions; he regarded with dread a Proteſtant prince on the throne of France; and was determined cloſely to connect himſelf with the chiefs of the league; while Elizabeth, intent on extirpating the Catholic religion from every country in Europe to which her power and influence could reach, was prepared to ſupport a king whoſe religious principles were ſimilar to her own.

A. D. 1589.] Such were the ſtate and inclinations of the two moſt powerful potentates in Europe, when the ſtroke of aſſaſſination diſmiſed Henry the Third from a turbulent and ignominious reign. His ſucceſſor, Henry the Fourth, who had completed his thirty-fifth year, and was equally adorned with all the ſplendid qualities of mind and body, eloquent in council, intrepid in action, fertile in reſources; a great general, an undaunted ſoldier, and a penetrating ſtateſmen, beheld in a moment a proſpect preſented to his view, which, as it might kindle the ambition of the coldeſt, was ſufficient to damp the ardour of the moſt aſpiring ſpirit. The crown of France, his right by deſcent, was the object of his hopes; but innumerable objects ſtill oppoſed the peaceable poſſeſſion of it. He was indeed, at the head of a conſiderable army, but the greateſt part of his troops, as well as of his ſubjects, conſiſted of Catholics; his capital was in the hands of a faction formidable by their numbers, and daring in their deſigns: his coffers were empty; and the moſt fertile provinces of France acknowledged the authority of the league.

The Swiſs guards, with their colonel Sanci, firſt ſaluted Henry as their ſovereign; the mareſchal Biron aſſured him of his fidelily; the principal Catholics, Bellegarde, D'ò, Chateauvieux, d'Entragues, and Dampierre, who had attached themſelves to the fortunes of the late king, were induced to declare themſelves in favour of the preſent; but the duke d'Epernon, under pretence of reſenting the little deference that was ſhown to him, retired with the troops more immediately under his command, and firſt communicated to the camp the contagious ſpirit of diſaffection.

The duke of Mayenne, in Paris, was, on this critical occaſion, at leaſt as much embarraſſed as Henry; but in a ſituation the moſt delicate, he conducted himſelf with dignity and judgment, and juſtified the favourable opinion which his party entertained of his abilities. He declined the dangerous title of king, which he was earneſtly ſolicited to accept; he rejected a propoſal that was made to offer the crown to Philip of Spain; but at the ſame time he exhorted the people of France to live and die in the Catholic religion, and as the king of Navarre was an heretic, to acknowledge as their ſovereign the cardinal of Bourbon.

The deſertion of the duke d'Epernon was ſoon followed by that of the moſt zealous Catholics; and Henry, ſenſible of the daily diminution of his forces, retired from the walls of Paris, and ſlowly directed his march toward Normandy. The governor of Dieppe opened the gates of that city, and readily admitted his ſovereign; the officer to whom the league had entruſted Caen, diſplayed the ſame diſintereſted loyalty; the acquiſition of two places ſtrongly fortified, and provided with numerous garriſons, which might long have reſiſted the efforts of the royal army, was highly acceptable to the king; who was now able to preſerve a free communication with England, the only power he could depend upon for effectual aſſiſtance.

The duke of Mayenne was equally conſcious of the importance of the revolted towns; the zeal of the Pariſians profuſely ſupplied him with every pecuniary aid; he drew large levies of ſoldiers from Lorrain; at the head of an army of thirty thouſand men, he advanced towards Normandy, and threatened to overwhelm the royal forces, ſcarce amounting to ſeven thouſand, and to reſtore Dieppe to the authority of the league; his ſuperior numbers in either enterpriſe muſt have inſured ſucceſs, had he rapidly preſſed forwards; but naturally cautious and ſlow in all his motions, his dilatory march afforded Henry leiſure to ſhelter himſelf under the walls of Arques. In that poſition he was attacked by the duke of Mayenne, who, after ſeveral ineffectual attempts on the intrenchments of the royaliſts, was compelled to retire with the loſs of above ſix hundred men. The ſatisfaction of Henry at having repelled ſo formidable an antagoniſt, was heightened by the welcome intelligence, that the Swiſs cantons, the republic of Venice, and the queen of England, had acknowledged him as king; and by the junction of four thouſand ſoldiers whom Elizabeth had diſpatched to his ſupport.

With this reinforcement, and with the troops which the count of Soiſſons, the dukes of Orleans and Longueville, the mareſchals Biron and Aumont, led to his aſſiſtance, Henry determined once more to appear before the gates of Paris, and endeavour to ſurpriſe the unguarded capital. By rapid marches he outſtripped the intelligence of his deſign; and the Pariſians were aſtoniſhed and intimidated by the hoſtile appearance of a monarch, whom they expected to have beheld led through the ſtreets, a captive to the victorious arms of the league. He inſulted the ſuburbs; cut in pieces above thirteen hundred of the troops of the league; and would probably have made himſelf maſter of the capital, had not the duke of Mayenne, at that critical moment, entered Paris on the oppoſite ſide; prudence allowed Henry no longer to perſiſt in beſieging a city, always formidable from the number of its inhabitants, and now defended by an army more numerous than his own; he retired to Tours, while the duke of Mayenne, in Paris, ſolemnly proclaimed as king the captive cardinal of Bourbon, by the title of Charles the Tenth; in the name of this pageant of royalty, who was himſelf a priſoner to Henry, the duke diſſolved the council of union, whoſe intemperate meaſures and ſecret intrigues with Spain he had long diſapproved; and with the aſſiſtance of a privy council, nominated by himſelf, and devoted to his will, aſſumed the ſupreme adminiſtration of affairs.

The duke of Savoy, deſcended by his mother from Francis the Firſt, had not heſitated, on the death of Henry the Third, to urge his pretenſions to the vacant throne; ſenſible of the weakneſs of his claim, amidſt the general confuſion, he endeavoured to poſſeſs himſelf of Provence and Dauphiné: he was baffled by the ſkill and vigilance of Valette, elder brother to the duke d'Epernon, who ſacrificed his fortune and his life in the ſervice of his ſovereign; while the duke himſelf, without publicly acknowledging the authority of Henry, acted with ſpirit and ſucceſs againſt the league.

A. D. 1590.] The duke of Mayenne, after the retreat of Henry from Paris, had reduced Pontoiſe, twice inveſted Meulan, and twice retired on the approach of that monarch. The king, in return, with an army of twelve thouſand men, laid ſiege to Dreux; and the walls were already ſhaken by his attacks, when he was informed that the army of the league, reinforced by the prince of Parma, and conſiſting of ſixteen thouſand veteran ſoldiers, was advancing towards him. He immediately deſiſted from the hopeleſs enterpriſe, and, determined to hazard a deciſive engagement, poſted himſelf at Yvri, on the banks of Eure. The duke of Mayenne ſtill wiſhed to avoid commiting the fortune of his party to the fate of a ſingle day; but his own irreſolution was vanquiſhed by the reproaches of the citizens of Paris, and by the daring counſels and preſumptuous vaunts of count Egmont, whoſe father had periſhed the victim of the jealouſy of Philip, and of the cruelty of the duke of Alva. Yet the ſon had diſplayed undaunted zeal and unſhaken loyalty in the cauſe of the tyrant: and, inflamed with religious enmity towards the reformed, had been detached by the prince of Parma to the ſupport of the Catholic arms. He boaſted that the cavalry which he led were able alone to encounter and vanquiſh the royal army; and the duke of Mayenne reluctantly yielded to his impetuous courage. The conflict was long obſtinately maintained; but the ſuperior genius of Henry at length prevailed. Count Egmont, with the greateſt part of his detachment, periſhed on the field; two thouſand five hundred of the leaguers were involved in the ſame fate; and the duke of Mayenne, after having diſcharged the ſeveral duties of a general and a ſoldier, eſcaped with difficulty from the ſword of the conqueror. The Swiſs, who amidſt the general rout alone preſerved their ranks and reputation, conſented to enter into the ſervice of the king; but Henry was prevented from immediately improving his advantage by the diſtreſſed ſtate of his finances; he ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed by a fallacious negociation, and it was not till near two months afterwards that he marched to and blocked up the city of Paris.

About this time the cardinal of Bourbon, his competitor for the crown, ſunk into the grave, expreſſing in his laſt moments his regard for his ſucceſsful rival, and conſcious of the intereſted views of thoſe who had effected to elevate him to a throne; yet his name for ſeveral years, after his death, was uſed to ſanction the deſigns of the league, and to nouriſh the flame of rebellion. The Pariſians ſtill diſplayed the ſame implacable emnity towards their ſovereign; and the duke of Nemours, who had been appointed governor of the capital, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and conduct. Even the eccleſiaſtics on this occaſion forgot the peaceable tenets of their religion; and, emerging from the gloom of the cloyſter, formed themſelves into a regiment under the command of the legate of the court of Rome. This holy corps would have added but little real ſtrength to the cauſe in which it armed; and Paris derived more effectual advantage from the humanity of her ſovereign, whom it continued thus obſtinately to reſiſt; famine and peſtilence began already to ſtalk at large through the ſtreets; and the duke of Nemours, to avoid the inſtant conſequences of the former, commanded the aged and infirm to leave the city; had Henry refuſed a paſſage through his lines to theſe unhappy wretches, it is more than probable his capital muſt have ſurrendered; but his natural clemency prevailed over the ſuggeſtions of ambition; and he rejected the counſels of his officers, who adviſed him to drive them back with the ſword; yet even this could only for a ſhort time alleviate, but not extinguiſh their miſery; the cry of peace, or bread, reſounded through the ſtreets, and the reſolution of the duke of Nemours muſt have yielded to the clamours of a ravenous and diſorderly multitude, when the fainting ſpirits of the leaguers were again revived by the approach of the duke of Mayenne and the prince of Parma.

In the ſpace of the laſt month famine had conſumed above thirty thouſand of the inhabitants of Paris; each feeling of nature was overborne by the preſſure of immediate diſtreſs; at the imperious call of hunger, mothers are reported to have prolonged a guilty life by feeding on the diſmembered limbs of their offspring. With mingled horror and compaſſion, Henry turned from his polluted capital; and impatient, amidſt the tumult of battle, of effacing from his mind the inhuman ſcenes he had witneſſed, directed his march towards the prince of Parma; that able commander at Meaux had joined the duke of Mayenne with fourteen thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, and their confederate forces compoſed an army of twenty-four thouſand infantry, and near twelve thouſand cavalry: but the ſole object of the prince was to relieve Paris, and he determined to accompliſh it, if poſſible, without hazarding a general engagement. To a defiance from the king of France, to put an end to the calamities of the kingdom by a deciſive action, he coolly replied, that he was accuſtomed to fight only when he thought proper himſelf, and not when it was convenient for his enemies; and by a ſeries of ſkilful operations, which commanded the admiration of Henry himſelf, he eluded the vigilance of his adverſary; ſtormed within his very ſight the walls of Lagni, ſwept away the garriſons of St. Maur and Charenton, and once more poured plenty into the famiſhed capital.

Though Henry himſelf could not but applaud the ſkill and conduct of the prince of Parma, yet his generous ſpirit was ſeverely mortified by the diſappointment. Paris was raviſhed from his graſp, at the moment that his hand was ſtretched out to receive it; the ſuperior dexterity of his antagoniſt had wounded his reputation, and evaded his endeavours to force him to a battle—his own army was greatly weakened by ſickneſs and the fatigues of a long campaign—the ravaged country could no longer ſupply the neceſſary ſubſiſtence—his exchequer was exhauſted—the nobility and gentry, who ſerved him at their own expence, were diſcontented and impatient to depart—and he was compelled, though reluctantly, to embrace the only expedient that remained: he retired to Saint Denis, diſbanded the greateſt part of his forces, diſmiſſed his principal adherents to the protection of the provinces in which their intereſt lay, and with a flying army of his beſt troops prepared to watch the motions of the prince of Parma.

That general, after the relief of Paris, at the requeſt of the duke of Mayenne and the chiefs of the league, inveſted Corbeil; which, though defended with gallantry, was taken by aſſault. The prince, to ſound the inclinations of the Catholic leaders towards the king of Spain, propoſed to garriſon it with his Walloon, or Italian troops; but this offer was rejected with indignation by the duke of Mayenne and his confederates; and their manner of refuſal clearly diſcovered their jealouſy and ſuſpicion of Philip. The prince confirmed in his opinion, that the moment was not yet arrived of avowing the ambitious deſigns of his maſter, and influenced ſtill more by the inclemency of the ſeaſon, the ſickly ſtate of his troops, the want of money and proviſions, determined, notwithſtanding the importunities of the Catholic chiefs, to return into the Netherlands; and to leave the contending parties to exhauſt their ſtrength, in mutual animoſity, in hopes their weakneſs hereafter would deliver them an eaſy prey to Spain.

Leſt the Catholics might be overpowered in his abſence by the ſuperior genius of the king of France, the prince left for their ſupport a body of ſix thouſand men, and with the reſt of his troops began his march towards the Netherlands; but he was ſenſible that ſo enterpriſing a commander as Henry, however his weakneſs had compelled him to remain a peaceable ſpectator of his late operations, would not fail to obſerve his retreat with a vigilant eye. That he might accompliſh without loſs this arduous deſign, he drew up his army in four diviſions, and marched always in order of battle; the country through which he paſſed was diligently in the morning reconnoitred by his light cavalry, and his army each night was ſecured by ſtrong entrenchments.

The moment that Henry was informed of the intended route of his adverſary, he collected a ſmall but ſelect body of troops; and impatient to efface his disgrace before Paris and Lagni, continually hovered round and harrassed the forces of Spain; his bravery and vigilance were displayed in incessant attacks; but in the passage of the river Ainé his ardour precipitated him amidst the thickest of the enemy, and he must either have perished, or surrendered to the multitude that surrounded him, had he not been disengaged by the active gallantry of baron Biron, son to the marescbal; yet his danger, instead of depressing, seemed only to inflame his enterprising spirit. The length of the march, the badness of the roads, and the advanced season of the year, all contributed to second his attempts, and to encrease the distress of the enemy; but every obstacle vanished before the prudence and skill of the prince of Parma; and, without any considerable loss, he triumphantly conducted his troops into the province of Hainault.

The mortification of Henry at beholding his rival thus escape with impunity, was encreased by the success of the duke of Savoy in Provence, and by the unseasonable death of pope Sixtus the Fifth. The former reduced Frejus and Antibes, and entered Aix in triumph; the latter expired at the moment that he had determined to break with the Spaniards, and to urge by arms the claim of the court of Rome to the kingdom of Naples; Urban the Seventh, his transient successor, within a few months sunk also into the grave; and the vacant apostolical chair was filled with Gregory the Fourteenth, by birth a Spaniard, and the most implacable enemy of Henry. He instantly declared that monarch an heretic, absolved his subjects from their allegiance, unless they quitted the impious party they had espoused.

A. D. 1591.] But the magnanimity of Henry seemed to rise in proportion to the difficulties that presented themselves; baffled in repeated attempts to surprise the city of Paris, he still maintained his superiority in the field; a supply of money and ammunition from England enabled him soon after to besiege Chartres. In the reduction of that city Francis de Coligni, son to the celebrated admiral, displayed qualities which promised even to surpass those of his father; and his death soon after was universally deplored by the Calvanists, who were permitted to behold, and to lament the loss of his virtues. From the acquisition of Chartres, the king directed his attacks to Noyon, which was compelled to surrender even in the sight of the duke of Mayenne.

The escape of the young duke of Guise from the castle of Tours, in which he had been confined ever since his father's death, increased the number of Henry's enemies; but the duke of Mayenne, on his side, found himself almost equally embarrassed with those who professed themselves his most zealous friends. The council of sixteen had again assumed the government of the capital; and inflamed with religious and political fury, had caused, on a frivolous charge, and without the form of a trial, the president, and two of the counsellors, to be seized and executed. On information of this outrage, the duke of Mayenne, with a select body of troops, hastily returned from Picardy; severely reproached the council for their insolence and temerity; and as an example to the rest, commanded four of the moſt guilty to be inſtantly hung up in his hall. The ſurvivors, intimidated by the fate of their companions, gladly withdrew to their original obſcurity.

The forces of Henry had been ſwelled by ſixteen thouſand Germans, levied by the viſcount du Turenne, and were reinforced by four thouſand Engliſh commanded by the earl of Eſſex: and the king of France, with an army of nearly thirty thouſand horſe and foot, laid ſiege to Rouen, the capital of Normandy. That city was defended with the higheſt intrepidity and ſkill by the Sieur de Villars; but there was little probabilty that he would be long able to reſiſt ſo formidable a force, directed by ſo able a commander as Henry. The duke of Mayenne, alarmed at the danger of this important place, ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the king of Spain; and the prince of Parma was again commanded to enter France, and endeavour to preſerve Rouen.

He began his march about the middle of December, and his army, when joined by that of the duke of Mayenne, might conſiſt of twenty-five thouſand infantry, and ſix thouſand cavalry. Henry informed of his approach, and unwilling to relinquiſh his hopes of a city which he daily expected would capitulate, left his foot to proſecute the ſiege, and with his horſe advanced to retard the progreſs of the prince. But his ardour on this occaſion precipitated him into a danger the moſt lively and imminent; having with four hundred horſe outſtripped the reſt of his ſquadrons, he fell in with the van of the Spaniards, near the town of Aumale. Theſe he charged and repulſed; and purſued his advantage till he deeply engaged himſelf with the adverſe ranks; for ſome time he continued fighting deſperately, till wounded in the reins, and the greater part of his companions killed by his ſide, he effected a retreat, which it would have been impoſſible for him to have accompliſhed, had not the prince of Parma, ſuſpicious of an ambuſcade, called off his troops.

The forces of the confederates, though inceſſantly haraſſed and repeatedly attacked, had now penetrated within two days march of Rouen, when they were ſurpriſed by the agreeable intelligence that the governor had availed himſelf of the abſence of the king, ſallied from the town, and deſtroyed the works and cut in pieces great numbers of the beſiegers; mareſchal Biron himſelf, who commanded, was wounded, and Villars, who aſpired to the glory of raiſing the ſiege without the aſſiſtance of the Spaniards, added, that if his garriſon was reinforced, he expected to defend the town for ſeveral months longer. Though the prince of Parma was of opinion that he ſtill ought to purſue his march, and attack the royaliſts before they had recovered from their confuſion, yet he yielded to the counſels of the duke of Mayenne, and after detaching eight hundred choſen men to Rouen, he turned aſide into Picardy, and inveſted St. Eſprit de Rue.

A. D. 1592.] The king himſelf was no ſooner informed of this reſolution than he returned to preſs the ſiege of Rouen with redoubled vigour. The loſs that he had ſuſtained was amply ſupplied by cannon and ammunition from the ſtates of Holland; and Villars, in a few weeks reduced to diſtreſs, was again compelled to implore the prince of Parma. That general immediately relinquiſhed the ſiege of St. Eſprit de Reu, and rapidly preſſed forwards towards Rouen. Though Henry could not conceal his mortification at being thus obliged twice to abandon a place which he had daily expected to occupy, yet conſcious of the inferior numbers of his own army, he retired from the inauſpicious walls, and waited at Pont de l'Arche the return of his nobility; who, on the former occaſion, ſeeing no immediate proſpect of a battle, had left his camp, and withdrawn to their reſpective provinces.

The prince of Parma, after entering Rouen in triumph, led his army againſt Caudbec, the reduction of which was thought neceſſary to complete the deliverance of the former city; but as he marked in perſon the ground for the batteries, he received a wound in his arm from a muſket ball. A fever attended the wound, and he ſcarce on his recovery had poſſeſſed himſelf of Caudbec, before he was ſenſible that his own army was expoſed to a greater danger than that from which he had relieved the citizens of Rouen. Caudbec is ſituated in the peninſula Caux, formed by the Seine on the weſt, and the ſea and the river d'Eu on the north and eaſt; and the king was no ſooner informed that the prince had committed his forces within the narrow limits of Caux, than he prepared to efface by a ſignal revenge the memory of his former diſappointments. The nobility at his ſummons had repaired with alacrity to his ſtandard; his army by their ready appearance was increaſed to ſeventeen thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe. He already poſſeſſed the towns of Eu, Arques, and Dieppe, which commanded the eaſtern entrance into the peninſula; and after ſeveral ſharp encounters, he occupied the defiles to the ſouth, by which the Spaniards had entered. With more than uſual precaution he fortified his camp againſt the deſpair of the enemy; and the prince of Parma's health no ſooner enabled him to reconnoitre the poſition of the royaliſts, than he was convinced no other expedient remained than to tranſport his troops acroſs the Seine. To paſs the broad and rapid ſtream of that river, with ſo conſiderable an army incumbered with artillery and baggage, and in ſight of a vigilant and powerful adverſary, appeared to the duke of Mayenne and the moſt experienced officers utterly impracticable; but no difficulties could depreſs the bold and inventive genius of the prince of Parma. He collected from Rouen a number of boats and rafts; he cleared by his cannon the Seine of the Dutch ſhips which occupied it; he availed himſelf of the riſing grounds between him and the royaliſts, which ſcreened his motions from the ſight of Henry; he ſeized the favourable moment of a thick miſt, and while his cavalry threatened a ſerious attack on the works of the enemy, his infantry, with the artillery and baggage, ſafely croſſed the river; they were rapidly followed by the horſe; and the rear was ſecured from loſs or inſult by two batteries which he had judiciouſly erected.

Henry had for ſeveral days flattered himſelf with the moſt ſanguine hopes of gaining a deciſive victory, and his mortification was in proportion to the confidence of his former expectations; his rival had again eluded his efforts, and poſſeſſed himſelf in his retreat to the Netherlands of Epernai, while the duke of Mayenne with a part of his forces had entered Rouen. The exhauſted ſtate of the king's finances had compelled him to diſband the majority of his army; on the frontiers of Anjou the prince of Conti was defeated by the duke of Mercœur, a zealous leaguer, and a younger branch of the houſe of Lorrain; Epernai was indeed recovered by the royaliſts, but the acquiſition was attended with the death of the mareſchal Biron, whoſe career of military glory was terminated by a cannon ball. On the other hand, in Dauphiné, Leſdaguires, who had firmly attached himſelf to the fortunes of Henry, vanquiſhed the duke of Savoy, and purſued him to the very gates of Turin: and the duke of Joyeuſe, who commanded in Languedoc an army of ſeven thouſand men in the ſervice of the league, was routed by the royal troops under Themines, and miſerably periſhed with the greateſt part of his followers in the waters of the Tarn.

The league was induced by theſe diſaſters to ſolicit again the aſſiſtance of Spain, and the prince of Parma was once more commanded to march to the ſupport of the Catholic cauſe. But the conſtitution of that able commander was already fatally impaired by the fatigues of fourteen ſucceſſive campaigns—the wound which he had received before Caudbec had never properly healed, and while he applied with his wonted aſſiduity to haſten the neceſſary preparations for his expedition, his death deprived the king of Spain of a ſubject whoſe ſagacity and penetration had reunited to his crown great part of the Netherlands; and delivered the king of France from a rival whoſe ſplendid military talents had ſo often baffled his beſt concerted enterpriſes. On his deceaſe, the government of the Netherlands was committed to count Peter Erneſt of Manſfveldt, whoſe ſon Charles led a Spaniſh army of ſeven thouſand veteran ſoldiers to the ſupport of the league; and after, in conjunction with the duke of Mayenne, reducing Noyon, returned to Flanders.

A. D. 1593.] Philip had hitherto laviſhed his treaſures and the blood of his ſubjects to keep alive the flame of war in France, but the progreſs of his arms had yet been attended with no permanent advantage, and he now endeavoured by negociation to ſecure in his family the crown, the object of his ambition. His importunity had prevailed on the duke of Mayenne to aſſemble the ſtates at Paris, and the duke of Feria, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, endeavoured to perſuade the deputies to place Iſabella, the daughter of his royal maſter, on the throne. Though even the moſt bigoted Catholics abhorred a meaſure which muſt have rendered France, in fact, a province of Spain, yet conſcious they were unable to contend with Henry, unleſs ſupported by Philip, they ſtudiouſly concealed their averſion, and expreſſed an affected ſolicitude in regard to the perſon whom the latter prince might name for his daughter's conſort. The archduke of Auſtria they unanimouſly rejected, and declared that they never would ſubmit to her union with a foreign prince. The young duke of Guiſe, the next object of Philip's choice, was endeared to them by the name and popularity of his father; but the duke of Mayenne beheld with ſecret diſguſt his nephew preferred before his ſon, while outwardly he profeſſed the higheſt ſatisfaction at the propoſal, he privately determined to traverſe it; and inſiſted, both for the honour of the king of Spain and for the ſafety of the duke of Guiſe, that the election of Iſabella ſhould be deferred till an army was aſſembled ſufficient to overwhelm her enemies, and to firmly eſtabliſh her on the throne.

But while the king of Spain and the Catholic chiefs were bewildered in an endleſs labyrinth of negociation, both were ſurpriſed by an event as important as it was unexpected. Henry had beheld with anxiety the aſſembly of the ſtates, and dreaded the intrigues of the duke of Mayenne with the court of Spain. He perceived the religious prejudices of the Catholics were confirmed by a ſeries of long and bloody hoſtilities; thoſe who hitherto acted with him, had been deluded by the hopes of his converſion—their patience was now exhauſted, and they publicy ſuggeſted the neceſſity of transferring their allegiance to the cardinal of Bourbon, the couſin of the king; deſirous of delivering his people from the calamities of war, the humanity of Henry co-operated with his ambition; even the moſt diſtinguiſhed of the Proteſtant leaders, and his favourite Roſny, afterwards better known by the title of the duke of Sully, exhorted him to conſult the happineſs of his ſubjects, and to relinquiſh a faith which he only could maintain amidſt ſcenes of blood and devaſtation. In conſequence of this advice, Henry invited the Catholic divines throughout his kingdom to come and inſtruct him in their religion; and after being preſent at ſeveral conferences, he profeſſed himſelf ſatisfied with their argument, heard maſs at St. Denis, read aloud his confeſſion of the Catholic faith, and declared his reſolution conſtantly to maintain and defend it.

A. D. 1593.] The converſion of Henry ought to have enſured the ſubmiſſion of his Catholic ſubjects—but the embers of civil commotion which had been waked into life by the breath of religion, were now fanned by that of ambition; and the voice of the pope, which might have extinguiſhed, ſtill continued to nouriſh the deſtructive flame. Gregory the Fourteenth was indeed no more, and Innocent the Ninth, who with the power ſeemed to have ſucceeded to the implacable diſpoſition of his predeceſſor, had alſo ſunk into the grave. But Clement the Eighth, who had been elected to the honours of the pontificate, ſtill refuſed to admit the ambaſſors of Henry, or to relieve him from the ſentence of excommunication which had been pronounced againſt him.

The duke of Mayenne and the Spaniſh miniſters, alarmed at the intelligence that Henry had entered the pale of the Catholic church, reſumed their intrigues with redoubled vigour. They repreſented it to the people merely as a political device to evade the election of a Catholic prince; and they perſuaded a number of their adherents to ſwear that they would not acknowledge Henry for king, unleſs his converſion was ratified by the pope—while at the ſame time they employed their influence to confirm the inflexible diſpoſition of the ſee of Rome. Philip was now more ſenſible than ever of his error in connecting himſelf with the duke of Guiſe, a young nobleman of little weight, in preference to the duke of Mayenne; he ordered his miniſters to acquaint that powerful leader, that on mature conſideration he had changed his intentions, and was determined to beſtow the hand of his daughter Iſabel a on his ſon.

But while Philip and the chiefs of the league endeavoured to fortify themſelves againſt the increaſing influence of the king of France, the hand of an obſcure enthuſiaſt, who earned a daily and ſlender pittance as a waterman on the Loire, was already prepared to extinguiſh their fears with the life of his ſovereign. James Barrier, for ſuch was the name of the unhappy bigot, had communicated his intentions to ſeveral of the moſt zealous eccleſiaſtics, who had eſpouſed the party of the league, and their exhortations had confirmed his reſolution; at length he revealed them to a dominican friar at Lyons, who, ſtruck with horror at the crime, contrived to tranſmit to the king, with the picture of the aſſaſſin, an account of the atrocious deed he meditated. From the reſemblance of the portrait, Barrier was diſcovered and apprehended at Meulan; and after confeſſing his guilt, and in vain endeavouring to impeach the count of Soiſſons as having ſtimulated him to the attempt, was executed as a traitor.

Though the enmity of the league was but little abated, their reſources were in a great meaſure exhauſted—they had ſolicited, and Henry had conſented to a truce for three months—it was afterwards extended to ſix more—and the ſweets of tranquillity which the people in this interval had taſted, rendered them ſtill more averſe to plunge again into the calamities of war. The deſcription of ſcenes, clouded by anarchy, and where an independent intereſt was maintained in almoſt every different province, cannot fail of fatiguing the patience of the reader. The duke of Savoy was routed again by Leſdiguieres, who alſo diſperſed an army of three thouſand Spaniards on the frontiers, and checked in Provence the arrogance of the duke d'Epernon; but Languedoc alone amidſt the general diſtraction was exempted from the miſeries which had afflicted the reſt of the kingdom, and the prudence of the mareſchal Montmorenci, which had ſecured the peace of that province, was rewarded by the king with the ſword of conſtable.

A. D. 1594.] In vain did the intrigues of the court of Spain and Rome endeavour to allay that ſatisfaction with which every honeſt Catholic in France had heard the news of their ſovereign's converſion to the faith they profeſſed. Lewis de l'Hoſpital, marquis of Vitri, had on the death of Henry the Third withdrawn himſelf from the preſent king, and was by the league entruſted with the city of Meaux. He had frequently, but in vain, importuned the duke of Mayenne to terminate by a peace the calamities of France, but no ſooner did Henry abjure the Proteſtant religion, than he determined to follow the dictates of his conſcience, and to return to his allegiance. He commanded his garriſon to evacuate the town, and when he delivered the keys to the magiſtrates, "I ſcorn," ſaid he, "to ſteal a place, or to make any fortune at other men's expence; I am going "to pay my duty to the king, and I leave it in your power to act as you please." This short, but animated harangue, was attended by the acclamations of the inhabitants, and the air resounded with "Long life to Henry the Fourth!" The flame of loyalty once kindled, soon imparted its warmth to the most distant parts of the kingdom; and the example of Meaux was followed by the cities of Pontoise, Orleans, Bourges, and Lyons, which shook off the yoke of the league, and acknowledged the authority of Henry.

The king determined to embrace the moment of returning prosperity to celebrate his coronation; Rheims was still in the hands of his enemies, and Chartres was preferred for that important ceremony. It was performed by Nicholas de Thou, bishop of that city, and was graced by the presence of the prince of Conti, and count of Soissons, with the dukes of Montpensier, Luxemburgh, Retz, and Ventadour: it was scarce accomplished, before a new event engrossed the attention of Henry, and while it dissipated the visionary projects of his adversaries, seemed simly to fix the crown on his head.

The presence of the duke of Mayenne, and the terror of a Spanish garrison, had hitherto restrained the fickle disposition of the Parisians, and maintained the authority of the league; but the disorders of Picardy summoned the duke to that province; he had before deprived the count of Belin, whose inclinations he perceived to lean secretly towards the king, of the government of the capital, and now conferred it on Charles de Cossé, count of Brissac. That nobleman, impressed with an high and romantic respect for the commonwealth of Rome, the history of which he had diligently studied, entertained the singular and chimerical project of forming France into a similar republic. His designs had been received with cold contempt by the chiefs of the league; and alarmed lest on Henry recovering his capital, he should he involved in the fate of his favourite system, the spirit of the stern republican evaporated, and Brissac became only anxious for his interest and safety.

To secure these, he immediately entered into a negociation with the king, and on advantageous conditions agreed to admit the royal forces into the city of Paris, While the Spaniards were amused by the arts of Brissac, the new gate was opened to Henry and his army, who instantly possessed himself of the squares and principal streets. The Parisians received their sovereign with loud acclamations; the troops maintained the most exact discipline; and amidst the revolution, the city throughout bore the appearance of peace and security. The Spaniards alone, about four thousand in number, and commanded by the duke of Feria, still occupied the quarters of St. Anthony and St. Martin, with the Bastile and the Temple. These they diligently fortified, and declared their resolution, if attacked, to defend themselves to the last extremity; but from this desperate design they were soon diverted by Henry, who, unwilling to pollute with blood that capital which he had just recovered, permitted them to march out with all the honours of war.

The enemies of Henry, who had reſiſted his arms, were vanquiſhed by his clemency. His generous ſpirit, ſuperior to reſentment, revolted at the idea of puniſhing thoſe who were willing to ſubmit; and he received his moſt inveterate foes with a degree of goodneſs and condeſcenſion, which for ever attached them to his ſervice. Even the ducheſs of Montpenſier, who had diſtinguiſhed herſelf by the moſt indecent and public invectives, was admitted to his preſence, and by his familiar converſation, he endeavoured to baniſh that confuſion which ſhe could not entirely conceal; Briſſac, with a liberal pecuniary reward, was raiſed to the rank of mareſchal; l'Huillier, mayor of Paris, who had diſplayed equal, and more diſintereſted zeal, was preferred to the poſt of preſident of accounts; while a general amneſty diſſipated the fears, and reſtored tranquillity to the anxious multitude.

Villars, who had defended Rouen with ſuch diſtinguiſhed ſkill and courage, ſoon after opened the gates of that city, and proclaimed Henry the Fourth. His return to his allegiance was recompenſed with the dignity of admiral, and the government of the place he had ſurrendered: Cambray, which had been wreſted from the Spaniards by the duke of Anjou, and by that prince had been bequeathed to Catherine of Medicis, was ruled with independent authority by Balagny, a French officer, whom the queen-mother had entruſted with the defence of it. The waining fortunes of the league recalled Balagny to a ſenſe of his delicate ſituation, and he was conſcious that he muſt ſeek a protector in the king of France, or of Spain; his partiality to his native country determined him to prefer the ſupport of the former, and he acknowledged his dependance on Henry, on condition that under him he ſhould be permitted to enjoy the ſovereignty, with the title of prince of Cambray.

The duke of Mayenne, embarraſſed by the rapid deſertion of his confederates, again ſolicited the ſupport of Spain, and though Philip could no longer flatter himſelf with the hopes of obtaining the crown of France, his implacable enmity to Henry, and his dread leſt that monarch, when firmly eſtabliſhed on his throne, ſhould revive the pretenſions of his houſe to Navarre, determined him ſtill to keep alive the flames of civil war. He detached Charles count of Manſveldt with an army of twelve thouſand men, to invade the province of Picardy; the count laid ſiege to the town of la Capelle, and before Henry could march to its aſſiſtance, the garriſon was compelled to capitulate.

The king of France had aſſembled an army of twelve thouſand infantry and two thouſand cavalry; and to indemnify himſelf for the loſs of la Capelle, he inveſted Laon. That city, ſtrongly fortified, and well provided, was defended by one of the braveſt officers of the league, and animated by the preſence of the count of Somerive, ſecond ſon to the duke of Mayenne. Henry carried on his operations with his wanted ardour; and the duke of Mayenne, alarmed for the fate of the town, the moſt conſiderable that remained in his poſſeſſion, advanced to the relief of it with the Spaniſh forces, the chief command of which Philip had confered on him; but his efforts were continuely fruſtrained by the valour and activity of the mareſchal Biron, ſon to the celebrated commander who had periſhed before Epernai, and who now emulated the martial fame of his father. Mayenne, diſtreſſed for proviſions, was at lenghth compelled to retreat; but though harraſſed, and repeatedly attacked by the ſuperior forces of the royaliſts, he maintained an undaunted countenance, repulſed by his conduct and courage the attempts of his enemies, and reached La Fera in ſafety; on his retreat, Laon, hopeleſs of ſuccour, capitulated—the garriſon was permitted to march out with all the honours of war, and Henry diſplayed his magnanimity by treating the count of Somerive with every mark of reſpect. A conduct ſo truly generous, could not but impreſs the enemies of the king with the moſt favourable ſentiments; and the duke of Guiſe, mortified at the neglect of the Spaniards, and impelled by his admiration of Henry, reconciled himſelf to his ſovereign, and delivered to him the towns of Vitri, Recroix, and Rheims.

The daily return of his ſubjects to their allegiance, and the expiring ſtate of the league, inſpired Henry with more vigorous counſels. He now publicly declared war againſt Spain, and entered into a treaty of alliance with the revolted inhabitants of the Netherlands, who, by the treaty of Utrecht, had laid the foundation of a free republic under the title of the United Provinces. While the allies purſued their joint preparations with diligence, the enemies of Henry again reſolved to aſſail the life of that monarch; as the king in his apartments of the Louvre ſtooped to embrace a nobleman that was preſented to him, he received a ſtroke from a knife that cut his lip, and broke one of his teeth; the compoſure of Henry diſpelled the conſternation of his friends—the aſſaſſin was immediately diſcovered and ſeized. His name was John Chatel, a ſcholar of the college of the Jeſuits, to the influence of whoſe doctrines he attributed his atrocious attempt. Chatel was inſtantly conſigned to the puniſhment due to his crime; father John Guignard, who was accuſed of having vindicated in his writings the right of the ſubject to attempt the life of his prince, was alſo executed; and the whole order of the Jeſuits was commanded, on the penalty of death, to quit the kingdom of France.

A. D. 1595.] Henry, ſtill more determined to proſecute the war, and to ſeek in camps that ſafety which was denied him in his own palace, entered the county of Burgundy, Dijon, the capital of which had already declared for him; but he had ſcarce poſſeſſed himſelf of Troyes, before he was informed that the Spaniards, commanded by the conſtable Velaſco, and joined by the duke of Mayenne, had paſſed the Saone. At Fontain Frençoiſe, the confederates were attacked by Henry with his wanted ardour and impetuoſity. At the head of eighteen hundred horſe and foot, the king of France carried carnage and confuſion through an army of fourteen thouſand men; but had not the caution of Velaſco reſiſted the importunities of the duke of Mayenne, the courage of Henry, nor the fidelity of his companions, could have prevented him from being overpowered by the numbers of his enemies; but the Spaniard, intimidated by the boldneſs of his aſſailants, founded a retreat, left the king in poſſeſſion of the field of battle, and early the next morning repaſſed the Saone. He thence purſued his march to the town of Gray, where, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the duke of Mayenne, he fortified his camp, and determined to remain on the defenſive. But in Picardy the campaign opened with events leſs auſpicious to France. The count of Fuentes, who had been appointed by Philip governor of the Netherlands, penetrated into that province, reduced Chatelot, and endeavoured, by treachery, to poſſeſs himſelf of Ham; his troops were admitted into the town, but the caſtle ſtill reſiſted their attacks. Baffled in this enterpriſe, he pointed his march towards Dourlens, which he immediately inveſted. Senſible of the importance of that city, admiral Villars, with a body of ſelect ſoldiers, advanced to reinforce the garriſon. He was met, encountered, and overwhelmed, by the ſuperior forces of the Spaniards, and periſhed in the field, with fifteen hundred of his companions, gallantly fighting to the laſt. Dourlens was ſoon after carried by aſſault, and the brave defenders of its walls, diſdaining to aſk quarter, were put to the ſword.

The ſucceſs which had attended Fuentes, ſerved only to inflame him with the deſire of farther glory. The ſituation of Cambray has been already deſcribed, and the Spaniſh commander determined to ſignaliſe his arms by the ſiege of that city. Balagny had ſpared no expence or pains in ſtrengthening the fortifications of the place. The garriſon amounted to three thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe, and the town was well furniſhed with military ſtores and proviſions. The principal officers of Fuentes repreſented to him the danger of waſting his forces in ſo arduous an enterpriſe, but he refuſed to liſten to their remonſtrances, and began his operations wirhout delay. They were carried on with a degree of ſkill and vigour that even vanquiſhed the reſiſtance of de Vic, whom Henry had ſent with a reinforcement to the aſſiſtance of the beſieged. The inhabitants, diſguſted with the extortion and inſolence of Balagny, co-operated with the arms of the Spaniards, and opened their gates to the aſſailants; the garriſon retired into the caſtle, but were ſoon compelled to ſurrender from the want of proviſions. Cambray was again reſtored to the dominions of Spain; and the tranſient ſovereignty of Balagny was extinguiſhed for ever.

In the mean while the king of France croſſed the Saone in purſuit of Velaſco, and unable to draw the conſtable from his entrenchments, extended his devaſtations over Franche Compté. From the conqueſt of that conntry he was diverted by the powerful mediation of the Swiſs Cantons; but the inactivity of the Spaniards awakened the jealouſy of the duke of Mayenne, who at length determined to ſeparate himſelf from allies he could no longer confide in.—His inclinations had already been intimated to Henry; but Mayenne ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution never to effect a reconciliation till that monarch had been abſolved by the pope; Henry ſecretly ſuggeſted to him to retire to Chalons, a town ſtill in his power, till Clement ſhould relent; and aſſured him that no advantage ſhould be taken in his abſence of himſelf, nor of his adherents; the duke had ſcarce arrived at that place, when the Roman pontiff, fully convinced that Henry was firmly eſtabliſhed on his throne, abſolved him in form from the cenſures that had been pronounced againſt him by his predeceſſors.

A. D. 1596.] The duke of Mayenne immediately threw himſelf at the feet of his ſovereign, and vowed a fidelity which he ever afterwards inviolably preſerved. The duke of Guiſe in Provence equally diſplayed by actions the ſincerity of his ſubmiſſion; he ſurpriſed Marſeilles, cheked the arrogance of the duke d'Epernon, who had aſſumed the ſtyle of independence, and reduced that haughty chieftan to implore the clemency of his royal maſter. Henry himſelf, after his return from Franche Compté, had entered Picardy, and inveſted La Fere: the ſtrength of the fortifications, and the number of the garriſon, had determined him to relinquiſh his hopes of carrying it by aſſault, and to depend on the ſlow but certain effects of famine. The Spaniards, commanded by the archduke Albert, in whoſe favour Philip had ſuperſeded the count de Fuentes, abandoned the impractible deſign of preſerving La Fere, and formed the reſolution of beſieging ſome other frontier town which might compenſate for the loſs of that place. The ſieur de Loné, a native of France, and a zealous officer of the league who had been refuſed by Henry the rank of mareſchal, repreſented the defenceleſs ſtate of Calais, and urged the archduke to aſpire to that important acquſition. Albert yielded to his ſuggeſtions, and entruſted the conduct of the enterpriſe to de Roné himſelf, whoſe bold and active genuis, and diſtinguiſhed ſkill in war, eminently qualified him for the undertaking.

To deceive Henry, the archduke ſtill affected to meditate the relief of La Fere, and began his march towards that place, while de Roné ſuddenly turned to Calais with a body of ſelect troops, and poſſeſſed himſelf, after a faint reſiſtance, of the two forts which commanded the entrance of the town and the harbour. He was quickly followed by Albert and his whole army; the ſuperior numbers of the Spaniards ſoon penetrated into the ſuburbs and occupied the town; and the caſtle alone reſiſted the arms of the beſiegers. To reinforce the garriſon of that fortreſs, Matalet, governor of Foix, had opened a paſſage for himſelf and three hundred companions through the lines of the enemy. But even this additional force was not capable of withſtanding the attacks of the Spaniards; and Henry endured the mortification of beholding the banners of Spain diſplayed from the citadel of Calais, at the moment that he advanced from La Fere at the head of his cavalry to the ſupport of the beſieged.

Henry immediately returned to preſs the ſiege of La Fere, while the archduke, after repairing the fortifications of Calais, led his troops againſt the town of Ardres. The ſtrength of that place, it was reaſonahly expected, might have reſiſted the arms of the Spaniards till La Fere had ſurrendered; and the garriſon at firſt diſplayed their valour in repeated vigorous ſallies; but no ſooner had the troops of Spain poſſeſſed themſeles of the ſuburbs, than the marquis of Belin, who commanded in Ardres, baſely yielding to his fears, propoſed to his officers to capitulate. Though the propoſal was rejected with diſdain by the majority of the council, yet the marquis availing himſelf of his ſuperior authrity, offered to open his gates on condition that the garriſon ſhould march out with the honours of war; Albert readily agreed; and the capitulation was ſigned the day that preceded the ſurrender of La Fere.

From that place the king of France had rapidly preſſed forwards with an army, ſwelled by the zeal of his nobility, and with the moſt ſanguine expectations of raiſing the ſiege of Ardres. His hopes were clouded by the mortifying intelligence of the ſhameful capitulation of the marquis of Belin; with the approbation of his principal officers, he ſtill however continued to advance to compel his enemy if poſſible to give battle; but Albert, after placing ſtrong garriſons in the towns he had taken, and unwilling to hazard a deciſive engagement with Henry, retired from the dominions of France into the province of Artois; and the king, after taking the caſtle of Imbercourt by aſſault, and making an ineffectual attempt on Arras, returned to his capital, and left mareſchal Biron, with a body of ſix thouſand troops, to ſecure the frontiers of Picardy.

That enterpriſing officer did not long confine his operations to the cautious ſyſtem which had been recommended to him. He entered the province of Artois, retaliated on that country the injuries of France, and ſpread the terror of his arms along the ſouthern frontier of the Netherlands. The archduke had for ſome time been employed in the ſiege of Hulſt, but no ſooner had he accompliſhed the reduction of that place, than he detached the marquis of Varambon, with a conſiderable body of forces, to check the deſtructive progreſs of the French. Biron informed that the marquis was on his mrach to offer battle, advanced rapidly to meet him: his ſkilful evolutions confounded and vanquiſhed his antagoniſt: the Spaniards deluded into an ambuſcade, were routed with conſiderable ſlaughter, and Varambon himſelf became a captive to the French; the duke d'Arſchot, who was appointed to ſucceed him, and reſtore the honour of the Spaniſh arms, though he avoided the fate of his predeceſſor, was reduced to remain a ſpectator of the deſtruction of the country; which the cavalry of Biron ſtill continued to inſult and ravage till the approach of winter compelled them to retire.

The ſatisfaction which Henry derived from the ſucceſs of his generals, was allayed by the factious and aſpiring diſpoſition of his nobles. The eaſy temper of the duke of Montpenſier recommended him to the nobility of France as a proper repreſentative to carry their injurious propoſals to the throne. The duke, in an audience from Henry, ſtudiouſly dwelt on the dangerous ſtate of the kingdom, and the difficulties that ſtill obſtructed the re-eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity; he added, one meaſure ſtill remained; to reſign to the different governors the hereditary right of the provinces they preſided over, and to require of them only homage and allegiance; the zeal and gratitude of theſe dependant princes would for ever attach them to his ſervice, and the troops they would conſtantly maintain for his ſupport, would enable him to triumph over his foreign enemies. The king remained ſome moments in ſilent indignation; but no ſooner had the emotions of anger and aſtoniſhment ſubſided, than he declared his reſolution rather to ſubmit to the moſt adverſe fortune, than conſent to a propoſal that would fix an empty ſceptre in his hand, and reduce him to the ſhadow of royalty. His reproaches awakened the duke of Montpenſier to a juſt ſenſe of his temerity; he implored the forgiveneſs of his ſovereign; and by his future fidelity diſconcerted the deſigns of thoſe who had allured him to act a part ſo unworthy a prince of the blood.

A. D. 1597.] Joyeuſe, who had quitted the habit of a monk to reſume that of a ſoldier, now with the ſame facility deſerted the decling fortunes of the league, opened the gates of Thouloufe, and returned to his allegiance to his ſovereign. The duke of Nemours had already entertained the ſame intention, when his negociations were interrupted by the ſtroke of death; his brother however continued the treaty that he had began, and reconciled himſelf to the crown; but while the king from theſe examples flattered himſelf with the hourly expectations of beholding the royal authority firmly eſtabliſhed, his fortitude was ſeverely exerciſed by an unexpected diſaſter that cooled the ardour of his newly acquired friends, and revived the fainting hopes of the league.

Amiens, the capital of Picardy, had lately ſubmitted to the king of France, and the citizens, with their ancient privileges, had obtained an exemption from being garriſoned by regular troops; their ſubſequent conduct proved how unworthy they were of the honourable truſt repoſed in them. Of fifteen thouſand inhabitants who were enrolled, only a few was employed as centinels and guards, and even thoſe performed their duty in the moſt remiſs manner. Their negligence had not eſcaped the knowledge of Portocarrero, governor of Dourlens, an officer brave and enterpriſing, and who, encouraged by the vicinity of his ſituation, planned a ſcheme for ſurpriſing Amiens. With three thouſand horſe and foot he marched from Dourlens, and, concealed by the darkneſs of the night, reached at dawn an hermitage about a quarter of a mile from the capital of Picardy. Twelve of his moſt reſolute ſoldiers, diſguiſed as peaſants, and with arms beneath their frocks, were ſent forwards as ſoon as the gates of the city were opened; ſome nuts which they carried, and affected accidently to ſpill, amuſed the guards; a waggon which they had driven, and intentionally ſtopt in the gate way, prevented the portcullis from being let down; they fell with fury on the aſtoniſhed centinels, were ſoon ſupported by Portocarrero and his troops, who ruſhed forwards to join them; and after a feeble reſiſtance, and a ſlaughter of about an hundred citizens, Amiens ſubmitted to the arms of the Spaniards.

The loſs of a city ſo ſtrong, ſo well provided, and ſo near to Paris, ſtruck Henry with conſternation. Calais, one of his principal ſea-ports, was already in the poſſeſſion of Spain, and by their preſent conqueſt the forces of Philip might extend their incurſions to the very gates of his capital. Though labouring under a ſevere indiſpoſition, the conſequence of his too licentious armours, the king renounced the care of his perſon, to provide for the defence of his kingdom; he determined to poſtpone every other conſideration to the recovery of Amiens, and immediately ordered mareſchal Biron to inveſt the town with whatever forces he could draw from the neighbouring garriſons, while he himſelf returned to Paris to provide the neceſſary ſupplies for the proſecution of this enterpriſe.

The abilities of the baron de Roſny, to whom Henry had entruſted the regulation of his finances, ſurmounted every obſtacle, and repleniſhed the exhauſted coffers of his ſovereign; the zeal of the duke of Mayenne was eminently diſplayed to ſecond the efforts of a monarch whom he had ſo long oppoſed; the friendſhip of Elizabeth had reinforced him with four thouſand troops; and the indefatigable induſtry of the mareſchal Biron, jealous of the preſence of the king, and ambitious of military fame, had already rendered the blockade complete, and rapidly advanced the ſiege, when Henry himſelf joined the army. Conſcious of the haughty ſpirit of Biron, he ſuffered him ſtill to retain the command: but though the beſiegers carried on their operations with redoubled ardour and alacrity, yet the garriſon diſputed every inch of ground with incredible obſtinacy; the death of Portocarrero, who fell in a deſperate ſally, diminiſhed not their confidence; and the defence was conducted with the ſame ſkill and ſpirit as before by the marquis de Montenegro.

Henry already had ſtuggled for five months with every difficulty that the experience or courage of the beſieged could oppoſe, when he was at length alarmed by the approach of the archduke, who, at the command of Philip, with an army of twenry-five thouſand men, preſſed forward to the relief of Amiens, and appeared in ſight of the French camp; the mareſchal Biron, tranſported by his uſual ardor, adviſed the king to accept their offer of battle: his counſel was oppoſed by the cautious remonſtrances of the duke of Mayenne: "Sire," ſaid he, "you came to take Amiens, and not to fight." Henry for once preferred the voice of prudence to that of glory; he kept within his intrenchments; the archduke, after ineffectually endeavouring to provoke him to action, retired to Arras, and reſigned Amiens to its fate, which ſoon after ſurrendered to the French.

From the reduction of Amiens and inſulting the province of Artois, Henry turned his arms againſt Dourens; the vigilance of Albert had already provided that city with every thing neceſſary to its defence, and the king had ſcarce commenced the ſiege before he repented his enterpriſe. The troops were harraſſed by the fatigues they had ſuſtained before Amiens; diſeaſes and ciſcontents began to prevail through the camp; the works were retarded by a ſeries of unfavourable weather; and the roads naturally heavy, by inceſſant rains were rendered impaſſable to the artillery; the king, convinced of his error abandomed the hopeleſs attempt; and after diſbanding the majority of his forces, and leaving the cavalry for the defence of the frontier, he returned to Paris.

A. D. 1598.] The greateſt part of the kingdom had ackwowledged the authority of Henry; but in Brittany the league ſtill nouriſhed the flames of ſedition, and the fire was ſecretly fed by the counſels and influence of Philip duke of Mercœur, of the houſe of Lorrain. For two ſucceſſive years that prince, while he profeſſed the moſt profound reſpect for the throne, had maintained a proud and dangerous independence; but the king, determined to extinguiſh theſe ſparks of civil commotion, aſſembled his forces on the return of ſpring, and had already advanced to Angers, when his further progreſs was rendered unneceſſary by the ſubmiſſion of the ſtates of Brittany, and of the duke of Mercœur. The former expelled the Spaniards from the few towns they ſtill held, and reſtored the royal authority; the latter, while he emplored the clemency of his ſovereign, intereſted in his favour the fair Gabrielle d'Eſtrees, the favourite miſtreſs of Henry. The duke offered to beſtow the hand of his daughter, the heireſs of the vaſt eſtates, on Cæſar, the natural ſon of that lady by Henry. The nuptials were celebrated with princely magnificence at Angers; the ſubmiſive proteſtations of the duke of Mercœur were accepted; and his former errors were conſigned to oblivion.

The recovery of Amiens and the extinction of the league, opened the eyes of Philip to the vanity of thoſe flattering dreams of conqueſt by which he had been ſo long deluded. His advanced age and broken health warned him of his approaching end, and he was unwilling to leave his experienced ſucceſſor involved in a bloody and dangerous war. Peace on the other hand was no leſs deſirable to Henry, and ſome reſpite was required to cloſe the wounds under which his kingdom had bled for ſo many years. The meditation of Clement, and the common father of both princes, were accepted; at the requeſt of the Roman pontiff a congreſs was held by the plenipotentiaries of France and Spain at Vervins, a town in Picardy; though the queen of England and the ſtates of Holland affered Henry the moſt effectual ſupport for the continuance of the war, he declined, with every profeſſion of gratitude, a ſyſtem which he declared muſt end in the utter ruin of the kingdom; and after ſeveral difficulties which the zeal of Clement was ſucceſsfully employed in removing, Henry ſigned a peace by which he relinquiſhed, indeed, his claims on Cambray, but obtained reſtitution of Calais, Ardres, Dourlens, and all the towns in France, that Philip had acquired at the expence of ſo much blood and treaſure.

A. D. 1598.] The peace of Vervins had reſtored tranquillity to the ſubjects of France; but the amiable qualities of Henry could not enſure that happineſs in private life, that his courage and conſtancy had commanded in public. Previous to the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew, he had formed a political union with Margaret, ſiſter to Charles the Ninth, and Henry the Third; a princeſs who united all the virtues and vices of the family of Valois, from whence ſhe ſprung. The beauty of her perſon inſpired paſſion and deſire in the coldeſt boſom; her genius and imagination were celebrated by all the poets of her time; ſhe ſung and played on the lute with exquiſite ſkill; and in dancing no lady of the court was her equal; but ſo violent was her love of pleaſure, that at twelve years old ſhe had ſacrificed to it her honour; Entragues, Charry, the prince of Martigues, and the duke of Guiſe, had been ſucceſſively admitted to her moſt intimate favours, previous to her marriage with Henry; and mingling the fervours of religion with the exceſſes of diſſipation, her hours afterwards were alternately occupied by enthuſiaſtic devotion, and unreſtrained ſenſuality.

While Margaret ſtretched her dominion over the multitude that admired and adored her, ſhe had never been able to touch the heart of Henry, on whom, indeed, at the command of her brother Charles, ſhe had beſtowed her hand with extreme reluctance, and to whom her irregularies were no ſecret. That monarch, who had broken the formidable confederacy of the league, and affixed bounds to the ambition of Spain, was himſelf the captive of the fair. His character bore a ſtriking reſemblance to that of Francis the Firſt, and he was always flattered and charmed by the compariſon. Like Francis, he had early engaged in a variety of promiſcuous amours; but for ſome time paſt his unlimited homage had been paid to the fair Gabrielle d'Eſtrees, on whom he had ſucceſſively beſtowed the titles of marchioneſs of Monceaux and ducheſs of Beaufort. Two ſons and a daughter were the fruits of their illicit commerce: and Henry, deſirous of eſtabliſhing in his offspring the peaceable ſucceſſion of the crown, even entertained thoughts of legitimating his natural children, and dividing his throne with the miſtreſs of his affections.

A. D. 1599.] The queen, who for ſeveral years had reſided at Uſſon, a caſtle in Auvergne, had already conſented to the diſſolution of a marriage, the effect of conſtraint; and the Roman pontiff readily liſtened to a meaſure calculated to promote the future tranquillity of France; yet both Margaret and Clement expreſſed the moſt pointed diſapprobation, when informed that the ducheſs of Beaufort was intended to be raiſed to the vacant bed of Henry. The paſſion of the king would probably have triumphed over all oppoſition, and have placed the crown on the head of his miſtreſs, when his fame was preſerved from this degrading inſtance of weakneſs, by an event as deciſive as it was unexpected. While the ducheſs of Beaufort, in the vigour of health and pride of beauty, feaſted her imagination with the grandeur of royalty, the viſionary proſpect was diſſolved by the hand of death. In the abſence of Henry ſhe was ſuddenly ſeized with convulſions, and expired a ſpectacle too horrid for deſcription.

Henry, on the intelligence of her fate, abandoned himſelf to all the tranſports of ſorrow; but that conſolation, which was vainly proffered by the attention of his courtiers, he derived from time and the duties of his ſtation. His ancient and inveterate enemy, Philip, was no more; but the latent embers of commotion, which ſtill lurked in the boſom of France, required all the care of the monarch to extinguiſh. Previous to the peace of Vervins, he had endeavoured to ſecure the tranquillity of the Proteſtants by the celebrated edict of Nantz. It granted to the reformed all the favours in which they had been indulged by former princes, and added a free admiſſion to all employments of truſt, profit, and honour; an eſtabliſhment of chambers of juſtice, in which the members of the two religions were equal; and permiſſion to educate their children, without reſtraint, in any of the univerſities. Yet even theſe liberal conditions could not entirely baniſh that jealouſy which the Hugonots had conceived on the king's abandoning their faith; and already their intrigues had reached the ear, and awakened the vigilance of Henry.

On the death of the ducheſs of Beaufort, Margaret had profeſſed an entire obedience to the will of her royal conſort, and Clement had pronounced her marriage, as the effect of conſtraint, illegal and void; but the king was diverted from the immediate thoughts of a ſecond union, by a paſſion for Henriette de Balzac, daughter to de Balzac Entragues, by Mary Touchet, the celebrated miſtreſs of Charles the Ninth; to this lady Henry transferred that affection which he had ſo lately vowed to the ducheſs of Beaufort; he created her marchioneſs of Verneuil, and even delivered to her a promiſe of marriage; yet the moments allotted to pleaſure, diminiſhed not his application to buſineſs, and the intrigues of the duke of Savoy ſummoned him from the embraces of his miſtreſs to the cares of a throne.

The duke of Savoy, emboldened by the late diſtracted ſtate of France, had embraced the moment of civil commotion to poſſeſs himſelf of the Marquiſate of Saluces. On the treaty of Vervins, he had agred to ſubmit his pretenſions to the arbitration of pope Clement; but had conſtantly eluded a deciſion, which he was conſcious muſt deſpoil him of the territory that he had thus daringly uſurped. Truſting to the arts of negociation, and the addreſs for which he was eminent, he embraced the reſolution of preſenting himſelf at Paris, and treating with Henry in perſon. Though the king would readily have diſpenſed with, he could not decently decline, the honour of the propoſed viſit; and in a court, gallant, profuſe, and ſplendid, the magnificence, liberality, and conciliating manners of the duke, ſoon attached to his intereſt the principal favourites and miſtreſſes of Henry. The marchioneſs of Verneuil eſpouſed his pretenſions with ardour; but the mind of Henry was ſteeled againſt the importunities of that lady, by a juſt ſenſe of the dignity of his crown, and by the remonſtrances of his miniſter, the baron de Roſny, whoſe inflexible integrity was ſuperior to all the allurements of corruption.

A. D. 1600.] After laviſhing the immenſe ſum of four hundred thouſand crowns in preſents to the rapacious minions of a court, the duke of Savoy retired from Paris, and prepared to aſſert by arms, what he had vainly hoped to have acquired by negociation. He had indeed already entered into a cloſe and ſecret connection with the mareſchal de Biron; but the military ardour and vanity of that commander could not be reſtrained by the intereſt of his new ally. The duke of Savoy in an inſtant beheld Breſſe, Savoy, and Nice, deluged by the forces of France; Miolans ſurrendered to the king; the baron de Roſny, whom Henry had appointed grand maſter of artillery, reduced Montmelian, a fortreſs which the duke had conſidered as impregnable; and St. Catherine's, in the ſtrength of which he equally confided, was, in the depth of winter, taken by the mareſchal de Biron. Theſe ſucceſſive diſaſters humbled the haughty ſpirit of the duke; and overwhelmed in the unequal conflict and deſerted by the court of Spain, which had promiſed to ſupport him, he reſumed the thoughts of peace; and implored the mediation of the pope to extricate him from a war in which he had thus raſhly engaged.

The ardent paſſion of Henry for the marchioneſs of Verneuil, and the miſery that he had experienced in his former marriage, rendered him extremely averſe to a ſecond. The remonſtrances of his miniſters, and his concern for the public welfare, had reluctantly extorted from him permiſſion to negociate an union with Mary de Medicis, niece to the grand duke of Tuſcany. Senſible of his irreſolution, the commiſſioners on whom he had devolved this important truſt, haſtened to conclude it. Their zeal outſtripped the wiſhes and expectations of Henry; and he heard, with mingled regret and ſurpriſe, that they had ſigned a treaty of marriage with that princeſs. His own honour and the happineſs of his people allowed him not to retract; he haſtened to Lyons to receive the hand of Mary; and whatever might be his private fellings, he diſcovered to his royal conſort no emotions but thoſe of reſpect and regard.

A. D. 1601.] The marriage of Henry was followed by a treaty with the duke of Savoy; who, diſappointed in that aſſiſtance which he expected from Spain, and equally deprived of that aid with which he had flattered himſelf from the diſcontents of the factious nobles of France, found himſelf no longer able to ſupport the unequal conteſt; for the marquiſate of Saluces, which he was permitted to retain, he conſented to cede to Henry the county of Breſſe, an extenſive territory on the banks of the Rhone, and to pay one hundred thouſand crowns to defray the expences of the war.

Yet while the duke ſubmitted to the arms of France, he did not relinquiſh the intrigues that he had entered into with the aſpiring chiefs of that kingdom. The principal of theſe were the dukes de Bouillon, d'Epernon, and the mareſchal Biron. That celebrated commander, whoſe exploits eclipſed the military fame of his father, and who openly boaſted that his arm had fixed the ſceptre in the hand of Henry, had long ſecretly laboured to undermine the edifice that his valour had erected, and his blood cemented. Born for the camp, he delighted in war, and excelled in every martial exerciſe; but the reſtleſs ſoldier diſdained the calm acquiſition of ſcience; and while he aſpired to the higheſt honours of the ſtate, was almoſt as illiterate as the meaneſt ſentinal. In action he was brave, indefatigable, vigilant, and abſtemious; but with his armour he ſeemed to lay aſide every virtue, and diſplayed a diſpoſition, vain, envious, and arrogant; no revenue was ſufficient to diſplay his boundleſs extravagance; and his fatal attachment to gaming, is reported to have ſwallowed within the compaſs of one year, the immenſe ſum of 500,000 crowns: his correſpondence with the duke of Savoy, had not entirely eſcaped the vigilant eye of Henry: and at Lyons that monarch had reproached him with his ſeditious deſigns. Biron affected frankly to confeſs the imprudence of his conduct. His profeſſions of repentance, and his proteſtations of future fidelity, diſarmed the indignation of his ſovereign, mindful of former ſervices. By a large pecuniary donative, Henry endeavoured to awaken his gratitude; and ſenſible that his active ſpirit could ill brook a life of indolence, he ſtrove to divert him from the dangerous practices that he had engaged in, by appointing him, as firſt ambaſſador to Elizabeth, and afterwards to the Swiſs Cantons.

A. D. 1601, 1602.] The birth of a ſon, while it afforded a ſource of domeſtic ſatisfaction to Henry, and opened to his people the pleaſing proſpect of a peaceable ſucceſſion, ſerved at the ſame time to quicken the deſigns of thoſe, who, impatient of tranquil rule, aſſociated in the moſt formidable cabals againſt the throne. The mareſchal Biron had no ſooner returned from executing the commiſſion that had been entructed to him, than he reſumed with redoubled ardour his ambitious projects; he entered into an alliance with the courts of Spain and Turin; he cloſely connected himſelf with the duke of Bouillon, who, by his marriage, had obtained the principality of Sedan; and united in his treaſonable enterpriſe, Charles count d'Auvergne, grand prior of France, and natural ſon to Charles the Ninth. Haughty and ſupercilious in his natural demeanour, Biron now affected the garb of courteſy, and aſſiduouſly laboured to ingratiate himſelf in the hearts of the multitude. The improper nomination to eccleſiaſtical dignities, at the influence of the miſtreſs of the king; the public neglect of the reformed, by a prince who had abjured their tenets, and who meditated their extirpation; but above all, the numerous impoſts which were daily multiplied by the ſovereign on an oppreſſed people, were the favourite topics of the mareſchal, and were induſtriouſly circulated by his adherents in factious murmurs through the provinces. The ſeditious vapour ſoon ſpread itſelf over the countries of Anjou, Poitou, Saintonge, Auvergne, Guienne, and Languedoc; the animated countenance of Henry was clouded with anxiety: gaiety and pleaſure were baniſhed from a court long diſtinguiſhed by its ſuperior gallantry and ſplendour; and the brooding tempeſt of revolt was foretold by every indication of ſuſpicion and diſcontent.

The ſplendid proſpect that Biron contemplated in the conſciouſneſs of his own military talents, and the power and influence of his confederates, were blaſted by one fatal inſtance of miſplaced confidence. La Fin, a native of Burgundy, and deſcended from a reſpectable family in that province, was diſtinguiſhed by a diſpoſition daring, indefatigable, and intriguing. He had inſinuated himſelf into the favour of the mareſchal, and had been employed both by Biron, and the duke of Bouillon, in their moſt ſecret negociations with Spain and Savoy; but he had lately regarded with jealouſy the aſcendancy which the baron de Lux had acquired over the mind of his patron; and in a moment of diſguſt, he revealed to Henry the whole of a conſpiracy, the wheels of which he was no longer permitted to direct.

The king read with aſtoniſhment the black ſcrowl, which contained the names of the moſt illuſtrious nobles of France. Some of theſe had actually embarked in the daring projects of Biron; others, by their known diſcontent, had afforded reaſon to expect they would join the ſtandard of revolt, as ſoon as it was erected; and the remainder were probably added by the creative genius of La Fin, deſirous of magnifying the importance of his perfidy: yet the danger was great and immediate; and the king determined to viſit the different provinces of Poitiers, Limoſin, and Guienne, to awe by his preſence the ſeditious ſpirit of the people, and to obtain more perfect information of the ſchemes of the mareſchal. Each day convinced him that he tottered on the brink of a precipice; and after a ſhort reſidence at Blois, he returned to Fontainbleau, determined to cruſh the infant conſpiracy, before it was ſtrengthened by the troops and treaſures of Spain and Savoy.

On his return from Switzerland, the mareſchal Biron had retired to his government of Burgundy, and diligently applied himſelf to ſecure and ſtrengthen the moſt important cities in that province. Confiding in the affection of the inhabitants, and in the fidelity of thoſe to whom he had entruſted the command of the fortified places, he conſidered that country as an immediate retreat, ſhould his deſigns be diſcovered before his confederates were prepared to ſupport him; but of this reſource he was deprived by an artifice of the baron de Roſny; under pretence of new-caſting the cannon throughout Burgundy, that miniſter, as grand maſter, had obtained from the mareſchal the artillery which belonged to his government; but no ſooner was theſe tranſported beyond the juriſdiction of Biron, than Roſny ſtopped the new, with which he had promiſed to replace them. The rage of Biron on this occaſion broke forth in open menances, and his ſuſpicions were ſoon after awakened by intelligence of the private conference that La Fin had held with the king; but he ſuffered himſelf again to be deluded by that traitor's proteſtations that he had not betrayed him, and that Henry was by no means appriſed of his deſigns. He was alſo conſcious, that ſhould his ſovereign march againſt him, and declare him a rebel, he was no longer capable of reſiſtance; actuated by the powerful motives of hope and fear, he obeyed the royal ſummons, and with his aſſociate, the count d'Auvergne, repaired to the court at Fontainbleau.

The mind of Henry, on the arrival of the mareſchal, was ſuſpended by the conflicting paſſions of gratitude and reſentment. When he called to remembrance the former ſervices of Biron, and the dangers they had ſhared together, his feelings drowned the ſtern voice of juſtice, and he determined to pardon the ambition of a man to whoſe valour he had been ſo eminently indebted; but when the calamities of civil war, from which the kingdom had ſcarce emerged, preſented themſelves to his view; when he conſidered the welfare of his people, and the infant ſtate of his ſon, both endangered by the reſtleſs and turbulent diſpoſition of Biron, the duty of a ſovereign, and the affection of a parent, loudly exhorted him to conſult the happineſs of millions, by the ſacrifice of one obnoxious perſon: yet he beheld the unhappy victim with tenderneſs and compaſſion; and while he treated him with every mark of regard, he endeavoured in converſation, to lead him to a full confeſſion of his guilt, and to juſtify the clemency that he ſtill panted to exerciſe, by his ſincerity and contrition.

Yet the friendly admonitions of the monarch could not bend a temper naturally ſtubborn and hauty; encouraged by the aſſurances of La Fin, the mareſchal retained a ſullen reſerve, and aſſumed the tone of inſulted integrity; he perſevered in declaring, that ſince the confeſſion at Lyons, he had nothing to accuſe his conſcience with; and Henry, fatigued with unavailing exhortations, at length reſolved to give way to the courſe of juſtice; mareſchal Biron and the count d'Auvergne were arreſted as they withdrew from the king's apartment, and were conveyed to the Baſtile. A commiſſion was directed to the parliament to examine into their conduct, and the proofs of their guilt were clear and poſitive; the very treaty with Spain, which Biron had ſubſcribed, and which he firmly believed that La Fin had deſtroyed, was produced againſt him. His judges unanimouſly, though reluctantly, pronounced ſentence of death. The intreaties of his friends prevailed on the king to change the place of execution; he was beheaded in the court of the Baſtile; and, in his laſt moments, diſgraced by alternate ſallies of rage, and agonies of terror, the character of Intrepid, which he had acquired amidſt the greateſt dangers of war.

The count d'Auvergne had been involved in the ſame ſentence as the mareſchal Biron; but regard for the brother of his miſtreſs, the marchioneſs of Verneuil, and reſpect for the laſt male deſcendant of the race of Valois, induced Henry to grant him not only his life, but alſo to alleviate the rigour of his confinement, and at length inſenſibly to reſtore him to freedom; a clemency which the ſubſequent intrigues of the count repaid with the blackeſt ingratitude. Of the other conſpirators, the principal threw themſelves at the feet of their ſovereign, who not only freely pardoned their imprudence, but even concealed from reproach their names; the multitude found ſhelter in their numbers and obſcurity—and the baron de Fontenelles alone, by a public and painful death, was doomed to atone for his treaſonable intention of delivering the fort of Douarnenes to the Spaniards.

It was not alone in detecting the dangerous deſigns of his foreign and domeſtic enemies, that the vigilance of Henry was exerciſed; the internal adminiſtration of his kingdom claimed and obtained his unwearied attention. Regularity was introduced into the finances, by the integrity and induſtry of his favourite miniſter, the baron de Roſny; new manufactures were eſtabliſhed, colonies planted, commerce extended, and agriculture reſtored; the rage of duelling which had proved mortal to ſome of the moſt gallant ſpirits of France, was at the ſame time reſtrained by new edicts; but it could not be diſguiſed, that the king, educated in camps, and impreſſed with lively notions of honour, too often ſanctioned by his expreſſions that fatal practice which his laws were framed to repreſs.

1603.] The tempeſt of civil commotion, which had alarmed France, was alſo felt in England. The conſpiracy and execution of the mareſchal de Biron, were preceded by the preſumption and fate of Eſſex, the favourite of Elizabeth; but though the queen, jealous of her authority, ſigned his final doom, ſhe never could eraſe from her heart that fond partiality which ſhe had ever evinced towards him. Oppreſſed by a ſorrow which ſhe affected to conceal, but which inceſſantly preyed upon her body, her frail conſtitution at length gave way to the emotions of her mind. During the latter hours of her life, the pride of royalty was overwhelmed by the torrent of returning affection; for ſeveral days ſhe rejected all conſolation, and even refuſed food and ſuſtenance. The few words ſhe uttered were all expreſſive of ſome inward grief that ſhe cared not to reveal; and in the ſeventieth year of her age, ſhe cloſed a reign of vigour, conſtancy, vigilance, and addreſs, the victim of a romantic paſſion, ſcarce credible in a love-ſick girl.

Henry, who had ever entertained the moſt profound ſentiments of regard and reſpect for Elizabeth, and who had concerted with that princeſs the depreſſion of the houſe of Auſtria, deplored the death of his old and faithful ally with a ſincerity ſeldom found in royal boſoms. His cloſe connection with England rendered it of importance to him to acquire a thorough knowledge of the diſpoſition of her ſucceſſor; and he diſpatched the marquis de Roſny to congratulate James the Firſt, who, by his ſucceſſion to the throne, united the dominions of England and Ireland to thoſe of Scotland; the feeble and temporiſing diſpoſition of that monarch, could not be concealed from the penetrating genius of Roſny; always negociating, and never daring to act, he ſuffered that power to become contemptible in his hands, which might have commanded the reſpect of the haughty Spaniard, and repreſſed the overweening arrogance of the houſe of Auſtria. Enamoured of peace, he conſidered the attainment of it as the only true object of a ſtateſman's labours; and though he agreed with Roſny ſecretly to ſupport the united ſtates, in concert with the king of France, leſt their weakneſs ſhould oblige them to ſubmit to their old maſter, yet that miniſter ſoon acquainted Henry, that he muſt not too implicitly depend on the exertions of a prince who continually expreſſed his dread leſt he ſhould be reproached as the abettor of rebels.

A. D. 1604.] Wearied by inceſſant importunities, the king of France conſented to reſtore the Jeſuits, and to demoliſh the pillar which had been erected to perpetuate the atrocious attempt of Chatel, and the dangerous principles of the order that he belonged to. But this freſh inſtance of the placable diſpoſition of the ſovereign, could not extinguiſh the embers of diſcontent which ſtill lurked in his kingdom. The duke of Bouillon had deeply engaged in the conſpiracy of the mareſchal Biron, and to avoid the ſtorm which he beheld gathering, had retired to his principality of Sedan; he now reſumed his correſpondence with the court of Spain, and with the count d'Auvergne. That nobleman, unmindful of the clemency, which he had ſo lately experienced, involved in his intrigues his ſiſter the marchioneſs of Verneuil, the favourite miſtreſs of the king, and her father Francis d'Entragues, on whom Henry had beſtowed the rank of mareſchal, as the price of the promiſe of marriage he had imprudently given to the daughter. Their deſigns were detected and diſconcerted by the vigilance of Henry. The marchioneſs of Verneuil was for ſome days confined to her houſe; but the paſſion of the man triumphed over the juſtice of the ſovereign, and Henry ſoon flew to proſtrate himſelf at the feet of the haughty beauty whoſe chains he found it impoſſible to break —D'Entragues, who had been condemned to loſe his head, was indebted for his life to the charms of his daughter; and the protecting influence of the fair was was even extended to her brother the count d'Auvergne, whoſe ſentence of expiating his repeated guilt on a public ſcaffold, was commuted to the milder doom of perpetual impriſonment.

A. D. 1605.] But when the vigorous mind of Henry was not faſcinated by the charms of female beauty, he well knew how to render his authority reſpected by his ſubjects, and to curb the wild deſigns of ingratitude and ambition. The duke of Bouillon for four ſucceſſive years had evaded every ſummons to appear at court, and the king determined by his preſence to humble that haughty ſubject, he directed his courſe through the counties of Auvergne and Limoſin; and Bouillon, aſtoniſhed at the rapid approach of his ſovereign, and unprepared for reſiſtance, ordered the governors of the different towns that belonged to him to open their gates, and diſarmed the immediate reſentment of Henry by the apparent ſincerity of his ſubmiſſion.

A. D. 1606.] But Henry had ſcarce returned to Paris before he was juſtly incenſed by repeated inſtances of the duke's reſtleſs and diſcontented diſpoſition. It was with reluctance that he prepared to reduce by arms a man whom the Proteſtants looked up to as the chief of their religion, and from whom he himſelf had formerly received conſiderable ſervices. But the preſent tranquility of his kingdom, and the ſucceſs of the lofty deſigns that he began already to meditate, all concurred in prompting him to meaſures the moſt vigorous and deciſive. With a train of artillery, which he entruſted to the command of his miniſter Roſny, whom on this occaſion he created duke of Sully, and with a ſmall but well appointed body of veteran forces, the king of France paſſed forwards to Sedan. To the laſt moment the vanity of the duke of Bouillon had ſuggeſted to him the language of reſiſtance; but with the approach of danger, the haughty ſpirit of that nobleman began to ſubſide; the inſincerity of Spain he was too well acquainted with; and the Proteſtants, inſtead of arming in his defence, flocked to the royal ſtandard; nothing now remained but to ſubmit to a power with which it would have been madneſs to have contended; in the generous and clement diſpoſition of his ſovereign, he ſtill found that reſource which his obſtinacy allowed him little reaſon to expect; the inhabitants of Sedan, with the duke, took the oath of fidelity to the king of France; a royal garriſon and governor were to be maintained within the walls for four years; and Bouillon, after having ſo long defied, eſteemed himſelf happy in eſcaping the vengeance of his prince on ſuch favourable conditions.

The good fortune which attended Henry in public, preſerved him alſo in private life. An unfortunate wretch, whom inſanity had impelled againſt the life of that monarch, was diſarmed by his attendants, and by the humanity of Henry was diſmiſſed to gentle confinement, and to that care which his melancholy ſituation required. In croſſing the river Neuilly, the royal carriage, by the ſpirit of the horſes, was precipitated from the ferry-boat, and overturned in the middle of the ſtream; the king, the queen, the duke of Vendoſme, and the princeſs of Conti, were expoſed to the moſt imminent danger. They were reſcued by the zeal and alacrity of their retinue; and Henry himſelf, after ſafely gaining the ſhore, plunged again into the river to extricate his conſort.

A. D. 1607, 1608.] But while the multitude exulted at the ſafety of a ſovereign whom they loved and revered, the royal boſom was deemed to experience thoſe cares which invade with impartial miſery the peace of the peaſant and the prince. The queen, cold and reſerved in her temper and manner, received with indifference, or repreſſed with diſguſt, the amorous aſſiduities of Henry. Her imprudent partiality to her Italian attendants, was regarded with indignation by that monarch; and his own licentious amours, his open connection with the marchioneſs of Verneuil, too frequently furniſhed juſt cauſe for reproach. The inmoſt receſſes of the palace were diſturbed by their mutual and inceſſant complaints. The happineſs which Henry found not in the company and converſation of his queen, he ſought in the familiar ſociety of others; the arrogance of the marchioneſs of Verneuil had for ſome time paſt been inſufferable; and the lively wit, the amiable manners of Charlotte de Montmorancy, the daughter of the conſtable, had inſenſibly ſtolen into his heart; yet he ſuffered not his paſſion, ardent as it was, and fatal as it propably afterwards proved, wholly to engroſs his mind. He renewed his ancient alliance with the United States of Holland; he aſſiduouſly cultivated the friendſhip of England; he ſucceſsfully interpoſed his meditation between the court of Rome and the Venetians; but he declined the importunate ſolicitations of the Mooriſh inhabitants of Spain; who oppreſſed, and at length driven into exile by the miſtaken policy of Philip the Third, in vain implored an aſylum in the boſom of France.

The wiſdom of Henry has been ſeverely impeached in refuſing the proffered acceſſion of near half a million of induſtrous people, whoſe ſilent labours might have fertiliſed the baren and deſerted plains of France; and repaired the fatal ravages which had been inflicted by religious commotion. The inclination of this unhappy race to prefer the former to the Catholic church, the perſecuting ſpirit of which they had already experienced, might perhaps in ſome meaſure influence the mind of Henry, long ſince grown diſtruſtful of the intrigues of the Hugonots; perhaps he was determined by the dread of precipitating thoſe hoſtile deſigns which he ſecretly meditated againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and which were yet ſcarcely ripe for execution. A conjecture which is rather ſtrengthened by the caution with which he continued to ſooth the jealouſy of the court of Spain, and the zeal which he diſplayed in negociating a truce with the united ſtates and the archduke Albert. The tranquillity of his kingdom was reſtored; the ambition of his nobles had been ſeverely humbled; the magazines were filled with coffers repleniſhed; order was introduced into his finances; diſcipline among his troops; and he beheld the moment rapidly approaching in which he might unfold the vaſt object of thoſe immenſe preparations which alarmed or aſtoniſhed all Europe.

A. D. 1609.] But while the power, the experience, and the reputation of the monarch filled his enemies with terror, the paſſions of the man too often expoſed him to the cenſure and pity of his friends. Nor time, nor ambition could extinguiſh his fatal affection for Charlotre de Montmorency; ſecretly nouriſhing the deſtructive flame, he determined to beſtow the hand of that lady on the prince of Condé, and by introducing her into his own family, at leaſt to enjoy the ſatisfaction of her converſation. The marriage was celebrated without pomp at Chantilli, and it was the expreſſion of the marchioneſs of Verneuil, "that "the king had made this match to ſink the heart, and to raiſe the head "of the prince of Condé." The paſſion of Henry ſoon burſt the bounds that his prudence had preſcribed. His looks, his words, his actions, inceſſantly betrayed the ardent emotions of his ſoul; the fire that conſtantly conſumed him could not be concealed from the prince, jealous of his own honour, and the fidelity of his wife. He deſired leave to retire from court, and the peremptory refuſal of the king ſerved only to confirm the ſuſpicions already entertained. His reſpect for his ſovereign was overwhelmed by a lively ſenſe of the injury intended; and after giving way to his indignation by the moſt pointed reproaches, he ſecretly prepared to eſcape with the princeſs beyond the limits of the kingdom, before the ungovernable paſſion of Henry had ſealed his diſhonour.

This deſign he executed with ſucceſs; reluctantly accompanied by his wife, and attended by a few domeſtics, he eluded the vigilance of thoſe who had been directed to obſerve him, and reached in ſafety Landrecy. The king received the intelligence of his flight with a tranſport of rage and grief that he was at no pains to conceal. He inſtantly diſpatched Praſlin, the captain of his guard, to demand the fugitives from the archduke; but Albret replied with becoming dignity, "that he had never violated the laws of nations on any occaſion what-"ever; and that he would not begin with a prince of the blood-royal of France". He immediately ſupplied the neceſſities of the prince of Condé with liberality, appointed an eſcort to conduct him to Bruſſels, and aſſured him of his conſtant protection.

The perſonal ſecurity of the prince did not entirely ſhield him from the effects of Henry's reſentment. After an ineffectual attempt to carry off the princeſs by force, at the command of the king the parliament paſſed an arret againſt the firſt prince of the blood, and condemned him to undergo whatever puniſhment the ſovereign ſhould pleaſe to inflict; with this judicial proceſs the martial preparations of Henry kept pace; and the armaments which had been ſuggeſted by ambition were probably quickened by love. England, the independent princes of Germany, and the United Provinces of the Netherlands, all readily aſſociated in the deſign of humbling the houſe of Auſtria; the duke of Savoy conſented to relinquiſh that country to France, on condition of receiving the duchy of Milan; while the majority of the Italian ſtates profeſſed that deſire to accede to a confederacy, on which they flattered themſelves with the hope of founding a permanent tranquillity. When to allies ſo powerful, and ſo firmly engaged by intereſt in the cauſe they had eſpouſed, are added the reſources of France in a diſciplined and veteran army of forty thouſand men, a treaſure of forty millons of livres, and the high reputation and diſtinguiſhed abilities of her king, it cannont be wondered that the aſtoniſhment of viſionary ſtateſmen have conſidered the force ſo far exceeding the object as even to have attributed to Henry the immenſe but chimerical project of forming Europe into one great republic.

At length the death of the duke of Cleves gave the ſignal for action; his dominions, which had been formed of four or five great fiefs, were claimed by the emperor, Rodolph, as ſupreme ſovereign; and he inſtantly beſtowed the inveſture of them on the archduke, Leopold of Auſtria. But this arbitrary uſurpation was diſputed by the ſiſters of the late duke and their repreſentatives; the duke of Brandenburg and Pruſſia, the count palatine of Newburg, the count palatine of Deux Ponts, and the marquis of Burgaw, were arouſed by the ſecret and friendly aſſurances of France, to aſſert their rights by arms, and to implore the protection of Henry.

A. D. 1610.] The king readily liſtened to ſolicitations which he himſelf had ſuggeſted. The conteſted territories ſtretched along the frontiers of his kingdom, and he was not inſenſible to the dangerous vicinity of the houſe of Auſtria; intereſt combined with honour in prompting him to a ſpeedy reſolution; and both, perhaps, were ſtimulated by the ſecret but ardent motives of affection; the prince of Condé ſtill boaſted the protection of the court of Spain, and the abſence of the princeſs had not allayed the flame that her charms had kindled in the boſom of Henry. That monarch declared his determination to lead an army to the ſupport of his German allies, and to vindicate with his forces and treaſures their pretenſions to the duchies of Cleves and Juliers. His road lay through the provinces of Flanders, and the archduke Albert, through whoſe country he demanded permiſſion to march, unprepared for reſiſtance, diſguiſed his hereditary enmity, and anſwered in terms of reſpectful acquieſcence.

NECKER

The ſupine indifference with which the houſe of Auſtria affected to regard the combination of its moſt powerful and inveterate enemies, has given riſe to a ſuſpicion probably as deſtitute of foundation, as it is injurious to the honour of that family; and the ſubſequent fate of Henry has, by more than one contemporary hiſtorian, been aſcribed to the perfidious and ſanguinary principles which have diſgraced the councils of Spain, and which but a few years ſince involved the deſtruction of the prince of Orange. With more reaſon the deadly ſtroke may be imputed to that fanatical fury kindled by a long ſeries of religious commotion, and not extinguiſhed by the fleeting years of tranquillity which had ſucceeded the peace of Vervins. Whatever might be the ſource of an event, which has been ſo variouſly related by the immediate ſpectators, and which ſeems at the moment it happened to have eluded the reſearches of the moſt curious and intereſted, it is our duty from the maſs to ſelect thoſe circumſtances only which can inform the mind and guide the judgement of the reader.

Amidſt all his preparations, amidſt the moſt flattering proſpects of acquiring that glory which he had ſo long and ſo ardently panted after, the diſpoſition of Henry was viſibly impreſſed with a deep and ſettled melancholy. The blameable indulgence of the queen to her Italian attendants, had been often the ſubject of his open diſcontent, and he had more than once meditated the deſign of compelling the moſt obnoxious to repaſs the Alps. From this intention he was diverted by his confidential miniſter the duke of Sully; and in conformity to the advice of that ſtateſman he endeavoured to gain on the cold and reſerved temper of the queen by acts of kindneſs and attention. That princeſs had expreſſed her deſire to be crowned before the king took the field; and Henry, though he regarded with diſguſt all pageantry and oſtentaton, had conſented to gratify her wiſhes. The ceremony was performed on Thurſday the thirteenth of May with the utmoſt magnificence; the next Sunday was fixed for the public entry of the queen, and on the Wedneſday following Henry had determined to quit Paris, and to put himſelf at the head of his army.

But the final period of his life and greatneſs now rapidly approached; and while he meditated enterpriſes the moſt ſplendid and important, his own death was planned and executed by Francis Ravaillac, a native of Angouleme. From that province the unhappy wretch had directed his footſteps to the capital; and after endeavouring to obtain a miſerable ſubſiſtence as an obſcure retainer to the law, he had attempted to procure admiſſion among the order of Feuillants; but theſe rejected him as a wild and frantic viſionary; and his diſtreſs had already reduced him to ſeek ſupport by imploring alms, when he conceived the dark and deſperate deſign of mingling the miſeries of a nation with his own, by arming his hand againſt the ſovereign of France.

Though the king had acquieſced in a ceremony which he conſtantly diſapproved, and though he had endeavoured by the appearance of ſatisfaction to diffuſe through the court that joy which he felt not, his expreſſions but too clearly announced his gloomy preſages of his impending deſtiny. From his confidential miniſters and domeſtics he concealed not the load that preſſed upon his heart; and "you will ſoon know how kind a maſter you have loſt," was the inceſſant and mournful exclamation. The morning that ſucceeded the coronation of the queen had been deſtined for a viſit to the arſenal; but the indiſpoſition of the duke of Sully induced the king to poſtpone his intention: he had already paſſed a ſleepleſs night, and with the return of light his apprehenſions and inquietude ſeemed every moment to encreaſe. He attended maſs, and prayed with unuſual fervour; the pleaſures of the table diſſipated not his chagrin; and after a vain effort to compoſe himſelf to reſt, he ordered his coach, and, accompanied by the duke of Epernon and Montbazon, the mareſchals Lavardin and Roquelaure, the marquiſſes de la Force and Mirabeau, and du Pleſſis Laincourt, his maſter of horſe, determined to proceed to the arſenal; Vitry, the captain of his guards, was by his order diſpatched to the palace to haſten the preparations for the queen's entry; and the carriage was only attended by a ſmall number of gentlemen on horſeback, and a few of the royal footmen. The curtains on every ſide were drawn up that the king might witneſs the zeal of his ſubjects in the various ornaments they had prepared. In a narrow ſtreet the coach was ſtopped by the accidental meeting of two carts; the majority of the attendants inſtantly took a nearer way, and two only were left; one went before to clear the paſſage, the other ſtaid behind to tie up his garter. At this inſtant, as the king turned to read a letter to the duke of Epernon, he received a ſtroke from a knife; he had ſcarce time to exclaim, "I am wounded," before a ſecond more violent, and more fatally directed, pierced his heart, and breathing only a deep ſigh, he ſunk back in the coach a lifeleſs corpſe.

Thus periſhed, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and the twenty-firſt of his reign, Henry the Fourth, whoſe virtues and talents have juſtly entitled him to the honourable diſtinction of Great. His acceſſion preſented to our view a kingdom diſunited, and a nobility haughty and diſcontented, a commonalty clamorous and oppreſſed. The broken provinces of the ſtate were cemented by his policy, the nobles were humbled by his valour, the commons were conciliated by his addreſs, and relieved by his humanity. He firſt introduced order into the finances, and diſcipline into the armies of France; new manufactories were eſtabliſhed at his command, and new colonies planted; and while he reſtored peace and plenty at home, he rendered his kingdom great and formidable abroad. The power of Spain was checked by his courage and conduct; and at the moment of his death he meditated deſigns againſt the houſe of Auſtria, which had they been ſucceſsfully executed, would have finnally precluded her from ever diſturbing again the tranquillity of Europe. In private life he was a kind and generous maſter; a warm and tender lover, a polite and obliging huſband; but the ſincerity of the hiſtorian will not allow him to conceal thoſe faults which he cannot but regret; the paſſion of Henry for the fair, too often induced him to forget the prudence and dignity of the monarch: his ardent and guilty affection for the princeſs of Condé in the decline of life, caſt a cloud over his meridian glory; and the warmth with which he purſued, and the indiſcretion with which he countenanced the fatal rage of gaming, has been the ſubject of ſevere and general cenſure.

Though the confuſion of the nobles who accompanied Henry allowed them not to ward the fatal blow, yet the moment their preſence of mind returned, it was diſplayed in ſeizing the aſſaſſin, who ſtill ſupported himſelf on the wheel of the coach, with the bloody inſtrument yet reeking in his hand, as if glorying in the atrocious deed. The prudence of the duke of Epernon preſerved him from the immediate fury of the royal attendants, to periſh by the moſt exquiſite torments; while the ſame caution enabled him to quiet the tumultuous apprehenſions of the populace, by declaring that the king yet lived, and that they were carrying him to the Louvre to have his wounds dreſſed. The crowd inſtantly gave way, the body conveyed to the palace, was laid upon a bed, and was ſoon deſerted by the ungrateful many who had baſked in his favour, but who haſtened to proſtrate themſelves before the riſing ſun, and loſt the recollectiou of former benefits in their eagerneſs to ſolicit new.

LEWIS THE THIRTEENTH.

WITH the life of Henry the Fourth were extinguiſhed the great deſigns that he had meditated againſt the houſe of Auſtria; and France beheld, with grief and terror, the ſceptre paſs from his vigorous graſp to the feeble hand of an infant. Of his three ſons by Mary of Medicis, the eldeſt, who now ſucceeded to the throne as Lewis the Thirteenth, was only in the ninth year of his age; and the two younger, though their birth might ſerve to ſtrengthen the ſucceſſion, could only be known by their different titles of dukes of Orleans and Anjou; but the queen, amidſt the diſmay of the court, waſted not the important moments in unavailing ſorrow; and the affliction, if any, that ſhe felt on the loſs of Henry, was ſwallowed up by the more intereſting care of obtaining the regency. Her ambition was gratified by the ready acquieſcence of the parliament; and in her perſon were united the adminiſtration of the kingdom, and the guardianſhip of her ſon.

The firſt moments had been employed in the acquiſition of power, the next were devoted to revenge. The wretched Ravaillac, whoſe guilty hand had precipitated the untimely death of Henry, was drawn from his cell, to periſh by the moſt exquiſite torments. His bones were broken by the arm of the executioner; his fleſh were torn by hot pincers; ſcalding lead and oil were poured upon his wounds; and his mangled body, ſtill ſenſible, was delivered to be diſmembered by four horſes; the ſtubborn frame reſiſted their utmoſt efforts; the indignant multitude, whoſe thirſt of vengeance could no longer be reſtrained, ruſhed through the guards—in an inſtant they put an end to his miſery, by tearing him in pieces; and with barbarous joy they dragged his limbs in frantic triumph through the ſtreets. Amidſt every mark of ingenious cruelty inflicted by public juſtice, or private hatred, he ſtill maintained, with conſtancy, the declaration, "that impreſſed "with the idea that the armaments of Henry were deſtined againſt the Catholic "church, and the ſucceſſor of St. Peter, he alone had planned, he alone was "privy to the deed, to the juſt horror of which he was now awakened—and "which he hoped in a future world, the torments he had ſuffered here, would in "ſome meaſure expiate."

On the firſt intelligence of the death of Henry, the prince of Condé quitted his retreat in the territories of Spain, and haſtened to urge his pretenſions to the regency as firſt prince of the blood. A ſplendid palace, a conſiderable ſum of money, and a penſion adequate to his dignity, were temptations that his neceſſities allowed him not to reſiſt; while the diſcontent of the count of Soiſſons was appeaſed by the important government of Normandy. The former miniſters of the crown, who had ſerved with fidelity, and who were recommended by their experience, were received with coldneſs, and liſtened to with evident diſapprobation; the queen abandoned herſelf, without reſerve, to her fond partiality for her Italian adherents; Conchini, a native of that country, and of obſcure extraction, had increaſed his influence by a marriage with Leonora Galigni, the favourite of the regent, and their united counſels ruled France and their miſtreſs with abſolute ſway. The mareſchal de la Chatre, with a detachment of twelve thouſand men, had effected a junction with prince Maurice of Naſſau, penetrated into Germany, and reſtored the duchy of Juliers to the marquis of Brandenburgh, and the count Palatine of Newburgh; but the court, as if fatigued with this inſtance of vigour, again ſunk into ſupineneſs; and the duke of Savoy, betrayed and deſerted, was happy to eſcape the chaſtiſement of Spain, by the moſt degrading and humiliating conceſſions.

A. D. 1611.] The duke of Sully, auſtere and inflexible, and who confiding in his integrity, diſdained the arts of courts, found that ſincerity, which had been eſteemed by Henry, no longer acceptable; he indignantly retired to the eſtates which he had purchaſed through the bounty of the late king, and reſigned his offices of governor of the Baſtile, and ſuperintendant of the finances; but the reformed, who ſtill confided in him, notwithſtanding the intrigues of the duke of Bouillon, exhorted him to retain his government of Poitou, and his poſt of maſter of the ordnance. Each day revealed the aſcendancy of Conchini, who endeavoured to remove from the eyes of the people the unpopular circumſtance of foreign birth, by aſſuming the title of marquis of Ancre. The death of the duke of Orleans, whoſe title devolved on his younger brother the duke of Anjou, did not interrupt the negociations which the queen and her miniſters eagerly purſued with the court of Spain. Inſtead of attempting to repreſs the dangerous ambition of the houſe of Auſtria, the regent, to eſtabliſh her authority, determined cloſely to connect herſelf with that family; and while the young king was contracted to the Infanta, the hand of his ſiſter, the princeſs Elizabeth, was engaged to the prince of Aſturias.

A. D. 1612.] While the princes of the blood concealed not their diſguſt at the influence of the marquis of Ancre, the reformed, in the union with the court of Spain, dreaded the revival of former perſecutions. The duke of Rohan, ſon-in-law to the duke of Sully, ſeized the ſtrong town of St. Jean d'Angeli, the government of which had been promiſed to him by the deceaſed king; in excuſe for the enterpriſe he alledged, that the court, at the repreſentations of the duke of Bouillon, had removed the mayor, who was attached to his intereſt, and appointed another, wholly at their own devotion; the queen, to quench the embers of revolt, conſented to reſtore the former officer—and the death of the count of Soiſſons, which happened ſoon after, left the prince of Condé without a guide, who again reconciled himſelf to the marquis of Ancre.

The duke of Bouillon had been diſpatched to England to remove the jealouſies which James might entertain at the late union between France and Spain, and to propoſe a marriage with the princeſs Chriſtina, the ſecond daughter of Henry, and the eldeſt ſon of the king of England; but the prince of Wales unfortunately expired in the dawn of manhood, when his talents and virtues had awakened the expectations of his country; and the duke of Bouillon availed himſelf of the opportunity to negociate the nuptuals of his own nephew, the elector Palatine, with the princeſs Elizabeth, daughter to James; a marriage, which probably prompted the elector to his enterpriſe againſt the kingdom of Bohemia; and which after plunging his poſterity in a long ſeries of abject diſtreſs, by the union of the princeſs Sophia with the houſe of Hanover, finally transferred the ſceptre of England to that family.

A. D. 1613.] The death of Francis, duke of Mantua and marquis of Montferrat, without male offspring, rekindled the ambition of the duke of Savoy. He diſputed in arms, the ſucceſſion of the cardinal of Mantua, the brother of the deceaſed prince, to the marquiſate. His liberality attached to his cauſe a conſiderable number of the nobility, and his forces, like a torrent, deluged the conteſted country, and ſwept before him all oppoſition to the very gates of Montferrat. That city conſented to receive the victor; and Caſal alone, encouraged by the preſence of the duke of Nevers, held out for the cardinal. At the ſupplicating voice of her kinſman and ally, the queen of France prepared to chaſtiſe the temerity of the invader. Spain and the Venetians, embraced, with rival ardour, the ſupport of the cardinal; the duke of Savoy, in his turn, was averwhelmed by the numbers and reſources of ſo formidable a confederacy; he was reduced to abandon his conqueſts with the ſame rapidity he had acquired them; and eſteemed himſelf happy in obtaining a peace, by acknowledging the pretenſions of the cardinal to the territories of his deceaſed brother.

A. D. 1614, 1615.] Whatever might be the ſucceſs of France abroad, at home, her annals for four ſucceſſive years, preſent a dreary proſpect of unintereſting anarchy and barren diſcord. The princes of the blood, inſatiate of power, and the nobles turbulent and diſcontented, repeatedly erected the ſtandard of revolt againſt the regal authority; as frequently, with contemptible levity, they courted the returning friendſhip of a court, whoſe timed counſels were content to ſooth without preſuming to repreſs their capricious arrogance. It was amidſt theſe inceſſant alarms and deſultory hoſtilities, that the king, who had been declared of age, concluded the double marriage with Spain, and received at Bourdeaux the hand of Anne the Infanta.

A. D. 1615, 1616. From the celebration of that ceremony, Lewis purſued his march, at the head of a ſmall, but well-diſciplined army, to reduce the prince of Condé, and to impreſs his ſubjects with favourable ſentiments of his courage and activity. The approach of the winter ſuſpended the operations of the contending parties, who, while they rejected all terms of accommodation, ſeemed ſtudious in every enterpriſe, to avoid the effuſion of blood; with the return of ſpring, the royal forces again aſſembled, and were again animated by the preſence of their ſovereign; but when his ſubjects daily expected the effects of that military ardour which had thus early tranſported him to a camp, they were ſurpriſed by the intelligence that he had ſubſcribed a peace, and had ſubmitted to the demands of thoſe princes, whom he had ſo lately declared traitors to his throne.

The fatal councils of the marquis of Ancre had influenced a meaſure ſo degrading to the royal authority; the alternate perſecutor and protector of the princes of the blood, he dreaded a war, which, if ſucceſsful, could add but little to his power, and if unſucceſsful, muſt be attended with his ruin. In the field, he well knew the king would be expoſed to the ready acceſs and ſuggeſtions of the nobility, jealous of the ſuperior fortunes of a favourite, whom they hated and deſpiſed; the partiality of the queen had inveſted him with the dignity of mareſchal; but this new rank had only increaſed the envy of his competitors, and the deteſtation of the public. He languiſhed to return to Paris, that by the aſcendancy of his wife, over the mind of Mary, he might ſecure himſelf from the hoſtile practices of his enemies.

His return to court exceeded his moſt ſanguine expectations. The queen, though no longer legally inveſted with the authority of regent, ſtill appeared to maintain her influence over her feeble ſon, and was herſelf devoted to the will of the mareſchal and his conſort. With laviſh hand he diſſipated thoſe treaſures which had been amaſſed by the ambition of Henry, and the unwearied frugality of Sully; new titles were invented, and new poſts were created to gratify the pride, or the avarice of his dependants; the ancient ſervants of the crown were diſmiſſed, and their places were ſupplied by the creatures of his pleaſure. At length, inflated with proſperity, and no longer able to endure a rival, even in the firſt prince of the blood, he prevailed on the queen to arreſt the prince of Condé, who had preſumed to menace him with his indignation.

The impriſonment of that prince in the Baſtile, awakened from their dream of ſecurity the dukes of Vendoſme, Mayenne, Nevers, and Rohan, with a ſplendid train of nobility, who haſtily retired from court, and prepared by arms to deliver themſelves from the oppreſſiou of the favourite; the public diſcontent was increaſed by the diſmiſſal of Villeroy, grown grey in the ſervice of Henry the Fourth, from the office of ſecretary of ſtate, and by the promotion of the biſhop of Lucon, ſince known as the celebrated cardinal Richlieu. The vigour that the court diſplayed was moſt probably the effect of the new miniſter's counſels; three armies, levied with diligence, immediately appeared in the field to ſupport the royal authority; the firſt in Champagne, commanded by the duke of Guiſe, reduced Chateau, Porcien, and Rethel; the ſecond, which acted in the Nivernois, and was conducted by the mareſchal Montigny, defeated and took priſoner the ſecond ſon of the duke of Nevers; the third was entruſted to the count d'Auvergne, whom the queen had drawn from the long confinement to which he had been ſentenced by Henry, and now placed at the head of the royal forces in the iſle of France. Age and misfortune had not extinguiſhed the youthful vigour of that reſtleſs noble. He ſurpriſed and diſperſed the ſcattered bodies of the confederates, and inveſted in Soiſſons the duke of Maynne, ſon to the renowned chief of the league. The walls of that place could not long have reſiſted his ardour; and he had already prepared to give the ſignal for a general aſſault, when the duke of Mayenne was preſerved from the deſtruction that impended over him, by an event as unexpected as it was deciſive.

While the mareſchal of Ancre, elated at the proſpect before him, gave looſe to a temper naturally raſh and vindictive, his capricious jealouſies and unbridled arrogancc precipitated on his own head the ruin that he meditated againſt his enemies. Ha had placed about the perſon of the young king a gentleman of the name of Luines, who inſinuated himſelf into the favour and confidence of Lewis, by his unwearied aſſiduities, and the ardour with which he planned and partook of his childiſh amuſements; but while the thoughts and hours of this new favourite ſeemed occupied by ſports and pleaſures the moſt frivolous, he in private nouriſhed an ambition above his rank and ſtation. The mareſchal had repulſed, with contempt, his offer of alliance by uniting his brother to the niece of Ancre; and Luines, not inſenſible of the ſuſpicious diſpoſition of the Florentine, determined to provide for his own ſafety, by the deſtruction of a man whom from that moment he ſecretly conſidered as his implacable enemy.

In the unguarded hours of familiarity, he impreſſed Lewis with a lively dread of the dangerous deſigns of the aſpiring Italian; he repreſented to him that his father, Henry the Fourth, had ever regarded, with peculiar averſion, the influence of the mereſchal, and Leonora, over the mind of the queen. That he had only been prevented by the tears of his conſort, from compelling them to repaſs the Alps; that the evils which he had foreſeen from their aſcendancy over that princeſs, were now realiſed: the firſt prince of the blood was impriſoned; the principal nobility were baniſhed from court; and the kingdom was plunged into the calamities of civil war, to ſatiate the revenge, or ſooth the arrogance of a ſupercilious foreigner. That while this inſolent minion diſpoſed at pleaſure of every employment of truſt and importance, the ſovereign himſelf was little better than a captive to the queen and the mareſchal; and the avowed preference and attachment of the former to his younger brother the duke of Orleans, ought to inſpire him with ſentiments of prudent diſtruſt.

A. D. 1617.] The tender years of Lewis were already diſtinguiſhed by that jealouſy of the royal authority which afterwards became the prominent feature of his character. He liſtened attentively to the repeated ſuggeſtions of Luines, and at length imparted his reſolution to atchieve his own deliverance, and to extinguiſh the torch of civil commotion by the death of the mareſchal. With the concurrence of Lewis, Luines exacted an oath from Vitri, the captain of the guard, to execute whatever the king ſhould command. He then diſcloſed to him the royal orders to arreſt the mareſchal D'Ancre, and Vitri having aſſociated in the enterpriſe his brother Hillier, his brother-in-law Perſan, and a few more friends, on whoſe courage and fidelity he could rely, prepared to execute the will of his ſovereign.

While the conſpirators were engaged in concerting their meaſures, the queen was confidentially admoniſhed to diſmiſs her Italian favourites, whoſe inſolence muſt involve in their ruin her own influence; and Leonora was exhorted to conſult her ſafety by a prudent and timely retreat; the natural timidity of her ſex inclined her to embrace the counſel that was offered; but the mareſchal indignantly rejected the alternative, and declared that he would never deſert that fortune which hitherto had conſtantly accompanied him. On the morning fixed for his deſtruction, he had entered the Louvre, ſurrounded by forty gentlemen who derived their ſupport from his liberality: he was earneſtly engaged in reading a letter, when the captain of the guard and his friends appeared; the retinue of Ancre, imagining they preceded their royal maſter, gave way; and Vitri, advancing to the mareſchal, arreſted him in the name of the king. In a moment of aſtoniſhment and indignation he laid his hand on his ſword; this mark of reſiſtance was the ſignal of his deſtruction. The command of Vitri to kill him was inſtantly obeyed; and three piſtols, diſcharged with unerring aim, extended the mareſchal lifeleſs on the ground.

The preſence of the king at a window which overlooked the bloody ſcene, repreſſed the ineffectual zeal of Ancre's adherents; his ſon, the marquis de Pene, and his wife, the unfortunate Leonora, were immediat ly ſecured. A judicial proceſs was commenced againſt the latter; her eſtates were confiſcated, and ſhe was condemned to expiate with her life, a crime that exiſted only in the malice, or ignorance of her perſecutors. She was charged, and pronounced guilty of having faſcinated the affection of the queen by magical arts; but the conſtancy with which in her laſt moments ſhe endured the ſevereſt tortures, commanded the admiration, though it diſarmed not the rage of her relentleſs enemies.

The deſtruction of her favourites was attended by the diſgrace of the queen-mother herſelf; that princeſs, diveſted of her guards, and the enſigns of royalty, was permitted to retire to Blois. The power which had been occupied by Ancre was transfered to Luines; the dignity of mareſchal was conferred on Vitri; his brother Hillier was raiſed to the vacant poſt of captain of the guards; and the biſhop of Lucon was compelled to reſign the ſeals of ſecretary of ſtate; which he had ſo lately received.

While the duke of Mayenne, hopeleſs and deſerted, anticipated in his terrors the puniſhment of unſucceſsful rebellion, he was agreeably ſurpriſed by the intelligence that the mareſchal d'Ancre was no more, and that the king had been pleaſed to approve his conduct, as originating in zeal for the public welfare. The gates of Soiſſons were thrown open to the royal forces, and the count d'Auvergne entered as a friend, that city which he had ſo lately afflicted with all the calamities of war. The dukes of Vendoſme, Nevers, and Rohan, alſo haſtened to court to throw themſelves at the feet of a ſovereign whoſe juſtice had extinguiſhed the object of their enmity; and while they loaded with reproaches the memory of the former, they laboured to acquire, by their aſſiduities, the friendſhip of the preſent favourite; the birth of Luines rendered him deſirous of ennobling his obſcure extraction by an illuſtrious alliance; the ſiſter of the duke of Vendoſme, and the natural daughter of Henry the Fourth, firſt preſented herſelf to his aſpiring hopes; but he dreaded the revival of that envy, which had proved ſo fatal to the mareſchal d'Ancre; and contented himſelf with ſoliciting the hand of the daughter of the duke of Montbazon; who with pleaſure conſented to receive as his ſon-in-law the favourite of the king.

While the deſtructive flame of civil commotion preyed upon the vitals of France, the duke of Savoy was expoſed to the formidable arms and reſtleſs ambition of Spain. The mareſchal duke de Leſdeguieres flew to the ſuccour of that prince, whom formerly he had encountered with equal ardour. The commands of the queen-mother could not reſtrain him from an enterpriſe in which the glory and intereſt of his country were deeply concerned. The late revolution ſuſpended his operations for a moment, but on the deſtruction of the mareſchal d'Ancre he reſumed them with the ſanction of the royal authority. In ſucceſſive engagements the troops of Spain were defeated by a veteran who joined the fire of youth to the experience of age; and at that inſtant he prepared to carry his victorious arms into Milan, and render Italy once more the theatre of war, his triumphant career was ſtopped by the intelligence of a peace, which Spain, baffled and humbled, had condeſcended to propoſe, and which the exhauſted coffers of the duke of Savoy had induced him to accept.

A. D. 1618.] The favourite, who had obtained from the partiality of his ſovereign the title of duke of Luines, endeavoured, by every method that policy could ſuggeſt, firmly to eſtabliſh his dominion over the mind of his royal patron; at the ſame time he aſſiduouſly courted the general opinion; to ingratiate himſelf with the people, he aſſembled the ſtates of Rouen, and aboliſhed the moſt burdenſome impoſts; to conciliate the princes of the blood, he appeared zealous in his ſolicitations to procure the freedom of the prince of Condé, and by a dextrous application to the intereſts of individuals, he converted the reproachful clamours of his moſt formidable opponents into profeſſions of eſteem. The duke of Mayenne was gratified with the government of Guienne, wreſted from the prince of Condé; the mareſchal Ornano was appointed to that of Normandy; and the duke of Luines reſerved to himſelf the iſle of France, the ſituation of which allowed him to exerciſe the duties of a governor, without neglecting the arts of a courtier.

Yet amidſt every precaution that prudence could dictate, amidſt the ſplendour of a fortune that was envied by millions, the reſtleſs hours of the favourite were conſtantly haunted by the dread of the returning influence of the queen-mother. Exiled and encompaſſed at Blois by hollow friends and open enemies, that princeſs was ſtill formidable. She entered into a correſpondence with the duke d'Epernon, who had quitted the court in diſguſt, and maintained in the city of Metz a ſullen independence. He readily liſtened to the advances of the queen-mother, whoſe partiality he had formerly experienced, and whoſe deliverance he engaged to atchieve. At the head of an hundred horſe, whoſe fidelity he could depend on, he ſuddenly quitted Metz, and rapidly advanced to Blois; Mary, informed of his approach, eluded by a ladder of ropes the vigilance of her guards; and deſcending from a window, eſcaped to the protection of Epernon, who conveyed her ſafely into Angouleſme, at the critical moment that the court had determined to commit her a cloſe priſoner to the caſtle of Amboiſe.

A. D. 1619.] On the firſt intelligence of the flight of the queen, the king and his favourite abandoned themſelves to menaces the moſt harſh and violent. An hundred thouſand men were deſtined to chaſtiſe the temerity of the duke d'Epernon, and the royal forces were commanded to aſſemble on every ſide to recover the fugitive princeſs, and to overwhelm her preſumptuous protector; but with the return of reaſon Lewis was awakened to the infamy of arming againſt his mother; and the duke of Luines was ſenſible that the public voice would attribute to his councils a war unnatural and odious. On the other hand, the duke d'Epernon beheld himſelf diſappointed in the ſupine indifference of the nobles, from which no exhortations either of his own or his royal ally could arcuſe them; he was ſenſible that alone and unſupported, he muſt ſoon ſink in the unequal conflict; yet though both parties ſincerely wiſhed for peace, the negociations were ſlow and indeciſive. To quicken theſe, the duke of Luines recalled the biſhop of Lucon, whom he had baniſhed from the ſide of the queen-mother, to Avignon. That prelate, whoſe commanding genius was already diſcerned amidſt the clouds of faction, was peculiarly acceptable to Mary; though the duke d'Epernon at firſt regarded him with jealouſy, the addreſs and inſinuating manners of Richlieu, ſoon diſſipated his ſuſpicions, and enſured his confidence. His influence again eſtabliſhed that tranquillity which was ſo earneſtly deſired. The queen-mother by the treaty of Angouleſme was reſtored to liberty, and indulged in the privilege of changing the ſeat of her reſidence at pleaſure; in lieu of the government of Normandy, ſhe received that of Anjou, with the caſtles of Angers, Pont de Ce, and Chinon. Her adherents were reinſtated in their poſts and appointments; but on this occaſion Richlieu himſelf diſplayed the features of honourable diſintereſtedneſs, and amidſt the various articles that he ſtipulated, ſeems alone to have neglected his private advantage.

A. D. 1619, 1620.] That diſcord which interrupted the repoſe of France, was diffuſed more widely, and with more bloody rage through the ſeveral principalities of Germany. The oppoſition to the houſe of Auſtria was inflamed by religious enthuſiaſm; the ſtates of Bohemia having taken arms againſt the emperor Mathias, continued their revolt againſt his ſucceſſor Ferdinand the Second, and claimed the obſervance of all the edicts enacted in favour of the new religion, along with the reſtoration of their ancient laws and conſtitution. The ſurrounding principalities, Sileſia, Moravia, Luſatia, Auſtria, and the kingdom of Hungary, took part in the quarrel; and each in their turn experienced the horrors and calamities of a civil war.

Ferdinand, bold and haughty, diſdained to conciliate by lenient meaſures thoſe diſaffected ſpirits he aſpired to chaſtiſe by arms. With the aſſiſtance of his own ſubjects, who profeſſed the ancient religion, and the alliance of the neighbouring Catholic princes, he beheld his armies ſwelled by the acceſſion of the Proteſtant elector of Saxony, by the rapid cavalry of Poland, and the firm and veteran infantry of Spain. To reſiſt ſo formidable a confederacy, the ſtates of Bohemia determined alſo to implore the protection of foreign powers, and they caſt their eyes on Frederic, elector palatine; who as ſon-in-law to the king of England, and nephew to prince Maurice, whoſe authority was become almoſt abſolute in the United Provinces, might from his own ample dominions, and the greatneſs of his connections, be able to defend the Proteſtant cauſe and the liberties of Bohemia from the hoſtile enterpriſes of the houſe of Auſtria.

The elector palatine, ſtimulated by the fire and ambition of youth, accepted the crown which the diſtreſs of the ſtates had proffered, and marched into Bohemia to the ſupport of his new ſubjects. But his raſh reſolution was diſapproved by James and Maurice; and the former reſtraining the ardour of his people in the cauſe of Frederic, and impreſſed with an exalted idea of the rights of kings, refuſed to countenance the revolted ſubjects of the houſe of Auſtria. The elector, defeated in the great and deciſive battle of Prague, fled with his family into Holland; and Spinola entering the palatinate, notwithſtanding the efforts of ſome Proteſtant princes of Germany, and a gallant band of Engliſh volunteers, commanded by the brave ſir Horace Vere, in a ſhort time made himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of that principality.

In France the power and favour of the duke of Luines ſeemed daily to increaſe; yet the queen-mother, though all her demands had been gratified by the late treaty, ſtill refuſed to appear at court, and nouriſhed in diſcontented ſecurity, at the caſtle of Angers, the ſeeds of revolt. To fortify himſelf againſt her influence, Luines had reſtored the liberty, and laboured to engage the gratitude of the prince of Condé. But the dread that union might have inſpired was balanced by the jealouſies of the reformed, by the murmurs of the people at new impoſts, and by the envy of the nobility, who could ill brook the fond partiality of the king, and the inſulting grandeur of his favourite. The duke of Mayenne retired to his government of Guienne; the count of Soiſſons, the dukes of Vendoſme, Nevers, Rohan, and Retz, haſtened to Angers, and offered their ſervices to the queen-mother; the duke d'Epernon once more declared in her favour; and Mary of Medicis, aſſuming the tone of independence, proclaimed her reſolution never to conſent to any future treaty, unleſs guaranteed by the parliament of France, or ſome foreign power.

But on this occaſion the king, tenacious of his dignity, acted with vigour and firmneſs. While his diſcontented ſubjects gave vent to their indignation in ineffectual invectives, with what force he could haſtily aſſemble, he entered the province of Normandy, confirmed by his preſence the doubtful allegiance of Rouen, reduced Caen, and compelled the duke of Longueville, who had eſpouſed the cauſe of the queen, to ſeek ſhelter in Dieppe. While his ſucceſs inſpired with hope and confidence his own adherents, Mary, aſtoniſhed at an alacrity ſo little expected, felt, with the approach of danger, the natural timidity of her ſex return; rejecting the bold and deciſive counſels of the duke of Rohan, to retire to Bourdeaux, and rely on the affection of that parliament, zealouſly attached to her intereſt, ſhe was perſuaded by the biſhop of Lucon to depend on the effects of negociation; a new treaty was ſubſcribed which confirmed the former; and a general pardon was granted to thoſe who ſhould deſerve the clemency of their ſovereign by immediate ſubmiſſion. On the day after the conditions were ſigned, the king, diſſembling his knowledge of the event, attacked and carried Pont de Ce, a fortreſs which he had formerly yielded to the demands of the queen, and which was now betrayed by the artifices of the biſhop of Lucon, and the cowardice of the duke of Retz.

If in the treaty of Angouleſme, the diſintereſtedneſs of Richlieu commanded the admiration of his enemies; in the preſent, the ſincerity of his counſels and the integrity of his conduct were universally suspected and loudly impeached. A secret article of the treaty too clearly revealed his ambitious motives. While the duke of Luines stipulated to obtain the dignity of cardinal for the aspiring prelate, the bishop of Lucon consented to bestow the hand of his niece, with an immense portion, on the nephew of the favourite; and Mary of Medicis discerned too late that she had fallen a victim to the specious arts and worldly views of the subtle churchman.

For a series of fifty years, the province of Bearn, the patrimony of Henry the Fourth, had maintained the religion of the reformed, pure and inviolate. The suggestions of the favourite, impatient of distinguishing himself by his zeal for the ancient worship, prevailed on the king to enter that country with his forces, and re-establish the Catholic church; surprised and unprepared for resistance, the Bearnois bent before the storm they were incapable of resisting; mass was celebrated in the presence of Lewis; and after suppressing the privileges, and uniting the principality of Bearn to the crown, the monarch returned in triumph to his capital to meditate new enterprises, and to extend the limits of the royal authority.

A. D. 1621.] The inhabitants of Rochelle, enthusiastic in the cause of religion, animated by the recollection of former exploits, and confiding in the edict of Nantz, still publicly convened their assemblies, and braved the orders of their sovereign; who prohibited their meetings as seditious, and proclaimed them rebels to the crown. But the duke of Luines, sensible of the danger of encountering the united force of the reformed, determined to detach from their interest the marescha duke de Lesdeguires; to gratify the ambition of that powerful chieftain, who ruled Dauphiné with almost independent authority, the post of marescha-general of the camps was instituted; but the favourite at the same moment seized for himself the sword of constable, which for seven successive years, since the death of the duke of Montmorency, had been denied to the solicitations of rank and ability.

The intrigues and preparations of the court could not be concealed from the vigilant eye of the Hugonots. The duke of Rohan, son-in-law to the duke of Sully, with his brother the duke of Soubise, exhorted them to defend their religious principles at the hazard of their lives. But du Plessis Mornai, who, in the reign of Henry the Fourth, had distinguished himself by his ardour in the cause of Calvanism, now avowed his reluctance to oppose the authority of his sovereign, and surrendered the important castle of Saumur, which commanded the passage of the Loire. His example was followed by the duke of Tremouille, and the duke of Bouillon, respectable from his experience, and from his principality of Sedan. The king himself, accompanied by the new constable, the prince of Condé, and the marescha duke de Lesdeguieres, invested St. Jean d'Angeli; for thirty-five days the duke of Soubise repulsed with persevering valour the incessant attacks of the royal forces; their superior numbers at length compelled him to surrender; and some praise is due to the magnanimity of Lewis, who respected the gallantry of the garrison, and permitted them to depart without molestation.

From the reduction of St. Jean d'Angeli, the royal army moved forwards towards Montauban; but the care of the Proteſtants had provided that place with a numerous garriſon, commanded by the marquis de la Force; and the pride and power of the monarch were ſucceſsfully oppoſed by the ſkill of that officer, and the conſtancy of his brave companions. Their ſallies from the town were equally bold and prudent; and in repelling the aſſaults of the beſiegers, they diſplayed an invincible courage; for three months Lewis and his general preſſed their attacks with incredible obſtinacy; but the loſs of the duke of Mayenne, with his braveſt officers and the flower of his army, obliged the king to abandon the hopeleſs enterpriſe, and to lead back his haraſſed forces to Paris.

With the ſiege of Montauban the reputation of the duke of Luines expired; and it is probable that a timely death preſerved him from experiencing on what a ſandy foundation he had erected the edifice of greatneſs. From the moment that he had extorted the ſword of conſtable, Lewis, profuſe to his favourites, but jealous of a maſter, had viewed him with eyes of diſtruſt; and the duke himſelf, alarmed at the ſymptoms of impending diſgrace, ſunk under the preſſure of his fears; and cloſed a life, remarkable only for the ſplendid and unmerited fortune that had attended it.

A. D. 1622.] In Spain, Philip the Third, unnoticed and unlamented, had ſunk into the grave; while Lewis, indifferent to the diſpoſition of foreign powers, reſumed his deſigns againſt his own ſubjects with redoubled ardour; he had beſtowed the ſword of conſtable on the duke of Leſdeguieres, who had abjured the Proteſtant religion, and entered the pale of the Catholic church. At the head of his councils he placed the cardinal de Retz, and the count of Schomberg; and in conſequence of their advice, he marched into the province of Poitou, with a ſmall but well-diſciplined army, to chaſtiſe the duke of Soubiſe, who, after the reduction of St. Jean d'Angeli, had collected a band of deſperate and indigent aſſociates, and ravaged the defenceleſs country. On the approach of the royal forces, he retired into the iſland of Rhe, ſeperated from the continent by a ſmall arm of the ſea, which was fordable at low water. The difficulty of the enterpriſe could not reſtrain the indignant courage of Lewis; impatient of reſiſtance, he croſſed the ſea under cover of the night, and ſtormed the intrenchments of his rebellious ſubjects; the duke of Soubiſe, with a few companions of his fortunes, eſcaped the vengeance of his ſovereign, by committing himſelf to the waves, and ſwimming to the continent.

Negrepeliſſe was ſtormed by the prince of Condé, and the lives of the inhabitants of every age and ſex were involved in one promiſcuous carnage; but this inſtance of rigid ſeverity impreſſed not with terror the enthuſiaſtic courage of the Proteſtants. The walls of Montpellier were defended by the duke of Rohan in perſon, and the prince of Condé beheld the flower of his army conſumed in ineffectual aſſaults; the citizens of Rochelle, though inveſted by ſea and land, ſtill preſerved their former conſtancy; and Lewis, liſtening to the counſels of the conſtable Leſdeguires, who revolved with concern the deſtruction of a party whoſe principles he had formerly ſo ſucceſsfully ſupported, conſented to cloſe the bleeding wounds of his country by a treaty with the Hugonots; the edict of Nantz was again confirmed; the royal forces were withdrawn from the gates and harbour of Rochelle; and the inhabitants of Montpellier ſubmitted to acknowledge their ſovereign, and to receive him within their walls; but the king in the moment of confidence violated the article that diſmiſſed them from the dread of a royal garriſon; two regiments devoted to his ſervice were left in that city; and the Proteſtants, too weak to oppoſe, could only indulge their reſentment in empty murmurs.

A. D. 1623.] During the convulſions of Italy, and the tranſient authority of the Sforzas in Milan, the Valteline, a country ſituated on the borders of Ferol and Milan, but annexed to the dominions of the latter, had been occupied by the hardy natives of that part of Switzerland diſtinguiſhed by the name of Griſons; their poſſeſſion of it had been guaranteed by Francis the Firſt and Henry the Fourth; but Spain, with the acquiſition of the duchy of Milan, extended her pretenſions alſo to the Valteline; to oppoſe her ambition, a confederacy was formed by the duke of Savoy and the ſtate of Venice; and France readily agreed to a league, in which her honour and intereſt were involved. The court of Spain, alarmed at ſo formidable a junction, conſented in ſome meaſure to recede from her claim, and to ſequeſter the Valteline into the hands of the Roman pontiff, Gregory the Fifteenth, an expedient which Lewis for the preſent thought it prudent to acquieſce in.

A. D. 1624.] But the attention of the public was ſoon diverted from foreign to domeſtic concerns. The cardinal de Retz had expired amidſt the diſſenſions of his country; the partiality of the queen for the biſhop of Lucon, now known as cardinal Richelieu, was revived; and the king was prevailed upon to introduce into his councils a man deſtined to reſtore the grandeur of France, and to eſtabliſh a new epoch in the reign of Lewis.

From the tedious and unintereſting annals of a monarch whoſe perſonal courage alone faintly gilds the gloom of the political horizon, the hiſtorian with pleaſure haſtens to the vigorous counſels and aſpiring ſpirit of his miniſter, whoſe commanding genius burſt the narrow limit of the cloyſter, and awed and aſtoniſhed the nations of Europe with the blaze of its meridian luſtre. Born to ſteer the veſſel of ſtate amidſt ſtorms and quickſands, the political talents of the cardinal Richelieu, have, to the preſent moment, extorted the praiſe and admiration of poſterity; frequently ſucceſsful, and always great, in his deſigns, he roſe with accumulated ſtrength from defeat; and the ambitious prelate had no ſooner exchanged the crozier for the ſeals, than his open and ſecret enemies were overwhelmed by the torrent of his ambition. During eighteen years he maintained his aſcendency over the jealous mind of his ſovereign; the reformed, who had triumphed over the artifices of Catharine of Medicis, and the dark rage of Charles the Ninth, were broken by his invincible arm; and the houſe of Auſtria, defeated and depreſſed, was forced to yield to his ſuperior fortune, that which the valour and virtues of Francis the Firſt and Henry the Fourth had in vain attempted.

His rivals in the cabinet were the firſt victims to the arts of Richelieu; and the duke of Vieuville, to whom had been entruſted the care of the finances, was not only diſmiſſed from his poſt, but even committed to the caſtle of Amboiſe; his ſucceſſor Marillac, endeavoured to avoid a ſimilar fate, by an obſequious compliance with the will of the cardinal: who no ſooner had eſtabliſhed his authority at home, than he prepared to extend the terror of his name abroad. His admiſſion into the conclave had not ſerved to impreſs him with zeal or awe for the court of Rome; and his contempt for the ſucceſſor of St. Peter was diſplayed in his inſtructions to expel the eccleſiaſtical forces from the Valteline. The marquis of Cœuvres obeyed with alacrity orders ſo congenial to his own inclinations; Gregory the Fifteenth, ſenſible of the inefficacy of the thunders of the vatican, which had once appeared ſo formidable, contented himſelf with remonſtrances, which Richelieu received with impatience and conſigned to neglect.

James of England, wrapped in the proud and conſtant contemplation of royal dignity, conſidered every alliance below that of a king, as unworthy of the prince of Wales; and determined never to beſtow the hand of his ſon Charles, but on a daughter of France or Spain. With the latter court his ambaſſador, the earl of Briſtol, had opened a negociation. Philip the Fourth received his propoſals with pleaſure; and with the infanta offered a portion of ſix hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, and the reſtitution of the palatinate, which had been wreſted from Frederic, ſon-in-law to James, by the emperor of Germany. But when all meaſures were agreed between both parties, and nothing was wanting but the diſpenſation from Rome, this connection, ſo honourable and ſo advantageous to England, was broken by a romantic enterpriſe, originally conceived with the idea of haſtening and cementing the propoſed alliance.

George Villiers, with the ſole recommendation of perſonal accompliſhments, had rapidly advanced in the favour of James, too partial to external advantages; and from an obſcure condition, had attained the rank and title of duke of Buckingham; to ingratiate himſelf alſo with the ſon, he propoſed to the prince of Wales to break through the forms which uſually bind the heirs of royalty, and paſſing in diſguiſe to Madrid, to introduce himſelf to the infanta as an ardent and devoted lover. Charles reliſhed the gallantry of the propoſal; a reluctant conſent by the tears of his ſon, and the reproaches of his favourite, was extorted from James; and the prince of Wales, accompanied by Buckingham, privately quitted London, and croſſed over to Calais: they had even the temerity in their journey to viſit the French court in diſguiſe, and the charms of the princeſs Henrietta, the ſiſter of Lewis, made a lively and deep impreſſion on the heart of the youthful prince.

Though Charles and the duke were received at Madrid with every mark of reſpect and attention by the king of Spain, yet the volatile manners, and diſſolute pleaſures of the latter, but ill accorded with the gravity and dignity of the Spaniſh court: Influenced by motives of diſguſt or caprice, he determined to return without accompliſhing the object of his journey; he eaſily obtained the acquieſcence of Charles; the delay of the diſpenſation from Rome afforded a decent pretence; and immediately on their arrival in England, the duke of Buckingham prevailed on the eaſy king and prince, firſt to ſuſpend, and afterwards to break off the negociation wito Spain.

A. D. 1625.] But James ſtill continued firmly fixed in his opinion, that his ſon would be degraded by receiving into his bed a princeſs of leſs than royal pedigree. After the rupture therefore with Spain, nothing remained but an alliance with France, and to that court he immediately applied himſelf. The earls of Holland and Carliſle were ſent over ambaſſadors on this occaſion; but though the portion of Henrietta equalled not that of the infanta, and the reſtitution of the palatinate could not be expected from this alliance, yet the ſuperior addreſs of Richelieu to the Engliſh miniſters, extorted the ſame terms for the Chriſtian king, as had been granted to the Catholic. To Henrietta was allowed the important privilege of educating her children till they attained the age of thirteen; and Buckingham was diſpatched to Paris to conduct the bride to her royal conſort, who, by the death of his father James, had aſcended the throne of England.

But the near alliance of France with a Proteſtant king did not deter the cardinal from nouriſhing the moſt fatal deſigns againſt the followers of the reformed religion. Pride had induced him to brave the impotent reſentment of the court of Rome; and that policy which conſidered the augmentation of the regal authority as the grand object of his adminiſtration, prompted him to meditate the extirpation of a hardy ſect, whoſe frequent revolts openly violated the dignity of the crown. Several circumſtances pointed out to him the favourable moment of enterpriſe; the duke of Bouillon, and du Pleſſis Mornai, formidable from their abilities, their experience, and their influence, had expired covered with years and glory; and though the brothers of Rohan and Soubiſe, by their martial exploits had acquired and maintained a high reputation, yet their impetuous courage too often ſlighted the voice of prudence, and precipitated their party into dangers, which hourly threatened their deſtruction.

The late treaty had been infringed by the introduction of a royal garriſon into Montpellier, and the remonſtrances of the Hugonots had been diſregarded or evaded by the court. A new ſubject of diſcontent now preſented itſelf in a royal fleet ſtationed at L'Orient, to guard and block up the harbour of Rochelle. The duke of Soubiſe offered with a few ſhips ſuddenly to attack and deſtroy the hoſtile ſquadron; and permitted the Hugonots, if he failed in the attempt, to diſown his conduct. Though his meaſures were betrayed, he happily accompliſhed the daring project: and on the firſt intelligence of his ſucceſs, his brother the duke of Rohan reſumed his arms, and again diſplayed the banner of revolt. A ſharp and deſultory war was carried on with that fire and animoſity that attends religious commotion. The Rochellers were defeated at ſea by the united ſquadrons of France and England; but the loſs of the confederates in the action prevented them from improving their advantage. The clamours of the Engliſh compelled their ſovereign to interfere; the mediation of the conſort of Henrietta was liſtened to with reſpect, and a peace at length was concluded, which confirmed the edict of Nantz; the harbour of Rochelle was delivered from the vigilance of the royal ſquadrons; the fort of St. Lewis, which approached and inſulted that city, was to be demoliſhed within ſix months; and the king of France conſented that his brother-in-law, the king of England, ſhould guarrantee to the Proteſtants the articles of the peace.

Philip had beheld with indignation the expulſion of the eccleſiaſtical troops from the Valteline; the French, as allies to the duke of Savoy, ſtill maintained the war againſt the power of Spain. The Spaniards, in attempting to raiſe the ſiege of Verue, were defeated with conſiderable loſs: but Urban the Eighth, who had ſucceeded to the apoſtolical chair, prevented the two crowns from coming to an open rupture. His zeal to reconcile the moſt powerful princes of the Catholic church was attended with ſucceſs; a treaty was concluded at Moncon, by which the ſovereignty of the Valteline was confirmed to the Griſons, and the paſſes of that country, by the gratitude of her allies, were ſecured to France.

A. D. 1626.] The reputation of Richelieu was not increaſed by his firſt eſſays in arms; to the Hugonots he had granted the moſt favourable conditions; and in the late treaty of Moncon the duke of Savoy loudly complained that his intereſts were deſerted. But if abroad his ability and integrity were impeached, at home, he was expoſed to the envy and rage which attends ſucceſsful ambition.—Gaſton, duke of Orleans, and brother to the king, had completed his eighteenth year, and that irreſolution, which formed the predominant feature of his character, began already to diſplay itſelf. His father, Henry the Fourth, had expreſſed his wiſh that he might be united to mademoiſelle Montpenſier, one of the greateſt heireſſes of France; but the favourites of the duke of Orleans endeavoured to divert his inclinations to a marriage with ſome foreign princeſs, whoſe connections might render him independent of the power of the miniſter. Their intrigues could not elude the vigilance of the cardinal; the mareſchal Ornano, who had even concerted the aſſination of Richlieu, was committed to the Baſtile, and delivered by diſeaſe from an ignominious death; the count of Chalais expired on a ſcaffold; the duke of Vendoſme, and his brother the grand prior, were cloſely guarded, and the count of Soiſſons, by a haſty flight, ſought ſhelter from the tempeſt in the court of Rome. The deſigns of his enemies ſerved only to eſtabliſh the authority and influence of the cardinal; and the partiality of Lewis for his miniſter, was evidently diſplayed in the honourable diſtinction of guards for the protection of his perſon.

The duke of Orleans, deprived of all in whom he could repoſe confidence, returned to court; and with his natural levity conceived, or pretended, a violent paſſion for mademoiſelle Montpenſier. The nuptial ceremony was performed by the cardinal; but though the duke himſelf obtained, from the liberality of his brother, the duchies of Orleans and Chartres, with the county of Blois, his ſolicitations for his unhappy friends were ineffectual; and the cardinal having cruſhed the enemies of his perſon, prepared to extinguiſh thoſe of his faith.

Though ardent in his deſigns of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, he was convinced, to exert the power of France, it was firſt neceſſary to extirpate the ſeeds of civil commotion; the Proteſtants, impatient of delay, had urged by arms the demolition of Fort St. Lewis; but their temerity was checked by the formidable preparations and vigorous meaſures of Richelieu; and the duke of Soubiſe, anxious for the ſafety of Rochelle, menaced on every ſide, implored and obtained the aſſiſtance of England.

A. D. 1627.] That court, embarraſſed by domeſtic factions and an unſucceſsful war with Spain, ought, perhaps, in prudence to have declined any hoſtile enterpriſe againſt the kingdom of France. Its mediation, in behalf of the reformed, had hitherto been attended with the greateſt advantages; and Richelieu himſelf, daring as he was, could not but regard, with ſome degree of dread, the martial ſpirit of a people who had ſo often proved the ſcourge of his country; but the duke of Buckingham ſtill maintained his aſcendancy over the mind of Charles; when diſpatched to receive the princeſs Henrietta, he had entertained a guilty paſſion for the queen of France; the beauty of his perſon, the elegance of his manners, and the ſplendour of his equipage, caſt round him a luſtre, which is ſuppoſed even to have dazzled the eyes of royalty; a private viſit that he paid to Anne, was received with a reproof that ſavoured more of kindneſs than anger; but his preſumption had not eſcaped the obſervation of the cardinal; the vigilance of that miniſter was exerted to preclude all future correſpondence; on the preparations of Buckingham for a ſecond embaſſy to Paris, he was informed by a meſſage from Lewis, that he muſt not think of ſuch a journey; and though he reluctantly abandoned the deſign, he ever after nouriſhed a deep reſentment againſt Richelieu, to whoſe ſuggeſtions he imputed his diſappointment.

A. D. 1627, 1628.] He had already, in a wanton inſult, diſplayed the features of his imperious diſpoſition; he prevailed on Charles to ſend back to France all the domeſtics of that nation, who had attended Henrietta to England. The mareſchal Baſſompierre was diſpatched by Lewis to the court of London, to remonſtrate againſt this infraction of the marriage articles; and though the addreſs of the ambaſſador rendered him acceptable to Charles, yet his efforts could only ſuſpend the increaſing jealouſy and enmity of Buckingham.

Implacable in his hatred, that haughty favourite now liſtened with pleaſure to the repreſentations of the duke of Soubiſe; in the naval victory over the Rochellers, the fleet of France had been reinforced by a ſquadron from England, and the ſubſequent peace had been concluded under the mediation of Charles: that monarch had aſſiſted in humbling the Hugonots, and his honour was concerned in faithfully guaranteeing a treaty, which his arms had compelled them to accept;

when to theſe arguments were added the ſolicitations of Buckingham, and the clamours of his people, zealous for their oppreſſed Proteſtant brethren, it is no wonder that the reluctance of Charles was overwhelmed by their united force.

Before the mighty preparations of Richelieu could be completed, a fleet of an hundred ſail, and an army of ſeven thouſand men, were fitted out for the invaſion of France. Both of theſe were entruſted to the command of the duke of Buckingham, who preſented himſelf with his armament before the harbour of Rochelle; but ſo ill-concerted were his meaſures, that the inhabitants refuſed to admit theſe formidable allies, of whoſe coming they had not been previouſly informed. Diſappointed in this expectation, the duke directed his operations againſt Rhé, an adjacent iſland, protected by a numerous garriſon and ſtrong fortifications; he landed his men, though with ſome loſs; and had he immediately urged his attacks, and not allowed Thoiras, the French governor, ſeveral days reſpite, he might probably have reduced St. Martin, the principal fortreſs of the iſland; but his negligence and unaccountable delay enabled the French to repleniſh the magazines, and reinforce the garriſon of that place. The Engliſh were repulſed in repeated attacks; detached and ſucceſſive bodies of troops were poured by the cardinal into the iſland; and Buckingham himſelf, after the loſs of two thirds of his original force, found it neceſſary to conſult his ſafety by a precipitate retreat. He conducted the rear in perſon, with a gallantry which, in ſome meaſure, effaced the diſgrace of defeat; but while the teſtimony of his companions eſtabliſhed the reputation of his courage, the voice of the public loudly impeached his ſkill and judgment.

The retreat of Buckingham was the ſignal for action to Richelieu. That miniſter had already ſecured, by ſeparate treaties, the alliance of Spain and the United Provinces; his addreſs had repreſented to the court of Philip his treaty with the latter, as ſolely a temporary expedient to prevent their arming in defence of the reformed—he had recalled and pardoned the count of Soiſſons—and while he reſtrained the levity, had conciliated to his deſigns the inclinations of the duke of Orleans. The army that he had aſſembled was commanded by the king in perſon, and animated by the preſence of the principal nobility. The cardinal, who accompanied his ſovereign, aſpired to the reputation of a generel as well as a ſtateſman; he planned the lines of circumvallation—deſigned the different forts, and directed the attacks. To deprive the beſieged of all ſuccour, his boundleſs genius formed the project of throwing acroſs the harbour a mole of a mile's extent in that boiſterous ocean. His diligence daily urged and inſpected the work; but before it yet could be completed, the fleet of England, commanded by the earl of Denbigh, once more appeared in view. The Rochellers crowded to their ramparts with the expectation of inſtant relief, and Richelieu trembled for the darling ſtructure which his daring ambition had ſuggeſted; but he was preſerved from diſgrace by the treachery or cowardice of the Engliſh admiral—and the earl of Denbigh, after throwing into the city a ſcanty ſupply of corn, declined an engagement with the fleet of France, and retired to Portſmouth. To efface the diſhonour of the Engliſh arms, the duke of Buckingham determined, in perſon, to reſume the command—but while his preſence haſtened the preparations, he fell a victim to the national indignation, and was aſſaſſinated by the hand of a fanatic, named Felton, who avowed himſelf prompted to the deed by the remonſtrance of the commons, that declared the duke the ſource of every national grievance, and the great enemy of the public.

The unhappy fate of Buckingham ſuſpended the armaments of England—each moment was aſſiduouſly employed by the cardinal—and he at length beheld the ſtupendous work completed, and enabled to defy the efforts of the enemy. In vain did the earl of Lindſay, who ſucceeded to the command of the Engliſh fleet, endeavour to force his way to the harbour. The mole, ſtrongly and firmly fortified, reſiſted and repelled the weight of his attacks. Hopeleſs of ſucceſs, he abandoned the Rochellers to deſpair, and ſteered back his courſe to England. The laſt ſpark of enthuſiaſm, which had ſo long inſpired the miſerable inhabitants of that city, expired with the ſignal of his retreat. While yet his ſails were in ſight, they conſented to ſurrender at diſcretion—and ſome idea may be formed of the miſeries they had endured, ſince of fifteen thouſand perſons who had originally been ſhut up in Rochelle, four thouſand alone ſurvived the fatal effects of famine, fatigue, and the ſword.

The king entered the proſtrate city in triumph—and the fortune of the cardinal was ſtill more conſpicuous in the moment of ſubmiſſion, than even his genius had ſhone forth in the courſe of the ſiege. Scarce had the citizens opened their gates to implore the clemency of their ſovereign, before a tempeſt, ſo violent, agitated the ocean, as to bury in the waves the proud ſtructure that he had planned. Had the Rochellers perſevered but a few hours longer, the fury of the ſtorm had overwhelmed the pride of the cardinal, and preſerved their freedom—but the wretched inhabitants drew ſome conſolation from the pity of their monarch; their walls were, indeed, diſmantled, but their perſons and effects were ſpared—and the moderation of Lewis and his miniſter, ſatisfied with having broken the power of the Hugonots, and wreſted from them their ancient aſylum, ſtill permitted them to enjoy an open and avowed toleration.

The celebrated duke of Leſdeguieres had expired amidſt the diſſenſions of his country, without beholding the humiliation of the reformed, whoſe tenets he had formerly profeſſed, and whoſe principles he had ſucceſsfully vindicated with his ſword. On his deceaſe, the king reſolved to ſuppreſs the office of conſtable, a dignity that he thought raiſed the ſubject too near the throne; he obtained, at the ſame time, from the duke of Montmorenci, the reſignation of the poſt of admiral, and committed the mangement of the marine to the vigilance of the cardinal. The genius of that aſpiring ſtateſman, which embraced every department, had juſtified the diſcernment of his ſovereign in the ſiege of Rochelle; but though his addreſs might baffle, his abilities could not extinguiſh, the hatred of a court; the ducheſs of Orleans had found her grave in the nuptial bed; after being delivered of a daughter, ſhe expired, lamented by her conſort, whoſe former reluctance her amiable qualities had converted into a lively affection; but the duke ſoon after reſumed his intrigues, his natural levity ſoon returned to efface the loſs of his late ducheſs, he profeſſed an ardent paſſion for Mary de Gonzagua, the duke of Nevers, and his addreſſes to that lady were alternately renewed, or ſuſpended, as his own caprice inclined, and the intereſt of his favourites dictated.

A. D. 1629.] The contempt of the cardinal for the ſee of Rome had been inſtanced in the expulſion of the eccleſiaſtical forces from the Valteline; ſuperior to the influence of religious ſuperſtition, from political motives alone, he had armed the power of the crown againſt the reformed, to exalt the glory of France and to depreſs the houſe of Auſtria, he now reſigned his own perſonal reſentments. On the death of Vincent duke of Mantua, his kinſman, the duke of Nevers, pleaded his claim as the next male in ſucceſſion to that duchy: but the emperor aſſerted his right as ſupreme prince, and beſtowed the inveſtiture on the duke of Guaſtalla; and the duke of Savoy alſo urged his pretenſions to the marquiſate of Montferrat, both were ſupported by the forces and treaſures of Philip: the banners of Spain were diſplayed from the walls of Mantua; and the duke of Nevers could only loudly accuſe an uſurpation which he was incapable of reſiſting. He had incurred the diſpleaſure of the cardinal by entering into the cabals of his avowed enemies; he was expoſed to the perſecution of the queen-mother, who regarded, with open averſion and female rage, the paſſion of the duke of Orleans for Mary de Gonzagua; but in the mind of Richelieu, the intereſt of the ſtate ſuperſeded every other conſideration, and while he abandoned the ſenſe of his own injuries, he was deaf to the implacable enmity of Mary of Medicis. He adviſed the king of France to embrace the opportunity of ſupporting his own ſubject, the duke of Nevers, againſt the injuſtice of the houſe of Auſtria. The ardent ſpirit of the miniſter communicated itſelf to the monarch: and with the veterans whoſe diſcipline had been confirmed and whoſe perſeverance had been exerciſed in the ſiege of Rochelle, Lewis, early in the enſuing ſpring, erected his ſtandard, and prepared to march to the relief of Caſal, which was beſieged by the forces of the confederates. The inclemency of the ſeaſon, the rugged tracts of the Alps in vain oppoſed his progreſs, he penetrated through the narrow paſs of Suza: and the duke of Savoy, alarmed at his approach, conſented to deſert his allies, and to negociate a treaty with France. He engaged to allow a free paſſage to, and to ſupply with proviſions the forces of Lewis: and he agreed, with his own army, to join the French ſtandard, and to chace the Spaniards from the walls of Caſal.

To the defence of that fortreſs, Lewis detached three thouſand choſen ſoldiers, under the command of Thoiras, who had already ſignaliſed his gallantry in the defence of the iſland of Rhé. The monarch himſelf, with his miniſter, animated by ſucceſs, traverſed again the Alps, and entered his kingdom to chaſtiſe the preſumption of the Hugonots. The duke of Rohan, undiſmayed by the reduction of Rochelle, ſtill diſplayed the banner of revolt in Guienne, Languedoc, and the mountains of the Cevennes. Niſmes, Montauban, Caſtres, Privas, and Alais, ſtill profeſſed the principles of the reformed, and declared their reſolution to ſeal their faith with their blood. While the cardinal, oppreſſed by a ſlow and dangerous fever, ſought a tranſient repoſe from his toils, the king aſſaulted the walls of Privas, compelled the garriſon to ſurrender at diſcretion, and devoted the inhabitants, without exception of age or ſex, to the ſword. Richelieu, rejoiced at his abſence from the promiſcuous maſſacre which ſullied the victory of his ſovereign. This inſtance of ſeverity ſtruck terror indeed into the citizens of Alais, ſtrongly fortified, and amply provided, that place might long have reſiſted the attacks of the royal army; the gates were immediately opened on the approach of the king, and the duke of Rohan, too fatally convinced of the inability of the Proteſtants any longer to defend themſelves by arms, ſigned a treaty, which reſtored the reformed to their eſtates and the free exerciſe of their religion, but deprived them in their fortified towns of the means of protecting either. He himſelf immediately after withdrew into honourable exile. But the citizens of Montauban rejected terms which involved their walls in deſtruction; and refuſed admittance to the prince of Condé, whoſe ſanguinary diſpoſition they dreaded. To the extortions of Richelieu himſelf they were leſs inexorable; the cardinal with his guards were invited to enter the city, and the lenity with which he treated the inhabitants, added a milder luſtre to the glory that he had acquired by the ſucceſs of his martial enterpriſes.

A. D. 1630.] The enemies of Richelieu had again reſumed their intrigues; but their cabals proved fatal to themſelves, and ſerved to confirm the authority of the cardinal, who Lewis, by letters patent, inveſted with the title of principal miniſter. The duke of Savoy had availed himſelf of the late hoſtile operations againſt the Proteſtants, had violated the treaty of Suza, and had joined the Spaniards in the ſiege of Caſal. To the title of miniſter, the king of France added that of leutenant general; and the cardinal, poſſeſſed of all the military and civil power, prepared to chaſtiſe the preſumption of the Savoyard. He croſſed again the Alps in perſon; and while he affected to liſten to the terms of accommodation, continued his march with unwearied rapidity. The heads of his columns were already pointed towards Turin, and the duke was diligently occupied in preparing for the defence of his capital, when Richelieu, ſuddenly changing his direction, preſented himſelf before the gates of Pignerol; that important fortreſs, which opened a direct road from Dauphine into Italy, was taken in twelve days; and the miniſter now ſummoned Lewis to the camp to ſhare the glory of his ambitious projects. With a veteran army of twenty-five thouſand men, the king of France overran and reduced the country of Savoy; Mazarin, afterwards ſo well known in France by the dignity of cardinal and the power of miniſter, was ſent to negociate with Lewis on behalf of the duke of Savoy; a partial ſuſpenſion of arms was all he could obtain; and that unhappy prince, who beheld his territories portioned out between his implacable enemies, and faithleſs allies, ſunk himſelf into the grave the victim of diſappointed ambition.

The death of the duke of Savoy facilitated the progreſs of the French. Revel, Ville Franche, and Poncallier, inſtantly capitulated; but their career of conqueſt was checked by a peſtilential diſorder, which thinned and debilitated the armies of France. The king himſelf indiſpoſed, and attended by the cardinal, had retired to Lyons; and the remnant of the troops under the mareſchals de le Force, Schomberg, and Marillac, were ordered to proceed to the relief of Caſal. Feeble and enervated by diſeaſe the ardour of the generals inſpired the ſoldiers—they already beheld the walls of that fortreſs, and the camp of the beſiegers—but when they hourly expected the ſignal for engaging, they were preſerved from the encounter with the freſh and vigorous troops of Spain, by intelligence of the treaty of Ratiſbon, negociated by Mazarin, and which eſtabliſhed the duke of Nevers in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the duchy of Mantua and the marquiſate of Montferrat.

The indiſpoſition of Lewis was attended by the moſt alarming ſymptoms, and in the danger of the monarch the miniſter beheld his own. His enemies, encouraged by the queen-mother, reſumed their hopes and intrigues—but when the phyſicians had even pronounced the recovery of Lewis impoſſible, a ſudden and favourable turn in his diſorder confounded the foes, and confirmed the authority of the cardinal. The moſt active of his enemies were diſgraced and arreſted—and Mary of Medicis herſelf was compelled to ſubmit to a feigned reconciliation with the haughty ſtateſman, whoſe influence over the mind of her ſon had overwhelmed his regard, and even his reſpect for his parent.

A. D. 1631.] Sweden emerging from obſcurity and animated by the heroic genius of the great Guſtavus, had already penetrated into Germany, and ſhaken by ſucceſſive victories the imperial deſpotiſm of the houſe of Auſtria; to ſecond her efforts the cardinal negociated a treaty, by which he engaged annually to ſupply Guſtavus with four hundred thouſand crowns, while he acquired with equal addreſs, by a ſecret article with the duke of Savoy, the ſtrong fortreſs of Pignerol, and prevailed on the duke of Mantua to admit a French garriſon into Caſal. Yet even theſe negociations, ſo advantageous to his country, could not exempt him from the malice of his adverſaries; the queen-mother and the duke of Orleans ſtill retained their implacable enmity. But their adherents, the princeſs of Conti, with the ducheſſes of Elbœuf and Leſdiguieres were ſentenced to exile, and the mareſchal Baſſompierre was committed to the Baſtile. Mary of Medicis eſcaped to Flanders from the ſtern juſtice of her ſon, and the inexorable reſentment of his miniſter; the duke of Orleans ſought ſhelter from the ſtorm in the court of Lorrain; and abandoning himſelf to his natural levity, eſpouſed Margaret the ſiſter of that prince.

A. D. 1632.] The pride of the king of France was wounded by the preſumption of the duke of Lorrain, in affording ſhelter to, and contracting an alliance with his fugitive brother. Twice he invaded the territories of that prince, and twice compelled him to ſue for peace on the moſt humiliating conditions. Amidſt theſe alarms the duke of Orleans had quitted a court which could no longer afford him ſecurity, and had retired to his mother Mary of Medicis, in Flanders. While Lewis purſued his career of victory in Lorrain, his brother having collected a feeble band of two thouſand followers, penetrated into Burgundy, exhorted the inhabitants to arm againſt the arrogance of the cardinal, and inſulted and deſtroyed the ſuburbs of Dijon. Chaced from thence by the mareſchal de la Force, he retreated to Auvergne; and purſued by mareſchal Schomberg, eſcaped with his miſerable train into Languedoc. The duke of Montmorency, who governed that province, received the brother of his ſovereign with open arms, and eſpouſed his deſigns with ardour. Though Thouloufe, the capital, maintained its loyalty, and proclaimed the adherents of the duke of Orleans rebels, yet the amiable qualities of Montmorency drew to Pezenas the principal nobility of the province; on theſe he beſtowed the title of ſtates of Languedoc; in an eloquent and ſpirited manifeſto he arraigned the pride, the inſolence, and the oppreſſive adminiſtration of the cardinal; and to ſupport his declarations by action, at the head of ten thouſand men, who had crowded to his ſtandard, he preſſed forwards to attack mareſchal Schomberg, who, with four thouſand infantry, had poſſeſſed himſelf of a ſtrong camp near Caſtelnaudari. The impetuous courage of Montmorency, with his cavalry alone, attacked the entrenchments of that general. His example inſpired his followers with the moſt heroic reſolution—the works of the royaliſts were pierced by their daring efforts—but while their leader diſplayed the valour of a ſoldier, he neglected the duties of a commander; his martial train, as they ruſhed on to improve their advantage, were betrayed into an ambuſcade and overwhelmed by ſuperior numbers—the duke of Montmorency, wounded in ſeveral places, and his horſe killed under him, was taken priſoner—and the duke of Orleans, informed of his fate, inſtead of endeavouring to retrieve the day, retreated with his ſcattered and diſheartened troops.

The inexorable juſtice of Lewis ſuffered not the duke of Montmorency long to languiſh in confinement—his proceſs was immediately formed before the parliament—he was ſentenced to loſe his head—and he expired on the ſcaffold with calm and undaunted courage. Inferior only to his anceſtors in fortune, in him were extinguiſhed the male deſcendants of the houſe of Montmorency—and while the jealouſy of Lewis refuſed to ſpare his life, his liberality enriched with his eſtates the prince of Condé, who had married his ſiſter.

While the fate of Montmorency was in ſuſpence, the duke of Orleans had endeavoured to obtain his pardon by profeſſions of future allegiance—but no ſooner had the deadly blow been given, than that prince retired again into Flanders. His abſence and intrigues gave but little uneaſineſs to the court of France. That kingdom each day became more conſcious of her own ſtrength, and of her weight in the political balance of Europe. The great Guſtavus, after repeatedly defeating the veteran troops of Ferdinand, and delivering Germany from the imperial yoke, cloſed in the arms of victory a life of ſplendid atchievements and military renown. The memorable field of Lutzen, in which he triumphed and expired, raiſed again the drooping ſpirits of the houſe of Auſtria, who welcomed a defeat that was accompanied by the fate of their moſt formidable adverſary. But Richelieu, diligent to improve every event, concerted his meaſures with prudence and promptitude—he nouriſhed by continual ſubſidies the confederacy of the German princes—he ſecretly negociated with the united ſtates of Holland—and he recalled the duke of Rohan from exile, and entruſted to his abilities the command of the French forces in the Valteline.

A. D. 1633, 1634.] Though Richelieu regarded with comtempt the machinations of the duke of Orleans, he ſuffered not the authority of his ſovereign to be inſulted with impunity by the reiterated hoſtilities of the duke of Lorraine. He eaſily perſuaded Lewis to regard that prince as the abetter of the factious deſigns of his brother, and once more to invade his dominions. Luneville and Saint Mihel were rapidly reduced by the French; Nanci was inveſted; and the unfortunate duke was compelled to ſurrender his capital as the pledge of his ſincerity, to deliver his ſiſter to the king of France, and to facilitate the diſſolution of her marriage with the duke of Orleans. But Lewis had ſcarce returned to Paris, before the duke of Lorraine having accompliſhed the eſcape of his ſiſter to Flanders, endeavoured to elude his engagements, and to preſerve his people from the calamities of war, by magnanimouſly reſigning his territories to his brother Francis. This artifice could not avert the indignation of the cardinal; the mareſchal de la Force, with a numerous army, re-entered Lorrain, ſurpriſed the new duke and his conſort, and eſtabliſhed the authority of France throughout the whole duchy. The duke of Orleans, diſmayed by the deſtruction of his brother-in-law and ally, concluded a treaty of reconciliation, quitted Bruſſels alone, and threw himſelf at the feet of Lewis. But though he conſented to live at Blois ſeparate from his conſort, he perſevered, with a degree of conſtancy unuſual in his conduct, to maintain the validity of his marriage.

While the cardinal counteracted with ſucceſs his domeſtic enemies, he was alarmed by the progreſs of the foreign foes of France, and the returning proſperity of the houſe of Auſtria. At Nordlingen the victories of Guſtavus were effaced by the total defeat of the Swedes; and the Imperialiſts beheld twenty thouſand of their adverſaries lifeleſs on the field. The policy of Richelieu revived their fainting courage with liberal and conſtant pecuniary ſupplies; but at the ſame time he ſtipulated for the immediate poſſeſſion of Philipſburgh and Spires in Germany; and the ceſſion of Alſace on the frontiers of Lorraine, as ſoon as he declared war againſt Spain.

Though long averſe to plunge his country into an open conteſt with the houſe of Auſtria, the ſituation of his allies allowed Lewis no farther delay. The forces of the emperor had already occupied Philipſburgh; and the cardinal concluded a ſecret treaty with the united provinces of Holland. On the intelligence of this hoſtile negociation, the court of Spain determined by activity and vigour to anticipate the deſigns of her enemies; ſhe poured her forces into Treves, ſurpriſed the capital, and ſeized the elector, who had acceded to the league with France. This bold and ſucceſsful enterpriſe was reſented by France by an open declaration of war. The mareſchals Chatillon and Breze were commanded to march to the ſupport of the prince of Orange, then in the neighbourhood of Maeſtricht; in their progreſs they encountered and defeated with cruel ſlaughter the forces of Spain, commanded by prince Thomas of Savoy. Animated by ſucceſs, and joined by the prince of Orange, they forced open the gates of Tillemont, and inveſted Louvain; but the diſſenſions of the commanders compelled them to abandon this enterpriſe with diſgrace; and an army which threatened to ſubvert the authority of Philip throughout Flanders, was waſted in vain attempts, or conſumed by fatigue and diſeaſe.

It was not alone by arms that Richelieu endeavoured to ſupport the glory of his country. His arts detached from the court of Spain the dukes of Savoy and Parma; and mareſchal Crequi was inſtructed, in concert with thoſe princes, to aſſert the liberties of Italy. He was defeated on the banks of the Po, by the ſuperior forces of the Spaniards, and loudly impeached the envy and diſcontent of the duke of Savoy, as the ſource of his misfortunes.

The king had beheld with impatience not only his foreign conqueſts ſhaken, but even his hereditary dominions inſulted; the duke of Lorraine had eluded the vigilance of his guards, and eſcaped from confinement; his appearance in that duchy revived the zeal of his ſubjects; ſeveral important places opened their gates to him; but his career was checked by the unexpected preſence of Lewis himſelf, who, at the head of a ſmall army, haſtily aſſembled, flew to maintain his former acquiſitions, retook Saint Mihel, and returned triumphant to Paris; while the duke of Rohan emulated in the Valteline the glory of his ſovereign, and in two bloody and ſucceſſive engagements broke in that country the ſtrength of the Imperialiſts and Spaniards.

A. D. 1636.] Metz was reduced by the forces of the emperor, but the Germans were compelled to raiſe the ſiege of Colmar by the cardinal Valette; who, deſpiſing the tranquil duties of the church, in imitation of Richelieu, aſpired to military glory. The Spaniards on their ſide poſſeſſed themſelves of St. John de Luz; but in Italy they were defeated by the ſkill and valour of the duke of Savoy; yet this misfortune was ſoon repaired, and Spain, after ravaging the territories of the duke of Parma, now meditated a more important enterpriſe.

To ſupport the war in ſo many different quarters, France had ſtripped of troops the frontier of Picardy, and expoſed it to the incurſions of her enemies. The Spaniſh army, commanded by prince Thomas of Savoy, and reinforced by the celebrated Picolomini, entered the defenceleſs province, occupied Capelle and Catelet, paſſed the Somme in defiance of the French troops under the count of Soiſſons, and in leſs than a week reduced the ſtrong town of Corbie. The Pariſians liſtened with conſternation to the rapid and unexpected approach of their foes; the capital was filled with terror and confuſion; the ſovereign involved himſelf in a ſilent and gloomy deſpondency; but the cardinal diſplayed a fortitude and magnanimity worthy of his elevated fortunes. He threw himſelf on the confidence of the public; he diſmiſſed thoſe guards which the partiality of the king had aſſigned him; and ever fruitful in expedients, called forth on this emergency the reſources of the ſtate. The horſes and domeſtics of the wealthy, the perſonal ſervice of the poor, were demanded to encounter the impending danger. The ſcattered bands of France were ſoon ſwelled to an hoſt of fifty thouſand men. Richelieu would willingly have aſſumed the command himſelf, but the count of Soiſſons refuſed to ſerve under him; and the cardinal entruſted the fate of France to that prince, and the duke of Orleans; whoſe jealouſy of each other he imagined would prevent them from combining in any intrigues dangerous to his authority.

The diſcernment of the cardinal on this occaſion deſerted him; the two generals acted with perfect unanimity, compelled the Spaniards to repaſs the Somme, and retook Corbie; but at the ſame time they concerted the deſtruction of Richelieu, and Amiens was fixed upon as the ſcene of his aſſaſſination. At the moment when the conſpirators expected the ſignal from the duke of Orleans, the reſolution of that prince forſook him, and he declared that his conſcience would not permit him to ſhed the blood of a cardinal, an archbiſhop and a prieſt. The miniſter was not appriſed of his danger till it was paſſed. The duke of Orleans haſtily retired to Blois, and the count of Soiſſons ſought ſhelter in Sedan; but the cardinal was unwilling at this critical juncture to increaſe his own enemies, and thoſe of the public. He prevailed on Lewis to treat both the princes with lenity; the duke of Orleans was ſoon reconciled, by acknowledging the validity of his marriage; and the count of Soiſſons was permitted to enjoy the income of his eſtates in exile.

A. D. 1637.] The enſuing campaign opened with events the moſt inauſpicious to France; the duke of Parma, beſieged in Placentia, was compelled to renounce the alliance of that crown. The duke of Rohan, neglected by cardinal Richelieu, who ſtill regarded him with jealouſy, after exhauſting his private credit, was conſtrained to evacuate the Valteline. But theſe diſaſters were followed by a ſeries of ſplendid ſucceſs; the count of Harcourt recovered in Provence the iſlands of St. Margaret and St. Honoret; the duke of Valette reduced ſeveral forts which the Spaniards had ſeized in Guienne; mareſchal Schomberg raiſed the ſiege of Lucat, and defeated Serbellon the Spaniſh general; cardinal de la Valette again planted the ſtandard of France on the walls of Capelle; the mareſchal de Chatillon ſucceſsfully inveſted Damvilliers in Luxembourg; and the duke of Longue-ville extended his conquests in Franche-Compté. In Italy, the duke of Savoy, seconded by marescha! Crequi, triumphed over the Spaniards led by the duke of Modena; and in the Netherlands, the vigorous efforts of the prince of Orange compelled the garrison of Breda to surrender.

A. D. 1638.] The flame of superstition was nourished amidst the devastations of war; and Lewis, to propitiate the favour of heaven, solemnly submitted his kingdom to the protection of the holy virgin. The duke of Weimar, who had been trained to arms in the school of Gustavus, and who maintained an independent authority over an army of various nations, was supplied from the treasures of France; he was however surprised and routed in the siege of Rheinfeld; the duke of Rohan, who had accompanied him from esteem, here received his mortal wound, and closed a life of virtue and glory. But the duke of Weimar within a few days effaced his disgrace by the total defeat of his enemies. Four imperial generals in chains attested his triumph; and the towns of Rheinfeld, Fribourg, and Brisac, acknowledged the dominion of the victor.

The death of the duke of Savoy rather increased than diminished the influence of France; his widow, the sister of Lewis, was appointed regent during the minority of her infant son; and Richelieu resolved to retaliate on Spain the invasion of Picardy by the siege of Fontarabia. But the prince of Condè, to whom that enterprise was confided, was defeated by the admiral of Castile, and with the remnant of his army with difficulty escaped to his ships. This miscarriage was balanced by a domestic event of the highest importance. The queen was at length delivered of a son, whose birth, while it secured the peaceable succession to the throne, contributed to check the turbulent levity of the duke of Orleans, and to establish the power of the cardinal.

A. D. 1639.] The duke of Weimar, while his vigorous age and mature judgement promised him a long and splendid career of glory, expired after a short illness; Richelieu had in vain endeavoured to persuade him to part with his new acquisition of Brisac; and his death at this critical period was not without suspicion of poison. By whatever means it was accomplished, the cardinal with his usual dexterity availed himself of his decease; he procured from his successors in command not only Brisac, but Fribourg also; and he prevailed on his army to acknowledge the authority of the duke of Longueville.

In Piedmont, the brothers of the late duke of Savoy disputed with his widow the succession to the regency. Supported by the marquis of Leganez, they surprised Chivas; were received into Quiers, Montcallier, and Goree; and assaulted Turin so suddedly, that the duchess had scarce time to retire into the citadel; from thence she retreated to Grenoble, where she had a personal interview with her brother; Lewis lamented her misfortunes, without affording her hopes of support. The defeat of the marquis of Feuquieres by Picolomini encreased the embarrassments of France; and though the court of Harcourt in Piedmont recovered Quiers, and eluded the superior forces of the marquis of Leganez and prince Thomas, his conduct and military skill were rather honourable to himself, than of essential service to the duchess of Savoy.

In the Low Countries, the marquis of Meilleraie reduced Hesdin, and acquired the baton of marescha. But the continuance of the war had already oppressed the people with heavy imposts, and the peasants of Normandy tumultuously assembled, and broke out in acts of open outrage. The parliament of Rouen were suspended for their neglect and lenity; and the chancellor Seguier, who was detached with six thousand troops to punish the guilty, determined to avoid a similar accusation, and extinguished the insurrection with the lives of the insurgents.

In Rousillon, Salces, which had been captured by the prince of Conde, was recovered by the Spaniards; but the count of Harcourt acquired fresh leurels in Piedmont. He relieved Casal, besieged by the marquis of Leganez; and retook Turin, though defended by prince Thomas of Savoy in person. At sea, the French obtained a decisive victory over the fleet of Spain; and in the Netherlands the mareschals Chaulnes, Chatillon, and Meilleraie, invested Arras. The cardinal infant, brother to Philip the Fourth, who had advanced to the relief of it was repulsed at the moment that he thought himself secure of victory; and the city, after a defence of thirty-five days, was compelled to surrender.

A. D. 1640, 1641.] But more deep and deadly wounds were inflicted on Spain by the imprudence of her own ministers than by the enterprises of Richelieu. The Catalans, indignant at the open violation of their ancient privileges, erected the standard of revolt: and Portugal, disdaiding any longer a dependant situation, shook off the yoke of Philip, and raised to the throne John duke of Braganza. To the support of the former, Lewis detached the mareschal de la Mothe Houdancourt, who reduced the city of Constantin; and with the latter he concluded a strict and solemn alliance. In Germany the count of Guebriant, who had been educated to war under the duke of Weimar, maintained against the Imperialists the glory of the French name; and the viscount Turenne, a pupil of the same school, happily seconded in Piedmont the efforts of the count of Harcourt.

The discontent and flight of the count of Soissons have already been noticed; in his exile of Sedan he still nourished his enmity to the cardinal; and supported by the dukes of Bouillon and Guise, he determined openly to pursue the emotions of his resentment. Richelieu sensible of his designs, detached mareschal Chatillon with ten thousand men to invest Sedan, and reduce him to submission. But the count was reinforced by a Spanish army under general Lamboi, and encountred the royal forces in the battle of Marfee. The troops of the mareschal were already broken and dispersed, when the fruits of victory were ravished from he conspirators by the death of the count himself, who perished by a random ball. The circumstances of his fate were dark and mysterious; but the policy of the cardinal prevailed on the king to consign to oblivion the guilt of his aſſociates; and the duke of Bouillon was again admitted to the preſence of his ſovereign, and permitted to retain the principality of Sedan.

A. D. 1641. 1642.] In the Netherlands, Aire was captured by the mareſchal Meilleraie, and recovered again by the Spaniards; but it was in Rouſillon, the poſſeſſion of which would enable him effectually to ſecure the Catalans, that the cardinal was determined to make the moſt vigorous efforts. Diſeaſe had long preyed upon his ſinking frame, but his mind ſtill roſe ſuperior to pain and laſſitude. His ardent ſpirit kindled the flame of martial ambition in Lewis; and though the declining health of the monarch threatened his ſpeedy diſſolution, yet he liſtened with pleaſure to the manly counſels of his miniſter, and prepared with Richelieu, to accompany the army into Rouſillon; but at Narbonne the indiſpoſition of the cardinal increaſed to ſuch a dangerous height, as compelled him reluctantiy to ſtop there, while the king, with the mareſchals Meilleraie and Schomberg, purſued his route, and encamped under the hoſtile walls of Perpignan.

A. D. 1642.] While Lewis in perſon preſſed the ſiege of that city, and Richelieu languiſhed on the bed of ſickneſs, a confederacy was formed, that promiſed to diſtinguiſh the power and ſhorten the fleeting moments of the latter. The lively temper, agreeable addreſs, and elegant perſon, of Cinq Mars, the ſecond ſon of mareſchal d'Effit, ſeconded by the recommendations of the cardinal, had rendered him peculiarly acceptable to the king; but the favourite, haughty and intractable, regarded with averſion the ſuperior aſcendancy of the miniſter; Richelieu had repreſſed his ambition that aſpired to the ducal honours of France; and the gratitude of Cinq Mars, for paſt favours, was overwhelmed by the refuſal of new dignities. Weak himſelf, and incapable of great deſigns, he liſtened to the ſuggeſtions of M. de Thou, the ſon of the celebrated hiſtorian; by the advice of that gentleman, he connected himſelf with the dukes of Orleans and Bouillon; and ſoon after, in conjunction with thoſe princes, formed a ſecret alliance with the court of Spain. The duke of Bouillon was to have the command of the army, and engaged, in caſe of danger, to receive the duke of Orleans into Sedan; while Philip the Fourth promiſed to furniſh the conſpirators with ample ſupplies of money and a formidable body of troops.

But theſe intrigues, however ſecretly conducted, could not eſcape the jealous vigilance of the cardinal. On the firſt intimation, he preſſed Lewis to quit the walls of Perpignan, and to repair to Narbonne. The defeat of the mareſchal Grammont, on the banks of the Scheld, diſpoſed the monarch to liſten to the ſolicitations of his miniſter, in whoſe abilities alone he could confide to retrieve the diſaſter; the cardinal, in this interview, is ſuppoſed bitterly to have reproached his ſovereign; and Lewis acknowledged that Cinq Mars had frequently urged him to the deſtruction of Richelieu. By the advice of that ſtateſman, the king proceeded to his capital, after inveſting the cardinal with diſcretionary powers for the de-ſtruction of his enemies. The duke of Orleans made an ample confeſſion; but though he refuſed publicly to bear evidence againſt his confederates, his life, as brother to the king, was reſpected; the duke of Bouillon purchaſed his pardon by the ceſſion of his principality of Sedan; but Cinq Mars and de Thou were condemned to atone for their preſumption on the ſcaffold; the morning of their execution brought intelligence of the ſurrender of Perpignan; and Richelieu apprifed the king of both events by a ſingle and expreſſive line—"Your troops are in Perpignan, and your enemies in the grave."

Mary of Medicis at Cologne, cloſed a life, embittered by the diſcord of her ſons, and her own exile; the filial affection which Lewis had denied to her while living, was revived on the news of her death; but the attention of France was engroſſed by the approaching diſſolution of him whoſe daring councils had driven her into baniſhment, and whoſe implacable vengeance had ſhed, by the hands of the executioner, the nobleſt blood of France. The glories and life of Richelieu now drew near their end; after the reduction of Perpignan, exhauſted in body, but ſtill vigorous in mind, he had approached the capital by ſlow and triumphant journies; his laſt moments atteſted his aſcendancy over his ſovereign, and were ſtill terrible to his enemies. On his death bed he proteſted to Lewis, that his councils had ever been directed to the honour of the crown and the welfare of the kingdom; and he terminated his ſplendid career with a fortitude and ſerenity that aſtoniſhed thoſe who had beheld the ſanguinary effects of his adminiſtration.

Three mighty and ſucceſsful projects immortaliſe the period of his government. He humbled the turbulent ſpirits of the great; he ſubdued the ſtubborn zeal of the Hugonots; and he curbed the encroaching power of the houſe of Auſtria. Undaunted and implacable, prudent and active, no combinations of the powerful nobles could withſtand his vengeance, no intrigues could elude his penetration. While he exalted the throne, he controuled a ſovereign impatient of rule and jealous of his authority; and while he extinguiſhed the liberties of the people, he eſtabliſhed among them diſcipline and order, and opened to them the paths of learning and renown.

A. D. 1643.] From the death of Richelieu, Lewis aſpired to hold the reins of government himſelf. Mazarin, for whom the late miniſter had obtained a cardinal's hat, and to whom he had lately imparted his confidence, was, indeed, introduced into the council; but the ſervants of the crown were retained in their former departments, and the only change that appeared, was recalling from baniſhment, and releaſing from confinement, the moſt illuſtrious objects of the cardinal's jealouſy or reſentment. The war was ſtill proſecuted with diligence and vigour, and the ſpirit of Richelieu ſeemed ſtill to impel the machine which his genius had firſt ſet in motion. In Germany, the count of Guebriant, and the Swediſh general Tortenſon, triumphed over the Imperialiſts; in Piedmont, Lorrain, Rouſillon, and Catalonia, the mareſchals Schomberg, Meilleraie, l'Hopital, and Houdancourt, in ſucceſſive victories, ſuſtained the glory, and increaſed the dominion of France.

But the ſucceſs of his arms could not check the progreſs of diſeaſe; and Lewis was ſenſible that the inevitable moment was rapidly approaching, when his reign and his life muſt terminate together. A ſlow fever inceſſantly hung upon him; and his body exhibited the ſymptoms of gradual but certain decay. The tender years of his ſons expoſed the kingdom once more to thoſe diſſentions which had lately been ſo happily extinguiſhed; and anxious for the welfare of his children and people, he diligently revolved in what hands to place the reigns of government. Anne of Auſtria, the partner of his bed, had never partook of his confidence; and his brother, the duke of Orleans, had forfeited his eſteem by his levity, and incurred his enmity by his ſeditious intrigues.

At length he publiſhed to the world the plan that he had ſecretly meditated; and endavoured, by diſtributing into different hands the power that he bequeathed, to counterbalance the aſpiring hopes of each, and to ſecure the tranquil minority of the dauphin. The queen, indeed, was appointed ſole regent, with the care of her children; but the duke of Orleans was declared head of the council, and lieutenant-general throughout the kingdom. In caſe of his death this truſt was firſt to be devolved on the prince of Condé and afterwards on the cardinal Mazarin. Buthillier, ſuperintendant of the finances, and his ſon Chavigni, were nominated to the council, in which all affairs were to be decided by a majority of voices. The queen and the duke of Orleans ſwore ſolemnly to preſerve inviolate the deed which they had ſubſcribed; and Lewis, to render it ſtill more authentic, commanded it to be regiſtered in parliament.

He now prepared to meet with firm compoſure, the laſt ſcene of human greatneſs; when his phyſician, at his earneſt deſire, numbered the fleeting minutes that remained, and pronounced that his life could not exceed two or three hours, he received the intelligence with avowed ſatisfaction, and looking fervently up to heaven, added, "Well! my God, I conſent with all my heart!" The prediction was verified by the event, and he expired ſoon after, in the forty-ſecond year of his age, and on the very day that he had completed the thirty-third of his reign. In eſtimating his character, on ſeveral occaſions his perſonal courage ſhone forth with ſuperior luſtre; but though jealous of his authority, he reluctantly yielded to the aſcendancy of Richelieu: and the epithet of Juſt, which he attained, was frequently impeached by his ſeverity, and ſometimes by his cruelty.

LEWIS THE FOURTEENTH.

A. D. 1643.] THE will of Lewis the Thirteenth, during his life, had been continually oppoſed, and after his death it was openly violated; his reſolution of eſtabliſhing a council of regency was inſtantly rejected; and his widow, Anne of Auſtria, by an arret in the parliament of Paris, was inveſted with unlimited powers; ſhe ſoon reſigned herſelf to the influence of cardinal Mazarin, a native of the little town of Piſcina, in the Abruzzo—his political knowledge and addreſs had introduced him to the confidence of Richelieu; and he now acquired that aſcendancy over the mind of his royal miſtreſs, as Richelieu had maintained over her deceaſed conſort.

Lewis the Fourteenth, the luſtre of whoſe reign afterwards attached to his name the envied appellation of Great, had not yet completed his fifth year, and the kingdom was left involved in a bloody and extenſive war with the houſe of Auſtria—but the ſituation of Europe was favourable to the deſigns of France. The kingdom of Portugal had ſhaken off the Spaniſh yoke, and eſtabliſhed the duke of Braganza, as John the Fourth, on the throne—the Catalans ſtill diſplayed the banner of revolt—the united provinces had been cheriſhed and protected by Henry the Fourth and Lewis the Thirteenth—the ſceptre of Sweden was in the hands of Chriſtina, the celebrated, but eccentric daughter of the great Guſtavus, and her generals ſtill maintained in war the glory of their country—while, in England, Charles the Firſt, inheriting from his father his fatal and lofty ideas of royal prerogative, had already kindled the flame of civil war throughout that iſland.

Lewis of Bourbon, duke of Enguien, ſon to the prince of Condé, had been appointed to the command of the French forces on the frontiers of Flanders, previous to the death of Lewis the Thirteenth; on intelligence of that event, he determined to attack the army of Spain, engaged in the ſiege of Rocroi—the remonſtrances of mareſchal de l'Hopital were overborne by his ardour—and in the execution of his deſign, the fire of youth was united with ſkill and judgment, ſcarce to be found in age. The Spaniſh infantry, till then deemed invincible, was broken by his impetuous charge; the count of Fuentes, who commanded it, periſhed on the field—nine thouſand ſlaughtered enemies, and twenty pieces of cannon, atteſted the deciſive victory of France, and uſhered in the dawning glory of her general.

A. D. 1643, 1644.] Thionville, on the banks of the Moſelle, had excited the deſires, and awed the aſpiring genius of Richelieu; it now yielded to the arms of the duke of Enguien, who rapidly traverſed the Rhine, and advanced to avenge the death of the count of Guebriant, who had glorioufly fallen in the ſucceſsful ſiege of Rotwil. The Imperialiſts had availed themſelves of the fate of that general, and the diſſenſions of his ſucceſſors in command, by the total defeat of the French near Tudelingen—but this diſgrace was effaced by the valour and ſkill of the duke of Enguien, who attacked and forced the Imperial army under the walls of Fribourg; general Merci, though vanquiſhed, ſtill maintained his reputation, and, by his retreat, extorted the admiration of his adverſary; who ſwept with his victorious troops Philipſburgh and Mentz, Worms and Oppenheim, with the forts along the courſe of the Rhine.

A. D. 1645, 1646.] In Flanders, the duke of Orleans reduced Gravelines, Mardyke, and Coutrai; but the mareſchal de la Mothe Houdancourt was defeated in Catalonia; and the victory of Tortenſon, the Swediſh general, over the Imperialiſts at Tabor, was more than balanced by the ſurpriſe of mareſchal Turenne at Mariendal: this diſgrace, the greateſt that ever befel that celebrateted commander, ſummoned once more the duke of Enguien to the frontiers of Germany. The laurels which Merci had ſo lately acquired, were torn from his brow in the plains of Nordlingen; but the indignant hero ſcorned to ſurvive defeat, and he obtained a glorious death, which even the victor could not but envy; three thouſand Imperialiſts periſhed on the field with their general; two thouſand acknowledged, in captivity, the ſuperior fortune of the duke of Enguien; who, after adding Dunkirk to the dominions of France, returned to the capital to reſtore his health ſhaken by fatigues, and to meditate new triumphs.

A. D. 1647.] But his ſplendid career of glory, inſtead of exciting the gratitude, had awakened the jealouſy of the court; and, by the envy of Mazarin, he was detached into Catalonia with a feeble and ill-provided army. The death of his father had devolved on him the title of prince of Condé, and the admiration of the public had annexed to it the epithet of Great; but his ſlender force allowed him not on that theatre to rival his former actions; and he was compelled to retire from the walls of Lerida, which had been ſucceſſively and ineffectually aſſaulted by the mareſchal de la Mothe Houdancourt, and the count of Grammont.

A. D. 1647, 1648.] Naples had revolted againſt the authority of Spain, and was long defended by the duke of Guiſe, the laſt prince of that branch of Lorrain, and who was inferior to his anceſtors in fortune alone. In Germany the mareſchal Turenne, in conjunction with the Swedes, defeated the Imperial generals Melander and Montecuculli; his ſucceſs influenced Spain to acknowledge the united provinces as free and independent ſtates; and by a ſecond treaty ſubſcribed at Munſter, the emperor, alarmed at the progreſs of the Swedes, who had inſulted and plundered part of Prague, conſented to purchaſe peace by ceding to France the biſhoprics of Metz, Toul and Verdun, with his pretenſions to Pignerol, Briſac, and Alſace; he permitted that crown alſo to retain a garriſon in Philipſburgh and Pomerania, conceſſions ſtill more liberal and important.

A. D. 1648.] Philip the Fourth, by his treaty with the Dutch, had deprived France of an important ally, and had delivered himſelf from a ſtubborn and perſevering enemy. He now renewed, with increaſe of vigour, his operations in Flanders, where the prince of Condé had reſumed the command. That general inveſted and reduced Ypres; and the archduke Leopold, to balance this acquiſition, aſſaulted and carried Coutrai, poſſeſſed himſelf of Furnes, and laid ſiege to Lens; to the relief of that place the prince of Condé advanced, and had the mortification of beholding it ſurrendered in his view. But this tranſient diſgrace was effaced by a victory the moſt ſplendid and deciſive; "My friends, remember "Rocroi, Fribourg, and Nordlingen," was his ſhort but animating addreſs; and the ſuperior numbers of the Spaniards were broken by the charge of a hero, and the enthuſiaſtic confidence of his followers; five thouſand periſhed on the field, three thouſand became priſoners, and the archduke himſelf with difficulty eſcaped the purſuit of the victors.

But while France triumphed in her own ſucceſſes and thoſe of her allies, the moment approached, doomed to ſhake her power and glory to the foundation by the rage of contending factions. Though Mazarin had affected moderation in his conduct, and baniſhed that pomp in which Richelieu had involved himſelf, yet his adminiſtration was far from acceptable to the public. As a foreigner, they regarded him with jealouſy; and the taxes that the profuſion or the neceſſities of the government compelled him to impoſe, converted that paſſion into hatred. The parliament of Paris refuſed to regiſter the edicts for the new impoſts; and the court, to enforce its authority, arreſted Blancmenil, the preſident, and the counſellor Brouſſel. This violent ſtep was the ſignal of inſtant ſedition. The barricadoes of the league were immediately revived—all Paris was in arms—and the ſafety of the queen was only to be ſecured by the releaſe of the priſoners.

A. D. 1649.] But the regent and her miniſter nouriſhed in their boſoms a lively reſentment of the inſult—from the caprice and fury of a ſeditious multitude, they eſcaped with the infant king to the royal reſidence of St. Germains—they were accompanied by the duke of Orleans—and the queen ſoon ſummoned to her defence the victor of Rocroi, Fribourg, Nordlingen and Lens. The adverſe faction, who aſſumed the name of the Fronde, and maintained poſſeſſion of the capital, were inſpired by the genius and intriguing ſpirit of the coadjutor, afterwards the cardinal of Retz, who, with the habit of a prieſt, diſplayed a diſpoſition ſuited to camps and courts; and licentious in his manners and profligate in his morals, acquired an aſcendancy over the minds of the people, without condeſcending to throw a veil over his vices, or employing the popular pretext of religion.

Ardent in the cauſe they had eſpouſed, the parliament ſoon eſtabliſhed a revenue for the ſupport of the war—and the citizens with pleaſure, deluded by the name of freedom, ſubmitted to taxes far more burthenſome than thoſe that had excited their clamours—the prince of Conti, envious of the fame of his brother the prince of Condé, with the dukes of Longueville, Bouillon, and Beaufort, devoted themſelves to the ſervice of the parliament. Troops were levied with diligence—and the coadjutor himſelf raiſed a regiment, which from his titular archbiſhopric was called the regiment of Corinth—the zeal of the Pariſians laviſhly ſupplied them with money, the ſinews of war—while the royaliſts experienced the ſevereſt diſtreſs, and the queen was reduced to pledge the jewels of the crown to alleviate the neceſſities of her court.

But that court was ſtill formidable from the renown and abilities of the prince of Condé; with an army of ſcarce eight thouſand ſoldiers, he blocked up a city that contained five hundred thouſand citizens; and though the mareſchal Turenne was allured by the charms of the ducheſs of Longueville to embrace the oppoſite party, yet his military talents but little availed him, when only ſeconded by an undiſciplined rabble. At length the leaders on each ſide obtained the particular objects of their avarice or ambition; the public good was buried in ſtudied ſilence; the ſtorm for a moment was huſhed; and the court returned to the deſerted capital.

The tempeſt of civil diſcord which had been felt in France, afflicted England with uncommon violence; that iſland preſented a new and ſolemn ſpectacle; a ſovereign was arraigned before the tribunal of his ſubjects; and the unhappy Charles was condemned to atone with his life for the violation of the laws of his country. He expired on a ſcaffold; his children were driven into exile; and a ſucceſsful uſurper, erecting himſelf on the ruins of the conſtitution under the title of protector, ruled England with abſolute ſway.

A. D. 1650, 1651.] But in France, the enthuſiaſtic flame of freedom, which had glowed in the boſoms of the Engliſh, was ſtill unknown; that people indeed again reſumed their arms, and turned their ſwords againſt each other; but the chiefs not unfrequently ranged themſelves under the banner of ſome celebrated beauty; and the prince of Condé, and the coadjutor de Retz, as caprice or intereſt dictated, ſupported the cardinal Mazarin. The court alternately abdicated or occupied the capital: and the princes of Condé and Conti, with the duke of Longueville, were at length the victims of their adverſaries artifices; they were ſuddenly arreſted and conveyed to the caſtle of Vincennes; the giddy populace, who had regarded their fate with indifference, in leſs than a year vented their diſcontent in loud and opprobrious clamours; and Mazarin, who had cauſed their impriſonment, was reduced to releaſe them in perſon, and to ſeek ſhelter himſelf in baniſhment from the rage of the multitude.

During theſe convulſions of the ſtate, Lewis the Fourteenth had attained the age fixed for his aſſuming the reins of government, and his majority was ſolemn-ly declared in parliament; but he was ſtill influenced by the counſels of his mother, and ſeemed to inherit her fond partiality for Mazarin. The prince of Condé, ſenſible of the implacable reſentment of the queen, quitted Paris to arm in his ſupport the provinces of Guienne, Poitou, and Anjou; and to ally himſelf with the very Spaniards, on whoſe defeat he had founded his martial glory; while the cardinal, at the head of an army levied at his own expence and devoted to his ſervice, reſumed his former ſtation, and menaced the deſtruction of his enemies.

The parliament ſtill regarded that miniſter with peculiar deteſtation, and even publicly fixed a price on his head; but with an inconſiſtency which characteriſed their proceedings, they alſo declared the prince of Condé an enemy to the ſtate. While they exhorted the forces that the duke of Orleans had raiſed to march againſt the former, they ſtrictly prohibited any part of the public revenue from being diverted to their ſubſiſtence; their reſolutions had at length fallen into contempt, and the rival factions diſdaining their mediation, prepared to terminate their differences by the ſword. Condé, in league with the Spaniards, appeared in the field againſt the king; and the mareſchal Turenne, who had returned to his allegiance, avowed himſelf the champion of the court.

Near the banks of the Loire the hoſtile armies regarded with a jealous eye each other's motions; when the prince, who had traverſed in diſguiſe, and through the poſts of his adverſaries, the extent of country from Agen to the foreſt of Orleans, joined his forces and immediately prepared to improve the confidence and boldneſs with which his preſence had inſpired them. He attacked that diviſion of the royal army which was poſted at Bleneau, under the command of the mareſchal d'Hocquincourt, and in a moment their ranks were broken by his impetuous charge. The panic in an inſtant communicated itſelf from the camp to the court; and the miniſter propoſed to ſave the king by flight, and to convey him privately to Bourges. But this diſgraceful expedient was averted by the ſkill and conſtancy of the mareſchal Turenne. With the remnant of his army he availed himſelf of every favourable inequality of ground, reſtored the ſinking ſpirits of the great, and confirmed in their allegiance the wavering multitude; Paris indeed received the victor with loud acclamations; but his popularity was tranſient; the coadjutor, now become cardinal of Retz, no longer the idol of the people, governed with abſolute ſway the mind of the duke of Orleans, and ſtimulated that prince to offer himſelf to the citizens as the competitor of Condé. The commanding genius that diſtinguiſhed the latter in the field, could ill ſtoop to the cabals of a faction; the duke of Lorraine, who had promiſed to join his arms, was bribed to deſert his cauſe by Mazarin; his troops were already enervated by the pleaſures of the capital; and with ſecret ſatisfaction he liſtened to the approach of Turenne, whoſe appearance again ſummoned him to the proper theatre of his glory.

In the ſuburbs of Saint Antoine the martial train of the prince was encompaſſed and oppreſſed by the ſuperior numbers of the royaliſts. From a neighbouring eminence the king beheld the unequal conflict in which the blood of his nobleſt ſubjects was ſhed; but the citizens of Paris affected to maintain a perfect neutrality, and ſhut their gates againſt each party; the duke of Orleans, with the cardinal de Retz, ſecluded himſelf in his palace of Luxemburgh; when at length mademoiſelle, the daughter of that prince, taking the part of Conde, whom her father dared not aſſiſt, ordered the gates to be opened for the wounded, and had the boldneſs to fire the cannon of the Baſtile upon the king's troops. The royal army retired; but mademoiſelle ruined herſelf for ever with the king her couſin, by this imprudent violence, and the cardinal Mazarin, who knew the great deſire ſhe had to eſpouſe a crowned head, obſerved upon this occaſion that, "thoſe cannon had killed her huſband."

A. D. 1652.] Soon after this action the prince of Condé retired from a capital diſguſted by his violence and haughty demeanor. The parliament declared the duke of Orleans lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and ſtill breathed the ſame ſpirit of animoſity towards Mazarin. The court, weary of their inceſſant labours, conſented in appearance to give up that miniſter; he was commanded to retire to Bouillon; and no ſooner was the intelligence of his exile conveyed to Paris, than the citizens of their own accord ſent deputies to invite the king to return to that city; he entered it amidſt the acclamations of the inhabitants, and by the ſudden turn of popular favour beheld himſelf firmly ſeated on his throne. The firſt exerciſe of his authority was to baniſh the duke of Orleans to Blois, who there cloſed the remnant of an inglorious life. The cardinal de Retz was alſo arreſted, and conveyed from priſon to priſon: while the prince of Condé, preſſed by the mareſchal Turenne, abandoned in France by almoſt all his partiſans, and feebly ſupported by the Spaniards, waged an unſucceſsful war on the frontiers of Champagne.

A. D. 1653.] The calm which the kingdom enjoyed, had been the reſult of the baniſhment of Mazarin. Yet ſcarcely was he expelled by the general voice of the French nation, and by the royal declaration, than he was recalled by the king; and to his infinite ſurpriſe entered Paris once more in full power, and without the leaſt diſturbance. The king received him as a father, and the people as a maſter; but the cardinal, amidſt the ſatisfaction of his change, could not repreſs his contempt of the national levity. The parliament, who had before ſet a price upon his head as a public robber, now ſent deputies to compliment him; and ſoon after paſſed ſentence of death for contumacy on the prince of Condé, whom ſo lately they had honoured as their ally, and even declared general of their forces.

The miniſter applied himſelf with vigour to extinguiſh the ſparks of revolt. In Burgundy, Belegarde was defended for the prince of Condé, by the count of Bouteville, afterwards ſo celebrated as mareſchal Luxemburg. It was attacked with rival ardour by the duke d'Epernon, at the head of a royal army; yet the governor consented not to surrender till a practible breach was made, and then obtained honourable conditions. Brouage and Oleron were purchased from the count of Oignon; the prince of Conti, and the duchess of Longueville capitulated in Bourdeaux—and the garrison under the command of the count of Marsin was permitted to march out and join the prince of Condé.

A. D. 1654.] That prince, in conjunction with the archduke on the side of the Netherlands, laid siege to Arras; but mareschal Turenne, after possessing himself of Stenai, advanced to the relief of the former town, and forced the lines of the besiegers; the Spaniards were routed with bloody slaughter; but the prince of Condé still maintained the honour of his name amidst defeat. With two regiments alone he protected the fugitives, and repulsed mareschal d'Hocqincourt; the king of Spain acknowledged his services in a short and expressive letter—"I heard that all was lost, and that you saved all."

The power of the minister each day increased; the prince of Conti sought his alliance, and obtained the hand of his niece; and the cabals of the parliament were broken by the resolution of Lewis. England, whom most he dreaded, was ruled by Cromwell, under the title of protector; and who after humbling the pride of Holland, meditated to despoil Spain of her transmarine possessions: while in Sweden, the celebrated queen Christiana resigned her throne to her cousin Charles Gustavus, and sought in the shade of private life, that happiness which her turbulent and restless disposition would never permit her to enjoy.

A. D. 1655.] Landreci and Quesnoi were reduced by the mareschal Turenne, and a road was opened by these acquisitions into the Spanish Netherlands. The king in person beheld the successful siege of Saint Guillain; and the Spaniards were compelled, by the marquis Merinville to retire from the walls of Solsonna. their fleet was defeated before Barcelona, by that of France, commanded by the duke of Vendosme. But even these successes afforded not that satisfaction to Mazarin, as the treaty he soon after concluded with the protector of England.

That great and prosperous usurper was equally courted and dreaded by all Europe; yet his political judgment has been impeached by posterity, when he preferred the alliance of France to that of Spain. But Lewis purchased the friendship of his new ally by a concession the most ignominious, which the magnanimity of his maturer years would have disdained, and which must solely be imputed to the more subtle, but less honourable policy of his Italian minister. Charles the Second, and his brother the duke of York, both sons to the late king of England, who had expired on the scaffold, and consequently the grandsons of Henry the Fourth of France, were compelled, at the imperious voice of Cromwell, to quit that kingdom, and to seek an asylum in the dominions of Spain.

A. D. 1656.] But if the honour of France suffered from diminution in thus withdrawing her protection from the unfortunate, the advantage to her arms was brilliant and important. Mareschal Turenne, with the mareschal de la Forte, had inveſted Valenciennes, and experienced the ſame reverſe of fortune as had befallen Condé before Arras. That prince, ſeconded by don John of Auſtria, forced the mareſchal de la Forte's lines, took him priſoner, and relieved Valenciennes. Turenne performed what Condé had done before on a ſimilar defeat; he ſaved the routed army, made head every where againſt the victors, and in leſs than a month afterwards laid ſiege to and carried the town of la Capelle.

A. D. 1657.] But the treaty with England aſſured Turenne of a decided ſuperiority; Cromwell engaged to ſend ſix thouſand infantry into Flanders, on condition that the French ſhould attempt the reduction of Mardyke, Gravelines, or Dunkirk, all of which had been recovered by Spain during the late civil commotions, and deliver into his hands which ever place was ſooneſt taken; while the mareſchal awaited the arrival of this reinforcement, he endeavoured by ſurpriſe to make himſelf maſter of Cambrai; he had ſcarce encompaſſed the walls, when the prince of Condé, at the head of two thouſand horſe, penetrated through the army of the beſiegers, and having routed every thing that attempted to ſtop him, threw himſelf into the town. The mareſchal no longer perſiſted in the hopeleſs enterpriſe, but directed his march towards St. Quintin to meet the Engliſh axiliaries; ſtrengthened by this reinforcement, he ſucceſſively reduced Montmedi and St. Venant, raiſed the ſiege of Ardres, and concluded the campain with the taking of Mardyke, which, according to the late treaty, was delivered into the hands of Cromwell.

A. D. 1658.] Early in the ſpring the armies reſumed their hoſtile operations, which had been ſuſpended by the inclemency of the winter. The remonſtrances of Cromwell commanded the acquieſcence of Mazarin; and Turenne was ordered to inveſt the town of Dunkirk. The port was already blocked up by an Engliſh ſquadron, and ſix thouſand of the infantry of that nation joined the French camp. The prince of Condé and don John of Auſtria aſſembled all their forces, and preſented themſelves before the city, to raiſe the ſiege. Turenne quitted his lines to encounter the enemy; and the prince of Condé, who was not allowed the diſpoſition of that day, turned to the Engliſh duke of Glouceſter, who had accompanied him, and aſked him, if he had ever ſeen a battle loſt: the reply was in the negative: "then," ſaid the prince, "you will ſee one now." The event juſtified his diſcernment: the French and Engliſh charged with rival valour; the Spaniards were broken on every ſide; and the prince of Condé, who had diſplayed in the battle the moſt heroic courage, preſerved the ſame undaunted countenance in defeat: the troops under his immediate command were ſtill formidable, and effected their retreat in tolerable order, but the reſt of the Spaniſh army was chaced to the gates of Furnes, and above nine thouſand of the veteran ſoldiers of Spain are ſuppoſed to have fallen in the action and purſuit.

Dunkirk, though now deſtitute of the moſt diſtant hope of ſuccour, ſtill rejected the ſummons of Turenne, and ſurrendered not till ten days after the battle; the garriſon marched out with all the honours of war, and Lewis entered in triumph the proſtrate city; but he was ſoon compelled to deliver it up to Lockhart, Cromwell's ambaſſador; and the reluctance of Mazarin was vaniquiſhed by the reſolution and menaces of the protector of England.

This was the laſt and moſt important acquiſition of that great and ſucceſsful uſurper—who, without any eminent qualities of body, or ſhining talents of mind, without fortune or illuſtrious birth, ſubverted one of the moſt ancient and beſt eſtabliſhed monarchies in the world—brought to trial and executed his ſovereign—compelled the royal family to ſeek their ſafety in exile—and reduced to ſubjection three powerful and diſcontented nations. In the laſt moments the illuſions of fanaticiſm, which had been ſo conſpicuous in his infant grandeur, ſtill prevailed—and he rejected the fatal predictions of his phyſicians, while his chaplains buoyed up his hopes with the aſſurances of a longer exiſtence. His dying breath bequeathed his power to his eldeſt ſon, Richard, who immediately aſſumed the title of protector, and was acknowledged by the court of France.

Mareſchal Turenne, on the ſurrender of Dunkirk, turned his arms againſt Furnes and Dixmude—theſe ſoon yielded to his victorious aſſaults—the Spaniſh forces, divided in garriſon towns, would probably have been ſwept away by the torrent of his fortune, had not his career been checked by the indiſpoſition of his ſovereign—but no ſooner was the health of Lewis reſtored, than thoſe intrigues which had already agitated the court, vanquiſhed into air, and Turenne was permitted to ſwell the long liſt of his conqueſts—Oudenarde and Menin opened their gates after a faint reſiſtance—the mareſchal de la Forte was detached to inveſt Gravelines, and Turenne himſelf covered with his army the operations of the ſiege. The colours of France were ſoon diſplayed from the walls—the prince of Ligne was encountered and routed by the rival of Condé—and Ypres ſubmitted to the victor, and received a French garriſon.

In Italy the current of ſucceſs flowed, though not with equal rapidity, in favour of France. The duke of Mantua, who endeavoured to ſtem the tide as the ally of Spain, was happy in being admitted to a neutrality. Trin, in the marquiſate of Montferrat, was taken by the marquis of Villa; and Mortare, in the Milaneſe, ſurrendered to the duke of Modena, who ſurvived his conqueſt but a few days.

Ferdinand, the third emperor of Germany, had, during the various events of war, ſunk into the grave; and the ambition of Mazarin aſpired to place the Imperial crown on the head of Lewis. The mareſchal Grammont was diſpatched for this purpoſe to the diet; but the cardinal was ſoon convinced of the futility of his chimerical expectations. After an interval of above a year, the electors raiſed to the throne Leopold, the ſon of the late emperor; but the policy of France embraced the opportunity to confirm the treaty of Munſter, and to attain to her intereſt ſeveral of the independent princes of Germany.

A. D. 1659.] The rigour of winter, which had ſuſpended the hoſtile enterpriſes of the crowns of Spain and France, had revived in the breaſts of their reſpective miniſters the deſire of peace. The ſucceſs of Turenne in the Spaniſh Netherlands had alarmed the former; and Mazarin was intent on ſecuring the tranquillity of the people by the marriage of the king. It has been aſſerted, that from the affection of Lewis to the niece of the cardinal, he had at one time raiſed his hopes to a royal alliance—but the haughty ſpirit of the queen-mother ſoon extinguiſhed the vain idea, and the daughter of the king of Spain and the princeſs of Savoy next preſented themſelves to his view; he therefore liſtened with pleaſure to the pacific overtures of Don Lewis de Haro, who governed Philip the Fourth with the ſame abſolute authority as he himſelf ruled Lewis.

A ceſſation of arms was immediately agreed upon; and in the Iſle of Pheaſants, on the frontiers of the two kingdoms, Mazarin and Don Lewis de Haro appeared as the repreſentatives of their reſpective ſovereigns. A conſiderable time was conſumed in deſputes about preſidency; but the Spaniard maintained his equality, and refuſed to yield to the dignity of the cardinal, or to the ſuperior pretenſions of France; their conferences were at length begun, and after four months, were concluded by the celebrated treaty of Pyrenees. By this treaty Lewis was to receive the hand of the infanta with five hundred thouſand gold crowns—Alſace and Rouſillon were confirmed to him—but he ſolemnly renounced every ſucceſſion that might accrue to him in right of his ſpouſe—and to Charles the Fourth he reſtored the duchy of Lorrain—to Spain the cities of St. Omer, Ypres, Menin, and Oudenarde—and he conſented to pardon the prince of Condé. Philip, on his ſide, extended alſo his clemency to the revolted Catalans—relinquiſhed Verceil to the duke of Savoy—Reggio to the duke of Modena—his whole territories to the duke of Monaco—and to the duke of Newburgh the city of Juliers, which for ſeveral years paſt had been ſequeſtered in the hands of the houſe of Auſtria.

A. D. 1659, 1660.] Charles of England had preſented himſelf at the Pyrenees to implore the aſſiſtance of the cardinal and Don Lewis de Haro—the former refuſed even to ſee him, and pleaded the alliance of France with the Engliſh commonwealth—but the latter received him with that generous civility peculiar to his nation. Even the offer of Charles to marry the niece of the cardinal was rejected with cold politeneſs. The condition of that monarch to all the world ſeemed deſperate—his friends had been baffled in every attempt for his ſervice; the ſcaffold had often ſtreamed with the blood of his moſt active adherents; their ſpirits were broken by tedious impriſonments; their eſtates were overwhelmed by fines and confiſcations. But amidſt all theſe gloomy proſpects, fortune, by a ſurpriſing revolution, brought that about which the miniſters of France and Spain might have had the honour of undertaking. Richard Cromwell, of a gentle, humane, and generous diſpoſition, was incapable of maintaining his dominion by ſanguinary meaſures; he ſigned his own diſmiſſion; and with a moderate fortune extended his peaceful and quiet life to an extreme old age. The committee of ſafety, who had uſurped the authority that he had abdicated, were hated and deſpiſed; they were reluctantly compelled to reſtore the parliament which they had diſſolved; the nation, wearied by contending factions, impatiently looked to the reſtoration of the ancient conſtitution; their wiſhes were ſeconded by the loyal declarations of general Monk, who, with the government of Scotland, commanded an affectionate and well-disciplined army. Charles was invited to mount the throne of his ancestors; he landed at Dover, took possession of his kingdom without the effusion of blood, and entered his capital amidst the unanimous acclamations of the inhabitants.

The duke of Orleans, the uncle of Lewis, had expired at Blois, but little noticed, and not at all regretted; his death did not interrupt the preparations for the marriage of the king of France: that monarch advanced to Saint Jean de Luz to receive the hand of his bride; the royal pair returned to Paris, and in their triumphal entry into that city displayed a magnificence before unknown; but though on this occasion the cardinal indulged the national taste for splendour, in every other respect he narrowly circumscribed the expences of the king, and Lewis was often reduced to request the loan of that wealth, with which the coffers of his minister overflowed.

A. D. 1661.] In the silent acquisition of riches, the cardinal had now reached the period which permitted him no longer to enjoy them. The treaty of Vincenns with the duke of Lorrain, and which, in some measure towards that prince, softened that of Pyrenees, was the last act of his administration; nine days afterwards he expired; and his concern for his wealth was still apparent in the last moments of his life. By a deed of gift he resigned his riches to the king; and his discernment was justified by the magnanimity of Lewis, who immediately restored the instrument. Though, perhaps, that monarch but little regretted the loss of a minister, whose yoke sat heavy on his shoulders, yet early taught to dissemble, he assumed the external marks of sorrow, and even honoured his memory by the compliment of wearing mourning.

The administration and talents of Mazarin have been compared with those of Richelieu; but those commanding features which distinguished the latter, are in vain to be sought for in the former. Prudent, subtle, and avaricious, he rather endeavoured to sooth than to command; to deceive than to vanquish; and the love of glory either existed not in his bosom, or was lost in his insatiate thirst of gold. That immense hoard was soon afterwards dissipated by the follies and prodigality of the marquis of Meilleraie, who had espoused his favourite daughter Hortensia Mancini, and assumed the title of duke of Mazarin; while Hortensia herself, banished from the bed and country of her husband, long subsisted in England on a pension allowed her by the liberality of Charles the Second.

On the death of Mazarin, Lewis the Fourteenth prepared to throw off those shackles which the ascendancy of the minister had imposed, and hereafter to assume not only the ensigns of royalty, but the duties of a king. The officers of state, who little expected that a young prince only in his twenty-third year, would limit the pursuit of his pleasures, to sustain the toils of government, impatiently enquired whom they were to apply to? They were equally surprised and disappointed, when Lewis answered, "to me;" their astonishment still increased when they found him perſevere. He had conſulted his own ſtrength, and made a trial in ſecret of his capacity for government; his reſolution once taken, he maintained it to the laſt moment of his life; he appointed bounds to the power of every miniſter; obliged him to give an account of every thing at certain hours; reſtored order to the finances, and eſtabliſhed diſcipline among the troops.

In his tranſactions with foreign ſtates, he aſſerted the dignity of his crown with jealous vigilance; the ambaſſador of Spain at the court of London, had on a public entry diſputed the way with that of France; but the firm remonſtrances of Lewis extorted from Philip ample ſatisfaction; and the Spaniſh monarch diſpatched the count of Fuentes with the important conceſſion, "that the miniſters "of Spain ſhould no longer diſpute the precedency with thoſe of France." With the court of Rome he diſplayed equal firmneſs. His ambaſſador, the duke of Crequi, had been inſulted, and even his carriage fired into by the guards of that city; the king menaced to avenge the affront by arms; and he compelled Alexander the Seventh, the Roman pontiff, to ſatisfy his honour, by erecting a pillar in Rome, expreſſing the injury and reparation.

A. D. 1661, 1667.] The ſatisfaction that he derived from theſe events was encreaſed by the birth of a ſon; and the ſecurity of his kingdom was augmented by the purchaſe of Dunkirk. Charles the Second, whoſe adverſity had not taught him œconomy, was reduced by his profuſion to part with that important place, and Lewis obtained it at the price of four hundred thouſand pounds. He immediately employed thirty thouſand men to fortify it by land and ſea; and dug a large baſon between the town and the citadel, capable of containing ſeveral men of war. He extorted ſoon after the ſtrong hold of Marſal from the duke of Lorrain. He ſecretly ſupported the crown of Portugal againſt that of Spain; but though the king of England offered to abandon to him all the Spaniſh low countries, provided he would ſuffer him to purſue his advantages over the Dutch, Lewis rejected the propoſal, which would have rendered Charles ſovereign of the ſeas; yet the aſſiſtance he could on that element afford his allies, the Hollanders, was feeble and unworthy of his greatneſs; but his ſuccours by land were more effectual and honourable; and his arms protected them from the martial and enterpriſing biſhop of Munſter, whom the gold of England had allured to invade the United Provinces.

A. D. 1667.] The peace of Breda reconciled the contending powers, but reſtored not for a moment the tranquility of Europe. The flame of war was kept alive by the pretenſions and ambition of the French monarch. In the ſilent lapſe of ſix years he had repleniſhed his coffers, created a naval force, augmented his armies, and provided large magazines and an immenſe quantity of military ſtores. The two miniſters who principally ſhared his confidence were Colbert and Louvois. The former in the finances, rivalled the fame and ablities of the duke of Sully; the latter firſt diſplayed to Europe the means of ſubſiſting large armies at a diſtance by magazines. The prince of Condé, and the mareſchal Turenne were ſtill in the vigour of their life; and France might juſtly boaſt the proud ſuperiority of her ſtateſmen and her generals.

A. D. 1668.] Anne of Auſtria, the queen-mother, who no longer retained her influence over the mind of her ſon, had ſunk unnoticed into the grave; the death of Philip of Spain was an event of more importance; he left a ſon, Charles the Second; but the queen of France, the iſſue of a former marriage, laid claim to a conſiderable province of the Spaniſh monarchy, even to the excluſion of her brother. By the cuſtom of ſome parts of Brabant, a female of a firſt marriage, was preferred to a male of the ſecond; and Lewis, in open violation of his ſolemn renunciation in the treaty of Pyrenees, prepared to vindicate the claim of his conſort by arnis.

The king of France with an army of forty thouſand men, directed by Turenne, paid by Colbert, and amply ſupplied by Louvois, burſt into the defenceleſs provinces of Flanders—The towns without magazines, without fortifications, and without garriſons, ſurrendered to Lewis as ſoon as he preſented himſelf before them—The banners of France were in an inſtant diſplayed from the walls of Athe, Tournay, Oudenarde, Courtrai, Charleroy, and Binche; Liſle alone maintained a reſiſtance of nine days, and the king returned to Paris from a campaign, attended by the moſt important acquiſitions, but which in its progreſs rather reſembled a party of pleaſure than an hoſtile expedition.

A. D. 1669.] The reputation which Turenne had acquired in this enterpriſe, awakened the honourable jealouſy of the prince of Condé: The inclemency of the ſeaſon could not chill his martial ardour, and in the midſt of winter he propoſed to his ſovereign the invaſion of Franche Comté. That province, ſituated on the borders of Switzerland, under the protection of the houſe of Auſtria, enjoyed its ancient privileges, and the honourable diſtinction of a parliament; the inhabitants contented, though poor were awakened from their humble tranquility by the diſcordant trumpet of war. Beſançon and Salins, the two ſtrongeſt towns, were inveſted and reduced by the prince of Condé; Lewis haſtened to join his army, and laid ſiege to Dole; in four days that city was compelled to open its gates; and in three weeks the conqueſt of the entire province was completely atchieved.

But the rapid ſucceſs of Lewis had awakened the envy and the fears of his powerful neighbours. A triple league was formed by England, Holland, and Sweden, to preſcribe bounds to his ambition. The arbitration of ſo formidable a confederacy could not be rejected. A negociation was immediately commenced, and rapidly concluded. By the peace of Aix la Chapelle, Lewis retained his acquſitions in Flanders, but reſtored Franche Compté to Spain; though even by theſe conditions he gained an extenſive territory, fruitful and populous, yet he ever after harboured a deep and implacable reſentment againſt the ſtates of Holland, whoſe deputies had diſplayed at the congreſs the proud and inflexible ſpirit of the republicans.

A. D. 1670.] At the moment that monarch ſigned the treaty of peace, he meditated new wars, and prepared to ſatiate his revenge; his firſt attention was directed to create a naval force; and his orders were executed by the indefatigable induſtry of Colbert and Louvois. The ſea-ports, which had almoſt ſunk into ruins, again erected their heads, were fortified with works which at once ſerved for their ornament and defence, and were filled with ſixty large men of war ready equipped for ſea. The next object of his councils was to detach the king of England from his alliance with Holland. His brother the duke of Orleans had married the ſiſter of Charles, and the influence of that princeſs was exerted over the mind of the Engliſh monarch; the neceſſities of Charles ſeconded her arts; the ſums that his profuſion demanded, and his parliament denied, were ſupplied by Lewis; and the king of England was prevailed upon to relinquiſh the moſt ſettled maxims of honour and policy, and to ſign engagements for the deſtruction of Holland, with whom he had ſo lately united himſelf to repreſs the ambition of France.

A. D. 1670, 1671.] The ſudden death of the ducheſs of Orleans, who had negociated this alliance, and whoſe fate was accompanied with ſuſpicions of poiſon, threw a gloom over the courts, but did not impede the preparations of the confederate monarchs. The liberality of Lewis extended itſelf to Sweden, and Charles the Eleventh ſubſcribed the new league; while the biſhop of Munſter, greedy of war and plunder, and naturally an enemy of the Dutch, readily concurred in the meaſures concerted for their deſtruction.

A. D. 1672.] But if the alliances and armaments of Charles and Lewis were formidable, the pretences they aſſigned for their hoſtile deſigns were frivolous and contemptible. The former complained that the cuſtomary honours had been refuſed to the Engliſh flag, and that pictures injurious to the reputation of the Engliſh had been encouraged; the latter maintained greater dignity, if undiſguiſed violence and injuſtice can merit that appellation; he pretended that the behaviour of the Hollanders had been ſuch that it did not conſiſt with his glory any longer to bear.

At the moment that the United Provinces were menaced by ſuch powerful enemies, they could derive but little ſatisfaction from the review of their domeſtic ſituation. Two factions at that time agitated the republic. The one headed by John de Wit, grand penſionary, a man equally eminent for greatneſs of mind, for capacity, and for integrity, but who regarded with jealouſy the leaſt ſhadow of abſolute authority; the other leſs attached to the exterior of liberty, deſirous of reſtoring the ſtadtholderſhip, and inveſting the prince of Orange with the poſts and dignities of his anceſtors.

Into this country burſt Lewis the Fourteenth, at the head of an army formidable from its numbers and diſcipline, but ſtill more ſo from the ſkill and experience of Turenne, Condé, Luxembourg, and Vauban. De Wit had expected his attack on the ſide of Maeſtricht, and provided that town accordingly; but the king of France taking advantage of his alliance with Cologne, invaded the provinces from that quarter. He paſſed the Meuſe at Niſat, poſſeſſed himſelf of Orſoi, reduced in four days Burik, Weſel, Emerik, and Rhimberg; and preſſed forwards to the Rhine. To all the other calamities of the Dutch, was added the extreme drought of the ſeaſon, which diminiſhed the greateſt rivers; the French cavalry, animated by the preſence of their ſovereign, plunged into the ſtream; a few Dutch regiments on the oppoſite bank made but a feeble reſiſtance; and the celebrated paſſage of the Rhine, the ſubject of ſo much panegyric, was atchieved without danger and almoſt without oppoſition.

Each ſucceſs added courage to the conquerors, and ſtruck the vanquiſhed with diſmay; and every hour brought intelligence of ſome freſh acquſition. A liſt of defenceleſs cities that opened their gates on the appearance of an enemy, can afford neither inſtruction nor entertainment to the reader. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, that in little more than a month three provinces, Guelderland, Overyſſel, and Utrecht, were in the hands of Lewis; Groningen was threatened; Friezland lay expoſed; and the only difficulty that preſented itſelf was in Holland and Zealand. Condé and Turenne exhorted the king to diſmantle, with a few exceptions, all the towns that he had taken, and preſs on to new conqueſts; but Lewis liſtened to the counſels of Louvois, who prevailed on him to ſtrengthen his acquiſitions with new fortifications; a project which, by weakening the main army, proved fatal to his ambitious deſigns.

But at ſea the Dutch maintained their former renown, and engaged with alacrity the combined fleets of two powerful nations—De Ruyter, their admiral, on this occaſion acquired immortal honour, and acknowledged, that of two and thirty actions which he had beheld, this combat was the moſt obſtinately diſputed. The loſs ſuſtained by the two fleets was nearly equal; the approach of night at length ſuſpended the fury of the combatants; and both retired to their reſpective harbours to repair the damages which they had ſuffered.

But the glory of de Ruyter could not inſpire his countrymen to emulate his conduct by land; the ſtates determined to implore the pity of the confederate monarchs; but the conditions that Lewis preſcribed were little better than articles of ſlavery—All the towns on the other ſide of the Rhine were to be ceded, with Nimeguen, and ſeveral in the heart of the provinces; the Roman Catholic religion was every where to be eſtabliſhed, and a medal was annually to be preſented to the French court, importing that the Hollanders retained their freedom by the moderation of Lewis.

The indignation of the people at terms ſo fatal and diſgraceful, broke out in open and violent ſeditions—Inſtead of arming to meet the haughty conqueror, they diſcharged their rage on their own unhappy miniſter. The unfortunate De Wit, and his brother Cornelius, were torn to pieces by the frenzy of the populace; the moſt ſhocking indignities were exerciſed on their diſmembered limbs: and the united voice of the people inveſted with the ſole adminiſtration William prince of Orange.

That prince, though only in the twenty-ſecond year of his age, gave ſtrong indications of all thoſe great qualities by which his life was afterwards diſtinguiſhed. The whole tenor of his demeanour ſuited extremely the genius of the people whoſe councils he was called to direct. Silent and thoughtful, he poſſeſſed a ſound and ſteady underſtanding; was firm in his reſolution, and indefatigable in buſineſs; and never ſuffered pleaſure to allure, or danger to intimidate him—His appointment once more animated the drooping ſpirits of his countrymen; they reſolved, if unable to maintain their freedom in Europe, to fly to their ſettlements in the Indies, and erect a new republic in thoſe remote regions. While, to check the preſent progreſs of the victor, they called to their aſſiſtance that deſtructive element, againſt which they had formerly ſo diligently fortified themſelves; and opening the ſluices, laid the adjacent country under water.

Lewis had made his triumphal entry into Utrecht; but he now quitted a campaign in which the difficulties of war were encreaſed, and the hopes of conqueſt were diminiſhed. He returned to his capital to enjoy the acclamations of his ſubjects for ſucceſſes which he owed to the merit of his generals, or to the panic of his enemies. But already a confederacy was formed to ſet bounds to his aſpiring ambition. Spain privately aſſiſted, and the emperor openly ſupported, the United Provinces; Luxemburgh was diſappointed in an attempt on the Hague, and the biſhop of Munſter was repulſed from the walls of Groningen.

A. D. 1673.] The enſuing year extended more widely the flames of war. The emperor and Spain openly declared themſelves the allies of the Dutch; and the houſe of Auſtria was now engaged to protect thoſe provinces which during ſo many years ſhe had endeavoured to oppreſs. De Ruyter ſtill maintained his reputation at ſea, and encountered in a ſecond and indeciſive action the combined fleets of France and England. A third that ſoon after enſued, though equally obſtinate and bloody, ſtill left the victory doubtful. But Lewis at the head of a numerous army inveſted, and in a week reduced Maeſtricht. The prince of Orange in return laid ſiege to Naerden; and the ſucceſs of that enterpriſe confirmed the confidence of his countrymen; he immediately after directed his march to join Montecuculli, the Imperial general, who on the banks of the Rhine was oppoſed to Turenne; the artful conduct of that commander eluded the penetration of the mareſchal, and he ſuddenly ſat down before Bonne. Under the walls of that city he was joined by the prince of Orange, who with ſimilar addreſs had deceived and eſcaped the vigilance of the French generals. Bonne ſoon ſurrendered to their combined arms; ſeveral other places in the electorate of Cologne fell into their hands; the communication between France and the United Provinces was cut off; and Lewis was obliged to recal his forces, and abandon all his conqueſts with greater rapidity than he had at firſt made them.

A. D. 1674.] The firm remonſtrances of the Engliſh parliament, and the clamours of his people, compelled Charles to conclude a peace with the United Provinces. But while he reluctantly deſerted his ally Lewis, he ſtill inſiſted that ten thouſand men whom he had detached to reinforce the army of that monarch, ſhould not be recalled, though he conſented to bind himſelf by a ſecret article of the treaty never to recruit them. Even this reinforcement, ſmall as it might ſeem, was neceſſary to the various enterpriſes of the French king. The empire, Spain, and Holland, were now firmly united againſt him. The biſhop of Munſter and the elector of Cologne had been compelled to renounce his alliance; yet he continued to make head every where againſt his enemies, and even meditated new conqueſts. With a powerful army in perſon he once more invaded Franche Comté; laid ſiege to and again carried Beſançon; and in ſix weeks reduced the whole province, which has ever ſince remained annexed to the dominions of France.

In Flanders the allied army was commanded by the prince of Orange, and the French by the prince of Condé. The former, encouraged by his ſuperior numbers, endeavoured to penetrate into France, but in the attempt he raſhly expoſed at Seneffe a wing of his army, and his active adverſary failed not to ſeize and improve the advantage. But the prince of Orange amply compenſated for his error by his behaviour in the obſtinate and bloody action that enſued; he rallied his diſmayed troops, led them to the charge, and puſhed the martial veterans of France. The conflict was continued for ſome time after ſunſet, till darkneſs parted the combatants, and left the victory undecided. But the conduct of William was ſtamped by the applauſe of his generous antagoniſt; "the prince of Orange," ſaid Condé, "has acted in every thing like an old captain, except venturing his "life too like a young ſoldier."

In Alſace, Turenne diſplayed againſt a much ſuperior enemy, all that military ſkill which by long experience, profound reflection, and great genius, he had been able to acquire. By a ſudden and forced march he attacked and defeated at Sintzheim the duke of Lorrain and Caprara, the general of the Imperialiſts, and afterwards extended his bloody devaſtations over the palatinate. Seventy thouſand Germans deluged Alſace; they were ſurpriſed by the unexpected appearance of Turenne; a conſiderable detachment was cut in pieces at Mulhauſen; the elector of Brandenburg, who had been entruſted with the chief command, was routed by the active vigilance of the mareſchal near Colmar; a third body ſuffered the ſame fate near Turkheim; and this formidable hoſt, baffled and diſperſed, was happy to evacuate Alſace and repaſs the Rhine.

A. D. 1675.] To oppoſe Turenne, the Imperialiſts recalled their celebrated general Montecuculli. The object of the latter was to penetrate into Alſace, Lorrain, or Burgundy; the aim of the former was to guard the French frontiers, and diſappoint all the ſchemes of his enemy. The banks of the Rhine was the theatre on which their ſkill was diſplayed. Each encountered the other with perſever-ance, penetration, and activity: but on the moment that they were on the point of ſtaking their reputation on the fate of a battle near the village of Saltzbach, Turenne was killed by a cannon ball as he was reconnoitering a ſituation to erect a battery. The news of his fate impreſſed the king, the court, and the people, with the deepeſt ſorrow; but it was in the camp that his loſs was moſt ſeverely felt and ſenſibly regretted. Montecuculli, who had for three months been kept on the other ſide of the Rhine by the abilities of the mareſchal, paſſed that river the moment he heard Turenne was no more; he penetrated into Alſace; and the French, who had lately aſpired to victory, eſteemed themſelves happy in eſcaping defeat, and effecting a retreat under the conduct of de Lorges, nephew to the deceaſed general.

Part of the German army, after the death of Turenne, had formed the ſiege of Treves; and mareſchal Crequi, with the troops that he could aſſemble, advanced to the relief of that place. His negligence expoſed him to a total and bloody defeat; with four attendants only he eſcaped into Treves, and endeavoured by a vigorous defence to efface his diſgrace; but the garriſon at length mutinied againſt his authority; they opened the gates to the enemy; and ſince he refuſed to ſign the capitulation they had made, they delivered him up a priſoner to the Imperialiſts.

Lewis in perſon had taken the field in Flanders, and was oppoſed by the prince of Orange with an equal army; each party was unwilling to hazard a general engagement without ſome viſible advantage. The monarch ſoon efter returned to Verſailles, and the late diſaſters in Germany induced him to recal the prince of Condé to make head againſt Montecuculli. The prince on this new field confirmed the opinion of his ſuperior genius. He compelled the Germans to raiſe the ſieges of Hageneau and Saverne; he eluded their attempts to force him to a battle; and at length conſtrained them to repaſs the Rhine. With this campaign he cloſed the long ſeries of his martial toils and glory; the remnant of his life he paſſed in honourable retirement at Chantilly; while Montecuculli, full of years and fame, withdrew at the ſame time from the ſcene of action, unwilling to expoſe that reputation in conteſts with younger adverſaries, which he had acquired as the rival of Condé and Turenne.

A. D. 1676.] Though the death of Turenne, and the retreat of Condé, deprived Lewis of two commanders, whoſe military talents have ſeldom been equalled, and never excelled, yet the vigour and diſcipline that they had infuſed into the armies, ſtill continued to open the road to victory. The Hollanders themſelves ſoon after ſuſtained a loſs which plunged them in the ſame honourable ſorrow as France had lately felt. Meſſina had revolted, and a fleet under the duke de Vivonne was diſpatched to ſupport the rebels; the Dutch ſent a ſquadron to aſſiſt the Spaniards; an engagement enſued, and de Ruyter, the Turenne of Holland, received a wound which put an end to his glorious life; the Dutch, diſmayed at his death, retired in confuſion; yet the advantage the French obtained was but tranſient; and they were ſoon after reduced to evacuate Meſſina, at the moment that they flattered themſelves with the hope of becoming maſters of it.

In Germany, Charles the Fifth, the new duke of Lorrain, who ſucceeded his uncle Charles the Fourth, and who like him was ſtripped of his dominions, had recovered Philiſburgh; but he vainly endeavoured to penetrate into his own territories; mareſchal Crequi, ranſomed from confinement, and grown more prudent by his defeat, defended the entrance into Lorrain, and in repeated actions baffled and defeated the unfortunate duke.

In Flanders Lewis himſelf early took the field, and provided with ample magazines, began his operations, while the enemy's cavalry were unable to find forage in the open country. The Spaniſh towns ill fortified, made but a feeble reſiſtance; in the month of April he laid ſiege to Condĕ, and took it by ſtorm in four days; while the duke of Orleans inveſted Bouchain, he poſted himſelf to ſuch advantage as to hinder the confederates from relieving it, or fighting but under great difficulties; the prince of Orange, after ſurmounting a variety of obſtacles, came indeed in ſight of the French army; but his induſtry ſerved only to render him a ſpectator of the ſurrender of Bouchain; both armies ſtood in awe of each other, and were unwilling to hazard an action which might be attended with the moſt important conſequences. Satisfied with his new acquiſitions, and the glory he had gained, Lewis retired to Verſailles, and entruſted his army to the command of mareſchal Schomberg; on his departure William inveſted Maeſtricht, but Schomberg, who had taken Aire, immediately advanced to the relief of that place, and the prince was compelled reluctantly to retire.

During the various operations of the hoſtile armies, the language of peace had been reſumed, and a congreſs had been eſtabliſhed at Nimeguen under the mediation of the king of England; the Dutch loaded with debts, and haraſſed with taxes, were deſirous of putting an end to the war. But gratitude to their allies, the emperor and the king of Spain, induced them to try the conſequences of another campain; and the prince of Orange, urged by motives of honour, of ambition, and of animoſity againſt France, endeavoured to keep them ſteady to this reſolution.

Lewis was alſo ſincerely deſirous of peace; his kingdom was exhauſted by the violent efforts that ſhe had made; but the monarch was conſcious that a good treaty could only be attained by a vigorous war. In February he laid ſiege to Valenciennes, and carried it by ſtorm; he next inveſted Cambray and St. Omer. The prince of Orange advanced to the relief of the latter place, and was encountered by the French, commanded by the duke of Orleans, the brother of the king, and mareſchal Luxemburg. The former concealed beneath the effeminate manners of a woman, a courage moſt ardent, and the latter had been the conſtant friend and pupil of the great Condé. By a maſterly movement of that general, William was defeated, and compelled to ſeek ſhelter under the walls of Ypres; but Lewis, jealous of his brother's fame, who had ſought glory in the thickeſt ranks of the enemy, liſtened to the victory with ſmall ſigns of external ſatisfaction, and never afterwards entruſted the duke with the chief command. Cambray and Saint Omer ſoon ſurrendered, and cloſed the operations of the campaign.

A. D. 1678.] Negociations for peace were ſtill continued, and Charles of England having beſtowed the hand of his niece on the prince of Orange, ſeemed ſincerely deſirous of acquieſcing in the wiſhes of his people, and of protecting the provinces. The king of France had taken the field with his uſual readineſs, and had reduced Ypres and Ghent, and the army under Luxembourg had inveſted Mons, when Van Beverning, the Dutch ambaſſador, alarmed at his progreſs, and conſcious of the unſteady councils of England, at Nimeguen ſigned the treaty of peace with the miniſters of France; by this treaty Lewis ſecured the poſſeſſion of Franche Comté, together with Cambray, Aire, Saint Omer, Valenciennes, Tournay, Ypres, Bouchain, Caſſel, &c. and agreed to reſtore to Spain only Charleroi, Courtrai, Oudenarde, Athe, Ghent, and Leonbourgh; while in the north, his ally the king of Sweden was reinſtated in thoſe dominions of which he had been ſtripped by the joint forces of Denmark and Germany.

The king of Spain and the emperor reluctantly and ſucceſſively ſubſcribed to theſe hard conditions; which were conſidered by the prince of Orange with equal diſguſt. The day after they were ſigned he attacked, near Mons, and gained ſome advantage over Luxembourg, who reſted ſecure on the faith of the treaty, and concluded the war finiſhed; William had alſo reaſon to believe the peace was ſigned, though not formally notified; and he wantonly ſacrificed the lives of many brave men on both ſides, who fell in this ſharp and well-conteſted action.

A. D. 1679, 1683.] The tempeſt of war which had ſo long agitated Europe, was ſucceeded by four years of peace. Lewis, whoſe reſtleſs ambition was ever awake, diligently employed each moment in preparations for future conqueſts; even the treaty that he had ſo lately ſigned at Nimeguen could not ſuſpend his inſatiate thirſt for dominion; by treachery he poſſeſſed himſelf of the imperial city of Straſburgh; he purchaſed Caſal of the duke of Mantua, and diſpoſſeſſed the elector Palatine and the elector of Treves of the lordſhips of Falkenburg, Germaſheim, and Valdentz. Ports and harbours were conſtructed at Breſt and Toulon; the docks were filled with ſhips of war, the army was augmented, and the magazines repleniſhed; while the people, enriched by arts and commerce, willingly ſubmitted to new impoſts, and cheerfully acquieſced under their burthens.

A. D. 1684, 1686.] The death of the queen was an event but little regarded by Lewis, who already felt that paſſion for madame de Maintenon, which accompanied him through the reſt of his life; he was doubtleſs impreſſed with more real concern at the loſs of Colbert, whoſe ſkill and integrity as a financier had greatly contributed to his conqueſts; that miniſter expired when the ambition of the king had juſt rekindled the flame of war; on pretences the moſt frivolous, Lewis had demanded Aloſt of the Spaniards, and on their refuſal had ſeized on Luxemburgh; the indignation of Spain had compelled her to an open declaration of war againſt her haughty enemy; but her own weakneſs, and the ſituation of the other powers of Europe, compelled her to ſign at Ratiſbon a truce for twenty years, which left Lewis in the peaceable poſſeſſion of Luxemburgh.

With equal injuſtice that monarch had bombarded Genoa, and reduced the republic to ſue for peace in the moſt abject manner, for having ſtipulated to build ſome gallies for the Spaniards; but greater glory accompanied the expedition againſt Algiers, and thoſe licentious rovers, after beholding the greateſt part of their city reduced to aſhes, ſubmitted to releaſe ſeveral hundreds of chriſtian captives. Yet vanity or intereſt were the ſole motives that actuated the ſovereign of France; and while he braved the ſpiritual cenſures of the Roman pontiff, and ſtripped that ſee of Avignon, he revoked the edicts of Nantz, revived the perſecutions againſt the Proteſtants, and drove by his miſtaken policy into exile above five hundred thouſand of the moſt uſeful and induſtrious inhabitants of France.

Lewis diſcovered too late that the characters of a conquerer and perſecutor are incompitable; beſides weakening his own kingdom by the baniſhment of myriads, the melancholy fate of the refugees had inflamed againſt him all the Proteſtant nations of Europe. The prince of Orange, who well knew how to avail himſelf of the general indignation, had by his intrigues and influence formed a league at Augſburg, where the whole empire united in its defence againſt the French monarch; Spain and Holland became parties in the ſame alliance; the acceſſion of Savoy was afterwards obtained; Sweden and Denmark ſeemed to favour the ſame cauſe.

A. D. 1688.] The knowledge of this league had not eſcaped the vigilance of the king of France; and to anticipate the deſigns of the confederates, he had invaded the empire, and laid ſiege to Philipſburg; but his intention was engroſſed by the affairs of England, which every day more plainly appointed to a new revolution. Charles the Second had expired at variance with his parliament, and deſpiſed by his people. His brother the duke of York, as James the Second, ſucceeded to the throne; the misfortunes of his father ſerved not to reſtrain the raſh zeal and blind obedience of that prince for the church of Rome. He openly violated the laws of his country, he endeavoured to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed religion, and compelled his ſubjects to ſeek their ſafety in revolt, and to call to their protection the prince of Orange.

William, who had married the daughter of that monarch whom he was ſummoned to oppoſe, liſtened with pleaſure to ſolicitations which were at once enforced by policy and religion; he diligently collected a formidable fleet, levied additional troops, and raiſed conſiderable ſums of money; but Lewis's envoy at the Hague penetrated into the real obect of his preparations, and informed his maſter of his diſcovery. The king of France immediately conveyed the intelligence to James; and at the ſame time he offered to reinfore the Engliſh fleet with a French ſquadron, to ſend over any number of troops, or to march into the Netherlands and engage the Dutch in the defence of their own country; but theſe propoſals were rejected by the king of England, who dreaded to increaſe the diſaffection of his ſubjects by ſo unpopular an alliance.

At length the prince of Orange ſet ſail, and after encountering a violant tempeſt at ſea, landed at Torbay on the coaſt of Devonſhire; he was joined by the principal nobility of the iſland, and the integrity of his enterpriſe was fortified by the appearance of the princeſs Anne, the other daughter of James; that unfortunate prince, deſerted by his ſubjects, his favourites, and his children, yielded to the torrent, abdicated the throne, and ſought ſhelter with his infant ſon and queen in France; Lewis received the royal fugitives with every mark of reſpect and aſſurance of ſupport; while the gratitude of the Engliſh placed their crown on the head of the prince of Orange; and that monarch, as William the Third, prepared to aſſert his own dignity, and to vindicate the liberties of Europe.

A. D. 1688, 1689.] England and Holland, the two great maritime powers of Europe, the empire and Spain, with the greateſt part of Italy, were now united againſt France; but her monarch ſtill confided in his former fortune, and his enemies acknowledged his preparations were worthy of the important conteſt. Philipſburg was taken; Monheim, Frankendal, Spires, Worms, and Oppenheim, ſurrendered; and the fruitful country of the palatinate was, at the unrelenting voice of Lewis, conſigned to deſtruction; her towns were reduced to aſhes, her fertile fields became a deſeret, and the wretched people, driven from their habitations by the fury of the flames and the brutality of the ſoldiers, were left to periſh by famine and the inclemency of the ſeaſon; ſuch were the means by which the king of France endeavoured to intimidate his enemies and protect his frontier; yet the former were rather exaſperated than vanquiſhed; and the imperial armies, under the duke of Lorrain, reſumed their courage, and covered the important cities of Bonn and Mentz.

A. D. 1689, 1690.] But the grand object of Lewis was to reſtore to his dominions the fugitive James; that unhappy prince had ſtill a ſtrong party in Ireland: and the friendſhip of France liberally furniſhed him with arms and ammunition of every kind; a conſiderable fleet was fitted out to ſecond his efforts, and in its courſe encountered the ſquadron of England and Holland in an indeciſive engagement; he was received into Limeric, and his firſt ſucceſs exceeded his moſt ſanguine expectations; but his career was checked by the ſkill of the duke of Schomberg; and on the banks of the Boyne he was vanquiſhed by the ſuperior fortune and genius of William. James himſelf abandoned the day with a precipitation unworthy of the crown he aſpired to, and haſtily returned to France; while his ſucceſsful rival, by his valour and conduct, extorted the applauſe of his enemies, and eſtabliſhed his tottering throne; a deſultory war was maintained for ſome time after the flight of James, till Ireland gradually withdrew from the ſupport of a prince who had deſerted her, and ſubmitted to the authority of William.

In Flanders the mareſchal d'Humieres was defeated by the prince of Waldeck, and Lewis, to retrieve this diſaſter, again entruſted his forces in the Netherlands to the mareſchal duke of Luxemburg. In the plains of Fleurus, near Charleroi, that general avenged the injured glory of his country; the prince of Waldeck was defeated with the loſs of ſix thouſand killed and eight thouſand taken priſoners; yet the victor acknowledged the gallantry of the vanquiſhed—"Prince Waldeck," ſaid he, "ought always to remember the French cavalry, "and I ſhall never forget the Dutch infantry."

A. D. 1691.] In the enſuing campaign Lewis himſelf was preſent at the ſiege of Mons; and retired, after the ſurrender of that city to Verſailles; while William, who had haſtened from Ireland to oppoſe mareſchal Luxemburg, concluded the campaign finiſhed, and repaired to the Hague; the mareſchal embraced the moment of his abſence, and by a forced march ſurpriſed and routed the rear of the confederates commanded by the prince of Waldeck.

On the frontiers of Germany, and in Spain, a feeble and deſultory war was carried on with various ſucceſs; but in Piedmont, Victor Amedeus, duke of Savoy, a prince brave, penetrating, and active, was oppoſed by the mareſchal Catinat, who had relinquiſhed the early ſtudy of the law for the more glorious profeſſion of arms; and who amidſt camps cultivated the maxims of philoſophy. At Saluces he triumphed over the duke of Savoy in a bloody and obſtinate encounter; and the conqueror ſoon reduced to the authority of Lewis the greateſt part of Savoy and Piedmont.

A. D. 1692.] In two engagements the fleet of France had at leaſt maintained an equality with thoſe of England and Holland; and Lewis, ſtill anxious to reſtore the ſhattered fortunes of James, determined to hazard a general action, and, if victorious, to invade England. The hoſtile fleets met in the channel near Cape la Hogue, and Tourville, the French admiral, obeyed the orders of his ſovereign; but the ſuperior numbers of the confederates ſoon decided the fate of the day. The French admiral's own ſhip, with twenty more of the largeſt veſſels of his fleet, were deſtroyed by the fire of the victors; and James, with a ſigh of deſpair, beheld from a neighbouring eminence, the gloomy flame which for ever blaſted the fond expectations he had nouriſhed.

A. D. 1693.] But on land Lewis ſtill maintained his ſuperiority; Namur, the ſtrongeſt fortreſs of the Netherlands, was reduced even in the ſight of William—and though the activity and vigilance of that monarch ſurpriſed the French camp at Steenkirk, yet the battle was reſtored by the abilities of Luxemburg, and the kindred valour of the princes of the blood; and the king of England, after the moſt daring efforts, was indignantly compelled to give the ſignal of retreat. The next year he ſtill experienced a more deciſive defeat, at Landen the army of the confederates was broken with the loſs of eight thouſand men; Huy and Charleroi were the prey of the victors; while Lewis repaired by induſtry his late diſaſters at ſea, and once more diſputed the ſovereignty of that element.

A. D. 1694, 1695.] Huy was recovered in the enſuing campaign by William—and Luxemburgh, who had ſo often triumphed over that monarch, ſoon after found from diſeaſe that death which he had in vain courted in fields of battle; the duke of Savoy eluded the vigilance of Catinat, penetrated into Dauphiné, and retaliated the miſeries of the palatinate—While France appeared the object of envy to neighbouring ſtates, her diſtreſs each day encreaſed with the number of her victories; her provinces were depopulated to recruit her fleet and armies; the ravages of war were attended by thoſe of famine; and amidſt his glories the monarch has been heard frequently to ſigh for peace. The king of England, animated by the death of Luxemburgh, had inveſted Namur—and though that city was obſtinately defended by the mareſchal Boufflers, it was obliged to capitulate in the ſight of the French army commanded by Villeroi, who could only gratify his reſentment by the unprofitable bombardment of Bruſſels.

A. D. 1696.] To diminiſh the numbers of his enemies, the king of France opened a negociation with the duke of Savoy—and Amadeus was eaſily induced to prefer his intereſt to the faith he had pledged his allies. He received again his dominions with four millions of livres to repair the damages they had ſuſtained; Lewis at the ſame time engaged to him his conſtant protection, and promiſed his ſecond ſon, the duke of Burgundy, to the princeſs of Savoy—Though this treaty ſecured France on the ſide of Italy, yet her coaſts were continually alarmed and afflicted by the deſcents of the Engliſh, and Lewis beheld with concern that people again reſume their naval ſuperiority.

A. D. 1697.] In Flanders the mareſchal Catinat reduced Athe—in Spain the duke of Vendoſme, grandſon to Henry the Fourth, gained a glorious victory; he inveſted Barcelona, and the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt, who defended that city with a garriſon of ten thouſand men, was, after a gallant reſiſtance, compelled to capitulate; in America, Pointis, with a French ſquadron, ſurpriſed Carthagena; and the loſs ſuſtained by Spain in the plunder of that place was eſtimated at thirty millions of livres—on the other hand, Lewis in vain attempted to fix the crown of Poland on the head of the prince of Conti, who was conſtrained to abandon the field to his ſucceſsful competitor Auguſtus, elector of Saxony.

Each party at length ſincerely inclined to peace; the empire and Spain were weary of a war which had been attended only with misfortunes; the parliament of England had long murmured at the heavy and encreaſing expence; and Holland, though more devoted to the inclinations of William, regretted her trade intercepted, and her moſt fruitful provinces laid waſte. Lewis himſelf could not be entirely indifferent to the tears and miſeries of his ſubjects; the rigour of the ſeaſon had combined with the rage of the enemy, and the kingdom, lately ſo fertile, preſented to the eye a dreary and barren proſpect. Under theſe circumſtances, the mediation of Charles the Eleventh, king of Sweden, was accepted; and the caſtle of Ryſwick, near the Hague, was fixed upon as the ſcene of negociation.

The king of France reſtored to the Spaniards all thoſe places that he had taken from them, and the conqueſts that he had made in Flanders during the laſt war, as Luxemburgh, Mons, Athe, and Courtrai. He acknowledged William the Third as lawful king of England, whom he had hitherto treated as an uſurper. To the empire he relinquiſhed Fribourg, Briſac, Kheil, and Philipſbourg; and even ſubmitted to deſtroy the fortifications of Straſburg on the Rhine; Fort Lewis, and Traerbach, works on which the great Vauban had exhauſted his art, and the king his treaſure, Lorrain, Treves, and the Palitinate, were reſigned to their reſpective princes, and France, after a long and bloody war, in which her victories can only be numbered by her campaigns, conſented to a peace, which could ſcarce have been expected from her, if humbled by repeated defeats.

The miniſters who had ſigned the treaty, on their return to the capital were purſued with reproach and ridicule; they were execrated as traitors to their country by the unthinking multitude, who had lately clamoured againſt the proſecution of the war; the policy and judgement of Lewis were generally arraigned; but that monarch, in the late negociation, harboured a deſign beyond the views of the vulgar; the health of Charles the Second of Spain daily declined; and the king of France revolved in ſecret his pretenſions to that ſucceſſion, which by the treaty of the Pyrenees he had ſolemnly renounced.

The dawning luſtre of Lewis had been obſcured by the power and aſcendancy of his imperious miniſter; on the death of Mazarin, he emerged from that abject ſtate of vaſſalage, and awed and aſtoniſhed Europe by the blaze of his meridian glory, but a dark cloud hung over his ſetting ſun; and he ſurvived to behold, in the evening of life, the deſertion of his allies and the triumph of his enemies; his cities raſed, his people ſlaughtered, and his children prematurely buried in the grave.

A. D. 1698.] The peace of Ryſwick was ſucceeded by new negociations; the pretenſions of the king of France to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion were not veiled from the penetrating eye of William the Third; Lewis, ſenſible that the emperor urged the ſame claims of conſanguinity, though priority of birth fortified the houſe of Bourbon, and conſcious from late experience that his own ſtrength was not able to contend with the united power of Europe, opened by his miniſter a new project to the king of England. William entered into it with alacrity; and the celebrated treaty of partition was concluded, which divided the dominions of Spain during the life of her ſovereign. To the young prince of Bavaria were aſſigned Spain and the Eaſt-Indies; to the dauphin, ſon of Lewis the Fourteenth, Naples, Sicily, and the province of Guipuſcoa; and to the archduke Charles, the second son of the emperor Leopold, only the duchy of Milan.

A. D. 1699, 1700.] Even the feeble and languid soul of Charles was aroused by this daring insult; he heard with indignation in what manner his monarchy had been distributed; and to preserve it entire he signed his will, and bequeathed the whole of his ample dominions to the prince of Bavaria; the sudden death of that prince not only disconcerted the designs of Charles, but even those of Lewis and William; the two latter monarchs signed, however, a new treaty of partition, by which Spain and the East-Indies were transferred to the archduke Charles, and Milan to the duke of Lorrain. To this treaty the emperor Leopold, who flattered himself with the hope of the whole succession, refused to accede.

A. D. 1700.] But it was only the dread of alarming the united fears of Europe, which had prevailed on Lewis to subscribe conditions so inadequate to his insatiate ambition; he still waited in anxious suspence the death of Charles, and the bed of that expiring monarch was besieged by the intrigues and factions of the rival houses of Austria and Bourbon; but the intractable haughtiness of the former had disgusted the ministers of Spain; and they prevailed on their monarch to sign a new will, which blasted the hopes of Leopold, and preserved the Spanish monarchy entire; expressing his indignation at the late injurious conduct of Lewis, Charles bequeathed his dominions to Philip duke of Anjou, grandson to the king of France, and soon after expired.

The treaty of partition augmented the power and dominions of France; the will of Charles aggrandised the house of Bourbon; Lewis preferred the elevation of his family to the interests of the state, and accepted for his grandson the royal fortune that was bequeathed him; at the same time he endeavoured to justify to his allies the infraction of the partition treaty, by observing that he had only departed from the words, and still adhered to the spirit of it, which was to preserve the tranquillity of Europe.

But none felt their disappointment more deeply than the emperor Leopold, and William king of England. The former beheld Spain, and her dependencies, for ever separated from the house of Austria; yet his weakness confined him to ineffectual remonstrances; the latter, though secure of the affection of the united provinces, was regarded with jealousy by the English parliament; and he found that people averse to encrease their debt, and sacrifice their trade, to gratify his enmity to Lewis by a new war, in which they considered themselves but little interested.

Philip the Fifth was formally acknowledged by the king of England and the states of Holland; he was supported by the elector of Bavaria and the duke of Savoy, and from Gibraltar to Antwerp, and from the Danube to Naples, Lewis beheld the power and influence of the house of Bourbon extended; he was elated with the boundless prospect before him, and his presumption precipitated him into two errors, the source of all his future calamities.

A. D. 1701.] While Leopold ſtill heſitated whether to acknowledge or oppoſe the elevation of Philip the Fifth, he was arouſed by a new proof of the inſatiate diſpoſition of Lewis. That monarch prevailed on the duke of Mantua to admit a garriſon into his capital, and all Italy trembled for her liberties; the emperor immediately prepared to aſſert the freedom of Europe by the ſword; his army was entruſted to the command of prince Eugene, ſon to the count of Soiſſons. This general, who afterwards became ſo dangerous an adverſary to Lewis the Fourteenth, had aſpired to military honours in his native country; but his requeſt of a regiment had been rejected by the king, and the indignant prince for ever renounced the ſervice of France, and ſought glory under the imperial ſtandard; his reſentment was the ſubject of deriſion at Paris, but he ſoon diſtinguiſhed his martial genius in ſucceſſive victories againſt the Turks, and was now ſummoned to avenge the wrongs of Italy and his own inſults. He entered that country with thirty thouſand men, and full powers to act according to his own diſcretion; he forced the poſt of Carpi; reduced mareſchal Catinat to act upon the defenſive; and overwhelmed the country between the Adige and the Adda; Villeroi, the favourite of Lewis, was ſent to aſſume the command over Catinat, and diſguſted by his arrogance the duke of Savoy; he compelled his reluctant colleagues to attack prince Eugene; in the ſtrong poſt of Chiari, on the banks of the Oglio, his temerity was chaſtiſed by a ſevere and bloody defeat; and five thouſand of the braveſt troops of France periſhed on that diſaſtrous day.

While the flames of war were kindled in Italy, James, the abdicated monarch of England, cloſed at Saint Germain's his unfortunate and inglorious life. The tears and importunities of madame de Maintenon prevailed over the counſels of his moſt experienced miniſters, and Lewis, though he had acknowledged William's title by the peace of Ryſwick, now proclaimed the ſon of the deceaſed prince as James the Third. The enmity of William was ſtimulated by this wanton inſult; England, that had hitherto regarded war with averſion, partook in the indignation of her ſovereign, and prepared to vindicate by arms her own choice. The diſcernment of William improved the honourable enthuſiaſm; he concerted the triple alliance between the empire, the united provinces, and England, and haſtened, by his preſence and diligence, their formidable preparations.

A. D. 1702.] But theſe inceſſant efforts exhauſted a frame naturally weak and delicate; a fall from his horſe quickened the progreſs of diſeaſe, and in the fifty-ſecond year of his age he yielded up his throne and life. The former was immediately filled by Anne, the daughter of the unfortunate James, and who had married the prince of Denmark; and the new queen diſpatched the earl of Marlborough to the Hague, to aſſure her allies that ſhe would adopt and ſupport the engagements of her predeceſſor.

That nobleman was ſoon after appointed to the command of the allied army, and diſplayed that military ſkill which he acquired under the mareſchal Turenne; Boufflers, to whom Lewis had entruſted his grandſon the duke of Burgundy to train to war, was confounded by the rapid and complicated movements of his adverſary. He evacuated Guelderland, retired under the walls of Liege, and finally ſought ſhelter in Brabant; while Venlo, Ruremonde, and Liege, were ſucceſſively reduced by Marlborough.

In Italy, prince Eugene, by a daring and well-concerted march, had ſurpriſed Cremona, and taken mareſchal Villeroi priſoner; after an obſtinate conflict he was expelled again the town, ſuffered ſome loſs at Santa Vittoria, and in the battle of Luzara was encountered by the duke of Vendoſme; that prince, in whom martial activity and indolence were wonderfully blended, was diſtinguiſhed by talents worthy the grandſon of Henry the Fourth; and though in the battle of Luzara the loſs on both ſides was nearly equal, yet Vendoſme claimed the advantage, and maintained it by the reduction of Luzara and Guaſtalla.

On the banks of the Rhine a more deciſive victory was obtained over prince Lewis of Baden by the mareſchal Villars; and ſoon after in the plains of Hochſtet, in concert with the elector of Bavaria, he charged and routed the imperial general count Styrum; three thouſand of the imperialiſts were left dead on the field, four thouſand were taken priſoners with their cannon and baggage; while mareſchal Tallard, near Spires, engaged and defeated the prince of Heſſe.

In the midſt of this ſucceſs France was alarmed by the deſertion of the duke of Savoy, who obtained from the emperor the promiſe of Montferrat, Mantua, Valencia, and the countries between the Po and the Tanaro. At the ſame time the enemies of the houſe of Bourbon were increaſed by the declaration of Peter the Second of Portugal, who acknowledged the archduke Charles as ſovereign of Spain.

A. D. 1703, 1704.] The duke of Marlborough, with increaſe of dignity and the applauſe of his country, had returned to Flanders, poſſeſſed himſelf of Bonn, the reſidence of the elector of Cologn, retaken Huy and Limbourg, and made himſelf maſter of the Lower Rhine; mareſchal Villeroi, redeemed from captivity, in vain endeavoured to check his progreſs, and was ſoon after deceived by his maſterly addreſs. To ſuccour the emperor, oppreſſed by the joint forces of France and the elector of Bavaria, Marlborough rapidly marched into the heart of Germany, and traverſing the Rhine, the Maine, and the Necker, was met at Mindelſheim by prince Eugene, who had quitted Italy, to aſſume the command of the imperialiſts on the banks of the Danube.

Villars had been recalled to wage an inglorious war in the mountains of the Cevennes againſt the unhappy Proteſtants, whom the perſecution of Lewis had forced into revolt, and the glory of France was entruſted to mareſchal Tallard: the lines of the elector of Bavaria, near Donawert, had been forced by Marlborough with conſiderable loſs; but the appearance of Tallard inſpired that prince with freſh confidence; it was determined to riſk the fate of the war on a deciſive battle, and the French and Bavarians with ſuperior numbers advanced to attack the confederates, who effected a junction with the prince of Baden; but the plains of Hochſtet, which had ſo lately witneſſed the triumph of Villars, were rendered memorable by the defeat of Tallard. That general was vanquiſhed by the ſuperior ſkill of his adverſary; he himſelf was taken priſoner, with fourteen thouſand of the braveſt troops of France; twelve thouſand periſhed by the ſword, or were precipitated into the rapid ſtream of the Danube; and of an army of ſixty thouſand men, ſcarce twenty thouſand could be collected from its broken remains.

A. D. 1704, 1705.] The battle of Hochſtet, better known in England by the name of Blenheim, expoſed to the ravages of the victors the electorate of Bavaria; and Lewis once more ſummoned the mareſchal Villars to the ſcene of his former glory; an accommodation had reſtored the inhabitants of the Cevennes to their allegiance; and the conduct of Villars proved him an adverſary worthy of Marlborough. He occupied a ſtrong camp, remained on the defenſive, and by his prudent meaſures compelled the duke to relinquiſh his deſign of penetrating into France by the courſe of the Moſelle.

The ſtates, anxious for their frontier, ſoon prevailed on the duke of Marlborough to return to Flanders; and Villeroi, who had taken Huy, and was preparing to beſiege Liege, abandoned the enterpriſe on the intelligence of his approach. Huy was again compelled to ſurrender to the confederates; and the lines of Villeroi were immediately after forced. That general croſſed the Geete and Dyle with precipitation; but the ſtrong ground he judiciouſly occupied prevented the allies from improving their advantage, and he ſhortly after reſtored his reputation by the reduction of Dieſt.

The numerous armies of the empire on the banks of the Rhine were baffled by the ſkill of Villars; and in Italy the duke of Vendoſme inceſſantly preſſed prince Eugene and the duke of Savoy, fought the bloody but indeciſive battle of Caſſano, gained that of Caſſinato, and even menaced Turin with the horrors of a ſiege. But in Spain, the allies, who had proclaimed the archduke Charles, king, obtained the moſt rapid and ſplendid advantages; the earl of Peterborough poſſeſſed himſelf of Barcelona; all Catalonia ranged itſelf under the banners of the houſe of Auſtria; while Gibraltar, which the year before had been wreſted by the Engliſh from Philip, ſecure in her native ſtrength, defied the vain and feeble efforts of the mareſchal de Teſſe.

Lewis had reaped ſome ſatisfaction from the gallantry of his natural ſon, the count of Toulouſe, who, with the French fleet, engaged, with honour and without loſs, that of England—But this was the laſt effort of marine greatneſs; the numerous enterpriſes of the king had exhauſted his treaſures, and his navy was gradually ſuffered to ſink into that ſtate of inſignificance from whence he had raiſed it. Even the death of the emperor abated not the ardour of the confederates, and his ſon Joſeph ſucceeded to his throne and deſigns.

A. D. 1706.] The campaign in Flanders opened with events the moſt diſaſtrous. The command there was ſtill entruſted to the mareſchal Villeroi; and that general, impatient of glory, yet unendowed with talents to acquire it, rejected the advice of his officers, and determined to hazard a decisive engagement against the allies. Near the village of Ramillies, France was vanquished by the injudicious disposition of her own, and the consummate skill of the English commander. In the action and pursuit twenty thousand men were slaughtered or taken prisoners; Antwerp, Brussels, Ostend, Menin, and the greatest part of Spanish Flanders were the prey of the victor; the court of Lewis was filled with consternation; but the monarch himself still preserved his magnanimity; instead of reproaching, he endeavoured to console the unfortunate Villeroi, and to his expressions of concern, replied, "People at our time of life, monsieur "mareschal, are not fortunate."

The flattering prospect in Italy still promised to repair the disasters of Flanders; Turin there was invested by mareschal Feuillade; and the siege was covered by the duke of Orleans, the nephew of Lewis, but whose authority was controlled by the superior but secret powers of mareschal Marsin. The city was already reduced to the last distress, when the besiegers were alarmed by the rapid approach of prince Eugene. In a long and painful march that celebrated commander had pierced the most difficult defiles, had traversed the rapid streams of the Adige and the Po, and effecting a junction with the duke of Savoy, now pressed forwards to the relief of the desponding capital. The duke of Orleans would have quitted his lines to have met and encountered the enemy; this bold but prudent propofal was over-ruled by mareschal Marsin; the French awaited the attack in their entrenchments; but their confidence was extinguished by the dissensions of their generals; prince Eugene and the duke of Savoy charged with rival ardour, and in less than two hours their efforts obtained a complete victory. The duke of Orleans was wounded; mareschal Marsin killed; the scattered remnant of the vanquished troops directed their hasty and trembling steps towards Pignerol; and by the fate of one day the duchies of Milan, Mantua, and Piedmont, with the kingdom of Naples, were torn from the house of Bourbon.

An advantage obtained by the French in Mantua over the prince of Hesse, could but ill compensate the disastrous battle of Turin. The courtiers of Lewis stood aghast at the intelligence, and madame de Maintenon alone ventured to inform him that all Italy was occupied by his enemies. His grandson Philip had been compelled to abandon precipitately the siege of Barcelona; Charles had entered in triumph, and been proclaimed in Madrid. But that prince suffered the moment of enterprise to elapse; and was in his turn reduced to evacuate the capital, and fly before the arms of the duke of Berwick, natural son to James the Second of England.

A. D. 1707.] Lewis, humbled by repeated defeate, sued in vain for peace; the allies elated by their victories, determined to pursue their advantages, and rejected his proposals—Yet the war in Flanders was continued this campaign with little effect; the duke of Vendome, who commanded the French, remained upon the defenſive; and the duke of Marlborough was diſpatched into Saxony to penetrate into the intentions, and concilitate the friendſhip of Charles the Twelfth king of Sweden. That monarch, young and warlike, and ambitious of the fame of a conqueror, had already ſpread his renown through the north. He had preſcribed laws to Denmark: he had defeated the Muſcovites, a people ſcarce known in Europe, and juſt emerging from barbariſm; and had purſued with implacable enmity, Auguſtus king of Poland into his hereditary dominions of Saxony. The confederates trembled leſt he ſhould turn his victorious arms againſt the empire; but Marlborough was equally ſucceſsful in the cabinet as the field; he gained the miniſters of Charles; and that monarch ſoon after repaſſed the Oder, and directed his march towards Muſcovy in ſearch of barren laurels.

In Spain the duke of Berwick triumphed at Almanza over the forces of the confederates, and reſtored the ſinking fortunes of Philip—In Germany mareſchal Villars paſſed the Rhine, preſſed the Imperialiſts, and even penetrated to the Danube—Yet he was prevented from improving his advantage by the recall of a conſiderable part of his army to the defence of France itſelf, which was now attacked within its limits. The duke of Savoy and prince Eugene had forced the paſſage of the river Var, advanced along the coaſt of Provence, and encamped under the walls of Toulon—But the tardy motions of the Germans, who were to have joined them, and the activity of France, compelled them to abandon the enterpriſe; and they retired, after having bombarded the town, and convinced Lewis that his native dominions were not invulnerable.

A. D. 1708.] The tranſient ſucceſs of the laſt campaign revived the ſpirits of the king of France; he determined to make one more exertion in favour of the exiled branch of Stuart—Seventy tranſports, with ſix thouſand troops, convoyed by eight men of war, ſailed from Dunkirk; but the coaſts of Britain were protected by her numerous fleet; the vigilance of her officers were already alarmed; the adherents of James were ſecured and diſarmed; and the French, after a fruitleſs attempt to land in Scotland, eſteemed themſelves happy in ſafely regaining Dunkirk.

Flanders at firſt promiſed a fairer harveſt; and the forces of France, commanded by Vendome, were animated by the preſence of the duke of Burgundy, eldeſt ſon of the dauphin. The inhabitants of Ghent and Bruges, corrupted by the gold of Lewis, opened their gates—But the hopes of the French were blaſted by the approach of Marlborough; on the banks of the Scheld they were attacked by that general, who had effected a junction with prince Eugene; the battle of Oudenarde was long obſtinate and bloody; night parted the combatants; the French were rather preſſed than vanquiſhed; but the troops of Lewis, from ſucceſſive defeats, had loſt all confidence, and they diſperſed under cover of the darkneſs; Liſle, defended by mareſchal Boufflers in perſon, and fortified by the conſummate ſkill of Vauban, was reduced by the confederates; Ghent and Bruges were recovered; and the elector of Bavaria was compelled to retire from the walls of Bruſſels.

A. D. 1708, 1709.] In Spain, Germany and Italy, a feeble and languid war was carried on; in the former indeed the honourable attachment of the Caſtilians to Philip became every day more evident; but in the latter the duke of Savoy eluded the vigilance of Villars, and rendered himſelf maſter of Exilles, and Feneſtrelles; the Britiſh fleet reduced the iſlands of Sardinia and Minorca; and the difficulties of Lewis increaſed on every ſide. The taking of Liſle had opened a road to the very gates of Paris, that proud city was inſulted and alarmed by the predatory incurſions of the enemy; and a prince who had carried his arms a few years ago to the banks of the Danube, the Tagus, and the Po, now doubted whether he could remain in his capital with ſafety. The deſpair of the nation was completed by the ſeverity of the winter; the olive trees throughout the ſouth of France were deſtroyed, the grain was cut off, and the proſpect of impending famine threw a deeper gloom over the calamities of war. Accuſtomed to proſperity, Lewis reluctantly bowed beneath his adverſe fortune, and inſtructed his miniſter Torcy to open at the Hague a negociation for peace.

A. D. 1709.] Bat though the king of France agreed to yield the whole Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria, to cede Furnes, Ypres, Tournay, Liſle, &c. as a barrier to Holland, to own the title of queen Anne to the Britiſh throne, and to remove the pretender from France, yet theſe conceſſions appeared inſufficient, and the allies demanded that the king ſhould aſſiſt in driving his grandſon from the throne of Spain; Lewis rejected the ignominious condition with indignation, and added, "ſince I muſt make war, I had rather it was againſt my ene-"mies than my children."

The internal miſery of France ſerved to ſwell her forces, and the wretched huſbandman fought in the profeſſion of arms, that ſubſiſtence which he could no longer extort from the earth. Mareſchal Villars was recalled from Italy to aſſume the command of an army formidable from its numbers and deſpair. In the neighbourhood of Malplaquet he diligently fortified a camp naturally ſtrong; Marlborough and Eugene, animated by the capture of Tournay, ruſhed to the attack. The battle was diſputed with an obſtinacy ſcarce to be equalled even in theſe ſanguinary annals; the allies were frequently repulſed, and as frequently returned to the charge; Villars himſelf was wounded, and Boufflers, who ſucceeded to the command, at length withdrew his troops from the unavailing conflict. Yet his retreat partook in nothing of flight; it was neither confuſed nor precipitate; eight thouſand of the French were indeed left dead on the ground, but the confederates purchaſed the honour of the field of battle at the expence of twenty thouſand men.

Mons ſoon after ſurrendered to the allies, and cloſed the campaign in Flanders. The efforts of the contending powers in Spain, Germany, and Italy, were ſtill feeble and inadequate; but in the north the king of Sweden, who had endeavored to penetrate into the heart of Ruſſia, was at Pultowa defeated by the ſovereign of that country, afterwards ſo celebrated as Peter the Great; the Swediſh army was entirely deſtroyed, and Charles, who had aſpired to rival the fame of Alexander, wounded and accompanied only by a few faithful guards, croſſed the Boryſthenes in a ſmall boat, and ſought ſhelter in the Ottoman dominions.

A. D. 1710.] The negociations for peace had been reſumed with as little ſucceſs as in the enſuing year. The allies took the field, and mareſchal Villars ſtudiouſly avoided a deciſive engagement. Douay, Bethune, Saint Venant, and Aire, were ſucceſſively reduced by the confederates; but theſe towns were long and obſtinately defended, and the beſiegers loſt by the ſword, by diſeaſe, and fatigue, above twenty-ſix thouſand men; diſabled by ſucceſs, and ſatisfied with their new acquiſitions, they withdrew into winter quarters.

Germany and Italy preſented nothing worthy of attention, but in Spain, the campaign that opened with events the moſt inauſpicious to the houſe of Bourbon, was cloſed with the moſt ſplendid and deciſive ſucceſs. In the battle of Almenaſa, the rival monarchs encountered each other with mutual rage, but Philip was compelled to yield to the ſuperior fortune of Charles. In the battle of Saragoſſa he ſuffered a ſecond and more bloody defeat; Madrid was again occupied by the confederates, and the ſituation of Philip appeared deſperate to his moſt ſanguine adherents. But he was raiſed from deſpondence by the courage and conduct of the duke of Vendome. His affability, frankneſs, and generoſity, conciliated the eſteem of every claſs of men; he again kindled the enthuſiaſm of the Caſtilians, aſſembled the troops ſcattered by the defeat of Saragoſſa, allured to his ſtandard the moſt gallant ſpirits of Spain, conducted the king in triumph to his capital, and purſued with vigour the aſtoniſhed and diſmayed enemy. At Brehuega general Stanhope, with five thouſand Engliſh, ſurrendered after a brave reſiſtance; at Villa Vicioſa Staremberg was defeated with the loſs of near ſix thouſand men; and though his retreat challenged the admiration of his adverſary, yet the progreſs of Vendome was rapid and uninterrupted, and Portugal in her turn was taught by the victors to experience the calamities of war.

A. D. 1711.] The ſucceſs of Philip in Spain could not alleviate the diſtreſs of France, though it might moderate the preſumtion of her enemies; that kingdom, totally exhauſted by her inceſſant efforts, preſented a ſcence of dreary deſolation; but the peace, which ſhe had in vain emplored by the moſt humiliating conceſſions, was now facilitated by two events as favourable as they were unexpected. Amidſt a glorious and ſucceſsful war, the queen of England was prevailed on to diſmiſs thoſe miniſters who had conducted it, and admit to her councils a new deſcription of men who had ſyſtematically laboured to oppoſe it. About the ſame time, in the vigour of his age, the emperor Joſeph expired; and his brother Charles, the competitor of Philip for Spain, was raiſed to the imperial throne.—The confederates had been arouſed to action by the dread of uniting in one hand the ſceptres of France and Spain; and they could not but regard with ſimilar jealouſy, the latter kingdom added to the hereditary dominions of Charles, and the power that he derived from the imperial crown.

Though the female paſſions of his ſovereign had exiled his friends from her confidence, yet the reputation of Marlborough preſerved him from being involved in their immediate diſgrace; he again reſumed the command in Flanders; and mareſchal Villars, who was alſo again oppoſed to him, well acquainted with the ardent deſire of Lewis for peace, and conſcious that he conducted the laſt army the ſtate could furniſh, dexterouſly eluded every effort of the confederates to force him to a deciſive engagement. He had encamped behind the river Sanſet, and had fortified his lines with ſuch ſkill and diligence, as obtained for them the character of impenetrable. But he was deceived by the maſterly addreſs of Marlborough; he was compelled to abandon the works on which ſo much coſt and labour had been laviſhed, and had the mortification of beholding the allies inveſt and reduce the ſtrong and important fortreſs of Bouchain.

A. D. 1712.] This laſt entarpriſe of Marlborough cloſed the long and ſplendid ſeries of his martial exploits; he was recalled to England, and ſoon after, diſguſted at the aſcendancy of a party whoſe implacable enmity he was no ſtranger to, reſigned his command. His place was ſupplied by the duke of Ormond, equal to him alone in perſonal courage, and whoſe attachment to the new miniſtry was his principal recommendation. But while each power prepared with vigour for a ſecond campaign, negociations for peace were ſecretly carried on between the courts of Paris and London. Lewis entruſted this important and delicate concern to the knowledge and addreſs of Menager, deputy from the city of Rouen; certain preliminaries were, by his diligence and prudence, adjuſted; but before they could be reduced to form, the operations of war had been reſumed in Flanders.

Mareſchal Villars ſtill remained upon the defenſive, and ſuſtained the cautious part that he had acted in the preceding campaign; but prince Eugene inſulted and burnt the ſuburbs of Arras; and was no ſooner joined by the duke of Ormond, than he advanced towards the French, and propoſed to the duke to give battle; but the Engliſh general had received inſtructions not to hazard an eugagement, and the prince, diſappointed in his favourite object, inveſted Queſnoi. Before that town ſurrendered, a ceſſation of arms was proclaimed between France and Great Britain; the duke of Ormond, with the Britiſh troops, withdrew from the confederates, and directed his march towards Dunkirk, which was delivered by Lewis to the Engliſh as a pledge of his intentions to fulfil the preliminaries of peace which his envoy had ſigned.

Though deſerted by ſo important an ally, the army of prince Eugene was ſtill formidable. Mareſchal Villars beheld with indignation Qeſnoi taken in his ſight; and the confederates ſoon after inveſted Landreci. But prince Eugene is accuſed of errors on this occaſion, which did not eſcape the vigilance of his veteran antagoniſt. His lines were too much extended; his magazines at Marchiennes were at too great a diſtance, and the earl of Albemarle, who was poſted between Denain and the prince's camp, was not near enough to be ſupported in caſe of an attack. Mareſchal Villars ordered his cavalry to advance within ſight of the camp of the prince, and while that quarter of the confederates prepared for action, he rapidly preſſed forwards with his infantry towards Denain, pierced the intrenchments of Albemarle, cut in pieces thoſe who reſiſted, forced the ſurvivors to ſeek their ſafety in flight, took that general himſelf priſoner, and ſlaughtered or diſperſed a body of fourteen thouſand men. Prince Eugene had marched in haſte to their ſupport, but before he could arrive the action was over. In endeavouring to wreſt from the French a bridge over the Scheld which they had occupied, he augmented his loſs; and was at laſt obliged to withdraw to his camp, after having witneſſed the defeat of his beſt troops.

All the poſts along the Scarpe, as far as Marchiennes, were ſwept away by the victors, and Marchiennes itſelf was ſoon after inveſted by Villars; though defended by a garriſon of four thouſand men, ſuch was the ardour of the aſſailants, that it was compelled to ſurrender in three days; all the ammunition and proviſions that the enemy had laid up for the whole campaign, fell into the hands of the French; the confederates retired from the walls of Landreci; while Villars reduced Douay and Queſnoi, poſſeſſed himſelf in the latter of the military ſtores of the allies, and terminated the campaign by the reduction of the important town of Bouchain.

A. D. 1713.] The preliminaries which had been ſigned between the courts of Paris and London were ſucceeded by open conferences for peace at Utrecht; theſe were quickened by the brilliant and rapid ſucceſs of Villars—the emperor and ſome of the independent princes of Germany ſtill maintained an haughty and ſullen reſerve, and refuſed to ſheath the ſword. But Great-Britain, Holland, Pruſſia, Portugal, and Savoy, acquieſced in the terms propoſed, and ſigned ſeparate treaties of peace.

By theſe Philip the Fifth was acknowledged king of Spain, but at the ſame time he ſolemnly renounced all pretenſions to the crown of France—Lewis, for the other branches of the houſe of Bourbon, diſavowed all right to the future ſucceſſion of any part of the Spaniſh territories, and every precaution was taken to ſeparate for ever thoſe kindred thrones. The king of France conſented to guarantee the crown of Britain to the Proteſtant line of the houſe of Hanover, to demoliſh the fortifications of Dunkirk, and to yield acroſs the Atlantic, Newfoundland, Hudſon's Bay, and Acadia—he promiſed to ſequeſter into the hands of Holland, for the houſe of Auſtria, all that France, or her allies, poſſeſſed in the Spaniſh Netherlands, at the concluſion of the treaty of Ryſwick—he conſented to allow the title of king of Pruſſia to the elector of Brandenburg, and to cede to him the town of Guelders, with part of the Spaniſh Guelderland; with Portugal, all places that had been taken on either ſide were mutually reſtored; to the duke of Savoy were given the iſland of Sicily, with the title of king; he was alſo ſecured in the ſucceſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy, in caſe of failure in the king of Spain and his poſterity; and in exchange for the valley of Barcelonetta and its dependencies, he obtained the reſtitution of the duchy of Savoy, the county of Nice, and all the country along the Alps towards Piedmont.

By ſuch conceſſions Lewis diſarmed the rage of his moſt formidable enemies, and reſcued his kingdom from the deſtruction that impended over it; amidſt miſfortune and defeat, he eſtabliſhed his grandſon on the throne of Spain, whoſe pretenſions had firſt excited the hoſtile confederacy of Europe; and he was now left to turn his whole force againſt the emperor, who, deſerted and alone, ſtill nouriſhed the flames of war. From the Scheld mareſchal Villars rapidly directed his ſteps towards the Rhine; he made himſelf maſter of Spires and Worms, took Landau, pierced the lines which prince Eugene had ordered to be drawn from Briſgau, defeated Vauban, and laſtly, inveſted and reduced Friburg, the capital of Upper Auſtria.

His approach awakened Charles the Sixth from the deluſive idea that he had entertained of his own ſtrength, and he now panted for that repoſe which he ſo lately indignantly rejected. At Radſtadt, mareſchal Villars and the prince of Eugene, who had been ſo often oppoſed to each other in the field, were now oppoſed in the cabinet. Both diſplayed that frankneſs of character for which they were diſtinguiſhed; and deſpiſing the intrigues of courts, they ſoon adjuſted the different pretenſions of their ſovereigns. Lewis yielded to the emperor the fort of Keil, the city of Friburg, and old Briſac, with its dependencies; but he retained Straſbourgh and Landau, the ſovereignty of Alſace, and procured his allies, the electors of Cologn and Bavaria, to be reinſtated in their ranks and dominions.

The domeſtic miſery of Lewis had kept pace with the public calamities; that court, the ſplendour and magnificent entertainments of which had excited the envy and adminiſtration of Europe, had long been impreſſed with a deep and ſettled gloom. The paſſion of the king for madame de Maintenon, and the addreſs of that lady, who ſtill kept alive his hopes, without gratifying his deſires, had induced him to conſent to a private marriage; the art of ſurgery in Europe was yet feeble and crude; a fiſtula, with which the king was attacked, ſpread a general alarm; and though the operation was ſucceſsfully performed, yet he ever after led a more ſerious and retired life, and chiefly devoted his hours to the converſation of madame de Maintenon, whoſe influence increaſed with his years.

But it was while his mind was yet oppreſſed by a long and bloody war, invariably unfortunate, that he was doomed to experience the ſevereſt pangs of domeſtic affliction. The death of the king's only ſon, which happened this year; the duke of Burgundy, the ducheſs his wife, and their eldeſt ſon, all ſwept away within a few months, and laid in the ſame tomb; the only ſurviving child at the point of death; theſe private woes added to thoſe of the public, mark the reign of Lewis the Fourteenth as an æra of calamity; and a wretched people awaited in ſilence to behold the former greatneſs and glory of their monarch extinguiſhed by the dark cloud of miſery which obſcured his ſetting ſun.

A. D. 1714.] From theſe gloomy apprehenſions they were relieved by the ſound of peace; but one mortification ſtill remained to embitter the laſt hours of the king of France. He had enlarged the canal of Mardyke, and formed an harbour there, which was thought already equal to that of Dunkirk. The earl of Stair, ambaſſador from England, remonſtrated againſt this evaſion of the treaty of Utrecht in the ſtrongeſt terms, and Lewis reluctantly conſented to diſcontinue the works.

The Catalans ſtill refuſed to ſubmit to the authority of Philip of Spain; bold and hardy, they flattered themſelves with the hopes of erecting a republic in that fruitful country; and Lewis, who during the latter part of the war, had not been able to ſupport his grandſon, now fitted out an armament for his aſſiſtance. A ſquadron of French ſhips blocked up the harbour, and mareſchal Berwick, with a conſiderable army, inveſted Barcelona by land. The inhabitants defended themſelves with a courage that was fortified by fanaticiſm; the prieſts and monks ran to arms, and mounted the trenches as if it had been a religious war; but the queen of England, faithful to the treaty ſhe had concluded, refuſed their ſupplications for aſſiſtance; the aſſailants at length penetrated into the town; and the beſieged, after having defended ſtreet after ſtreet, were overpowered by the number of their enemies; the clemency of Philip granted to them their lives and eſtates; but their important privileges were for ever aboliſhed; and the ſpirit of that daring people, who, as Tacitus happily expreſſes himſelf, "only ſeemed to live when engaged in "war," was finally broken.

A. D. 1715.] Queen Ann had expired in England, and the life of Lewis now alſo drew near its end. At the age of ſeventy-ſeven, that vanity and ambition which had agitated the years of manhood, were nearly extinguiſhed. He coldly liſtened to the ſolicitations of the unfortunate James, who aſpired to aſcend the throne of his ſiſter, already filled by the elector of Hanover. To the importunities of that prince he granted a ſmall ſupply of money, and a veſſel fitted out in the name of an individual; but while that enterpriſe hung in ſuſpence, Lewis himſelf was ſeized with a diſeaſe that brought him to the grave.

In his laſt hours he diſplayed a greatneſs of mind worthy of his elevated ſituation. "Why do you weep," ſaid he to his domeſtics, "did you think me "immortal?" The fortitude with which he beheld his end, was diveſted of that glare of oſtentation which had tinſelled the reſt of his life; he had the courage even to acknowledge his errors; and his advice to his infant ſucceſſor was to avoid that glory which he himſelf had ſought by war, and to conſider the happineſs of his people as the principal object of his government. To madame de Maintenon he left no fixed ſtipend, and contented himſelf with recommending her to the care of the duke of Orleans; ſhe immediately retired to St. Cyr, which had been founded at her perſuaſion for the education of young ladies of quality, and demanded only a penſion of eighty thouſand livres; this was regularly paid her to her death, an event which took place in about four years afterwards.

The character of Lewis the Fourteenth, whoſe long and various reign was alternately the glory and misfortune of his ſubjects, has exerciſed the ingenuity of the moſt celebrated hiſtorians. The maſculine beauty of his perſon was embelliſhed with a noble air; the dignity of his behaviour was tempered with the higheſt affability and politeneſs; elegant without effeminacy, addicted to pleaſure without neglecting buſineſs, decent in his very vices, and beloved in the midſt of arbitrary power. But his qualities ſeemed rather thoſe that attract a momentary regard, than command a permanent eſteem! the talents, the fire of the ſtateſman and the hero were ſtill wanting; vanity rather prompted him to inſult, than ambition to enſlave his neighbours; though he frequently took the field, and reduced in perſon Franche Comté, and ſeveral of the ſtrongeſt towns of the Netherlands, yet his perſonal courage has not eſcaped imputation; and in repeated campaigns he never expoſed his life or reputation to the hazard of a battle. A purer praiſe attends the care with which he foſtered the arts and ſciences; though his own acquiſitions in literature were few and limited, yet he patroniſed the learned with a liberal hand; and the painter, the ſculptor, and the architect, were woke into life by the genial ray of his bounty.

LEWIS THE FIFTEENTH.

THE cares of government, which the tender years of Lewis the Fifteenth rendered him unable to aſſume, were devolved by the will of the deceaſed monarch on a council of regency, at the head of which was placed the duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood: but the duke received with diſguſt a diſpoſition, which inſtead of entruſting to him the ſole power, gave him only a caſting vote. He appealed from the injurious deciſion to the parliament of Paris; that aſſembly ſet aſide the teſtament of a king whom living they had feared and obeyed, and declared the duke of Orleans ſole regent.

The unfortunate James (from his empty claim to the throne of Great Britain, better afterwards known as the Pretender) had landed in Scotland, and had experienced in his reception the hereditary attachment of that country to the Houſe of Stuart: but the ardour of his undiſciplined followers was repulſed by the veteran troops of George the Firſt, who ſwayed the ſceptre of Britain. The pretender himſelf eſcaped from the inauſpicious coaſt, to hide his diſgrace in Commercy, in Lorrain; his unhappy adherents periſhed on the ſcaffold, or were driven into exile; and his future hopes were extinguiſhed by the friendſhip which the regent of France aſſiduouſly cultivated with the Houſe of Hanover.

A. D. 1715, 1716.] The duke of Orleans poſſeſſed courage, penetration, and an underſtanding improved by ſtudy: frank and eaſy in his manners, of all the deſcendants of Henry the Fourth he reſembled him the moſt; but his extravagant thirſt after novelty and pleaſure caſt a ſhade over his more ſplendid qualities; and his exceſſive attachment to the fair, impaired his conſtitution and diminiſhed his reputation. The early meaſures of his adminiſtration afforded to the people the moſt favourable impreſſions of his judgment, his equity and moderation. His gratitude reſtored to the parliament the right of remonſtrating againſt the edicts of the crown: he compelled thoſe who during the late reign had fattened on the miſeries of the people, to diſgorge their ill-gotten wealth; he re-peopled the cities that had been deſerted, and the lands that had been laid waſte by the ravages of war; he promoted commerce, rewarded agriculture, and diſpelled the jealouſy that Europe had entertained of the turbulent diſpoſition of France, by a cloſe alliance with Great Britain and the United Provinces.

A. D. 1716, 1717.] But that tranquillity which the pacific inclinations of the regent promiſed to maintain, was ſoon interrupted by the reſtleſs and intriguing genius of cardinal Alberoni, firſt miniſter of Spain. That ſtateſman, whoſe extravagant and chimerical projects alarmed and aſtoniſhed Europe, had re-eſtabliſhed in a few years the finances and troops of the Spaniſh monarchy; he now formed the deſign of recovering Sardinia from the emperor; of wreſting Sicily from the dukes of Savoy, to whom it had been aſſigned by the treaty of Utrecht; and of eſtabliſhing the Pretender on the throne of England. He negociated with the Ottoman Porte, the Czar, Peter the Great of Ruſſia, and Charles the Twelfth, king of Sweden. The Turks were to reſume the war againſt the emperor, which the courage and conduct of prince Eugene had lately compelled them to relinquiſh with diſgrace; the Ruſſians and Swedes were to invade Great Britain, reſtore the family of Stuart, and expel the Houſe of Hanover.

But the project of Alberoni was ſtill incomplete as long as the duke of Orleans retained the regency of France. His intrigues ſoon penetrated into the very capital of that kingdom; he kindled an inſurrection in Brittany; introduced in diſguiſe ſmall parties of troops to the ſupport of the inſurgents; and excited thoſe who envied the fortune, to oppoſe the authority and ſeize the perſon of the regent. But the vigilance of the duke of Orleans detected the conſpiracy; the partiſans of Alberoni ſuffered on the ſcaffold; the king of Sweden, on whom he principally depended, loſt his life in Norway; the Czar was occupied in the internal regulation of his dominions; the Turks refuſed to enter into new wars; and the ambitious cardinal ſaw at once the emperor, the regent of France, and the king of Great Britain united againſt him.

Yet this powerful combination did not entirely baffle the extentive ſchemes of Alberoni; the fleet he had fitted out, ravaged, and reduced the iſland of Sardinia to the ſubjection of Spain: from thence it directed its courſe towards Sicily; ſucceſsfully landed the forces of Philip; and the banners of that monarch were ſoon diſplayed from ſeveral of the moſt conſiderable towns. But while the Spaniards urged the ſiege of Meſſina, they were ſurpriſed by the appearance of a Britiſh ſquadron. The fleet of Spain was defeated after a feeble reſiſtance; and the remnant that eſcaped the purſuit of the victors, abandoned the hopeleſs enterpriſe on Sicily, and ſought ſhelter in their own harbours.

The duke of Orleans had declared war againſt Spain in concert with the Engliſh; and the firſt hoſtile operations commenced by Lewis the Fifteenth were againſt his uncle, whom Lewis the Fourteenth had, at the expence of ſo much blood, eſtabliſhed on his throne. The forces of France were entruſted to the mareſchal duke of Berwick, whoſe victories had formerly contributed to place the ſceptre in the hands of Philip; he ſucceſſively inveſted and reduced Fonterabia and St. Sebaſtian in the province of Biſcay; and Spain, overwhelmed with diſaſters both by ſea and land, conſented to ſue for peace. The conditions were dictated by the regent of France: he inſiſted that Philip ſhould diſmiſs his miniſter; and Alberoni was delivered to the French troops, and conducted to the frontiers of Italy, having only obtained by his ſplendid deſigns the character of a raſh and inconſiderate projector. Fonterabia and St. Sebaſtian were reſtored to Spain; but Sicily was transferred to the emperor Charles and the dukes of Savoy, in exchange, acquired Sardinia, and with the title of king have poſſeſſed that iſland ever ſince.

To cement the kindred thrones of France and Spain, the duke of Orleans projected a double marriage. His own daughter, Mademoiſelle Montpenſier was united to Don Lewis, prince of the Auſtrias; and the infanta of Spain was betrothed to her couſin the king of France. The ties of blood but ſeldom bind ambitious princes; but the late rupture betwen the two courts had reciprocally opened their eyes to their real intereſts, and the houſe of Bourbon was convinced that by unanimity alone it could reſiſt its common enemies.

A. D. 1716, 1718.] That ſpirit of enterpriſe which could no longer be diſplayed in war, was now diverted to the internal regulations of the ſtate. A Scotchman named John Law, who had been obliged to fly from England for murder, had formed the plan of a company that might pay off the debts of a nation by notes, and reimburſe itſelf by its profits. This needy adventurer had wandered through Europe, and endeavoured to excite the attention of various courts. He firſt opened his project to victor Amadeus, duke of Savoy, and who afterwards acquired the title of king of Sardinia; but that prince rejected the propoſal, with the reply, "that he was not rich enough to ruin himſelf." It was received with more favourable prepoſſeſſions in France; every circumſtance of public affairs contributed to recommend it; a debt of two hundred millions oppreſſed the ſtate; no common reſources appeared equal to the enormous burthen; and the inclinations of the people, ever prone to novelty, were ſeconded by the diſpoſition of the regent.

The bank at firſt iſſued their notes with caution; but the credit with which they were attended, ſoon increaſed the amount; its connection with the Miſſiſippi, a trading company, from which great advantages were expected, allured the public with the hopes of extraordinary gain. It now aſpired to grander objects; was declared the bank of the king; embraced the management of the trade to Senegal; acquired the privileges which the celebrated Colbert had granted to the old Eaſt-India Company; and finally, engroſſed the farming of the national taxes.

A. D. 1719, 1720.] But this plan, which, if confined in proper bounds, might have been attended with the moſt ſalutary effects, ſoon burſt the limits that had been propoſed; and ſweeping before it the feeble barriers of policy and diſcretion, overwhelmed the nation in its rapid courſe. Thouſands daily crowded to exchange their gold for bills; and the fluctuation of the ſtock afforded an opportunity to obſcure individuals to acquire immenſe fortunes. The notes circulated exceeded fourſcore times the real value of the current coin of the kingdom. At length the deluſion was diſpelled: the baſis of the fabric was credit; and the moment a doubt prevailed, the whole edifice fell to the ground. By drawing upon it for conſiderable ſums, the late financiers and great bankers exhauſted the royal bank; every one was now as eager to convert their notes into money, as they were lately to convert their money into notes; but the diſproportion was enormous; the arrets of the regent, inſtead of reſtoring confidence to the people, extinguiſhed it; and the ſame year that gave birth to the company's actions, beheld them return to their primitive nothing.

Law himſelf, the author of this fatal project, who had been raiſed from a mere adventurer to a lord, and from a banker to a miniſter of ſtate, was the ſame year loaded with the public execration, obliged to fly the country he had attempted to enrich, and had entirely ruined. He went off in a poſt-chaiſe that was lent him by the duke of Bourbon-Condé with only two thouſand louis d'ors, the ſcanty remnant of his tranſitory opulence; ſubſiſted ſome time in London on the liberality of a French nobleman; and died at Venice in a ſtate little removed from indigence.

It was not France alone that was afflicted by the credulous avarice of her people; in London, in Amſterdam, and Rotterdam, the ſame ſpirit of ſpeculation prevailed. The Engliſh entered with ſimilar ardour into the viſionary hopes of the South Sea Company, and experienced a ſimilar diſappointment. Thoſe ſhares which had been eagerly ſought after at the price of one thouſand pounds ſterling, were in the courſe of the ſame month ſold for one hundred and fifty; and ſo extenſive had the infatuation ſpread, that Europe trembled at the proſpect of a general bankruptcy.

A. D. 1720, 1721.] The attention of the regent was engroſſed in aſſuaging the diſtraction which the project of Law had excited. An account and valuation were taken of the private fortunes of individuals; and this laborious work was planned, digeſted, and conducted by four brothers of the name of Paris, who had never before any connection with public affairs, but whoſe genius and application deſerved to be entruſted with the wealth of the nation. They eſtabliſhed a ſufficient number of offices for the maſters of requeſts and other judges; they reduced to order the huge and miſhapen chaos before them; five hundred eleven thouſand and nine perſons, moſt of them fathers of families, brought their whole fortunes in paper to this tribunal; the enormous demand was liquidated at a certain ſum, and government became reſponſible for the future payment of it.

The parliament of Paris, by their ſupport of the pretenſions of the duke of Orleans to the regency, had excited his gratitude; their oppoſition to the brilliant but fatal project of Law had arouſed his indignation: he baniſhed them to Pontoiſe; and the citizens, who in the minority of Lewis the Fourteenth had vindicated the privileges of that aſſembly by a general inſurrection, now beheld them exiled without a ſingle murmur. A dearth that depopulated Provence, was ſubmitted to with more honourable reſignation—commerce ſoon repaired the diſtreſs the late innovations had occaſioned—and the court, which on the death of Lewis had reſumed its wonted magnificence, was now diſtinguiſhed by ſuperior luxury and profuſion.

A. D. 1720, 1722.] The regent had elevated to the poſt of miniſter, cardinal Dubois; a man who, deſcended from an obſcure apothecary in a remote province, had acquired the firſt dignities of the church, and the moſt eminent ſituation in the ſtate. By the recommendation of the duke of Vendoſme, he was introduced into the family of the late duke of Orleans, and preferred to be tutor to the preſent—by adminiſtering to the pleaſures of his pupil he gained his confidence—a ſmall ſhare of wit, a ſtrong turn for debauchery, great flexibility, and above all, a taſte like his maſter's for ſingularity, raiſed his immenſe fortune: yet he ſtill remained rather the companion of the regent's exceſſes than the partner of his counſels. A court thoughtleſs, diſſipated, and unprincipled, only ridiculed that promotion they ought to have regarded with indignation; and death ſoon after interrupted the licentious career of the cardinal, who expired as he had lived, with a thorough contempt of all religious ceremonies.

A. D. 1723.] The king had now attained that age which was fixed for his majority—the regency of courſe expired—and the duke of Orleans aſſumed the title of miniſter. But his own life alſo drew near its end—his conſtitution was ſhaken by exceſs, and his intemperate paſſions allowed him not to follow that regimen his phyſicians preſcribed: he himſelf had been ſtrongly addicted to chemiſtry—and his attachment to that ſcience had awakened the jealouſy of the people. At the cloſe of the reign of Lewis the Fourteenth, when the ſudden deaths of the royal family opened to him a proſpect of ſucceeding to the throne, public rumour had accuſed him of haſtening their deaths by his deadly arts. But his ſubſequent conduct effaced the injurious ſuſpicion—with paternal care he watched over the tender years of Lewis; nor is it probable that the man, whoſe ambition had fought a crown through the death of ſo many, ſhould have heſitated to complete his crimes by extinguiſhing the life of a feeble infant.

A. D. 1723, 1725.] On the death of the duke of Orleans, the reins of government were committed to the hands of the duke of Bourbon-Condé. A king young, indolent, and uninſtructed—a miniſter without talents or ambition, and a kingdom at peace, furniſh but ſlender materials for the pen of the hiſtorian. In Spain, Philip the Fifth, who in purſuit of that throne had deluged Europe with blood, gave way to a ſettled melancholy. Devotion ſerved only to inflame him with the love of retirement, and he reſigned his crown to his eldeſt ſon Don Lewis. On the death of that prince, which happened ſoon after, he was prevailed on to reſume it: but indifferent to the cares of government, he abandoned himſelf to the aſcendancy of his conſort, the daughter of Victor Amadeus, duke of Savoy; but who, with the iſland, had acquired the title of king of Sardinia. The late duke of Orleans had engaged the hand of the king of France to the Infanta of Spain; but though that princeſs had been received at Paris with the honours of a queen, the tender years of Lewis allowed him not to conſummate his marriage. As he advanced to maturity, the courtiers diſcovered through his natural indolence, and that politeneſs which he ever cultivated, a pointed averſion to the intended partner of his bed. The people, impatient of an union which might extinguiſh their hopes of male iſſue, and expoſe the kingdom, by a diſputed ſucceſſion, to the calamities of civil war, loudly murmured againſt the duke of Bourbon; the miniſter, though reluctantly, yielded to the general voice; he ſent back the Infanta; and the queen of Spain, daring, violent, and implacable, would probably have reſented the inſult by open hoſtilities, had not her turbulent diſpoſition already engaged her in a diſpute with the empire.

A. D. 1726.] This was the only political event that characteriſed the ſhort and languid adminiſtration of the duke of Bourbon-Condé. The reins of government ſoon after dropped from his hands into thoſe of cardinal Fleury: At the age of ſeventy-three, that prelate devoted the remains of a life which hitherto had challenged the public eſteem, to the ungrateful toils that attend miniſterial power; and at a period when the moſt ambitious ſeek repoſe, entered the liſts of fame. Yet he himſelf was diſtinguiſhed for his ſimplicity and modeſty, and with reluctance had expoſed his virtuous manners to the contagion of a court. He had been appointed in the former reign to the biſhopric of Frejus, a ſee in a diſtant and diſagreeable country; and he was ſo diſguſted with the ſituation that he ſoon after ſubſcribed a familiar letter, "Fleury, by the divine indignation, biſhop of Frejus." But in that ſtation he practiſed the ſame œconomy that he afterwards diſplayed in a more eminent condition; and though the ſee of Frejus, when he was nominated to it, was heavily burthened with debts, yet he reſigned it clear and unincumbered.

The ſtate of his health was the pretence for his reſignation; and candour will excuſe the inoffenſive deceit that enabled him to relinquiſh a dignity ſo many anxiouſly ſought after. The ſolicitations of mareſchal Villeroy prevailed on the late king to appoint Fleury, by a codicil in his will, preceptor to his infant grandſon; and if we may believe the confidential letter of that prelate to cardinal Quirini, he undertook the important truſt with regret.

But though he unwillingly accepted the envied appointment, yet he diſcharged it with unimpeached fidelity and diligence. Above the intrigues of a court, he diſdained the cabals which a minority foſter, and endeavoured to form the mind of his royal pupil to buſineſs, to ſecrecy, and to probity. The ſoil indeed but ill repaid his culture; yet the regent licentious as he was, ſaw and approved the virtues which he neglected to imitate—The eſteem of the public was mingled with the regard of the prince; and his amiable and prudent diſpoſition excited the univerſal wiſh of France to ſee him at the head of affairs.

A. D. 1726, 1729.] The gratitude of his pupil at length concurred with the voice of the people, and cardinal Fleury, while he rejected the invidious title of prime miniſter, ruled the kingdom with abſolute authority. The adminiſtration of the duke of Bourbon-Condé had expired after reſtoring the Infanta to Spain, with providing a new alliance for his ſovereign, more congenial to his inclinations.

Staniſlaus Leſczinſki had been raiſed to the throne of Poland by the victorious arms of Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, and experienced, after the defeat of Pultowa, the viciſſitudes which mark the ſingular life of that royal adventurer. The nobility of Poland had recogniſed their former ſovereign, Auguſtus, elector of Saxony, whom the Swediſh king had compelled to relinquiſh the crown, and to retire within his electoral dominions. Staniſlaus deſcended from the throne with a mind ſuperior to fortune, and cultivated in private life the virtues which had diſtinguiſhed him in public. His daughter Mary ſtill retained the title of princeſs, and that lady was choſen by the prince to ſhare the bed of Lewis; their nuptials were celebrated with royal magnificence—The new queen, deſtitute of perſonal charms, never perhaps inſpired with love the boſom of her conſort, who ſoon began to indulge his taſte for variety; but her meekneſs, piety, and ready acquieſcence to his will, extorted his eſteem; and the birth of a dauphin, the fruits of their union, eſtabliſhed the peaceable ſucceſſion of the crown, and baniſhed the fears of the people.

A. D. 1732.] The pacific diſpoſition of Fleury correſponded with the immediate welfare of France; he quietly left the kingdom to repair its loſſes, and to enrich itſelf by an advantageous and extenſive commerce, without making any innovations; and treated the ſtate in his political ſyſtem like a ſtrong and robuſt body, which recovers by the vigour of its own conſtitution.

A. D. 1733.] At length the death of Auguſtus king of Poland and elector of Saxony, rekindled throughout Europe the flames of war. The free ſuffrages of the Poles called Staniſlaus, the father-in-law of Lewis, to that throne from which he once already had deſcended with a magnanimity ſcarce to be equalled; but his election was oppoſed by the empire and the Ruſſians, who under the invigorating genuis of Peter the Great, had lately emerged from obſcurity.—That monarch had given laws, diſcipline and knowledge, to the immenſe deſerts of Muſcovy; had broken the power of the Swedes, which ſo long had overawed the North; and aſſumed in the balance of Europe that place which they had formerly occupied. His ſucceſſor now entered into a confederacy with the emperor to ſupport the nomination of the ſon of the late king to the crown of Poland; their numerous forces deluged that unhappy country; and Staniſlaus beſieged in Dantzic, eſcaped from the tottering walls of that city in diſguiſe, eluded the vigilance of his enemies, and, after a variety of dangers and adventures, reached the dominions of his ſon-in-law in ſafety.

A. D. 1734, 1736.] A feeble attempt had been made by Fleury to ſuccour Dantzic; and fifteen hundred French, detached for that purpoſe, were overwhelmed by an hoſt of Ruſſians. Auguſtus the Third was eſtabliſhed on the throne of Poland by the united arms of Anne of Ruſſia and the emperor Charles the Sixth; the diſtance of the former was alone ſufficient to ſecure her from the reſentment of the French; but the dominions of the emperor were both acceſſible and vulnerable; and France prepared to avenge by arms the outrage that had diſpoſſeſſed Staniſlaus of Poland. Charles Emanuel, king of Sardinia, (for Victor Amadeus had reſigned his throne) concurred in the views of the courts of Madrid and Verſailles; the confederates poured their troops into Italy, and ſwept all reſiſtance before them; while France aſſerted her ſuperiority on the banks of the Rhine, and reduced Khiel, Trierbach, and Philipſburgh.

The emporor bent before the ſtorm, and received the conditions of peace, which the victorious arms of France impoſed. Don Carlos, ſecond ſon to the king of Spain, was acknowledged as king of Naples and Sicily, both of which were diſmembered from the houſe of Auſtria; the king of Sardinia obtained, in the duchy of Milan, the Novareſe, the Tortoneſe, and the fiefs of Langes; to Francis duke of Lorrain, was aſſigned the inheritance of the houſe of Medicis; and the duchies of Lorrain and Bar were ceded by the duke to the crown of France.

Staniſlaus, on whoſe account this war had been commenced, reſigned in the treaty his pretenſions to the kingdom of Poland, but was permitted to retain the title of king. The liberality of Lewis rendered that dignity more reſpectable by beſtowing on his father-in-law, during his life, the duchies of Bar and Lorrain, which he had juſt acquired; after the death of Staniſlaus theſe territories reverted to the crown, and were indiſſolubly united to the dominions of France.

A. D. 1737, 1739.] The diſputes of Spain and England, reſpecting the trade of America, only feebly interrupted the tranquillity of Europe; and cardinal Fleury ſtill purſued in France that pacific ſyſtem to which he was ſo ſtrongly attached. Inſtead of arming the neighbouring potentates againſt each other, he inceſſantly laboured to extinguiſh their jealouſies, and reconcile their hoſtile diſpoſitions. He conciliated for a moment the Genoeſe and Corſicans, who had already plunged themſelves into the calamities of civil war; and his mediation was even accepted by the Ottoman Porte; which deſiſted from improving its advantages in Hungary, and at his powerful interceſſion granted peace to the diſtreſs of the emperor.

A. D. 1740.] But this happineſs was not of long duration; the emperor Charles the Sixth, the laſt prince of the houſe of Auſtria, expired in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and his death awakened the pretenſions of the different princes of Europe. Maria Thereſa, the emperor's eldeſt daughter, married to Francis of Lorrain, grand duke of Tuſcany, claimed by right of blood, and by the gurantee of the different powers of Europe, the whole of the Auſtrian ſucceſſion. This compriſed the kingdoms of Hungaria and Bohemia, the province of Sileſia, Auſtria, Swabia, Upper and Lower Auſtria, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, the four foreſt towns, Burgaw, Briſgaw, the Low Countries, Friuli, Tirol, the duchy of Milan, and the duchies of Parma and Placentia.

That princeſs, though ſhe was permitted peaceably to take poſſeſſion of this vaſt inheritance, was not without competitors. Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, from the will of Ferdinand the Firſt, brother to the emperor Charles the Fifth, aſſerted his right to Bohemia; the king of Sardinia reſumed his claim on Milan; the kings of Spain and Poland urged their pretenſions to the whole ſucceſſion; nor was Lewis the Fifteenth deſtitute of a ſimilar claim; he was deſcended in a direct line from the eldeſt male branch of the houſe of Auſtria, by two princeſſes married to his anceſtors, Lewis the Thirteenth and Lewis the Fourteenth; but he wiſhed not to awaken the jealouſy of Europe, end entertained hopes of aggrandiſing himſelf, and of diſmembering the Auſtrian dominions, by ſupporting the pretenſions of another.

A. D. 1741.] Yet Maria Thereſa rather confided in, than was alarmed at, the number of the claimants; ſhe had ingratiated herſelf with the Hungarians, by voluntarily taking the ancient oath of their ſovereigns, by which their ſubjects are allowed, if their privileges are invaded, to defend themſelves, without being treated as rebels; and was engaged in traverſing, in favour of her conſort, the deſigns of France, that endeavoured to fix the imperial crown on the head of the elector of Bavaria, when ſhe was ſurpriſed by the invaſion of a new and unexpected pretender. The king of Pruſſia, Frederick the Third, laid claim to four duchies in Sileſia; he ſuddenly entered that country, defeated the Auſtrians near Molwitz, and occupied the whole of the duchy.

The victory of Molwitz was the ſignal for war; cardinal Fleury, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, was indeed but little inclined to relinquiſh the pacific ſyſtem that he adored; but he was overwhelmed by the impetuous eloquence and enterpriſing ſpirit of the brothers, the mareſchal and chevalier de Belleiſle. Theſe repreſented to Lewis that the period was now arrived of finally breaking the power of the houſe of Auſtria, and exalting that of Bourbon on its ruins; and that ſo favourable an opportunity never again would offer of raiſing the elector of Bavaria to the imperial throne. The aſſent of a monarch, whoſe vanity was great, and diſcernment little, was eaſily obtained to this ſplendid project; and cardinal Fleury tottering on the brink of the grave, yet ſtill enamoured of power, conſented to ſanction with his name an enterpriſe he had never approved, and to preſide over a people whoſe councils he was not permitted to direct.

The count of Belleiſle negociated a treaty with the king of Pruſſia, by which the elector of Bavaria, with the imperial crown, was to poſſeſs Bohemia, Upper Auſtria, and the Tyroleſe; the king of Poland was to be gratified with Moravia and the Upper Sileſia, and Frederic was to retain Lower Sileſia, with the town of Neiſs, and the county of Glatz. To enforce theſe conditions, the French troops were immediately put in motion. Lewis appointed the elector of Bavaria, whom he meant to place in the firſt rank among Chriſtian princes, his lieutenant-general, with the mareſchals Belleiſle and Broglio to act under him.

A. D. 1741, 1742.] The ſucceſs of the French was rapid, ſplendid, and tranſient; the king of England was reduced to conclude a neutrality as elector of Hanover, for his German dominions; the confederates ſurpriſed Paſſau, poſſeſſed themſelves of Lintz, and menaced Vienna. Maria Thereſa retired from her capital to Preſburgh in Hungary; and that people vowed to conquer or die in the ſervice of their ſovereign. New and formidable armies were in an inſtant ſupplied by their enthuſiaſtic loyalty; the French declined the dangerous neighbourhood of Vienna, directed their march into Bohemia, and in conjunction with the Saxons reduced the city of Prague: from that important acquiſition the elector of Bavaria purſued his route to Frankfort, and was there elected emperor, under the title of Charles the Seventh, and inveſted with the enſigns of imperial authority.

But from the moment that he attained his envied dignity, the hours of that prince were invariably devoted to calamity: jealouſies already prevailed among the confederates; the French army was in its progreſs continually diminiſhed by ſickneſs or deſertion; George the Second, diſtinguiſhing between his capacity of king of Great Britain and elector of Hanover, reſolved as the former to ſupport the queen of Hungary; and the very day that Charles was proclaimed emperor at Frankfort, he received intelligence that Lintz had been recovered by the Auſtrian general Khevenhuller, though defended by ten thouſand veteran troops of France.

Even this diſaſter was ſoon forgotten in an event more important and more fatal. The king of Pruſſia had penetrated into Moldavia, but was compelled to retire before prince Charles of Lorrain; reinforced by the prince of Anhalt Deſſau, he ſuddenly turned on his purſuers. At Czaſlaw he engaged and defeated the Auſtrians; but with his uſual ſagacity, he ſeized the moment of victory to conclude an advantageous peace at Breſlaw, which left him in poſſeſſion of the Upper and Lower Sileſia, with the county of Glatz. At the ſame time a treaty was ſigned between the queen of Hungary and Auguſtus the Third, king of Poland, which transferred to the latter a conſiderable extent of country in the kingdom of Bohemia.

The French received with aſtoniſhment and diſmay the intelligence of the treaty of Breſlaw. Deſerted by their two moſt powerful allies, and preſſed by the ſuperior numbers of the Auſtrians, they retreated precipitately under the walls of Prague. A ſecond army, under mareſchal Maillebois, was detached to their aſſiſtance; but prince Charles had already occupied the paſſes of the intervening mountains: Maillebois was obliged to retreat; and the French in Prague were only ſaved from the diſgrace of ſurrendering by the ſkill and courage of mareſchal Belleiſle, who eluded the vigilance of the Auſtrians, and though inceſſantly purſued by a ſuperior enemy, in the depth of winter, ſucceſsfully conducted his army through a hoſtile country above ninety miles to the friendly walls of Egra.

Italy preſented to the contending powers, a campaign equally vigorous and diffuſive with that of Germany. Philip the Fifth, who had already eſtabliſhed one ſon on the throne of the two Sicilies, was deſirous of placing a crown on the head of Philip his ſon, by a ſecond marriage with Elizabeth Farneſe, daughter to the duke of Parma. Parma, Placentia, and the Milaneſe, were the territories he aſpired to. The king of Sardinia, alarmed at the progreſs of the houſe of Bourbon, had lately renounced his alliance with the courts of Verſailles and Madrid, and entered into engagements with the queen of Hungary, and the king of England; but the king of the two Sicilies, while he profeſſed himſelf neuter, ſecretly prepared to ſupport the ambitious deſigns of his family. From this intention he was diverted by the unwelcome appearance of an Engliſh ſquadron in the Bay of Naples; commodore Martin, to whom was intruſted the proud commiſſion of humbling the enemies of Great-Britain, threatened to bombard Naples, unleſs he received a peremptory and ſatisfactory anſwer in the ſpace of an hour—and the king, to avert the deſtruction of his capital, engaged to preſerve a ſtrict neutrality during the courſe of the war.

A. D. 1743.] The hoſtile armies, by the evacuation of Prague, were tranſferred from the banks of the Danube to that of the Rhine; and cardinal Fleury, oppreſſed by increaſing years and the diſappointments of his country, cloſed a life, that would have been terminated with more glory before the commencement of war. The king on his deceaſe, determined to be his own miniſter and to put himſelf at the head of the army. The king of England had already taken the field with forty thouſand Engliſh, Hanoverians, and Auſtrians. At the village of Dettingen, near the banks of the Mayne, he was attacked by mareſchal Noailles. Had the French patiently occupied the neighbouring heights, the confederates muſt have ſurrendered at diſcretion—but their ardour precipitated them on the allies, and their temerity was chaſtiſed by a ſevere defeat. The king of England, inſtead of improving his advantage, proſecuted his march to Hanau—and the duke of Noailles, after collecting his ſcattered forces, haſtened to join mareſchal Coigny in Upper Alſace, who was threatened by prince Charles of Lorrain.

In Italy, a bloody but indeciſive battle was fought at Campo Santo, between the Spaniards, commanded by count de Gages, and the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe, under count Traun—yet though both claimed the honour of the field, the former thought it prudent ſoon after to repaſs the Pareno, and to take ſhelter in the eccleſiaſtical territories.

A. D. 1744.] To diſtract the attention of the Engliſh, Lewis the Fifteenth reſolved to eſpouſe the fortunes of the exiled houſe of Stuart. Charles Edward, eldeſt ſon to the Chevalier de St. George, the grandſon of the unforiunate James the Second, had, on the firſt ſound of war, been invited into France. It was now propoſed to prove how far the affections of England ſtood inclined to him—an army of fifteen thouſand men was aſſembled in Picardy, under count Saxe—a number of tranſports were collected at Calais, Dunkirk, and Boulogne; and Charles, to whom his father had delegated his pretenſions, left Rome, and arrived in the French camp. But an Engliſh ſquadron, under Sir John Norris, rode triumphant in the channel; and though the combined fleets of France and Spain maintained ſoon after, in the Mediterranean, a doubtful conflict with that of England, yet Lewis ventured not to encounter that people in their own ſeas; and the young pretender was obliged to wait a more favourable opportunity.

Lewis himſelf invaded Flanders, and ſeconded by the duke of Noailles, and count Saxe, natural ſon to Auguſtus the Second, king of Poland, and who by his military exploits revived the fame of Condé and Turenne, ſucceſſively reduced Menin, Ypres and Furnes. From this ſcene of conqueſt he was ſoon recalled to the defence of his own dominions—prince Charles of Lorrain had paſſed the Rhine at the head of ſixty thouſand Auſtrians, had taken Weiſenberg, and laid all Lower Alſace under contribution. To repel this invaſion, mareſchal Noailles was detached with forty thouſand choice troops; while mareſchal Saxe in Flanders, by his maſterly movements, baffled the deſigns of the allies, though far ſuperior in numbers.

With a conſiderable reinforcement, Lewis prepared to follow the ſteps of Noailles; but at Metz he was ſeized with a putrid fever that threatened his life, and retarded the operations of his generals. His danger diffuſed conſternation throughout the kingdom; and the uncommon tranſports of joy with which his recovery was attended, touched the heart of the monarch himſelf, nor could he help exclaiming, "What a pleaſure is it to be thus beloved! What have I done "to deſerve it!"

But the king depended not alone on his own arms for the defence of Alſace; he had already negociated a new alliance with the king of Pruſſia; and Frederic, ſenſible that if the queen of Hungary ſhould again acquire the aſcendancy, the treaty of Breſlaw would prove a feeble barrier to her ambition, once more penetrated into Bohemia, and extended his ravages as far as Moldaw. Prince Charles repaſſed the Rhine, to check the progreſs of this formidable enemy; and Frederic, in his turn, was obliged to evacuate Bohemia with precipitation, and retire into Sileſia; while Lewis, availing himſelf of the retreat of the Auſtrians, inveſted and reduced Friburg.

The prince of Conti entered Italy, and having effected a junction with Don Philip, whoſe aggrandiſement firſt plunged Spain into the tumult of war, attacked the ſtrongeſt poſt of Chateau Dauphin, where the king of Sardinia commanded in perſon. It was carried after an obſtinate conflict, and the confederates immediately laid ſiege to Conti, the poſſeſſion of which was neceſſary to open them a paſſage into the Milaneſe. But though they obtained a ſecond victory over Charles Emanuel, diſeaſe pervaded the camp; they were compelled to retire from the inauſpicious walls, evacuate Piedmont, repaſs the Alps, and ſhelter the remnant of their way-worn followers in Dauphiné.

A. D. 1745.] Amidſt the various viciſſitudes of war, the emperor Charles the Seventh was once more reſtored to his capital; but his ſituation, on the retreat of the Pruſſians, grew more precarious every hour. His frame was exhauſted by inceſſant anxiety, and death delivered him from again exhibiting to Europe the ſpectacle of imperial miſery. His ſon Maximilian Joſeph, a youth of ſeventeen, concluded, through the mediation of the king of Great-Britain, a treaty with the queen of Hungary, which eſtabliſhed him in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the electorate of Bavaria; and rejected the alliance of France, which had proved ſo fatal to his father.

Lewis in vain tempted the ambition of Auguſtus, king of Poland, with the imperial crown; that monarch rejected the ſplendid allurement, and maintained his engagements with the queen of Hungary and the king of England; and the court of Verſailles had ſoon after the mortification of beholding Francis of Lorrain, the conſort of the former, inveſted with the imperial dignity at Frankfort. Yet France ſtill obſtinately purſued the war; and her monarch, accompanied by the dauphin, in Flanders animated his forces by his preſence: commanded by count Saxe, they laid ſiege to Tournay, one of the ſtrongeſt towns in the Auſtrian Netherlands. The Engliſh, the Dutch, and the Auſtrians, under the duke of Cumberland, ſecond ſon to the king of England, advanced to the relief of that place: The plains of Fontenoy were rendered memorable by the bloody and obſtinate conflict. At length the allies were broken by the numbers of their enemies, and the ſuperior ſkill of count Saxe; they retreated with conſiderable loſs, occupied ſoon after a ſtrong camp between Bruſſels and Antwerp, and remained inactive during the reſt of the campaign; while the French reduced by ſtratagem or force Tournay, Oudenarde, Ath, Dendermond, Ghent, Oſtend, Nieuport, and the principal fortified places through Auſtrian Flanders.

The ſucceſs of the houſe of Bourbon in Italy was equally rapid; Don Philip and mareſchal Maillebois preſſed with their ſuperior forces the king of Sardinia and Schulenberg. Charles Emanuel retired behind the Po, and even trembled for the fate of his capital; while the kindred armies of France and Spain deluged all Italy; and Don Carlos closed the campaign with a triumphant entry into Milan.

Nor were the operations of the king of Prussia less brilliant or decisive. In Silesia and Bohemia he successively defeated prince Charles of Lorrain; and from the victories of Fridbourgh and Slandentz, poured the torrent of his arms into Saxony. He soon made himself master of Dresden; and the king of Poland, anxious for the capital of his electoral dominions, purchased peace from the victor by the payment of a million of German crowns. It was the intention of Frederick to protect, but not to aggrandise the house of Bourbon; he had no longer any thing to dread from the Austrian power, and he concluded a second treaty with the queen of Hungary, which confirmed that of Breslaw, and guaranteed to him the possession of Silesia, on acknowledging the validity of the emperor's election.

France was astonished at the repeated desertion of so powerful an ally; but Lewis was encouraged to persevere by a new enterprise, which at first promised the most decisive advantage. Though the squadrons of France could not hope to elude the vigilance of the naval commanders of Great-Britain, yet the young pretender successfully traversing the seas in a single vessel, landed with a few adherents on the coast of Scotland. The inhabitants of that kingdom had ever been attached to the family of Stuart; and no sooner was the standard of Charles erected, than it was joined by some thousands of hardy and ferocious mountaineers. He occupied Edinburgh, was solemnly proclaimed there with all the forms of legal authority, and soon after defeated the royal forces at Preston Pans. The road now lay open to London; and George, though insensible of personal fear, trembled for his capital. But the pretender was intoxicated with success; he returned to Edinburgh, to enjoy the vain parade of royalty, while the British troops were recalled from Flanders, and a new and formidable army was formed by the zeal of the royalists. It was entrusted to the duke of Cumberland, the second son of George, and who had commanded in the disastrous field of Fontenoy. The pretender, who had at length quitted the pleasures of Edinburgh and penetrated as far as Derby, within an hundred and twenty miles of London, now retired before the veteran forces of the duke. An ineffectual victory which he afterwards obtained over a detachment of the royalists at Falkirk near Stirling, served only to embitter his subsequent defeat. On Culloden Moor, at the head of his brave but disorderly followers, he presumed to encounter the superior forces of the royalists, whose valour was confirmed by discipline, and who were animated by the gallantry of the duke of Cumberland. The decision of the day was such as might have been expected; the rebels were repulsed, and pursued with cruel slaughter; and after enduring a series of incredible hardships for five months, and repeatedly eluding the active resentment of his enemies, the pretender himself escaped in a small vessel to France; but the scaffold was stained with the blood of his principal adherents, and his party in this fatal enterprise was for ever extinguished.

A. D. 1746.] To balance this diſappointment, Lewis opened the campaign in Flanders at the head of one hundred and twenty thouſand men; inveſted and reduced Bruſſels, the capital of Brabant; took Mons and Charleroy; and rendered himſelf maſter of Flanders, Brabant and Liege. He ſoon after laid ſiege to Namur; and that city, ſituated on the conflux of the Sambre and the Meuſe, and defended by a garriſon of nine thouſand men, was obliged to ſurrender. The confederates, though commanded by prince Charles of Lorrain, were diſconcerted and ſoon after defeated by the ſuperior addreſs of mareſchal Saxe; and this victory, which the advanced ſeaſon of the year prevented the mareſchal from improving, terminated the campaign in the Low Countries.

In Italy the houſe of Bourbon was leſs ſucceſsful; Aſti, though garriſoned by five thouſand French, was ſurpriſed by the king of Sardinia; Don Philip and Maillebois were repulſed in an obſtinate attack on the Auſtrian camp at St. Lazaro; and this diſaſter was ſucceeded by the intelligence that Philip the Fifth was no more. That prince, the firſt of the houſe of Bourbon who ſat upon the Spaniſh throne, was governed by two women, who ſucceſſively ſhared his bed, and ruled his kingdom with abſolute ſway: the latter maintained her aſcendancy even after the death of her conſort; and under the reign of Ferdinand the Sixth, ſtill continued to direct the councils of Madrid.

Don Philip and Maillebois, informed of the death of Philip the Fifth, and ſtill ignorant of the ſentiments of his ſucceſſor, retired before the Auſtrian army, and took ſhelter under the cannon of Genoa; they ſoon after abandoned this ſituation, and Don Philip retreated towards Savoy, while mareſchal Maillebois repoſed his harraſſed forces in Provence. The Auſtrians immediately occupied Genoa; and that proud city was ſubjected to the moſt humiliating conditions. But the arrogance and rapacity of general Botta at length excited the general indignation of the inhabitants; they roſe in arms againſt their conquerors; deſpair animated their efforts—and the veterans of Germany were obliged to yield to a crowd of undiſciplined citizens. After an ineffectual ſtruggle they evacuated the city; and the Genoeſe, conſcious that they were ſtill ſurrounded by their oppreſſors, prepared by every prudent precaution to fortify in future their freedom.

A. D. 1747.] In the Eaſt-Indies the honour of the French flag was aſſerted by La Bourdonnais, who diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their ſettlement of Madraſs, on the coaſt of Coromandel—but it was in the Netherlands that Lewis prepared to make the moſt vigorous efforts. An army of one hundred and fifty thouſand men was aſſembled under mareſchal Saxe; and that celebrated commander detached count Lowendahl with twenty-ſeven thouſand men to invade Dutch Brabant. The French miniſter at the ſame time preſented a memorial to the States, declaring that his maſter, by thus entering the territories of the States, meant only to obviate the dangerous effects of the protection that they afforded to the troops of the queen of Hungary and the king of England. In the mean time Lowendahl made himſelf maſter of Sluys, Sandberg, and Hulſt—and having taken poſſeſſion of Axtel and Terneuſe, was meditating a deſcent on Zealand, when a Britiſh ſquadron defeated his purpoſe, and a revolution in the government of Holland made a retreat neceſſary.

Struck with conſternation at the progreſs of the French arms, the inhabitants of the United Provinces, believing themſelves betrayed, tumultuouſly roſe againſt the miniſters of the Republic, and compelled the magiſtrates to declare the prince of Orange Stadtholder—a dignity which had been laid aſide ſince the death of William the Third. The beneficial effects of this revolution to the confederates ſoon appeared in ſeveral vigorous meaſures—and inſtant orders were given by the States for commencing hoſtilities againſt France both by ſea and land, though without any formal declaration of war.

Lewis himſelf ſoon after joined his army in Flanders, and the ſiege of Maeſtricht was reſolved on. The confederates, to preſerve that city, determined to hazard a general engagement; the village of Val or Laffeldt was the object of their mutual efforts: But though the Engliſh were compelled to abandon the field with loſs, yet the duke of Cumberland in his retreat reinforced the garriſon of Maeſtricht; and mareſchal Saxe, after amuſing the allies with a variety of complicated movements, detached count Lowendahl with thirty thouſand men to inveſt Bergen-op-Zoom, the ſtrongeſt fortification in Dutch Brabant.

The experienced general and great maſter in the art of reducing fortified places now encountered in the favourite work of Vauban, an object worthy his ſkill. The town was garriſoned with three thouſand men, and could be reinforced on the ſhorteſt notice by a conſiderable army of the allies, which took poſſeſſion of the lines belonging to the fortification—The eyes of Europe were fixed on the fate of Bergen-op-Zoom—each inſtrument of deſtruction was inceſſantly employed on both ſides; the town was reduced to aſhes; the trenches were filled with carnage; yet the out-works were in a great meaſure entire, and the event of the enterpriſe ſeemed ſtill doubtful; when count Lowendhal demonſtrated that there are occaſions when it is neceſſary to go beyond the eſtabliſhed rules of art.

That general reſolved to attempt by a coup-de-main thoſe works which ſtill reſiſted his ragular approaches—The attack was made in the middle of the night and at three places at once. The beſieged, arouſed from their ſecurity, in vain endeavoured to repel the aſſaillants; the French grenadiers were already in the town; two regiments of Swiſs, and Scotch, who had aſſembled in the market-place, ſtill diſputed the day, and were cut to pieces; the reſt, with the governor, retired to the lines: the army that had occupied thoſe, immediately retreated; and the French became maſters of the whole navigation of the Scheld.

Lewis, on the intelligence of this event, raiſed Lowendahl to the dignity of mareſchal, and returned in triumph to Verſailles. But the ſatisfaction which attended his acquiſitions in Flanders was alloyed by a ſeries of unfortunate events—Mareſchal Belleiſle had aſſumed the command in Italy, and had detached his brother the chevalier with thirty thouſand men, to penetrate into Piedmont.—On the road to Exilles twenty-one battalions of Piedmonteſe, ſecured by ramparts of ſtone and wood, and defended by a formidable artillery, oppoſed his progreſs. Belleiſle, daring and emulous of fame, attacked the entrenchments with the greateſt intrepidity: in three ſucceſſive aſſaults he was repulſed, yet he ſtill returned to the charge; and the moment that he had planted with his own hand the colours of his king on the hoſtile battlements, he fell dead, having received the thruſt of a bayonet, and two muſquet balls in his body. The ſurvivors, diſcouraged by his death, immediately retreated; and ſo certain was the deſtructive aim of the Piedmonteſe, and the obſtinacy of the aſſailants, that the number of the ſlain more than doubled that of the wounded.

Mareſchal Belleiſle was no ſooner informed of the fate of his brother than he retreated towards the Var, to join the unfortunate army from Exilles; and the king of Sardinia was only prevented by the unfavourable ſeaſon and heavy rains, from carrying his victorious arms into Dauphine—But the moſt fatal blow to France, was the total deſtruction of her marine; the Engliſh began at length to exert themſelves on that element, on which they have ſo repeatedly triumphed—The marquis de le Jonquiere with ſix ſhips of the line and as many frigates, was intercepted by the admirals Anſon and Warren with fourten ſail of the line: the French defended themſelves with conduct and courage; but they were oppreſſed by numbers, and ten ſhips of war were taken—On the coaſt of Brittany Monſieur l'Eſtendeure diſplayed ſimilar gallantry with the ſame ill fortune; with ſeven ſhips of the line he was attacked by admiral Hawke, who commanded fourteen; and after an obſtinate reſiſtance, ſix of thoſe ſhips became the prey of the Engliſh victors.

In America the Engliſh had conquered Cape Breton and reduced Louiſburg; and the king of France, while he beheld his marine annihilated and his commerce extinguiſhed, was alarmed by the menacing countenance of a new and formidable enemy. The gold of England had influenced the councils of Peterſburg, and fifty thouſand Ruſſians prepared to add new horror to the rage of war. In the midſt of his victories the king of France had invariably expreſſed his wiſhes for peace; and the ſtorm that threatened from the north rendered him ſtill more impatient to deliver his ſubjects from the calamities of war: an ineffectual congreſs had been held at Breda, and negociations were this year reſumed at Aix-la-Chapelle with better ſucceſs.

To enforce his propoſal, Lewis commanded mareſchal Saxe, with a numerous army, to inveſt Maeſtricht. The danger of that city quickened the deliberations of the allies: the French had already affected a lodgement in the covered way with conſiderable loſs; but they were expelled by the gallantry of the beſieged, and mareſchal Saxe had reaſon to tremble for his reputation; when intelligence arrived that preliminaries of peace were ſigned; and the French were permitted to take poſſeſſion of Maeſtricht, on condition that they reſtored it, with all its magazines and artillery, on the concluſion of the treaty.

By the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, a mutual reſtitution was ſtipulated of all conqueſts made during the courſe of the war, with a releaſe of priſoners without ranſom. Parma, Placentia, and Guaſtalla were ceded as a ſovereignty to Don Philip; but it was provided, in caſe he or his deſcendants ſhould ſucceed to the crown of Spain, or that of the two Sicilies, that thoſe territories ſhould return to the preſent poſſeſſors, the empreſs queen of Hungary, and the king of Sardinia. The Engliſh acquired the privilege of ſending an annual ſhip to the Spaniſh ſettlements in America; and the contracting powers guaranteed to his Pruſſian majeſty the duchy of Sileſia and the county of Glatz, as he then poſſeſſed them.

A. D. 1748, 1749.] The war which had ſo long afflicted Europe, was ſucceeded by ſeven years peace; and that ſhort interval may be conſidered as the moſt proſperous and happy period that Europe had ever known; arts and letters were ſucceſsfully cultivated; manufactures and commerce flouriſhed; and the manners of ſociety aſſumed each day a higher poliſh. But monarchs, while they aſpire to the fame of conquerors, ſeldom condeſcend to regard the felicity of their ſubjects; and Lewis, who only had conſented to the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle to reſtore his navy, in the arms of the marchioneſs of Pompadour meditated new wars; and prepared to diſpoſſeſs the Engliſh of their principal ſettlements both in America and the Eaſt-Indies.

From theſe viſionary hopes the attention of the king was recalled by violent diſputes between the clergy and parliaments of France, which partially interrupted the tranquillity of that kingdom. The famous controverſy between the Janſeniſts and Jeſuits, concerning grace, free-will, and other abſtract points of theology, had originated in the preceding reign: the opinions of the former had been declared heretical by the court of Rome, in the celebrated bull commonly known by the name of Unigenitus. The reception of it was enforced by Lewis the Fourteenth, in oppoſition to the body of the people, the parliaments, the the archbiſhop of Paris, and fifteen other prelates; who proteſted againſt it as an infringement of the rights of the Gallican church, and of the laws of the realm, as well as an inſult on their private opinions. The duke of Orleans, while regent, extinguiſhed a perſecution which had been raiſed againſt thoſe who had rejected the bull; but at the ſame time prevailed on the biſhops, who had hitherto oppoſed, to ſubmit to it.

A. D. 1750, 1751.] Though the bull Unigenitus was held in execration by the people, it had hitherto occaſioned no public diſturbance; but on the concluſion of the peace, an attempt made by the miniſter of the finances to enquire into the wealth of the clergy, raiſed the jealouſy of that order, and they determined to divert the attention of the court by reviving the former oppoſition to the bull Unigenitus. It was reſolved by the clergy to demand confeſſional notes of dying perſons; that thoſe notes ſhould be ſigned by prieſts adhering to the bull, without which no viaticum, or extreme unction, could be obtained. The new archbiſhop of Paris engaged warmly in this ſcheme, and he was oppoſed with equal vigour by the parliament, who impriſoned ſuch of the clergy as refuſed to adminiſter the ſacraments to perſons in their laſt moments. Other parliaments followed the example of that of Paris; and a war was immediately kindled between the ſecular juriſdiction, and eccleſiaſtical diſcipline.

A. D. 1752, 1753.] The king, by an act of his abſolute authority, forbade the parliaments to take cognizance of eccleſiaſtical proceedings, and to ſuſpend all proſecutions relative to the refuſal of the ſacraments. Inſtead of acquieſcing, the parliament preſented new remonſtrances, refuſed to attend to any other buſineſs, and came to a reſolution that they could not obey this injunction without violating their duty and their oath. They cited the biſhop of Orleans before their tribunal, and ordered all writings, in which its juriſdiction was conteſted, to be burnt by the executioner: By military aid, they enforced the adminiſtration of the ſacraments to the ſick; and engroſſed by theſe religious differences, they entirely ceaſed, as ſupreme courts, to diſtribute that juſtice to the ſubject for which they had been erected.

A. D. 1753, 1754.] Their obſtinacy excited the indignation of their ſovereign; four of the members, who had delivered themſelves with the greateſt freedom, were arreſted and impriſoned; and the remainder were baniſhed to Bourges, to Poictiers, and Auvergne; and Lewis, to prevent their abſence from impeding the adminiſtration of juſtice, eſtabliſhed by his letters patent a Royal Chamber, for the proſecution of ſuits civil and criminal. But the counſellors, animated by the ſame zeal as the parliament, refuſed to plead before theſe new judges: and the people, left to themſelves, threatened to fall every day into anarchy and confuſion. The intrigues of the court had already excited hoſtilities in America and the Eaſt-Indies; and Lewis, intent on war with England, determined to conciliate the affections of his people by recalling the parliament. The members reentered Paris amidſt the acclamations of the inhabitants; and the archbiſhop, who continued to encourage the prieſts in refuſing the ſacraments, was baniſhed to his ſeat at Conflans; a ſimilar exile was preſcribed to the biſhops of Orleans and Troyes; and a tranſient calm was reſtored to the kingdom.

A. D. 1748, 1753.] For the ſource of this unexpected revolution we muſt turn our eyes to the diſtant continents of Aſia and America. From the moment that the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle was concluded, Dupleix, governor of Pondicherry, on the coaſt of Coromandel, a man active, intelligent, and enterpriſing, conceived the deſign of advancing the intereſt of the French Eaſt-India Company, by acquiring for France large territorial poſſeſſions in the ſouth of Aſia. The feeble ſucceſſors of Aurengzebe, who had ſuffered the native governors of the different provinces to aſſume the authority of independent princes, encouraged by their weakneſs the daring project of this aſpiring adventurer: The French troops which had been aſſembled during the late war to protect Pondicherry from the Engliſh, were now engaged in the various ſervices of the different viceroys of India; their ſuperior arms and diſcipline triumphed over a tumultuous multitude, always without ſkill, and frequently without courage; whatever ſide they inclined to, victory was ſure to follow; and the SUBAH, or viceroy of the Decan, whoſe authority they had eſtabliſhed over the immenſe tract of country that ſtretches from Cape Comorin to the Ganges, rewarded the intrepidity of his protectors by the moſt liberal conceſſions.

The progreſs of the French had awakened the jealouſy of the ſervants of the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company. The attempt of M. Dupliex to impoſe a nabob or governor on Arcot, a province in which Pondicherry is ſituated, excited the Engliſh to arms. As the allies of the princes of India, the rival nations oppoſed each other with equal courage and ſkill, and ſeveral battles were fought with various ſucceſs; at length the tide of war was turned by the appearance of a great and diſtinguiſhed military character. Mr. Clive had gone out in the ſervice of the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company as a writer: His aſpiring mind was but ill calculated for this calm and peaceable ſtation; he exchanged the pen for the ſword, and immortaliſed his name by a ſeries of rapid and ſucceſſive victories. With a ſmall band he occupied Arcot, the capital of the diſputed province; repelled a numerous army of the French and Indians, who threatened to overwhelm him; and triumphed, in a deciſive battle, over the hoſt that had lately beſieged him. In the neighbourhood of Tritchinopoli the French and their allies were finally defeated; the pretenſions of Chunda-ſaib, whoſe cauſe they had eſpouſed, were extinguiſhed in his blood; and his rival, Mahommed Ali, was eſtabliſhed by the Engliſh on the throne of Arcot.

A. D. 1754.] M. Dupliex was ſoon after recalled, and a ceſſation of arms was agreed upon by the hoſtile powers; but while Lewis revolved the means of reſtoring in India the aſcendancy of his ſubjects, his ambitious hopes were flattered by the inſidious and hoſtile enterpriſes of his governors in North-America. Their plan was to unite, by a chain of forts, their two extenſive colonies of Canada and Louiſiana; and to confine the Engliſh to that tract of country that lies between the ſea and the Apalachian mountains, which run from one end of North-America to another. In conſequence of this, France would have enjoyed in time of peace the whole Indian trade; and the Britiſh ſettlers, continually expoſed to the incurſions of the faithleſs and ferocious ſavages, muſt have ſoon been finally extinguiſhed. This project was purſued with ardour and judgment; forts were erected along the great lakes, which communicate with the river St. Laurence, and alſo on the Ohio, and the Miſſiſſippi; and the chain was almoſt completed, when England, alarmed at theſe rapid encroachments, after repeated and ineffectual expoſtulations, determined to unſheath the ſword.

A. D. 1755.] This meaſure was no ſooner reſolved on, than it was executed with equal vigour and promptitude; a formidable ſquadron was detached to the banks of Newfoundland, to attack the fleet of France; and though a friendly fog enabled the greateſt part to eſcape the ſuperior force of England, yet two ſhips of the line were taken; the Britiſh cruiſers ſwept the ſeas with ſuch ſucceſs, that above three hundred trading veſſels belonging to France were carried into the ports of Great-Britain; and above eight thouſand ſeamen became priſoners to that crown.

Lewis, aſtoniſhed and ſtunned by this unexpected ſtroke, filled every court in Europe with complaints and negociations. His naval ſtrength was already fatally impaired; but from the infinite ſuperiority of his land forces, he ſtill flattered himſelf with the hopes of the moſt decided advantages. General Braddock, who had been entruſted by the Engliſh with the chief command in America, had been allured by the French and Indians into an ambuſcade; and ſcorning to ſurvive a defeat, the effect of his own imprudence, had in the grave found ſhelter from the reproaches of his country. On the banks of Lake George, Dieſkau, who commanded the French forces in America, with a detachment of two thouſand men, was expoſed to a ſimilar fate. Yet France ſtill maintained on that continent her aſcendancy, and England was reduced to wage a feeble and defenſive war.

A. D. 1756.] Though George the Second, as king of Great-Britain, while he retained the ſovereignty of the ſeas, might deſpiſe the menaces of France, yet as elector of Hanover he was ſtill vulnerable in his German dominions; and Lewis, to avail himſelf of this advantage, entered into cloſe and ſecret connections with the courts of Vienna, Peterſburg, and Dreſden. The former ſtill harboured a lively reſentment of the ceſſion of Sileſia; and the diviſion of the dominions of the houſe of Brandenburgh, and the invaſion of Hanover, were the objects of this formidable confederacy.

But the deſigns of the confederates could not elude the vigilance and penetration of Frederic; conſcious of his danger, he formed an alliance with the king of England, whoſe intereſts and apprehenſions were ſimular to his own. Before the deſigns of his enemies were ripe for execution, the Pruſſian monarch anticipated their hoſtile efforts, burſt into Saxony, defeated the Auſtrians at Lowoſitz, compelled Auguſtus with his whole army to ſurrender, occupied Dreſden, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſtate papers relative to foreign tranſactions, which diſplayed to the world the conſpiracy that had been formed againſt him.

While the king of Pruſſia drained the proſtrate territories of Saxony, and Great-Britain, governed by miniſters whom ſhe hated and deſpiſed, indulged her diſhonourable fears, and called to her defence large bands of ſubſidiary Germans, Lewis aſſumed new vigour, and prepared to improve the favourable moments of enterpriſe. Numerous bodies of troops drawn towards the ſea-coaſts, continually alarmed the oppoſite ſhores of England; their hoſtile appearance ſerved to cover the ſecret intentions of the French, who aſpired to the conqueſt of Minorca, an iſland in the Mediterranean, which the Engliſh had formerly wreſted from Spain.

The armament for that purpoſe conſiſted of fifteen thouſand land forces, commanded by the mareſchal duke of Richlieu; and twelve ſhips of the line, with five frigates, under the marquis Galiſſoniere. They reached Minorca with a proſperous wind; the troops were diſembarked, and immediately inveſted the caſtle of St. Philip's, which commands the town and harbour of Mahon. The Engliſh had detached Byng to the relief of the iſland, with a ſquadron equal to that of France; Galiſſoniere ſoon after engaged the Britiſh admiral in an indeciſive action. The former returned to block up the port of Mahon; the latter withdrew to Gibraltar; and on his recal to England, expiated with his life the ſtain which his puſillanimity had fixed on the naval glory of his country: While the garriſon of Fort St. Philip, deſtitute of hope, ſurrendered, after a ſiege of nine weeks; and the iſland of Minorca ſubmitted to the dominion of France.

A. D. 1756, 1757.] The ſatisfaction which Lewis reaped from this acquiſition was allayed by domeſtic diſſenſions. The parliament, by their imprudent perſecution of the partiſans of the bull Unigenitus, awakened again the indignation of their ſovereign: With an honourable, though perhaps injudicious zeal, they had alſo, in the midſt of a bloody war, refuſed to regiſter certain taxes, which they conſidered as oppreſſive to the people. Lewis, attended by his guards, appeared in the aſſembly; he ſuppreſſed the fourth and fifth Chambers of Inqueſts, the members of which had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their firm and animated oppoſition; he commanded the bull Unigenitus to be reſpected; and prohibited the ſecular judges from ordering the adminiſtration of the ſacraments. Fifteen counſellors of the Great Chamber lodged their reſignation at the office next day: one hundred and twenty-four members of the different courts of parliament followed their example; and the people, who participated in the ſufferings of the champions of their religious freedom, diſplayed their diſcontent in loud and impatient murmurs.

A. D. 1757.] Their clamours, moſt probably, would have been little reſpected by a monarch, who, early nurſed in deſpotiſm, conſidered the will of the ſovereign as the ſole rule for the actions of his ſubjects. But Lewis was ſoon taught that the affections of his people were the beſt guards to his throne; and that in the plenitude of his power, he ſtill was expoſed to the rage of gloomy fanaticiſm. Francis Damien, an unhappy wretch, whoſe ſullen mind, naturally unſettled, was inflamed by the diſputes between the king and his parliament relative to religion, embraced the deſperate reſolution of attempting the life of his ſovereign.—In the duſk of the evening, as the king prepared to enter his coach, he was ſuddenly wounded, though ſlightly, between the ribs, in the preſence of his ſon, and in the midſt of his guards. The daring aſſaſſin had mingled with the crowd of courtiers, and was inſtantly betrayed by his diſtracted countenance. He declared it never was his intention to kill the king; but that he only meant to wound him, that God might touch his heart, and incline him to reſtore the tranquillity of his dominions, by re-eſtabliſhing the parliament, and baniſhing the archbiſhop of Paris, whom he regarded as the ſource of the preſent commotions. In theſe frantic and incoherent declarations he perſiſted amidſt the moſt exquiſite tortures; and after human ingenuity had been exhauſted in deviſing new modes of torment, his judges, tired out with his obſtinacy, conſigned him to a death, the inhumanity of which is increaſed by the evident madneſs that ſtimulated him to the fatal attempt.

BONAPARTE

Commander in Chief of the Army in Italy

But whether the mind of Lewis was deeply impreſſed by his late danger, or that he dreaded in the midſt of a bloody and extenſive war to alienate the hearts of his people, it is certain that he a ſecond time baniſhed the archbiſhop of Paris, who had been recalled; and found it expedient to accommodate matters with the parliament, which again proceeded to buſineſs.

In reſpect to foreign engagements, the councils of France were not influenced by the late attempt on the life of the king; and Lewis ſtill perſevered in his reſolution of attacking the electoral dominions of the king of England. Mareſchal Saxe, the ſource of ſo many victories to France, was now no more; and mareſchal d'Etrees was appointed to the command of an army which conſiſted of eighty thouſand men. He paſſed the Rhine, compelled the duke of Cumberland (who at the head of about forty thouſand Heſſians, Hanoverians, and Pruſſians, watched his motions, and in feeble ſkirmiſhes endeavoured to retard his progreſs) to retire behind the Weſer; he effected the paſſage of that river, drove the duke from an advantageous poſt in the village of Haſtenbach, and amidſt his triumphant career was recalled by the imprudent partiality of his ſovereign.

The mareſchal duke of Richelieu, adorned with the laurels of Minorca, aſpired to unite with the character of an accompliſhed courtier the reputation of a conſummate general. Lewis could not long reſiſt the ſolicitations of his favourite, and Richelieu was appointed to the chief command in Germany. The duke of Cumberland puſhed from poſt to poſt, at length took refuge under the cannon of Stade. Surrounded on every ſide he was there reduced to the neceſſity of ſigning the ſingular convention of Cloſter-ſeven, by which an army of thirty-eight thouſand Hanoverians, Heſſians, and other troops in the pay of his Britannic majeſty, was diſſolved, and diſtributed into different quarters of cantonment, without being diſarmed, or conſidered as priſoners of war.—The French were left, till the definitive reconciliation of the two ſovereigns, in full poſſeſſion of the countries they had conquered; though under the expreſs condition of abſtaining from future violences, hoſtilities being immediately to ceaſe on both ſides.

With the capitulation of Cloſter-ſeven the fortune of France expired; and an event which promiſed the moſt brilliant advantages, was ſucceeded by five years of continual defeat and inceſſant calamity. To deſcribe the different actions of a war, wide, bloody, and recent, would exceed the limits preſcribed to the work before us; and the reader perhaps will not be diſpleaſed, if, abandoning the order we have hitherto purſued, we place before him a ſlight ſketch of the principal occurrences during that period in the different quarters of the world.

In Europe, the king of Pruſſia, driven out of Bohemia, and menaced by the hoſtile armies of Sweden, Ruſſia, and Auſtria, was now deſerted by the only ally on whom he could place any dependance; and beheld the forces of France ready to penetrate into Saxony.—Prince Soubiſe with twenty thouſand French had joined the Imperial ſtandard; and Frederic ſaw the neceſſity of giving battle to the combined army, conſiſting of fifteen thouſand French and Imperialiſts, with leſs than half its number; but the preſumption of prince Soubiſe decided the fate of the day; he advanced without caution or order, as to a certain victory; his temerity was chaſtiſed by a bloody defeat; and Frederic from the triumphant field of Roſbach directing his march towards Sileſia, arrived in time to join the prince of Bevern, and to renew his laurels, by a ſecond victory over the Auſtrians at Liſſa.

In Hanover, the rapacity of the duke of Richelieu exhauſted the ſubjected country. A demand from the court of France of the arms of thoſe troops who had capitulated at Cloſter-ſeven, arouſed their indignation: they conſidered this as the laſt diſgrace of ſoldiers; and ſecretly reſolving to relieve their country from oppreſſion, they aſſembled from their different cantonments under prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, whom his Britannic majeſty had inveſted with the chief command of his electoral forces. The French, diſperſed and unprepared, were ſucceſſively expelled from Otterberg, Bremen, and Verden; four thouſand were taken priſoners in the city of Minden; and the duke of Richelieu, better calculated to ſhine in courts than camps, with the wretched remnant of his once victorious army, repaſſed with difficulty the Rhine, before a body of men whom he had ſo lately vanquiſhed and trampled upon.

A. D. 1758, 1762.] While the gallant Frederic maintained the war with various ſucceſs, and alternately afflicted the dominions of his adverſaries, or beheld his own capital inſulted by their preſence, the French were doomed to number their campaigns by ſucceſſive defeats. At Crevelt, count Clermont, at the head of fifty thouſand men, was attacked and broken by prince Ferdinand, and compelled with conſiderable loſs to retire under the cannon of Cologne; Mareſchal de Contades, who ſuceeded him, ſuffered in the enſuing campaign a more deciſive defeat at Minden; and mareſchal Broglio, who ſuperceded Contades, was equally unfortunate, and on the heights of Warbourg ſunk beneath the ſuperior genius of prince Ferdinand. The death of George the Second, and the acceſſion of his grandſon George the Third, to the throne of England, changed not, at firſt, the councils of the Engliſh, nor the fortune of the French; and the court of Verſailles, preſſed on every ſide, implored the ſupport of the kindred crown of Spain. That kingdom was ruled by Charles the Third, late king of Naples and Sicily, and the ſon of Philip the Fifth. His elder brother, Ferdinand the Sixth, had invariably diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his pacific diſpoſition, and reſiſted the intrigues of France: but the preſent monarch, more ambitious, or more attached to the houſe of Bourbon, ſigned the celebrated family compact; an alliance which, with the ſingle exception of the American trade, naturalizes, in the dominions of the houſe of Bourbon, the ſubjects of each crown; and ſtipulates that the kings of France and Spain ſhall look upon every power as the enemy of both, which becomes the enemy of either.

Yet the aſſiſtance of Spain was feeble and inadequate; her attempt to wound Great Britain through her ally, and to invade the neutral kingdom of Portugal, was ill-concerted and worſe executed, and the Spaniards were compelled to abandon their haſty conqueſts with diſgrace. Lewis was ſtill doomed to regret the unavailing ſlaughter of his ſubjects; and mareſchal Broglio, near the village of Kirch Denkern, was repulſed by prince Ferdinand, with the loſs of five thouſand men. France had indeed hitherto repelled the deſultory deſcents of the Engliſh on her coaſts; but her pride was deeply wounded by a loſs, leſs important in its real value than humiliating in the eyes of Europe. Belleiſle, an iſland of about twelve leagues in circumference, and ſituated between Port Lewis and the mouth of the Loire, was reduced by an armament from England; and the Britiſh banners diſplayed from Palais, inſulted and alarmed the inhabitants of the adjacent coaſts. The recal of Broglio from the German army, with the joint appointment of the Prince of Soubiſe and Marſhal d'Etrees, interrupted not the rapid and triumphant career of prince Ferdinand. The French were compelled entirely to evacuate the electorate of Hanover; and in the landgraviate of Heſſe they now occupied Ziegenhayen alone: while the king of Pruſſia, by the death of the empreſs of Ruſſia, was delivered from his moſt formidabe and implacable enemy.

A D. 1757, 1762.] In Aſia, the war, which had been ſcarce ſuſpended by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, was revived with increaſe of fury, and with the moſt diſaſterous conſequences to France; her ſettlement of Chandernagore, on the banks of the Ganges, was taken by admiral Watſon and colonel Clive; general Lally was compelled to retire from a fruitleſs attempt againſt the walls of Madras; he was afterwards defeated in ſucceſſive engagements, and reduced to ſeek ſhelter within the fortifications of Pondicherry: that ſettlement, the laſt that remained of any conſequence to the French on the coaſt of Coromandel, was inveſted by the Engliſh. After a gallant defence, Lally was obliged by famine to ſurrender: his obſtinacy and violence rejected thoſe terms of capitulation which he might have obtained; and the victors, informed ſoon after of the hoſtile confederacy of the houſe of Bourbon, turned their arms againſt the ſettlements of Spain, and poſſeſſed themſelves of Manilla, the capital of Luconia, one of the principal of the Philippine iſlands.

A. D. 1758, 1762.] In America, Louiſbourg, garriſoned by near three thouſand troops, under the command of chevalier du Drucourt, was attacked by admiral Boſcawen, and the generals Amherſt and Wolfe: for ſix weeks the governor maintained a gallant defence; he was at length compelled to ſurrender priſoner with his whole garriſon; and the iſland of Cape Breton ſhared the fate of the capital. The conquerer next directed his attention to the continent, and ſwept away in his progreſs the forts of Ticonderoga, Crown-Point, and Niagara. But in Canada the force of the French was ſtill entire; and the marquis of Montcalm, a brave and enterpriſing general, advantageouſly poſted, protected with a formidable army, Quebec, the capital of that province. His ſuperior force, and almoſt inacceſſible ſituation, could not repreſs the adventurous ſpirit of the Engliſh; animated by the example of their general, Wolfe, they climbed the rugged aſcent of the Heights of Abraham; and were formed for battle on the ſummit, before Montcalm, lulled into ſecurity by the temerity of the attempt, would give credit to the intelligence. Convinced that the report was too true, he now determined to decide the fate of Canada in a general engagement: but the adverſe fortune of France prevailed. Montcalm, after diſplaying equal ſkill and courage, periſhed on the field, with above a thouſand of his braveſt ſoldiers. The Engliſh alſo purchaſed their victory at the expence of their general, whoſe early martial genius promiſed to rank him among the firſt commanders of any age or nation; but their ſucceſs in every other point was brilliant and unalloyed; Quebec ſurrendered; and a ſubſequent attempt of M. de Levi to recover that city, was, after an ineffectual victory, baffled by the perſevering valour of the garriſon. The remnant of the French forces, deſtitute of ſubſiſtence, mouldered away; the town of New Orleans, and a few plantations on the Miſſiſſippi, alone remained to France, of all her ſettlements in North America; while in the Weſt Indies, the powerful armaments of the Engliſh wreſted from her the important and fruitful iſlands of Guadaloupe and Martinico; and ſoon after ſhook to the very baſis the grandeur and proſperity of the houſe of Bourbon, by ſtorming the Havannah, the principal ſea-port in the iſland of Cuba, the key of the Gulph of Mexico, and the centre of the Spaniſh trade and navigation in the New World.

A. D. 1758.] In Africa, France was driven from the forts and factories which ſhe had eſtabliſhed on the river Senegal. Monſ. St. Jean, the governor of Goree, an iſland which lies at the diſtance of thirty leagues on the ſame coaſt, attempted to defend it from an Engliſh armament, conducted by commodore Keppel and colonel Worge; but his ardour was ill ſeconded by his garriſon, and he was reluctantly compelled to ſubmit to the ſuperior numbers of his enemies.

A. D. 1758, 1759.] But it was on the ſea, that element ever fatal to the ambition of France, and the proud theatre of Britiſh triumph, that the houſe of Bourbon beheld its lofty hopes finally overwhelmed; that marine which the treaſures and reſources of Lewis had been devoted to create, was in a few years totally annihilated. The marquis du Queſne, with three ſhips of the line and a frigate, was intercepted between Cape de Gatt and Carthagena, by a conſiderable Engliſh ſquadron, under admiral Oſborne; the frigate eſcaped by the ſwiftneſs of her ſailing, but two of the ſhips of the line were taken after an obſtinate reſiſtance and the third was driven on ſhore on the Spaniſh coaſt. M. de la Clue, in attempting to paſs the ſtreights of Gibraltar with twelve ſhips of the line, was encountered by admiral Boſcawen with fourteen; the French ſoon fought their ſafety in flight; de la Clue was wounded himſelf; two of his largeſt ſhips were taken, two more deſtroyed, and the remaining eight found ſhelter under the cannon of Cadiz. But the principal fleet of France, conſiſting of twenty-one ſail of the line and four frigates, ſtill remained at Breſt, under the command of M. Conflans, and meditated a deſcent on the coaſt of Ireland. In the proſecution of this deſign, that admiral availed himſelf of a ſtorm which had driven the Britiſh ſquadron into their own harbours—but he had ſcarce put to ſea before his hopes were blaſted by the appearance of admiral Hawke, with twenty-two ſhips of the line. Conflans who dreaded the encounter, ſought ſhelter among the ſhoals and rocks of a lee-ſhore. He was purſued by his daring antagoniſt—his own ſhip the Royal Sun, was driven on ſhore, and burnt by the French themſelves—the Hero ſhared the ſame fate, by the hands of the Engliſh, the Formidable ſtruck her colours, and the Theſée, the Superbe, and the Juſte, were buried in the ocean by the Britiſh cannon, or the fury of the waves; the reſt ſought refuge in the river Vilaine. The victors themſelves did not entirely eſcape the rage of the tempeſt; two of their ſhips ſtruck on a ſand, and were totally loſt; but to the French marine, the wound, during the courſe of the war, was incurable; and thoſe ſhips which had eſcaped into the Vilaine, could never elude the vigilance of a Britiſh ſquadron conſtantly ſtationed to block up the mouth of that river.

A. D. 1762.] Such repeated diſaſters humbled the pride of Lewis; his finances were exhauſted: his commerce at a ſtand; his marine annihilated; in the four different quarters of the world his arms had proved unfortunate; and his alliance with Spain had only introduced that crown to a participation of his calamities. Happily for him, the Engliſh councils were equally diſpoſed to peace. George the Third had diſmiſſed from adminiſtration the man whoſe commanding genius had changed the fortune of his country, and raiſed the Britiſh empire to a glory that aſtoniſhed the world. The new miniſter liſtened with readineſs to the propoſals of the court of Verſailles: the great outlines of the treaty were ſoon adjuſted, as both parties agreed to withdraw themſelves totally from the German war, and to reſtore the places they had taken. France alſo ceded to Great Britain, Canada, and the greateſt part of her ſettlements in America; but retained the right of fiſhing on the coaſt of Newfoundland, with the ſmall iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. She received back Martinico, Guadaloupe, Goree, and Belle-iſle, with the neutral iſland of St. Lucia; and her Eaſt-India Company were eſtabliſhed in their former ſettlements; but in return ſhe conſented to deſtroy the harbour and demoliſh the fortifications of Dunkirk; reſtored Minorca; yielded Grenada and the Grenadines; and gave up all claim to the neutral iſlands of St. Vincent, Dominica, and Tobago. Her ally, Spain, obtained again the Havannah, and all that part of the iſland of Cuba which had been conquered by the Engliſh; but in return, Charles engaged to permit the Engliſh to cut logwood in the bay of Honduras, to evacuate Portugal, and to cede Florida to Great Britain. The king of Pruſſia ſoon after concluded a treaty with the empreſs-queen, by which all the conqueſts were mutually reſtored; and after a tedious and bloody war, the tranquillity of Europe was once more happily re-eſtabliſhed.

The late treaty, which delivered Lewis from the ſtorms of foreign war, promiſed a ſeaſon of reſt and tranquillity to his declining years, his luſt of tranſatlantic dominion had expoſed the veſſel of the ſtate to imminent danger, and at length eſcaped from the fury of the tempeſt, it might naturally have been expected that his caution and vigilance would have been exerted to ſteer clear of the ſhoals of domeſtic contention. But his reign was deſtined to prove equally inimical to the happineſs of his people, and to the deſpotic power of his ſucceſſor—the political horizon began already to be darkened with thoſe clouds which afterwards burſt with accumulated violence on the head, and ſhook to the very foundation the throne, of his grandſon.

The power of the firſt monarchs of France had been bounded by the national aſſemblies, to which was frequently applied the name of Parliaments: but when the feeble ſucceſſors of Charlemagne ſuffered the reins to drop from their hands, the barons aſſumed thoſe privileges which had been formerly annexed to the crown; and while they governed their own diſtricts with independent ſway, neglected the general concerns of the ſtate, and unleſs urged by private advantage, ſeldom deigned to attend the public ſummons. The vigour of Philip, ſurnamed Auguſtus, reſtored the ſemblance of regal authority; while the juſtice and wiſdom which his edicts diſplayed, allured the concurrence rather than commanded the obedience of his ſubjects. He united to the crown ſeveral of the moſt conſiderable provinces of France; he embelliſhed the principal towns and cities of his dominions; and generally ſucceſsful in war, he was reſpected and imitated in peace.

The integrity and piety of his ſon and ſucceſſor, Lewis the Ninth, caſt the ſame luſtre on the crown as had adorned it during the proſperous reign of Philip. Though defeated and even made captive in his unfortunate expedition againſt the infidels, his juſtice and devout humility blended with that of king the holy appellation of ſaint; and his ſubjects were diſpoſed to liſten with reverence to a legiſlator, who, ſevere to himſelf, directed his whole views to the benefit of the ſtate: his patience and vigilance were continually exerciſed in alleviating the diſtreſſes of his people, and reſtoring that order which had been ſubverted by the haughty and reſtleſs ſpirits of a martial age.

The encouragement which St. Lewis gave to the code of Juſtinian, and the body of inſtitutions which in his reign were compiled from the Roman laws, eſtabliſhed a grand revolution in the maxims of juriſprudence, and in the cognizance of civil cauſes. New courts were erected by his authority or example throughout the kingdom; the feudal judges who preſided over them, brave and indolent, by genius and habit were but ill qualified patiently to inveſtigate the theory of a complicated ſcience, or to toil through volumes which daily increaſed upon their hands; the numerous charters of enfranchiſement, which had been granted to different towns and villages, required a variety of ſtipulations and exceptions; and the opinions and judgments of canoniſts and clerks were inceſſantly demanded, either to frame new regulations, or to explain the old ones.

Hence this claſs of men, by degrees, entered into the functions of judicature, and became conſtituent members of thoſe courts of juſtice which were ſummoned by the kings, either for the determination of general feudal queſtions, or of private claims of right; and which were convened at any time, or in any part of the kingdom, according to the royal pleaſure. The ſecular peers and lords, whom they at firſt only aſſiſted with their advice, ſoon yielded to their ſuperiority in thoſe tribunals; inſtead of the ſimplicity and conciſeneſs which characteriſed the feudal forms of trial, and that martial appearance which can be compared only to the warlike ſplendour of a Poliſh diet, the judges, in peaceful dignity, devoted their attention to the nice diſcuſſion of law queſtions, and encouraged thoſe ſubtleties which at once perplex and protract, and which throughout Europe ſo univerſally diſgrace the modern courts of juſtice..

Yet thoſe who had raiſed themſelves to eminence by the knowledge of the law, were ſtill confined to deciſions which affected only the life or property of the ſubject, and remained excluded from the diſcuſſion of matters of political importance. The national aſſemblies had ſunk into diſuſe; the court of peers, which originally was compoſed of only ſix ſecular and ſix eccleſiaſtical peers, but which had inſenſibly admitted the moſt powerful barons and biſhops, and the principal officers of the crown, were reſtrained to appeals which involved the intereſts of perſons of the ſame rank, the privileges of the peerage, or the pretenſions of the throne; and Philip the Fair, the grandſon of St. Lewis, alarmed by the thunders of the Vatican, and deſirous of finding ſome ſupport in the concurrence of his people at large, convened an aſſembly of the three orders of his kingdom, the nobility, the clergy, and the commons; and for the firſt time introduced the latter into the grand council of the ſtate.

The example of Philip was imitated by his ſucceſſors; and theſe aſſemblies, which obtained indiſcriminately the names of States-General or Parliaments, were held as the neceſſities of the ſovereign ſuggeſted till the reign of Lewis the Thirteenth. But the kings of France, ever jealous of their ſpirit, endeavoured to prevent them from aſſuming a determined form or regular eſtabliſhment; the place of their meeting was frequently changed, and ſeveral provincial aſſemblies, to diminiſh the danger of their unanimity, were repeatedly held at the ſame time, and attended by commiſſioners from the crown. The later princes of the houſe of Valois even endeavoured to ſubſtitute in their place conventions of the notables, and other partial meetings of the nobles; and whenever diſtreſs impelled them, it was ſtill with reluctance they had recourſe to their laſt reſource the States-General or Parliaments.

But while the ſovereigns of France were impreſſed with evident jealouſy of theſe aſſemblies, they nouriſhed with care that court of juſtice which was compoſed of the moſt eminent among the nobility, the clergy, and the profeſſors of the law, and which, equally with the national aſſembly and the ſtates-general, had acquir ed the denomination of Parliament. Philip the Fair fixed the permanent ſeat of it at Paris; and as one chamber was inſufficient for the arrangement and diſpatch of appeals, he formed another, which was called the Chamber of Inqueſts. Theſe chambers were appointed to meet twice in the year at the terms of All Saints and Eaſter, when their ſeſſions were continued for two months: but it is probable, that during the anarchy of the unfortunate reign of Charles the Sixth, the magiſtrates continued to ſit without intermiſſion; and the ſeſſions of the parliament have ever ſince been only legally prorogued by their own conſent, and the termination of public buſineſs.

From the moment that the Parliament of Paris was eſtabliſhed, the progreſs of it was rapid and intereſting. The principal barons preſided with their ſwords by their ſides, as the ſupreme judges; but ignorant of the juriſprudence, their deciſions were directed by the opinions of the moſt able lawyers, who, as counſellors, explained to them the edicts of the ſtate and the cuſtoms of the kingdom. The nobles, during the calamities which afflicted the æra of Charles the Sixth, deſerted their judicial ſtation; and it was immediately occupied by the moſt able profeſſors of the law. When Charles the Seventh recovered Paris from the arms of the Engliſh, it was his firſt care to re-eſtabliſh the adminiſtration of juſtice; he compoſed the grand chamber of parliament of thirty counſellors, half laity and half eccleſiaſtics; the chamber of inqueſts he augmented to forty members; and confining his appointments to thoſe only verſed in the law, delivered his people from the capricious partiality of an ignorant nobility.

The neceſſity of providing ſome permanent repoſitory for the royal edicts, induced the kings of France to enroll them in the journals of their courts of parliament; and the members of thoſe courts ſoon availed themſelves of this cuſtom, to diſpute the legality of any regulation which had not been thus regiſtered. But the right of remonſtrating, which in modern times has been aſſerted with ſo much vigour, only feebly appeared in the reign of Lewis the Eleventh; and during the minority of his ſon, Charles the Eighth, when the duke of Orleans diſputed the regency with the lady of Beaujeau, and endeavoured to allure the parliament of Paris to ſupport his pretenſions, in oppoſition to the determination of the States-General, the preſident of that court replied, "that it was the "buſineſs of the parliament ſolely to adminiſter juſtice to the people; and that "war, the management of the revenue, and the government of the king, were "not within their province:" and he ſtrongly recommended to the duke, to reſtrain himſelf within the limits of his allegiance, and not to interrupt the tranquillity of the kingdom.

But this moderation was of ſhort duration. As the influence of the States-General diminiſhed, that of the parliament daily increaſed; the court of peers, reſigning its ſeparate claim of juriſdiction, was blended with it; and the kings of France, by holding their ſupreme beds of juſtice in this court, inveſted it with the ſupreme authority of the ſtate both in civil and criminal affairs. The encroachments of the ſee of Rome firſt engaged the attention of the parliament; and in the reign of Francis the Firſt, ſome ſtrong remonſtrances were preſented againſt the miſmanagement of the finances, and the impious rapacity which had ſtripped St. Martin of the ſilver rails that had been beſtowed on his ſhrine by Lewis the Eleventh.

In the tranſient and feeble reign of Francis the Second, when the progreſs of the reformed religion awakened the fears of the moſt zealous catholics, and afforded a pretence to the ambition of the houſe of Lorrain, the members of the parliament were ſummoned to deliver their opinions on religious toleration; and the lords of the council and the Guiſes mutually agreed to refer the deciſion of this important queſtion to that court. After long and warm debates, the majority of the parliament, by an edict, eſtabliſhed the authority of the Roman or apoſtolic church; they declared the adminiſtration of any other religious rites capital crimes, and the judgment of them was left to the provincial courts. Heretical opinions were conſigned to the eccleſiaſtical tribunals; but the power of puniſhing the culprits remained with the ſecular magiſtrates, who were reſtricted from pronouncing a ſeverer ſentence than baniſhment.

When Charles the Ninth, the brother and ſucceſſor of Francis, on the fatal eve of St Bartholomew, involved the unſuſpecting Hugonots in one promiſcuous maſſacre, and ſtained the memory of his reign with indelible infamy, the court of parliament praiſed the prudence of the king, who declared in that court, that he had only anticipated the deſigns of Coligny and the proteſtants againſt his own perſon; yet the preſident, de Thou, could not forbear adding, "That if the "conſpiracy of Coligny was real, he ought to have been proceeded againſt "legally."

In the ſubſequent reign of Henry the Third, when France was agitated by the ambition of the houſe of Lorrain, and the formidable confederacy of the League, the parliament maintained pure and unſhaken their allegiance to their ſovereign. On the aſſaſſination of the duke of Guiſe, the capital was ſubjected to the licentious caprice of the council of ſixteen; and Harlai, the preſident of the parliament, with Meſſrs. de Thou and Potier, who had incurred the diſpleaſure of the zealous leaguers, were by the triumphant faction committed to the Baſtile. A more unfortunate fate awaited the preſident Briſſon, who after the aſſaſſination of Henry the Third, had endeavoured to awake the loyalty of the Pariſians towards Henry the Fourth, and was executed, without the form of trial, by a ſentence of the council of ſixteen.

When that monarch recovered his capital, he reſtored the parliament to its dignity and freedom; and thoſe edicts which had been extorted by the power of the league, againſt himſelf and his predeceſſor, were formally annulled. But when Henry himſelf grateful for the former ſervices of the proteſtants, whoſe religious tenants he had abjured, in the edict of Nantz, which was regiſtered in parliament, granted to the reformed permiſſion to aſſemble at what place and at what time they pleaſed, to admit foreigners into their ſynods, and at pleaſure to quit the kingdom and join foreign ſynods; the parliament heſitated not to remonſtrate againſt a conceſſion ſo dangerous to the royal authority. The ſovereign liſtened with pleaſure to the language of loyalty; but the reformed were entitled to his confidence; he wiſhed to extinguiſh the rancour between the proteſtants and catholics by a generous toleration; and he compelled the parliament reluctantly to regiſter the edict.

On the death of Henry the fourth, the parliament confirmed the title of his widow to the regency, during the minority of Lewis the Thirteenth. Even after that prince came of age to aſſume the reins of government, they vindicated their authority againſt the duke d'Epernon, who had preſumed to releaſe by force a ſoldier from the priſon of St. Germain. The king, partial to the duke, commanded the parliament to diſcontinue their proceedings; the parliament obeyed; but at the ſame time they determined to ſtop the adminiſtration of juſtice, till they ſhould have received ſatisfaction for this inſult to their body; and though the king diſapproved of their reſolution, the duke d'Epernon was at length compelled to a perſonal ſubmiſſion.

But when the commanding genius of Richelieu guided the counſels of his ſovereign, the parliament was taught to reſpect the voice of a maſter: Their mediation in favour of the queen-mother was ſeverely reproved, and they were reduced, at Metz, to implore the pardon of inſulted majeſty. By acquieſcing in the deſires of the court in diſſolving the marriage of the duke of Orleans, the brother of the king, with Margaret of Lorrain, they reconciled themſelves to the haughty cardinal; yet, unmindful of their late humiliation, they again expoſed themſelves to his reſentment, by reſiſting the eſtabliſhment of the French Academy; and though their oppoſition was ineffectual, that miniſter ever after regarded them with jealouſy and averſion.

The death of the cardinal was ſoon ſucceeded by that of Lewis the Thirteenth, and the minority of his ſon was entruſted to the care of the queen-mother, Anne of Auſtria. That princeſs called to the ſupreme direction of affairs the cardinal Mazarin, and the nation ſubmitted with reluctance to the authority of a foreigner and a prieſt. The parliament availed themſelves of the general indignation, to ſhake off the fetters which Richelieu had impoſed, and to aſſume powers unknown to them before. Some vexatious edicts which they refuſed to regiſter, was the ſignal of public revolt; the queen, to force obedience, arreſted ſeveral of the counſellors; and the people eſpouſing the cauſe of the parliament, whom they conſidered as their champions againſt an oppreſſive miniſter, tumultuouſly aſſembled in arms, and barricadoed the ſtreets. The court, alarmed at their hoſtile appearance, reſtored the members of the parliament to their freedom, and ſoon after abandoned a capital which they could no longer govern. For four ſucceſſive years the parliament alternately oppoſed the authority of the regent, and launched its edicts againſt the princes of the blood. Amidſt every ſpecies of anarchy and civil commotion, Lewis the Fourteenth attained the age fixed for his majority; he appeared in his parliament, boldly reprimanded their preſumption, and baniſhed thoſe members whoſe activity had rendered them moſt conſpicuous. The reſt of the aſſembly ſubmitted to the mandates of their ſovereign; they cancelled the obnoxious edicts againſt Mazarin; they received that miniſter with every mark of regard and approbation; and during the reign of Lewis the Fourteenth the parliament of Paris was content to adminiſter juſtice in obſequious ſilence.

Towards the cloſe of the reign of that monarch, ſome feeble murmurs eſcaped them againſt the bull Unigenitus, which they conſidered as an infringement on the liberties of the Gallican church; but no ſooner had Lewis expired, than the parliament embraced the opportunity of eſcaping from that ſubjection in which he had held them; and, contrary to the will of the deceaſed monarch, they veſted the ſole power of the regency in the hands of the duke of Orleans. Yet the freedom of their expoſtulations with that prince, on the ruinous ſyſtem of Law, determined him to diſmiſs them to Pontoiſe; and they were compelled to purchaſe their recall by the moſt degrading conceſſions. We have ſince beheld them, on the reſumption of the bull Unigenitus, reſiſting Lewis the Fifteenth in the plenitude of his power; and though repeatedly baniſhed, yet conſtantly recalled, and gathering from each fall encreaſe of vigour.

From the time of Philip the Fair, the parliament of Paris advanced rapidly, and continually gathered ſtrength in its progreſs. In the different and moſt flouriſhing cities of France, other parliaments, on a ſimilar principle, were gradually erected; but though we have traced the counſellors of law thus elevating themſelves to the higheſt and nobleſt offices of government, and diſpenſing juſtice in the ſupreme court of the kingdom, yet the notions of honour peculiar to the Gothic nations precluded them from being ennobled by their places: they were officially aſſociated with the peers, and had ſat in judgment on princes of the blood; yet for ſeveral centuries they in vain ſtruggled to obtain admiſſion into the order of Nobility; and it was not till the reign of Lewis the Fourteenth, who had humbled their power, that their vanity was gratified by the indulgence of that monarch, whoſe edict firſt entitled them to the honours and privileges of the nobles.

A. D. 1762.] While Lewis ſunk beneath the fortune and genius of his foreign enemies, the parliament of Paris were vigorouſly engaged in purſuing their triumph over their domeſtic foes. The arts and influence of the Jeſuits had obtained and enforced the bull Unigenitus; and their victory had been conſidered as a dangerous wound to the dignity of the parliament. But that order, that had obtruded itſelf into the cabinets of the moſt powerful potentates of Europe, that had attained almoſt an independent ſovereignty in America, now tottered on the brink of deſtruction. A conſpiracy which they had framed and encouraged againſt the life of the king of Portugal, excited the general deteſtation; and while they laboured under this odium, ſome fraudulent practices to which their avarice ſtimulated them in France, completed their diſgrace, and expoſed them to the ſeverity of the civil law.

La Valette, chief of their miſſionaries at Martinico, had ever ſince the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle carried on, for the benefit of his ſociety, an extenſive and advantageous commerce: by his ingenious and bold ſpeculations, he had augmented it to ſuch a degree as to excite the jealouſy of the merchants and inhabitants of the colony; he formed eſtabliſhments in the neighbouring iſlands, and had factories at Dominica, Grenada, St. Lucia, and St. Vincent; he drew bills of exchange on Marſeilles, Nantz, Lyons, Paris, Cadiz, Leghorn, and Amſterdam; and his ambition aſpired to monopolize the trade of France in the Weſt-Indies, when his projects were blaſted by an event as calamitous as it was unexpected.

His veſſels laden with riches went over the ſeas in ſecurity, when the Engliſh commenced thoſe hoſtilities fatal to ſo many ſpeculators, and eſpecially to the brothers Lionay and Gouffre, merchants at Marſeilles, who, in expectation of two millions of merchandize, had accepted notes to the amount of a million and a half, drawn by the Jeſuits. Stunned by this heavy blow, they in vain implored the ſupport of the ſociety of Jeſus; that order, blind to its real intereſt, was either deaf to their intreaties, or too tardy in its aſſiſtance. Before their courier arrived, the houſe of the Lionays ſtopped payment, and throughout the principal commercial towns in France involved a multitude of unfortunate perſons in their ruin.

A. D. 1761, 1762. Thoſe who were intereſted as ſufferers in the failure of the Lionays, ſought for indemnification from the order of the Jeſuits; they aſſerted that La Valette had acted, as a monk indeed neceſſarily muſt do, for the benefit of his ſociety; and on the refuſal of the order to make good the loſſes they had ſuſtained in their connection with their agent, they carried their cauſe before the parliament of Paris.

That aſſembly eagerly ſeized the opportunity of humbling their domeſtic enemies. The Jeſuits were every where cited before their tribunals, and ordered to do juſtice to their creditors. In vain did they urge that commerce being forbidden to religious orders by the canons of the church, and by the laws, the engagements of La Valette were perſonal, and ought not to involve the ruin of a whole ſociety. But the completion of their errors was the giving into the ſnares that had been prepared for them by their adverſaries: theſe, in order to prove that the government of the Jeſuits was deſpotic, that every thing was ſubmitted to the power of the general: and that Father de la Valette neither was, nor could be, any thing elſe than the agent of the ſociety, appealed to the conſtitutions of the order. The Jeſuits imprudently accepted the challenge, and referred to the ſame authority to juſtify their aſſertion, that the ſociety had no property, and that the funds belonged to the ſeveral houſes or colleges.

The myſterious volume which had been ſo carefully ſecluded from the light, was now produced in open court: it was found to contain an admirable, but alarming picture of the order; all the members of which being united by the conformity of their morals, and the reſemblance of their doctrine and manners, ſubmitted implicitly to their chief; and formed a diſtinct body in the ſtate, ſubject to the ſole controul of their general, who was abſolute over their actions, their fortunes, and their lives.

At the ſame time it was diſcovered, that from the period of their former expulſion they had again been admitted into the kingdom on certain conditions, which they had never fulfilled, and to which their general had obſtinately refuſed to ſubſcribe; ſo that the contract between this religious order and the ſtate had never been completed; and their exiſtence in France was the effect only of toleration, and not of adoption.

To theſe fatal diſcoveries were added the diſpoſitions of the marchioneſs de Pompadour, and her favourite miniſter. The mareſchal Belleiſle, who had entruſted the education of his only ſon to the Jeſuits, died before the concluſion of the peace: and to his influence ſucceeded the duke de Choiſeul, a nobleman who diſliked, and was honoured by the hatred of, the order. This miniſter, of an active and bold turn of mind, endeavoured to effect revolutions not only in ſtates, but alſo in the opinions of the people; ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favour of modern philoſophy, and an enemy to the power of religious communities, his ſentiments gave weight to the proceedings of parliament; the writings of the Jeſuits were pronounced to contain doctrines ſubverſive of all civil government, and injurious to the ſacred perſons of ſovereigns: — The attempt of Damien on the life of the king was attributed to their ſuggeſtions, and every thing ſeemed to foretel their ſpeedy diſſolution.

Yet one feeble ray of hope broke in upon the gloom from the proſpect of royal favour; and Lewis who had beheld the late proceedings with indifference, was now allured by the ſolicitations of the friends to the ſociety, faintly to interpoſe in their behalf. The royal mandate, for the ſpace of a year, averted their impending deſtiny; and during that period, all deciſions againſt the ſociety were commanded to be ſuſpended. A plan of accommodation was drawn up, and ſubmitted to the pope and the general of the order; but the latter, at this critical moment, diſplayed an ill-timed haughtineſs, and imprudent inflexibility: "Let them exiſt as "they were, or not exiſt at all," was his injudicious anſwer. The indifference of the king returned; the activity of the parliament was rekindled; and the decree of proſcription immediately enſued.

The parliament declared the bulls, briefs, conſtitutions, and other regulations of the ſociety called of Jeſus, to be encroachments on authority, and abuſes of government; they diſſolved the ſociety; forbade the members to wear the habit of the order; and interdicted them from the poſſeſſion of any prebends, livings, or pulpits, or any other clerical or municipal offices. Their colleges were ſeized; their effects confiſcated; and the king joining in the general reſentment, ſeconded the decree of the parliament, by an edict which utterly aboliſhed the order of Jeſuits throughout his dominions.

A. D. 1763.] But the king of France, while he repoſed in the arms of beauty, little thought that in joining to ſuppreſs a religions order, he had kindled a flame which might prove fatal to deſpotic government. The French parliament, elated by their victory over eccleſiaſtical tyranny, now attempted to ſet bounds to the abſolute power of the crown, and ſeemed determined to confine it within the limits of law. An edict which Lewis iſſued for the continuance of ſome taxes which were to have ended with the war, was conſidered by the parliaments as an unwarrantable burthen; and a ſecond edict, which enabled the crown to redeem its debts at an inadequate price, was repreſented as a violation of the public faith. The flame rapidly ſpread through the kingdom; the different parliaments ſtrongly remonſtrated againſt, and ultimately refuſed to regiſter, the edicts; and thoſe of Paris and Rouen diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their firm and animated language. "The ſubject," ſaid the latter, "has a right to the eaſieſt and leaſt burthenſome "method of contributing to the wants of the ſtate. This right, which is founded "in nature, belongs to every nation in the world, whatever may be its form of "government; it is principally the right of the Franks, and in a more eſpecial "manner that of your province of Normandy. The Norman charter furniſhes on "this head the moſt reſpectable monuments of our national immunities, and of "the juſtice of the kings, your auguſt predeceſſors. We there find that no tax "can be laid on your ſubjects of this province, unleſs it be agreed to in the "aſſembly of the people of the three eſtates. This charter ſubſiſts in its full force; it "makes part of your people's rights, which you ſwore to maintain before Him BY WHOM "KING'S REIGN."

From the ſouth they echoed, without any diminution, the voice of the northern parliaments, and that of Bourdeaux, heſitated not to declare, that it was their duty in regiſtering an edict to bear witneſs to the people that the tax was juſt, and to the king, that his people are ſtill able to furniſh the ſupplies: at Thouloufe, at Grenoble, and Beſançon, they purſued the ſame meaſures, and held the ſame language.

A. D. 1763, 1764.] The court, to combat this oppoſition, ſent down the different governors of the provinces, with orders in the king's name to regiſter the edicts by force, and to cauſe them to be obeyed. The duke of Fitz-James accordingly repaired to Thouloufe, the duke of Harcourt to Rouen, and Monſ. Meſnil to Grenoble. The former in vain ſet guards upon the houſes of the principal magiſtrates, and menaced the reſt with the ſame reſtraint; the patriotic party was provoked rather than intimidated by this rigour: the neighbouring parliament of Provençe eſpouſed with ardour the cauſe of their brethren of Thouloufe; they declared, that by the outrage in the capital of Languedoc, the whole nation, and the throne itſelf, was wounded by tyrannical acts; the members of the parliament of Thouloufe, animated by the friendly aſſurances of Provençe, as ſoon as they could aſſemble, came to more effectual reſolutions, and determined to arreſt their governor, though acting with the authority and under the immediate direction of the crown, and to proceed againſt him as a criminal.

The duke of Harcourt and Monsieur Molé, in Rouen and Grenoble, imitated the conduct of the duke of Fitz-James, and were encountered by a similar opposition; their respective parliaments commanded their bodies to be seized, and to be brought to the prisons of the court; and in case they could not be apprehended, their estates and effects were to be confiscated, or put under the administration of a legal commissary.

A. D. 1765.] The fatal influence of the marchioness of Pompadour had terminated with her life; and amidst these convulsions, the dauphin of France, a prince of a pious and mild disposition, expired in the thirty-seventh year of his age. Maria Theresa, the infanta of Spain, whom he had first espoused, died in child-bed; and the daughter of which she was delivered, survived her mother but a short time. His second marriage, in 1747, with Maria Josepha, of Saxony, proved more fruitful; and he left behind him three sons, the duke of Berri, the count of Provençe, and the count of Artois, with two daughters. The king immediately conferred the title of dauphin on the duke of Berri; but with a proper attention to the memory of his deceased son, ordered that the dowager dauphiness should retain precedence of his royal highness.

A. D. 1766.] But if the heart of Lewis was on this occasion sensible of paternal emotions, the cares of sovereignty allowed him not to indulge his sorrows in retirement. The voice of freedom had been heard through the different provinces of the kingdom: the parliament of Brittany had refused to the crown a free-gift of seven thousand livres; and they were singled out to experience the weight of the royal vengeance. The old parliament was dissolved; a new commission of sixty members was appointed in its room, and a severe prosecution was at the same time carried on against the degraded members: But in the instant that sentence was to have passed, Lewis prudently stopped the process, and endeavoured to conciliate the affections of his people, by publishing a general amnesty in their favour.

The clemency of the monarch was treated with disdain; the counsellors of the parliament of Brittany refused to resume their functions; and alledged, that as they had taken an oath to their parliament, they could not plead before the commission which the king had appointed in its room. Lewis, enraged at their opposition, ordered them to be included in the list of those who were to be drafted for the militia; such as the lot fell on were immediately obliged to join their respective battalions, and the rest were employed in forming the city-guard.

The parliament of Paris had not beheld with indifference the fate of their brethren in Brittany; they had applauded their conduct, and exhorted them to persevere in their opposition. But the freedom of their remonstrances soon drew upon them the royal censure; Lewis suddenly appeared in the capital, presented himself in the public court, and severely reprimanded the temerity of the members; he added, with the dignity of offended majesty, "I will not suffer an association to be formed in my kingdom, which might grow into a confederacy of resistance."

The deputies from the parliament of Rouen had pointedly reminded the ſovereign of his coronation oath, and inſinuated a compact between the king and the people. The anſwer of Lewis was conveyed in the ſtrongeſt terms; "The oath "that I have made, not to the nation, as you take upon you to ſay, but to God "alone." This diſtinction proclaimed his determination to ſuffer no earthly oppoſition to his will; the parliaments were for a moment awed by the imperious voice of the monarch; and a tranſient and deceitful calm ſucceeded the hollow murmurs of diſcontent.

A. D. 1767, 1768.] From curbing the free and daring ſpirits of his parliaments, Lewis directed his attention to the ſtate of foreign powers. Poland was afflicted with all the calamities that attend religious rancour and civil commotion: The diſtance of that country prevented the interference of France; and her king, with ſuperior policy, limited his views to Corſica, an iſland in the Mediterranean. Previous to this enterpriſe, the patrimony of St. Peter, defended alone by ſpiritual arms, was doomed to experience the more formidable weapons of the king of France. On the refuſal of the pope to recall a brief which he had publiſhed againſt the duke of Parma, Lewis thought proper to reclaim the territories of Avignon and the Venaiſſin, as fiefs belonging to him; and the Roman pontiff, having no troops to oppoſe him, could only denounce againſt him the penalties incurred by thoſe who ſeize on effects belonging to the church. But the thunders of the Vatican, once ſo terrible, were no longer regarded; and the marquis of Rochecouart, with the regiment of Dauphiné, expelled the feeble train of the pope; and received, in the name of the king, the homage and ſubmiſſion of the people.

A. D. 1768. 1769.] But far different preparations were neceſſary to bend the hardy and ſtubborn natives of Corſica. Theſe had reſiſted, with manly firmneſs, the oppreſſive councils of the Genoeſe, who claimed the ſovereignty of the iſland by right of conqueſt. But Genoa, unable to ſupport her pretenſions, transferred them to France, on condition that Lewis ſhould put her in full poſſeſſion of the adjacent iſland of Capraia, which the Corſicans had lately invaded and reduced. To execute his engagements, powerful armaments were fitted out by Lewis, at Antibes and Toulon; twenty battalions of French were landed in Corſica; and the natives, whoſe free ſuffrages had ſummoned Paoli, one of their principal chiefs, to the ſupreme government of the iſland, determined to defend their liberties to the utmoſt. A ſharp and bloody war, ſuch as ſuited the inferior numbers of the inhabitants and the nature of the country, was carried on in all the faſtneſſes and mountainous parts of the iſland. And it was not till after the French had fatally experienced, in two ſucceſſive campaigns, the enthuſiaſtic courage which animates the champions of freedom, that they overwhelmed by their ſuperior numbers this unfortunate people; nor had Lewis much reaſon to triumph in an acquiſition, to attain which he had ſacrificed ſeveral thouſands of his braveſt troops, and only extended his dominion over a rugged and unproductive iſland.

While France abroad was exhauſting her treaſures in a ruinous and unprofitable conflict, at home her merchants were expoſed to every ſpecies of failure and diſtreſs. Her Eaſt-India company, formerly ſo flouriſhing, became totally bankrupt; the moſt capital commercial houſes were involved in the ſame calamity; and the deſpotic manœuvre of the miniſter, the duke of Choiſeul, in reducing the intereſt of the public funds to one-half, and at the ſame time taking away the benefit of ſurvivorſhip in the tontines, increaſed the general gloom, and ſtruck at the root of all national faith and credit.

But though the arms of Lewis had extinguiſhed the flame of freedom in Corſica, in France it was revived by the breath of the parliaments, and cheriſhed with a fond regard that threatened the moſt important conſequences. An edict iſſued by the king, which transferred ſome new and extraordinary powers to the grand council, was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the parliament of Paris; ſixty-four members of that aſſembly voted for utterly aboliſhing that council; and the queſtion was only loſt by a majority of two, though all the princes of the blood attended to ſupport the court and the duke of Choiſeul endeavoured to overawe the independent ſpirit of the patriotic party by continuing in the aſſembly throughout the debate.

That miniſter, wearied with ineffectual ſtruggles, now exerted his addreſs to conciliate thoſe whom he had in vain attempted to intimidate. Though the king had hitherto reſiſted the ſolicitations of his people to reſtore the parliament of Brittany, he now aſpired to popularity by doing voluntarily, that which he had been vainly importuned to grant; and the duke de Duras was ſent into that province, to re-eſtabliſh the parliament, and to recall the members from exile.

A. D. 1770.] But a conceſſion, which a ſhort time ſince would have been aſcribed to the benignity of the monarch, was now attributed to the fears of the court; and the parliament had ſcarce aſſembled before they convinced their countrymen, that oppreſſion had confirmed and not extinguiſhed their zeal for the public welfare. The province of Brittany had long groaned beneath the iron rule of the duke d'Aiguillon, and for four years he had perſecuted with unremitting vengeance M. de Chalotais, the attorney-general to the parliament. That unfortunate gentleman, whoſe genius, learning, and integrity merited a better fate, had oppoſed, with the indignation of a virtuous magiſtrate, the oppreſſive meaſures of the duke; and a malevolent rage of the haughty governor, ſeconded by the influence of the counteſs du Barré, the new and favourite miſtreſs of the king, whoſe confidence he had acquired, drove the unhappy object of his enmity into exile; purſued him from dungeon to dungeon; and at length, by the ſubornation of falſe witneſſes and the profligacy of dependant judges, procured againſt him a ſentence which involved his life; and which his perſecutor haſtened privately to carry into execution.

But though the parliament of Brittany had received intelligence of the dark deſigns of their governor, the humanity of the duke of Choiſeul was intereſted by their repreſentations; and an order in favour of M. de Chalotais arrived time enough to ſtop the hand of the executioner, which was already armed againſt his life. The reſcue of that gentleman laid open a ſcene of the blackeſt iniquity; and the parliament of Brittany, poſſeſſed of new proofs, commenced a proceſs againſt the duke d'Aiguillon, whoſe trial was conducted in the preſence of the king, the princes of the blood, the peers, and the parliament of Paris. Before theſe judges the written proceedings carried on againſt M. de Chalotais were produced, and diſplayed ſuch a complicated ſyſtem of guilt and cruelty, as exceeded whatever could have been ſurmiſed.

It was amidſt theſe domeſtic diſquietudes that the dauphin received the hand of Maria Antoinetta, ſiſter to the emperor of Germany. But even theſe nuptials, that promiſed to cement the alliance of France with the houſe of Auſtria, were attended with events the moſt inauſpicious: The crowd that haſtened to be ſpectators of the fireworks, tumultuouſly preſſed upon each other; thoſe who were foremoſt ſunk down by the weight of encreaſing numbers behind, and it is ſuppoſed that about a thouſand perſons periſhed in the fatal confuſion, beſides double that number grievouſly maimed and bruiſed. This diſaſter was conſidered as omenous. The dauphin in the firſt tranſport of his commiſſeration, beſtowed the amount of a months expences towards the relief of the ſurviving ſufferers, and the dauphineſs followed the noble example. The king alſo ordered that no expenſe ſhould be ſpared to alleviate their diſtreſs. But even this ſignal and mournful occurrence, could not divert the public attention from the proſecution of the duke d'Aiguillon.

At the moment that the nation awaited the deciſion of this important cauſe, Lewis thought proper, by a violent exertion of power, to put a total ſtop to the whole courſe of juſtice, and to all further enquiries into the conduct of the duke. At the ſame time, conſcious of their ſentiments, he forbade the princes of the blood from attending the parliament. A procedure ſo inconſiſtent with the rights of the peerage was openly reprobated by the prince of Conti; and the partiality which the king evidently diſplayed towards the duke d'Aiguillon, could not repreſs the determined reſolution of the parliaments againſt him. That of Paris prohibited him from exerciſing the functions of his peerage, till his character ſhould be cleared by an open trial; and though the king annulled their arret by his abſolute authority, they maintained their reſolution with incredible firmneſs, and their remonſtrances were ſeconded by the repreſentations of the princes and peers, who complained that their honour was ſacrificed, and the rights of the peerage annihilated.

The other parliaments were not behind in vigour or reſolution that of Paris; but the general deteſtation that purſued the duke d'Aiguillon, ſeemed only to encreaſe the attachment of his royal maſter; and Lewis, after having ſeverely reprimanded the parliament of Paris for their temerity, ordered two of the members to be arreſted, and ſent to the caſtle of Vincennes; yet the reſt, inſtead of being intimidated by this ſeverity, ſtill diſplayed an aſtoniſhing magnanimity, and perſevered in repeated deputations and remonſtrances.

At length the king arrived ſuddenly at Paris, and having with his guards ſurrounded the parliament, entered the aſſembly, reproached the members in the ſevereſt terms, diſmiſſed the two chambers of Inqueſts and Requeſts, and ordered all proceedings againſt the duke d'Aiguillon to be eraſed from their regiſters. The parliament, however, ſtill continued to aſſemble, and obſerved that the late acts of arbitrary power, both againſt the letter and ſpirit of the conſtitution, left no room to doubt that a premeditated deſign was harboured to change the form of government; and that though they ſhould for a while poſtpone their deliberations, they proclaimed their reſolution ſtill to perſevere in carrying truth to the foot of the throne.

Meaſures equally violent were adopted againſt the provincial parliaments. That of Brittany was ſurprized by the intruſion of a major-general, who produced lettres de cachet for the firſt-preſident, ſolicitor-general, and regiſter, and compelled them by an armed force to eraſe from their regiſters the arrets obnoxious to the court. The members, however, aſſembled ſoon after, and iſſued a ſtrong proteſt againſt this act of power, which they pronounced in the higheſt degree to be arbitrary and illegal.

At Metz, mareſchal d'Armentieres entered the parliament-houſe at the head of eight companies of grenadiers, tore to pieces ſeveral of the arrets, and baniſhed the moſt diſtinguiſhed members; Beſançon was inſulted by ſimilar inſtances of military violence; yet Rouen ſtill perſevered in its deputation, and its complaints were echoed by the chamber of aids at Paris; who, after in vain ſeeking acceſs to the throne, to the amazement and confuſion of the court, printed its remonſtrance.

The diſcontent of the populace, who looked up with admiration to the patriotiſm and heroic firmneſs of the parliaments, was encreaſed by a dearth which prevailed this year throughout the kingdom. A ſcanty ſupply was procured by opening the ports, and permitting foreigners as well as natives to import or export corn at will, without any retroſpect to the price for which it might have been ſold during the continuance in the ports: but though this regulation might alleviate the public miſery, yet ſo fatal were the ravages of famine, that in Limoſin and Marche only, four thouſand perſons are ſuppoſed to have periſhed.

The monarch, immerſed in ſenſuality, heard with indifference the cries of his people; but he liſtened with more reſpect to the ſolicitations of his miſtreſs, the counteſs du Barré, The hatred of that lady to the duke de Choiſeul, was conſtant and undiſguiſed; and her royal lover, amidſt the blandiſhments of amorous intercourſe, was inceſſantly urged to diſmiſs the obnoxious miniſter. But whatever promiſes were drawn from the eaſy king in the hours of dalliance, were repeatedly revoked on reflection; and it is probable that the duke of Choiſeul might have long continued in his poſt, had not the imprudence of his ſiſter, and his own enterprizing genius, precipitated his downfall.

The pride of the ducheſs of Grammont was ſeverely mortified by the aſcendancy of the counteſs du Barré; though neither young nor handſome, ſhe had aſpired to the royal bed, and hoped to confirm, by her influence as miſtreſs to the king, the power to which her brother had attained as miniſter. This proſpect was blaſted by the fond attachment of Lewis to his new favourite; and the ducheſs, inſtead of remaining at Verſailles, and endeavouring ſecretly to undermine her enemies, gave open vent to her indignation; ſhe inflamed the parliaments of the different provincial towns; and in a progreſs through France, aſſured them, that in their remonſtrances to the crown, they would be ſupported by the duke of Choiſeul.

But the impetuoſity of that miniſter plunged him into a more fatal error. The court of Spain had already formed deſigns againſt Port Egmont, a ſettlement on one of the Malouine iſlands, and poſſeſſed by the Engliſh. The duke of Choiſeul, who had with impatience ſubmitted to the triumphs of that people, aſſured the cabinet of Madrid that Lewis would firmly maintain the union of the houſe of Bourbon, and the engagements that he had contracted by the Family Compact. The intrigues of the duke could not long be kept ſecret from the king; he heard with aſtoniſhment the preſumption of that ſtateſman, who had hazarded an anſwer of ſuch importance without the concurrence of the crown; he trembled at the thoughts of war, and at duties which muſt obtrude upon hours which he had devoted to pleaſure; he was ſtill embaraſſed by the remonſtrances of his parliaments; and he determined to get rid of a miniſter whom he ſuſpected of too much complacency towards thoſe aſſemblies. The count de St. Florentin, lately created duke de la Vrilliere, was appointed to carry him the fatal lettre de cachet, which was couched in the following terms: "the diſſatisfaction I experience in your "ſervices, obliges me to baniſh you to Chanteloup, where you will repair in "twenty-four hours. I would have ſent you much further, if it had not been for "the particular eſteem I have for the ducheſs de Choiſeul, in whoſe welfare I am "much intereſted. Be careful that your conduct does not force me to take ſome "other ſtep; and I pray God to keep you in his holy protection."

A. D. 1771.] The duke of Choiſeul found ſome compenſation for the loſs of royal favour in the approbation of the public; and he retired with the acclamations of the people at large. But his retreat ſecured not the ſubmiſſion of the parliaments of France; and thoſe aſſemblies, though deprived of the ſupport that they had looked up to, ſtill maintained a conduct equally firm and honourable. The members long withſtood the royal edict, by which they were to acknowledge themſelves obliged in future to regiſter all the edicts of the king, even againſt their own remonſtrances. The preſence of the monarch at length compelled them to enter on their journals the fatal edict; but in their next aſſembly the parliament of Paris complained of it as an act of force, and appointed a deputation to the king to entreat him to withdraw it. Their language on this occaſion was bold, firm, and animated: "Your edict, Sire, is deſtructive of all law; your parlia-"ment is charged to maintain the law; and the law periſhing, they ſhould periſh "with it; theſe are, Sire, the laſt words of your parliament."

Lewis, enraged at their perſeverance, now yielded to the moſt violent councils, and prepared to ſupport his authority by the moſt deciſive meaſures; the members, in the dead of night, were awaked in their beds by parties of the guards, who preſented to each of them a lettre de cachet, which enjoined them to declare whether they would reſume the adminiſtration of juſtice, which they had abandoned, or perſiſt in their refuſal. Though in the moment of confuſion a few were ſurpriſed into acquieſcence, yet theſe ſoon retracted; they were commanded to attend at court, to receive their diſmiſſion; and maintaining, even in the preſence of the ſovereign, the ſame decent but inflexible firmneſs, the whole body of the parliament was baniſhed from the capital.

The chief adviſer of a conduct ſo daring and odious, was the chancellor de Maupeou; a man who had aſcended to power by the practice of every ſpecies of fraud and deceit, and who ſhared with the duke d'Aiguillon the public hatred. At his ſuggeſtion a temporary tribunal was erected, at which the lawyers of the crown were compelled to aſſiſt; but this phantom of a parliament, and the hopes of the people that the old one would be reſtored, were ſoon extinguiſhed. The king, at the laſt bed of juſtice that he held, iſſued three edicts; the firſt for the diſſolution of the preſent parliament; the ſecond for the ſuppreſſion of the Court of Aids; and the third for the transformation of the Grand Council into a new parliament. The king cloſed the aſſembly with theſe deciſive words; "You have "juſt heard my intentions; it is my will that they ſhould be executed. I com- "mand you to begin your functions next Monday; my chancellor will go to in- "ſtal you. I forbid all deliberations contrary to my will, and all repreſentations "in favour of the ancient parliament: for I will never change." Soon after the king declared that the juriſdiction of the new parliament, which reached from Lyons to Arras, was too extenſive, he now divided it into ſix different parts; each court was to have a ſimilar juriſdiction, and to be held at Arras, Lyons, Clermont, Blois, Poictiers, and Paris; a new code of laws, which had been framed by the chancellor, was alſo preſented and approved; and meaſures accordingly taken for carrying them into execution.

The parliament of Rouen had not beheld in ſilence the fate of their brethren at Paris; they declared the new parliament uſurpers, and enemies of the ſtate, and ſtrictly forbad the acknowledgment or execution of any of their arrets. The court was awed by the danger of a conteſt with the powerful and high-ſpirited duchy of Normandy, and it is ſurmiſed that the generous refuſal of the duke of Harcourt to command the troops intended to cruſh that province, induced Lewis to relinquiſh the violent meaſures that he meditated. But the ſame reſpect was not paid to the parliaments of Beſançon, Bourdeaux, Aix, Thouloufe, and Brittany: theſe were totally ſuppreſſed, the members driven into exile, and new parliaments erected in the room of the old.

The public diſcontent at the ſuppreſſion of their ancient parliaments was not leſſened by the appointment of the duke d'Aiguillon to the poſt of miniſter for foreign affairs. That nobleman, by the friendſhip of the counteſs du Barré, and the diſhonourable interpoſition of the royal authority, had eluded the ſword of Juſtice, and it was the ſtrong expreſſion of the duke of Briſſac, a nobleman of a lively and romantic diſpoſition, "that he had indeed ſaved his head, but that his "neck had been twiſted." He was now preferred to an office of the higheſt importance, and the king, by conſtant marks of favour, ſeemed deſirous on every occaſion of triumphing over the feelings of his people.

A. D. 1771, 1772.] Yet the inſenſibility of Lewis was not entirely proof againſt one inſtance of oppoſition. The princes of the blood had ſtrongly proteſted againſt the late innovations, and their firmneſs had drawn upon them the king's indignation, they were forbid to appear in the royal preſence, and ultimately baniſhed from court—but theſe illuſtrious perſons ill brooked their exile from ſcenes of gaiety and magnificence—with the life of the count of Clermont their fortitude expired, they languiſhed to return to the circle of royal pleaſures; and the king, who beheld the luſtre of his court clouded during their abſence, accepted, with pleaſure, their overtures of accommodation.

The courts of Vienna and Madrid ſaw with regret the duke d'Aiguillon, as miniſter for foreign affairs, poſſeſſed of a poſt to which their wiſhes were inceſſantly recalling the duke of Choiſeul; and the new ſecretary, though not deſtitute of capacity, yet ſuffered the partition of Poland to be concluded againſt the evident intereſt of France. Lewis himſelf was ſo ſtruck at the firſt intelligence of the event, that he could not help exclaiming, "Alas! if Choiſeul had been here, "this would not have happened." But this tranſient emotion ſoon ſubſided in the arms of the counteſs du Barré; and the revolution of Stockholm, accompliſhed under the auſpices of France, which overthrew the power of the ariſtocracy, and eſtabliſhed the authority of the ſovereign, reſtored the reputation of the duke d'Aiguillon.

Delivered from the remonſtrances of his parliament, and devoted to voluptuouſneſs, the hours of Lewis ſeemed to glide in conſtant enjoyment; the chancellor de Maupeou took care that all money edicts were regiſtered; and the inventive ſpirit of finance, by oppreſſing the people, liberally ſupplied the profuſion of the court. The holy deference of the king for the ſee of Rome was ſoothed by ceding to pope Ganganelli, Avignon and the county of Venaiſſin, which had been reclaimed in the adminiſtration of the duke of Choiſeul. The marquis of Monteynard was, by the intrigues of the duke d'Aiguillon, diſmiſſed from the war department; and the latter nobleman, by the fond partiality of the ſovereign, was inveſted with the ſpoils of the diſgraced miniſter.

A. D. 1774.] But in the moment of ſatiety, the mind of Lewis ſtill appeared impreſſed with ſettled melancholy; the ſudden death of the marquis de Chauvelin, the companion of his ſenſual exceſſes, ſtrongly affected him; and the ſubſequent fate of mareſchal d'Armentieres, who expired in a ſimilar manner, and who was nearly the ſame age as the monarch, increaſed his gloomy ſenſations. He was ſenſible of the daily diminution of his ſtrength; and even the charms of the counteſs du Barré could no longer excite deſire; and though that lady ſtill retained her influence, new objects were requiſite to rouſe the languid powers of the king. To provide theſe was the inceſſant care of the counteſs; and her aſſiduity in this office, proved at once fatal to her own grandeur, and the life of her royal ſlave.

A new beauty who was introduced into the bed of the monarch, communicated to the deſpoiler of her innocence the fatal ſeeds of diſeaſe. The ſymptoms of the ſmall-pox already appeared on the king, and by the advice of his phyſicians he was haſtily removed from Trianon to Verſailles. The danger hourly increaſed; and Lewis, appriſed of the nature of his diſorder, found, with the approach of death, the ſenſe of religion return; he deſired that the counteſs du Barré, who had officially attended him, might be removed; he received the ſacrament; and declared his intention to exert himſelf ever after for the maintenance of religion, and the happineſs of his people.

But it was not permitted to him to evince the ſincerity of theſe declarations; the ignorance of his phyſicians co-operated with the virulence of the diſeaſe; a momentary change for the better was ſucceeded by certain indications of ſpeedy diſſolution, and eight days after the firſt attack, that monarch cloſed a reign of fifty-nine, and a life of ſixty-five years.

Such was the fate of Lewis the Fifteenth, who at length fell a victim to thoſe ſenſual appetites, in the gratification of which he had ſacrificed his own fame and the welfare of his ſubjects. The enviable appellation of well-beloved, which had been conferred in the moment of danger by a lively and enthuſiaſtic people, was effaced by thirty years of laſcivious exceſs, profuſion, and rapacity; his example had looſened the bands of morality, his prodigality had exhauſted the credit and reſources of his country, and his wanton pride had trampled upon the remnant of the conſtitution. His affections ſeemed to have been confined within the narrow limits of his perſonal pleaſures and ſecurity; the marchioneſs of Pompadour, who ſo long enjoyed his confidence and ſhared his embraces, expired without a ſigh of regret from the monarch, who, during her life, had obeyed and adored her; and the death of his ſon, the dauphin, was received without any mark of emotion by the royal inſenſible. It was by inceſſantly ſuggeſting to him his perſonal danger, that the counteſs du Barré ſtimulated him to the deciſive meaſure of ſuppreſſing the ancient parliaments of France: but though concealed from the public eye, the embers of freedom were ſtill carefully cheriſhed; the magnanimity of thoſe aſſemblies had awakened new ideas in the boſoms of the French; they were taught by the late remonſtrances to conſider their inherent rights; and the glorious flame, in the ſucceeding reign, burſt forth with accumulated force, and overwhelmed the throne of deſpotiſm.

LEWIS THE SIXTEENTH.

A. D. 1774.] LEWIS the Sixteenth, at the age of twenty, ſucceeded to the throne of his grandfather; and whatever ſatisfaction might ariſe from the ſplendid proſpect before him, was alloyed by the general diſtreſs that preſented itſelf throughout the kingdom. Domeſtic cares were added to thoſe of the public; the contagious diſorder of which the late king died, had been communicated to his three daughters, the princeſſes Adelaide, Sophia, and Victoire; a general conſternation took place; the people trembled for the ſafety of the king and his brothers; and it was ſcarcely deemed an improbable event, that the whole royal family might have been ſwept off by that fatal peſt, which had ſo long been its inveterate enemy.

But theſe fears were of ſhort duration; the princeſſes recovered from the natural diſorder; and the king, with the two princes his brothers, and the counteſs d'Artois, wife of the younger, were all inoculated at the ſame time, and were ſoon releaſed from any apprehenſions by the eaſe and ſafety of the operation; their example contributed to remove the prejudices againſt that important diſcovery, and to extend the practice from the court throughout the provinces of France.

The health of Lewis was no ſooner confirmed, than he diligently employed himſelf to extinguiſh the diſcontent and alleviate the calamities of his people. He immediately determined to remove thoſe perſons from office whoſe errors, or oppreſſive conduct, had rendered them diſagreeable to the nation: he recalled the count of Maurepas, who had formerly occupied the marine department, but who had been baniſhed from the court for three and twenty years; and whoſe ability and integrity had been eſteemed and recommended by the deceaſed dauphin. This ſtateſman, however, declined the reſumption of his former ſtation; and with a ſeat in the privy-council, without any particular office, influenced the moſt important concerns of government.

The counteſs du Barré, whoſe aſcendency over the paſſions of the late monarch had occaſioned ſo many evils, was permitted to ſhelter herſelf in contempt and obſcurity; ſeveral ladies who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their ſervile aſſiduity to her, were baniſhed from the royal circle; while the ducheſs of Grammont enjoyed at once the diſgrace of her enemy, and the favour of the preſent ſovereign; ſhe was recalled to court by a letter from the young queen herſelf, and was treated with every mark of diſtinction and honour.

At length the duke d'Aiguillon reſigned his office of prime miniſter; and the chancellor de Maupeou, who had divided with him the hatred of France, was diſmiſſed from his high and important truſt; yet, even on this occaſion, the moderation of the king was conſpicuous; the puniſhment of Maupeou was limitted to the loſs of his employment; he was permitted to retire to the noble eſtate he had acquired in Normandy, and to enjoy without reſtraint the ſpoils of an oppreſſed people. The ſeals were delivered to monſieur Miromeſnil, preſident of the parliament of Rouen; the count of Vergennes, who had filled with reputation the poſt of ambaſſador to the courts of Conſtantinople and Stockholm, was called to preſide over the foreign department; and the count of Muy, afterwards created mareſchal, was nominated ſecretary of war.

The diſmiſſal of the duke d'Aguillon had filled the partizans of the duke of Choiſeul with the higheſt exultation; their ardent fancy beheld him again inveſted with the ſupreme authority, and extending his negociations into the different courts of Europe; but whether the enterpriſing genius of that nobleman was deemed inconſiſtent with the preſent pacific ſyſtem, or that the ſubordinate miniſters dreaded his haughty ſpirit, and ſilently traverſed his return to power, the hopes of his adherents were ſuffered gradually to ſubſide: he was indeed recalled to court, and ſhared with his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Grammont, the ſmiles of his ſovereign; but theſe favours were only extended to him as a private perſon, and he was ſedulouſly excluded from all participation in public affairs.

A ſtill more popular ſtep was an edict publiſhed in the name of the king, in which he engaged to pay unremitting attention to the management of the finances; to reſtore the diſcharge of the public debt, which had been intercepted by his predeceſſor; and to make full compenſation to thoſe who had ſuffered by that injurious meaſure. At the ſame time ſeveral ſchemes of œconomy were introduced; and though theſe were more pleaſing in their appearance than beneficial in their effects, yet th· people received with tranſport, plans which promiſed ſome future attention to their happineſs, and at leaſt a deſire to deliver them from the burdens under which they groaned. The price of bread, which had alſo riſen to an exceſſive height, was reduced by the prudent management of the miniſters: and thoſe who in the confuſion of the laſt reign had treaſured up the corn in their granaries, were now perſuaded to bring it to market.

Such attentions could not fail to command the gratitude of the populace, and whenever the monarch appeared in public, he was attended by the acclamations of the multitude; yet one circumſtance was wanting to eſtabliſh the general joy, and France ſtill panted after the reſtoration of her ancient parliaments. When the ſolemn funeral ſervice for the late king was performed in the abbey church of St. Denys, the new parliament was ſummoned to attend the ceremonial; but the duke of Orleans refuſed to appear, or to act in any manner in conjunction with that body. In a letter to the king he avowed his reaſons for abſenting himſelf; and the monarch, diſguſted with this unexpected oppoſition, and uncertain what effect it might produce upon the other princes of the blood, exiled the duke of Orleans, with his ſon the duke of Chartres, from his court.

The people, who had flattered themſelves that the diſmiſſal of the obnoxious miniſters would have been attended by the reſtoration of their idol, the parliament, were ſtunned by this ſtroke; they conſidered the two dukes as victims to the public good; the general diſcontent immediately revived; and Lewis, when next he preſented himſelf to the inhabitants of the metropolis, inſtead of the uſual marks of applauſe, was received in awful ſilence; dejection was ſtrongly painted in every countenance; and the young monarch ſoon perceived, that he could only reign in the hearts of his ſubjects by a ready compliance with their wiſhes.

Preparations were immediately made to ſoothe the anxious minds of an enthuſiaſtic people; the duke of Orleans was again invited to join the royal councils, and his preſence gave confidence to their reſolutions. The lettres de cachet which had been iſſued againſt the members of the ancient parliament were revoked; guards were poſted to ſecure the obnoxious perſons who compoſed the new from the rage of the populace; and the king, after attending divine ſervice, went to the great chamber of parliament, accompanied by his brothers, by the dukes of Orleans and Chartres, the other princes of the blood, and the great officers of ſtate, and commanded the edict to be regiſtered which re-eſtabliſhed the ancient parliaments and for ever ſuppreſſed the new.

But though the prudence of Lewis had ſuggeſted to him this compliance with the ardent deſires of his ſubjects, he endeavoured ſtill to preſerve pure and undiminiſhed the royal authority; and was equally averſe with his predeceſſor to granting to theſe popular aſſemblies any power that could poſſibly circumſcribe his own. He explained his intentions by the ſpeech in which he addreſſed that diſtinguiſhed body. The ſtep that he had taken to enſure the tranquillity and happineſs of his ſubjects, ought not, he obſerved, to invalidate his own authority; and he hoped, from the zeal and attachment of the preſent aſſembly, an example of ſubmiſſion to the reſt of his ſubject.. Their repeated reſiſtance to the commands of his grandfather had compelled that monarch to maintain his prerogative by their baniſhment; and they were now recalled, in the expectation that they would quietly exerciſe their functions, and diſplay their gratitude by their obedience. He concluded with declaring, that it was his deſire to bury in oblivion all paſt grievances; that he ſhould ever behold with extreme diſapprobation whatever might tend to create diviſions and diſturb the general tranquillity; and that his chancellor would read his ordinance to the aſſembly, from which they might be aſſured he would not ſuffer the ſmalleſt deviation to be made.

That ordinance was couched in the moſt explicit terms, and was immediately regiſtered by the king's command: The articles of it limitted within very narrow bounds the pretenſions of the parliament of Paris; the members were forbidden to look upon themſelves as one body with the other parliaments of the kingdom, or to take any ſtep, or aſſume any title, that might tend towards, or imply, ſuch an union: They were enjoined never to relinquiſh the adminiſtration of public juſtice, except in caſes of abſolute neceſſity, for which the firſt-preſident was to be reſponſible to the king; and it was added, that on their diſobedience, the grand council might replace the parliament, without any new edict for the purpoſe.

They were ſtill however permitted to enjoy the right of remonſtrating before the regiſtering of any edicts or letters-patent, which they might conceive injurious to the welfare of the people, provided they preſerved in their repreſentations the reſpect due to the throne. But theſe remonſtrances were not to be repeated; and the parliament, if they proved ineffectual, were to regiſter the edict objected to within a month at fartheſt from the firſt day of its being publiſhed: They were ſtrictly forbidden to iſſue any arrets which might excite trouble, or in any manner retard the execution of the king's ordinances; and they were aſſured by the king himſelf, at the concluſion of his code for their future conduct, that as long as they adhered to the bounds preſcribed, and attempted not to enlarge the powers granted to them, they might depend upon his protection and countenance.

Such were the terms on which Lewis contented to reſtore the ancient parliaments of his kingdom; and while he delivered himſelf from the odium that involved his predeceſſor, he reduced the authority of thoſe aſſemblies which had ſhaken the infant throne of Lewis the Fourteenth. Yet the conceſſions of the parliament may be vindicated as prudent and politic; they had to contend with a young monarch, poſſeſſed of the affections of the people, and whoſe ſhort reign had not yet allowed them an opportunity of changing their opinions. Moſt of the members had purchaſed their places at a conſiderable expence; and though their zeal amidſt the popular applauſe had triumphed over every other conſideration, yet they could not be entirely indifferent to the honours and affluence they had renounced. Each day more firmly eſtabliſhed the juriſdiction that had been erected on their ruins; and ſhould a continuance of their abſence gradually extinguiſh the regard of the Pariſians, they were ſenſible the jealouſy of the crown would ever afterwards preclude their recall from exile; but if once reinſtated in their dignities and the adminiſtration of juſtice, new opportunities might offer of reaſſerting what they had ſurrendered.

Even in the firſt moments of their return, they diſplayed a ſpirit unſubdued by adverſity; the article reſpecting remonſtrances was darkly and doubtfully worded, and they already aſpired to their former pretenſions; but their infant oppoſition was cruſhed by the deciſion of the monarch; and the anſwer to one of their repreſentations, "That he muſt be obeyed," was concluſive.

It was not only the parliament that ſilently bowed before the majeſty of the new ſovereign; the archbiſhop of Paris had renewed the commotions of the bull Unigenitus, and had oppoſed the adminiſtration of the ſacrament; but he was vanquiſhed by the ſtern juſtice of the king, who declared, that inſtead of conſigning him to that exile which the late monarch had repeatedly inflicted, on his again diſturbing the tranquillity of the kingdom he would give him over to the utmoſt rigour of the law.

The provincial parliaments of Beſançon, Bourdeaux, Aix, Thouloufe, and Brittany, that had been ſuppreſſed by the deceaſed monarch, were alſo reſtored by the preſent; and unanimity eſtabliſhed at home, France had leiſure to direct her attention to her late conqueſt of Corſica, which ſtill ſtruggled to throw off the yoke, and reſume her native independence.

To juſtify the ſeverities which were afterwards practiſed againſt thoſe brave but unfortunate iſlanders, the court of Verſailles had induſtriouſly circulated a rumour of dark and bloody conſpiracy. But as no detail of this plot had been given, the reality of it has been queſtioned; and it is more than probable, the revolt of the Corſicans originated in the oppreſſion of their governors, and was the reſult of momentary indignation, rather than the conſequence of any ſettled plan.—Whatever was the ſource of it, the effects were fatal to that unhappy people; ſome tranſient ſucceſſes in the firſt deſultory hoſtilities, were ſoon effaced by a ſeries of ſanguinary chaſtiſements. The new miniſters were deſirous of diſplaying their vigour and activity, freſh reinforcements were continually poured into the iſland; and the inmoſt receſſes of that mountainous country were penetrated by the perſeverance, and overwhelmed by the numbers of the victors: thoſe who had appeared moſt forward in oppoſing the government of France, atoned for their imprudence by the loſs of their lives; and great part of their followers, who had been excited to arms by their raſh ſuggeſtions, were tranſported to the Weſt India iſlands, and condemned to perpetual ſlavery.

In the final reduction of Corſica, France had ſeized the moment of favourable enterpriſe; and her ancient and formidable rival, England, was diverted from attending to her conduct, by her own momentous and immediate concerns. The laſt war, which had ſo deeply wounded the glory and power of the houſe of Bourbon, had eſtabliſhed the dominion of the Engliſh over North America; but with an extent of territory, that people ſeem not to have poſſeſſed, or to have cultivated the affections of their coloniſts. The idea of impoſing various taxes on the Americans had been alternately adopted and abandoned; it was now finally determined to be enforced, and the miniſters of great Britain proclaimed their reſolution of drawing a ſettled revenue from their valuable dependencies acroſs the Atlantic. A ſmall duty was laid upon tea; but even this, trifling as it ammounted to, was ſpurned at by the Americans: aſſociations were formed, and ſubſcriptions cheerfully entered into; and on the arrival of the ſhips that were freighted with the obnoxious commodity, ſeveral of them were boarded by parties of men diſguiſed as Mohawk Indians, who, without committing any other act of violence, inſtantly threw the tea overboard; the captains of the other ſhips, alarmed for the intereſt of their owners, thought it moſt prudent to avoid riſking a ſimilar loſs, and ſteered back their courſe to England.

Theſe tumultuous proceedings in America were heard with reſentment by the miniſters of Great Britain; and it was determined ſeverely to chaſtiſe the town and port of Boſton, which had been diſtinguiſhed as the ſcene of outrage. The Britiſh parliament condemned the town of Boſton to pay for the tea thus deſtroyed; and as a further puniſhment, they reſolved to deprive it of the privilege of a port, until the ſovereign ſhould be ſatisfied of the diſpoſition of the inhabitants to carry on trade quietly, obey the laws, and ſubmit to the duties impoſed; until that ſhould appear, the cuſtom houſe of Boſton, and conſequently the commerce, was to be removed to Salem, a port about ſeventeen miles diſtant.

This act of regulation was ſucceeded by another for the better government of Maſſachuſetts-Bay, the province in which Boſton is ſituated. The bill for that purpoſe, altered entirely the form of conſtitution throughout the province; it took the whole executive power out of the hands of the people, and veſted the nomination of judges, counſellors, and magiſtrates of all kinds, in the crown, and in ſome caſes in the king's governor; and to give weight to theſe innovations, general Gage, an officer who had long ſerved in America with reputation, was ſent out as governor of the province with a conſiderable military force.

But the Americans received with indignation, inſtead of ſubmiſſion, the bill that had been framed for their coercion; at Boſton they reſolved to diſcontinue the uſe of all goods imported from the Eaſt-Indies and Great Britain, until their grievances ſhould be fully redreſſed; and they ſtrongly recommended every poſſible encouragement to be given to the manufactures of their own country. The other provinces of the continent, whoſe jealouſy of the ſuperior trade of Boſton, it was ſuppoſed, would have allured them to a concurrence in meaſures calculated for its depreſſion, diſplayed a ſimilar ſpirit of reſiſtance: A general alarm was ſpread from one end of North America to the other; meetings were held in every town; and theſe numerous aſſemblies all agreed in expreſſing their dread, that their grants and charters, with all their rights and civil immunities, might be extinguiſhed by the breath of parliament. Even Salem, the town to which the government and trade of Boſton was to have been transferred, diſdained to profit by the ſpoils of her oppreſſed brethren, and joined in the general reprobation of the injuſtice of Great-Britain.

The new judges who had been appointed by the mother-country were every where rendered incapable of proceeding in their office; upon opening the courts the juries throughout the province refuſed to be ſworn, and rejected any other eſtabliſhment than what had been warranted by the ancient laws and uſages of their country; an end was put to all forms of law and government, and the province of Maſſachuſetts Bay was relinquiſhed to the ſame independent anarchy as had exiſted in the earlieſt ages. At length the twelve colonies that ſtretch from Nova-Scotia to Georgia, and are diſtinguiſhed by the names of New-Hampſhire, Maſſachuſetts Bay, Rhode-Iſland, Providence, Connecticut, New-York, New-

Jerſey, Pennſylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, and South-Carolina, animated by one ſpirit, nominated deputies to repreſent them in a general congreſs. This was held at Philadelphia, the capital of Pennſylvania; and their firſt reſolution was an approbation of the conduct of Maſſachuſetts-Bay, and a determination that if force ſhould be employed to carry the acts againſt that province into execution, all America ſhould join in the defence of it. They unanimouſly concurred in diſcouraging all goods imported from Great-Britain, and they ſtrongly exhorted the inhabitants to countenance their own manufactures: to this was ſubjoined an energetic addreſs to the French inhabitants of Canada, inviting them to join the ſtandard of freedom, and to render complete the confederacy of the continent of North America.

While the diſcontents of the colonies of Great-Britain aſſumed the form of ſerious reſiſtance, the empreſs of Ruſſia was employed in terminating a long and ſucceſsful war which ſhe had maintained againſt the Ottoman Porte. The haughty ſpirits of the Moſlems had been broken by repeated defeats; their camp preſented a diſguſting ſcene of mingled terror and mutiny; and the Divan at length condeſcended to ſubſcribe a treaty which exalted the glory of one empire as much as it debaſed the other. The independency of the Crimea was eſtabliſhed; the diſtricts of Kilburn, Kerche, and Jenickala, with the extenſive country between the Bog and the Dniper, were ceded to Ruſſia; and a free navigation was granted to the Ruſſians in all the Turkiſh ſeas, in which was included the paſſage of the Dardanelles, with all the privileges and immunities which had been allowed to the moſt favoured nations. With equal ſucceſs Catharine at the ſame time extinguiſhed a rebellion which had been excited in the ancient kingdoms of Caſan and Aſtracan; the impoſtor, who had aſſumed the name and title of Peter the Third, was taken, and ſuffered the juſt puniſhment of his preſumption; a few examples in the places moſt remarkable for their diſaffection were neceſſarily made: but the clemency of the empreſs ſoon after extended a general pardon to the obſcure and miſguided multitude.

The death of pope Ganganelli, who had filled the apoſtolical chair with prudence and moderation, was an event generally regretted by the countries which yet acknowledged the dominion of the holy ſee. His pontificate had been rendered memorable by the abolition of the ſociety of Jeſus; and a vague and idle rumour pervaded Europe, that he had fallen a ſacrifice to the effects of poiſon, and to the reſentment of that order. The falſehood of this charge was proved by the united teſtimony of the different miniſters of the houſe of Bourbon: theſe were preſent at the opening of the body; and the phyſicians and ſurgeons who aſſiſted at the operation, pronounced his deceaſe to be the conſequence of a gradual and natural decay. Though the authority of the ſucceſſors of St. Peter hath long been diſregarded by the enlightened ages of Europe, yet the vacant dignity was warmly conteſted: and it was not till the enſuing year that the votes of the conclave fixed the tiara on the head of John Angelo Braſchi, a native of Ravenna in the Romagna, and who aſſumed the name of Pius the Sixth.

A. D. 1775.] Though Lewis could not behold without ſecret ſatisfaction the diſturbances in America, which menaced the grandeur of Great-Britain, yet the tranquillity and happineſs of his own kingdom were far from being eſtabliſhed; the wounds which had been inflicted by the ſupine profuſion of the late monarch, ſtill required time to heal; and the elevation of monſieur Turgot to the chief direction of the finances, afforded no ſmall ſhare of diſcontent to the powerful body of the farmers-general. That miniſter, endued with integrity and ability, had delivered the commerce of grain from many injudicious reſtrictions, both with regard to the internal traffic and to foreign exportation; but the ſcarcity of corn happened to coincide with the moment of his regulations, and thoſe effects which aroſe from dearth, were aſcribed to the innovations he had ſuggeſted. His ſecret enemies induſtriouſly circulated rumours, that the public diſtreſs was the conſequence of certain political combinations; and the people, whoſe real miſery was augmented by an idea of the incapacity and injuſtice of their rulers, tumultuouſly aſſembled in large and formidable bodies. They inſulted the magiſtrates, plundered the houſes, and in the commiſſion of theſe outrages not only deſtroyed vaſt quantities of corn and flour, which might have alleviated their wants, but increaſed the general diſtreſs by deterring the proprietors of proviſions from bringing them to market. A diſtemper which had extended its fatal ravages amongſt the cattle through the heart of the kingdom, added to the public gloom, and at Dijon, the Capital of Burgundy, the inſurrection of the populace was attended with the moſt fatal conſequences. The unhappy people, ſtimulated by want, and inflamed to madneſs, had pillaged the houſe of the intendant, who with difficulty eſcaped from their fury. To check their progreſs, it was neceſſary to ſummons to the ſupport of government a body of regular troops: yet the hungry inſurgents for ſome time maintained their ground againſt the diſciplined valour of their adverſaries; and it was not till near five hundred of theſe miſerable wretches had fallen, that they relinquiſhed the ineffectual conflict.

The capital itſelf was not exempt from ſimilar diſtreſs and diſorders; and Lewis, after having in vain endeavoured to ſooth the turbulent miſery of the people by the mildeſt remonſtrances, now prepared to repreſs their outrages by the moſt deciſive meaſures. He ordered the parliament of Paris to attend him at Verſailles; and after repreſenting to them the immediate exigency which compelled him to deviate from the uſual courſe of juſtice, he expreſsly forbade them from making any repreſentations on the ſteps that he was determined to purſue: that auguſt body ſeemed indeed ſenſible of the neceſſity of adopting ſome quick and vigorous ſyſtem, and ſilently acquieſced under the mandate of their ſovereign.

The king having thus fortified the royal authority by the ſilent approbation of his parliament, commiſſioned the Marechauſſee, a military body dependant on the police, to diſperſe the ſeditious multitude, and to execute ſummary juſtice on the moſt guilty. At the ſame time a pardon was held out to thoſe who ſhould retire home, and make reſtitution for the corn they had taken away. The good effects of theſe regulations were ſoon diſcernible; numbers endeavoured to efface their miſconduct by reimburſing the perſons whom they had plundered; a few atoned for their crimes under the hands of the executioner; and a plentiful harveſt, which enſued, baniſhed the diſtreſs of the people, and confirmed the tranquillity of France.

To divert the minds of his ſubjects from the late gloomy ſcenes of miſery, the king reſolved to celebrate his coronation with royal magnificence at Rheims. The liberality of the clergy opportunely ſupplied a gift of twenty millions of livres; and the ancient dignities of the kingdom were revived on this occaſion. The count de Provençe repreſented the duke of Burgundy the count d'Artois; the duke of Normandy; the duke of Orleans, the duke of Aquitain the duke of Chartres, the count of Thouloufe the prince of Condé, the count of Flanders, and the duke of Bourbon, the count of Champagne.

The marriage of the princeſs Clotilda, ſiſter to the king of France, to the prince of Piedmont, eldeſt ſon of the king of Sardinia, was an event but little intereſting in modern politics. The courts of Paris and Turin had long been joined in the cloſeſt connection; and the futility of theſe alliances, unleſs the mutual advantage of both parties cemented their ſubſequent union, had been too often experienced to occaſion any alarm to the other powers of Europe.

The humanity of Lewis was conſpicuouſly diſplayed in an edict which he cauſed to be regiſtered in parliament, and which in future ſentenced the deſerters from his army to work as ſlaves on the public roads, inſtead of puniſhing them as formerly with death; and with equal attention to the general welfare of his ſubjects, he ſeized the moment of peace to reduce part of his numerous forces, and to fulfil thoſe promiſes of œconomy which on his acceſſion he had given to his people. The death of the mareſchal de Muy, who filled the poſt of ſecretary at war, was ſucceeded by the appointment of the count de St. Germain to the vacant department: that nobleman, during the laſt war, had enjoyed a high command in Germany; and the prince and his ſubjects were alike impreſſed with the moſt favourable opinion of his genius and application.

While one royal branch of the houſe of Bourbon thus emerged from the clouds that had obſcured its glory, the other ſtill more eminently diſplayed the weakneſs of its government, and the deficiency of its judgment. Charles the Third, king of Spain, was rouſed from his peaceful ſlumber by the hoſtile inſults of a barbarian, who ruled over part of Africa, and who ſtiled himſelf emperor of Morocco. This Mooriſh prince, without any pretence of injury, in a letter to the king of Spain, declared himſelf enjoined by the laws of the Alcoran to expel the Chriſtians from the forts they held on the African coaſt; at the ſame time that he profeſſed his wiſh in every other reſpect to maintain the peace that he ſubſcribed to with the court of Madrid, and to preſerve inviolate the commercial intercourſe of the two nations.

This ſingular manifeſto of Mahomed Ben Abdalla was anſwered by the court of Madrid by a declaration of war; but before Spain could tranſport her forces to this diſtant ſcene of conteſt, the Mooriſh prince, with a numerous and ill-diſciplined army, had laid ſiege to Melilla, in the kingdom of Fez, on the ſhores of the Mediterranean, and oppoſite to Almeria in Spain. Though that fortreſs was in every reſpect but badly provided, yet the conſtancy and conduct of the governor repelled the deſultory attacks of the aſſailants; and the emperor, after having continued the blockade for ſome months, retired from the inauſpicious walls.

If Spain had been tardy in affording ſuccour to her diſtreſſed ſubjects in Africa, her preparations to avenge the inſult were proportioned to the length of time that had been employed in making them. Twenty-ſix thouſand of the beſt troops of that kingdom, ſupplied with every engine for offenſive or defenſive war, were embarked onfour hundred tranſports. Theſe were eſcorted by ſeven ſhips of ſeventy-four guns, eight of forty, and thirty-two frigates. This formidable armament, which threatened to overwhelm all Africa, after a tedious voyage, caſt anchor in the bay of Algiers; and the count O'Reilly, to whom the command of the land-forces was entruſted, determined immediately to commence hi operations.

While the ſhips diverted the attention of enemy by a feigned attack on the town of Algiers, four thouſand of the Spaniſh infantry were ſucceſsfully landed; but theſe, inſtead of obeying the commands of their general, and patiently awaiting the junction of their companions, ruſhed to the encounter with the Moors, and were received with a degree of firmneſs that was little expected. The conſequence of this preſumption was what might have been eaſily foreſeen; as faſt as freſh troops were landed, they haſtened to the ſupport of their friends already engaged; and the advantages of ſkill and diſcipline were renounced, in a combat which was only diſtinguiſhed by deſparate courage and blind fury. For thirteen hours the ſenſe of national honour. ſupported the Spaniards againſt the torrent of their enemies; at length, after the loſs of near four thouſand of their beſt troops, they were obliged to retire under the ſhelter of the cannon of their ſhips: notwithſtanding the fatigues they had undergone in the courſe of the day, it was deemed prudent to avail themſelves of the night for a ſpeedy embarkation; and an armament that was conſidered ſo ſuperior to the object of its deſtination as to awaken the jealouſy of the European powers, returned to Spain, baffled and defeated by naked and undiſciplined barbarians.

Whatever concern Lewis might feel for the diſgrace of the kindred throne of Spain, was amply compenſated by the difficulties in which he obſerved the ancient and uniform rival of France rapidly involving herſelf. The language of reſiſtance adopted by America had not ſhaken the reſolution of the miniſters of Great-Britain, and the eyes of Europe were impatiently turned on the approaching conteſt. The inhabitants of Rhode-Iſland were no ſooner informed of the prohibition to export military ſtores from Great-Britain, than they ſeized on the ordnance belonging to the crown in that diſtrict, and openly avowed their intention, in this act of violence, was to defend themſelves againſt any power that ſhould preſume to moleſt them. Their example was followed by the people of New-

Hampſhire, who ſurprized a ſmall fort, called William and Mary, and ſupplied themſelves with a quantity of ammunition.

General Gage did not behold with indifference theſe acts of outrage; and on information that ſome braſs cannon were depoſited in the town of Salem, he detached a body of troops, commanded by a field-officer, to ſeize them; but the cannon had already been removed: a ſubſequent detachment of nine hundred men, for a like purpoſe, was directed to penetrate to Lexington; the march of theſe was interrupted by the provincials, who had taken the alarm, and began to aſſemble. They were diſperſed by ſome ſhots fired by the regulars, and a few of the Americans were wounded and killed. The inhabitants of the adjacent country were in a moment ſummoned to the ſupport of their friends; their numbers increaſing rapidly preſſed upon the Britiſh troops, who effected their retreat with conſiderable loſs and difficulty; it is probable indeed the whole detachment muſt have been cut off, had not the prudence of general Gage, apprehenſive of the event, directed a more conſiderable body to haſten to their relief. Strengthened by this reinforcement, they continued their retreat in better order, but harraſſed by a variety of deſultory attacks, and with ſome additional loſs, reached Boſton.

The attempt on Lexington excited the indignation of the whole province; the people immediately flew to arms, and Boſton was inveſted by twenty thouſand men, under the command of colonel Putnam, an officer who had acquired experience and reputation in the two laſt wars. But general Gage in the interval had been joined by the generals Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton, with a conſiderable body of troops from England; and it was determined to drive the Americans from ſome works which they had erected on Bunker's-Hill, an height that commanded the town of Boſton. This ſervice was committed to the generals Howe and Clinton, at the head of two thouſand ſelect ſoldiers; they were received with a firmneſs that might have ſtaggered veteran troops; and it was not until they had half their number killed and wounded, that their perſevering valour triumphed over the obſtinacy of their enemies, and drove the Americans from their entrenchments.

The general Congreſs at Philadelphia had not in the meantime been idle; the province of Georgia had acceded to the confederacy; and the different ſtates now aſſumed the appellation of The Thirteen United Colonies. Mr. Waſhington, a gentleman of fortune in Virginia, and who had fought at the head of ſeveral provincial bodies during the laſt war, was nominated commander in chief of all the American forces; the Congreſs alſo fixed the pay both of officers and ſoldiers, the latter of which were provided for with the utmoſt liberality.

But an expedition which was planned by the Americans againſt Quebec, the capital of Canada, was not attended with that ſucceſs which the authors of it fondly expected: They had ſurprized and ſwept before them all the important fortreſſes that commanded the entrance into that province; but in an attempt by a coup-de-main to poſſeſs themſelves of the town, they were repulſed with cruel ſlaughter. General Montgomery, who commanded the aſſailants, an officer of a reſpectable Iriſh family who had been trained to arms in the Britiſh ſervice, fell on this occaſion, lamented not leſs for his military ſkill and valour than for the more rare domeſtic virtues; colonel Arnold, the ſecond in command, was ſeverely wounded; and the beſiegers, after this check, retired to an awful diſtance, and were content to change the ſiege into a blockade.

While Lewis anxiouſly directed his attention towards America, and watched the gradual progreſs of hoſtility, he was not indifferent to the internal regulation of his own country. The count de St. Germain juſtified the opinion that had been formed of his courage and abilities; and intent only on the advantage of the ſtate, ventured on a reform which menaced him with the reſentment of the moſt noble families of France.

The mouſquetaires, a corps inſtituted for the protection of the royal perſon, were compoſed of young men of the moſt illuſtrious extraction; and though ſuch a guard muſt have been highly flattering to the dignity of the ſovereign, yet the expence attending it was ſeverely felt, and frequently regretted. The ſuppreſſion of it had been repeatedly agitated; but no miniſter had yet been found ſufficiently hardy to encounter the odium with which it was likely to be attended. This inſtance of political fortitude was reſerved for the count de St. Germain; he enforced to Lewis the conſiderable ſavings that might be applied from the reduction of a corps, the offspring of pageantry, to the effective marching battalions; an edict was accordingly publiſhed for the ſuppreſſion of the mouſquetaires; and thoſe brave men, whoſe courage had always been celebrated, received the news of their diſmiſſion with marks of the deepeſt deſpair. Attached to each other by ſimilarity of habits, and cemented in friendſhip by common dangers and ſervice, they regarded the decree that ſeparated them with equal grief, as if had ſentenced their immediate execution. Monſieur de la Chaiſe, a veteran officer of approved reſolution, and one of their commanders, fainted away on receiving the fatal mandate; and all the reſt vented their ſorrow in the loudeſt and moſt poignant exclamations: but the king and his miniſter were inexorable; and the capital was not ſorry to be delivered from a corps, whoſe impetuous and overbearing ſpirit too frequently inſulted the more humble claſs of citizens.

A. D. 1776.] The naval department was inſpected with equal diligence and care: When the adminiſtration of the duke of Choiſeul expired, and his couſin the duke of Praſlin was diſmiſſed from ſuperintending the marine, that nobleman declared, that he left ſixty-four ſhips of the line in the ports of France, beſides thoſe that were on the ſtocks; this force had not been ſuffered to decline in the preſent reign, and the appointment of Monſieur de Sartine to the marine department did honour to the penetration of the ſovereign. That miniſter, fruitful in reſources, and unwearied in his application, was inceſſantly engaged in augmenting the naval ſtrength of his country; and the various preparations that filled the ports and docks, created no ſmall uneaſineſs to the court of London.

One appointment more was ſtill neceſſary to ſtamp the royal mind free from prejudice and open to the impreſſion of merit. Monſieur Turgot, though poſſeſſed of integrity and induſtry had not been able to command the public confidence; On his retreat, Monſieur Clugny, intendant general of Bourdeaux, had been elevated to the vacant poſt; on his death, which happened ſoon after, M. Taboreau des Reaux was appointed his ſucceſſor; and Lewis ſoon after aſſociated with him, in the management of the finances, Monſieur Necker, by birth a Swiſs, and by religion a Proteſtant. That gentleman, in the preceding reign, had been choſen to adjuſt ſome differences between the Eaſt India Company and the crown; and had diſcharged his truſt with ſuch rare diſcretion as to challenge the approbation of both parties. Poſſeſſed of diſtinguiſhed and acknowledged probity, his appointment would have excited no ſurpriſe, had it not been contrary to the conſtant policy of France, which had carefully excluded the aliens of her country and faith from the controul of her revenue. It now ſtood forward as a new inſtance of enlargement of mind and liberality of ſentiment; and will to poſterity mark the prominent features of the reign of Lewis the Sixteenth.

With equal zeal to extend the dominion of ſcience, Lewis fitted out ſeveral veſſels on aſtronomical diſcoveries. The Chevalier de Borda was inſtructed to aſcertain the exact poſition of the Canary Iſlands and Cape de Verds; and the different degrees of the coaſt of Africa from Cape Spartel to the iſland of Goree: the Chevalier Grenier, who had traverſed the Indian ſeas to improve the charts and correct the errors which had miſled former navigators, was liberally rewarded by a monarch who aſpired to immortalize the æra of his power by expeditions beneficial to mankind.

But as often as the eyes of Lewis were recalled, ſo often did they return with increaſe of anxiety to the continent of North-America. The conteſt between Great-Britain and her colonies became each hour more important, and the humanity and intereſt of European powers were deeply concerned in the event. General Gage, as commander in chief, had been ſuperceded by general Howe; and that officer, preſſed and cloſely blockaded by the ſuperior numbers of the Americans, determined to quit the narrow limits of the town of Boſton and to retire to Halifax, until he ſhould be joined by the ſuccours that he expected from England. Though he was permitted to embark his troops without moleſtation, yet the acquiſition of Boſton reflected no ſmall luſtre on the arms of the Americans. Throughout the different provinces, the governors nominated by the king of England, had been almoſt univerſally expelled by the riſing indignation of the inhabitants; each day ſeemed to eſtabliſh more firmly the juriſdiction of the ſtates; their privateers overſpread the ſeas, and captured the rich merchant veſſels of the Engliſh; and Lewis, while he profeſſed to the court of London, a ſtrict neutrality, afforded to the veſſels of America a ſecure refuge in his harbours, where they bartered their ſpoils for arms and ammunition ſo neceſſary for the ſupport of their cauſe.

But Great-Britain, however aſtoniſhed by the unexpected reſiſtance of her colonies, determined not to reſign ſo rich a ſovereignty without a ſtruggle; a force was prepared which it was thought muſt look them into ſubmiſſion, large bodies of German troops were hired from the princes of Heſſe Caſſel and Brunſwick, ſovereigns who ſupply the ſplendour of their courts by the blood of their ſubjects. Theſe were ſtrengthened by conſiderable detachments from the electorate of Hanover, and by a number of Britiſh regiments, and when added to the troops that had been embarked from Boſton, the whole army under general Howe could not be eſtimated at leſs than thirty thouſand men.

Previous to the arrival of theſe reinforcements, general Howe had directed his courſe from the ſterile coaſt of Halifax, and landed his troops on Staten-Iſland, in the vicinity of New-York. He was there ſucceſſively joined by his brother lord Howe, and the armament from Great-Britain. All overtures of accommodation were fruitleſs; the thirteen colonies of America had already declared themſelves free and independent ſtates, and abjured all allegiance to the Britiſh crown; and the ſword alone could terminate the diſpute.

The poſſeſſion of New-York would enable Great-Britain, by its centrical poſition, either to carry on the war in Connecticut on the eaſtern ſide; or, on the weſtern quarter, to penetrate through New-Jerſey to Pennſylvania. To reduce that province was therefore the grand object of general Howe, and the operations that he immediately commenced were attended with the moſt brilliant ſucceſs. Though general Waſhington with a numerous army occupied both Long-Iſland and New-York, yet his ſoldiers were raw and undiſciplined; their officers were ignorant of the art of war, and only inflamed with an enthuſiaſtic love of freedom; and they were aſtoniſhed and confounded by the rapid evolutions and ſuperior ſkill of their adverſaries. The Britiſh forces had firſt landed on Long-Iſland, from which the Americans were chaſed with the loſs of above four thouſand of their beſt troops; thence the victorious army, fluſhed with ſucceſs, paſſed over to New York; while general Waſhington, convinced by fatal experience of the inferiority of his ſoldiers, determined to avoid in future any deciſive action, and to protract the war amidſt the woods and wilds with which the countr: abounds. In purſuance of this plan he abandoned New-York without a blow; retired to the higher grounds, and with no ſmall degree of dexterity conſtantly eluded the purſuit of the victor; while general Howe, after haraſſing his troops in fruitleſs attempts to overtake him, returned to reduce the fortreſſes in the neighbourhood of New-York, and extended his poſts far into the Jerſeys.

The diſtreſs of Quebec had not eſcaped the vigilance of Great-Britain, and an important reinforcement was deſtined to its relief: but before this could arrive, general Carleton, who, as governor of Canada, commanded in that town, ſtrengthened by the marines, and a detachment from ſome ſhips of war that had entered the harbour, had atchieved his own deliverance. The ſmall band of Americans, diſheartened by their former repulſe, and weakened by diſeaſe, was eaſily broken; they retired in diſorder, and the forces of the king of England in Canada, ſwelled by the arrival of the expected regiments to thirteen thouſand men, purſued with vigour the fugitives, and expelled them from that important province.

Hitherto the United States of America had ſuffered a ſeries of heavy and unexpected defeats. One inſtance of ſucceſs alone gleamed through the clouds which obſcured their dawning glory. An attempt had been made on Charleſton, the capital of South-Carolina, by commodore Sir Peter Parker and general Clinton, previous to their joining lord and general Howe. But the fort which commanded the paſſage to Charleſton, was gallantly defended by colonel Moultrie, an American officer; and general Lee, with a conſiderable body of forces, preſerved his communication with the fortreſs, and could at diſcretion augment the garriſon. After a ſevere and furious cannonade for ſeveral hours, the Britiſh commodore withdrew his ſhattered veſſels from the action, and relinquiſhed the hopeleſs enterpriſe.

But in the neighbourhood of New-York, the advantages of general Howe had been rapid and uninterrupted: Fort Waſhington was taken by aſſault; the garriſon of three thouſand men were made priſoners; Sir Peter Parker and general Clinton reduced Rhode-Iſland; and lord Cornwallis, with a ſeparate detatchment, penetrated through the Jerſeys, appeared on the banks of the Delaware, and threatened the ſafety of Philadelphia, the ſeat of the Congreſs.

The loſs which the Americans had ſuſtained by the ſword, by captivity, and by deſertion, though ſevere and diſcouraging, equalled not the embarraſſments that aroſe from the temporary engagements which their ſoldiers had entered into: theſe were moſtly enliſted for a year only; and unaccuſtomed to reſtraint, at the expiration of that term, they panted to return to their families, and few were prevailed upon to continue in the ſervice. Yet amidſt theſe various difficulties, the mind of general Waſhington was a ſtranger to deſpondency; he continued to obſerve with a vigilant eye the motions of his enemies: their poſts, in the moment of triumph and ſecurity, had been extended to the Delaware; and the American commander ſuddenly aſſembling a ſmall but ſelect body of men, ſilently marched to attack colonel Rall, a Heſſian officer, who with fifteen hundred Heſſians occupied Trenton, on the banks of that river. The enterprize was attended with the moſt brilliant ſucceſs; colonel Rall with a few of his ſoldiers were killed, and near a thouſand were made priſoners: the Britiſh general, taught caution by this chaſtiſement, contracted his poſts; and Philadelphia was for the preſent delivered from a dangerous and hoſtile neighbour.

A. D. 1777.] The exultation of France had been openly and conſtantly proportioned to the ſucceſs of the Americans; the princes of the blood and the chief nobility were eager to embark in the ſupport of freedom; and the prudence of the king and his moſt confidential miniſters, alone reſtrained their ardour. The fatal events of the laſt war were ſtill impreſſed on the mind of Lewis; and he could not readily conſent to expoſe his infant marine in a conteſt with a people who had ſo frequently aſſerted the dominion of the ſeas, and ſo lately broken the united ſtrength of the houſe of Bourbon. Yet he was ſenſible that the opportunity of humbling theſe haughty iſlanders ſhould not be entirely neglected, and that ſome advantages ſhould be taken of the preſent commotions in America. Two agents from the United States, Silas Deane and doctor Benjamin Franklin, had ſucceſſively arrived at Paris; and though all audience was denied them in a public capacity, ſtill they were privately encouraged to hope that France only waited the proper opportunity to vindicate in arms the freedom and independence of America. In the mean time the military preparations of that kingdom were diligently continued; the American cruiſers were hoſpitably received into her ports; artillery and all kinds of warlike ſtores were freely ſold or liberally granted to the diſtreſs of the coloniſts; French officers and engineers, with the connivance of government, entered into their ſervice; and the marquis de la Fayette, a young nobleman of affluent fortune, and nearly allied to the illuſtrious houſe of Noailles, under pretence of viſiting ſome relations in Italy, hired a frigate; and impatient to join the ſtandard of Liberty, ſteered towards America: he was received with open arms by the United States, and ſoon after promoted to a principal command.

At this critical juncture, the death of Joſeph the Firſt, king of Portugal, was not a matter of indifference to the houſe of Bourbon. Attached by gratitude and long and intimate connections to the Engliſh, he had a ſhort time previous to his deceaſe entered into a diſpute with the court of Madrid reſpecting the limits of their different ſettlements in South-America. The influence of the king of France had prevented the deſultory hoſtilities that were commenced in that quarter of the globe from communicating to Europe; yet every appearance proclaimed a diſpoſition jealous and inimical; and it is probable that the opportune death of the king, only, deterred Portugal from engaging in an open war with Spain. His eldeſt daughter, the princeſs of Brazil, ſucceeded to the vacant throne: in compliance with the cuſtom of the court of Liſbon, ſhe had already received in marriage the hand of her own uncle, the brother of her father: and her ſon, the prince of Beira, the preſumptive heir of the crown, had united himſelf to the younger ſiſter of his mother. The new ſovereign immediately applied herſelf to terminate the differences which had originated in the former reign; a perfect good underſtanding was ſoon eſtabliſhed between the two courts; the iſland of St. Catherines, on the coaſt of Brazil, which had already been reduced by Spain, was inſtantly reſtored; the limits of the ſettlements in South-America were amicably aſcertained; and the moſt explicit treaty of peace, union, and friendſhip, was finally ratified between the two crowns; nor could France be totally unconcerned in a negociation which thus converted the ancient foe to the firm ally of the houſe of Bourbon.

The viſit of the emperor of Germany to the court of Paris was another occurrence that excited the attention of Europe. Averſe to pomp he choſe to travel under the humble title of count Falkenſtein; he was received by Lewis with that reſpect which was due to the imperial dignity, and the regard that he was impatient to teſtify to the brother of his royal conſort. During ſix weeks that the emperor remained at Paris, his hours were inceſſantly devoted to the examination of the various eſtabliſhments of that capital, and in viewing the manufactures; with the ſame ſpirit of enquiry he made a tour through the different provinces of France, and in his journey endeavoured to glean whatever might be advantageous to his own dominions.

His example was in ſome meaſure imitated by the brothers of Lewis, the counts de Provençe and d'Artois: theſe alſo reſolved to viſit the diſtant diſtricts of France; their liberality and amiable manners commanded, in their progreſs, the eſteem of all ranks of people; they were every where received with unbounded acclamations; and the French, taught to be enthuſiaſtic admirers of their king endeavoured to diſplay their loyalty by the marks of regard which they paid to theſe princes of the blood.

Some changes were about this time introduced into the different departments of ſtate; the conduct of Monſieur Necker in the finances had been attended with univerſal approbation; Monſieur Taboureau des Reaux, his colleague, had reſigned his ſituation, but ſtill retained the dignity of counſellor of ſtate. To afford full ſcope to the genius of Monſieur Necker, Lewis determined no longer to clog him with an aſſociate; but with the title of director-general of the finances, ſubmitted to him the entire management of the funds and revenue of France.

The ſpirited meaſures of the count de St. Germain in ſuppreſſing the Moſquetaires have already been remarked. Whether the conſequences were ſuch as every miniſter had dreaded, and the reſentment of the noble families of France had oppreſſed the ſecretary of war; or that ſtateſman was found, as has been hinted, too intractable in the cabinet, and too partial to his own ſyſtem, has never yet tranſpired; his official ſtation for ſome time, however, had been extremely uneaſy, and he now determined to reſign; his death, in the enſuing year, prevented that recall which probably would have taken place; and the prince de Montbarey, who had already filled an inferior ſituation in that department, was now appointed ſecretary at war.

Lewis was not leſs attentive to his negociations with foreign courts, than he was deſirous of providing the ſtate with able and induſtrious miniſters. He concluded a new treaty of alliance with Switzerland; vigilantly obſerved the motions of the different princes of Germany on the death of the elector of Bavaria; and when cloſely queſtioned by the Engliſh ambaſſador, lord Stormont, reſpecting the various warlike preparations which were diligently continued through the kingdom, he replied, That at a time when the ſeas were covered with Engliſh fleets and American cruizers, and when ſuch armies were ſent to the New World as had never before appeared there, it became prudent for him alſo to arm for the ſecurity of the colonies, and the protection of the commerce, of France.

The king was not ignorant at the ſame time, that the remonſtrances of Great-Britain, and the importunities of the agents of the United States, would ſoon compel him to adopt ſome deciſive line of conduct. Though general Howe, after the defeat of colonel Rall, had continued in force at New-York, yet he had abandoned his former deſign of penetrating through the Jerſeys to Philadelphia. With the return of ſpring he determined to proceed againſt that city by ſea, and avail himſelf of the ſuperiority of his naval force. He embarked eighteen thouſand men; and after a tedious voyage entered Cheſapeak-Bay; ſailed up the river Elk, as far as it was capable of admitting his tranſports; and landed his troops in the higheſt health and condition.

General Waſhington had not been deceived by the preparatory movements of his military rival, but had early penetrated into his deſigns, and with an army of fifteen thouſand men, had marched to the defence of Philadelphia, and advanced to Brandywine-Creek, which, croſſing the country at ſome diſtance from that city, falls into the Delaware. As the Britiſh army moved forwards from the head of the Elk, a variety of ſkirmiſhes took place; and on general Howe paſſing the Brandywine, the American commander relinquiſhed his uſual caution, and hazarded a more deciſive action. On this occaſion, the marquis de la Fayette charged among the foremoſt; and, though wounded, continued to animate the corps that he commanded by his example: but the Americans were at length compelled to yield to the ſuperior ſkill and diſcipline of their enemies; night ſaved their army from a total defeat; and general Waſhington retiring to Cheſter, purſued next day his march to Philadelphia.

Towards that city the Britiſh forces rapidly advanced; and the Americans judged it prudent to abandon without a battle the capital of Pennſylvania, and the ſeat of Congreſs. It was immediately occupied by the Engliſh; but the major part of their army was quartered at Germantown, a conſiderable village, about ſeven miles diſtant from Philadelphia. The Congreſs, on quitting Philadelphia, transferred the ſeat of empire to York-Town; and general Waſhington encamped at Skippach-Creek, about ſixteen miles from Germantown.

Amidſt theſe various diſaſters one conſolation remained to ſupport the confidence of the United States. In Great-Britain it had been repreſented that the majority of the Americans were ſtill attached to the mother-country, and averſe to the new government; but though general Howe had traverſed a vaſt extent of country, though he had poſſeſſed himſelf of the rich and populous cities of New-York and Philadelphia, yet the active adherents of the Crown were found to be inconſiderable, both in property and numbers; while general Waſhington, after the defeat of Brandywine, had been largely reinforced by the zeal of his party, and now meditated the ſurpriſe of the royal army in its camp at Germantown.

This enterpriſe, though planned and executed with a degree of ability and vigour that reflected honour on the character of the general, was yet unſucceſsful. The Americans indeed penetrated into the middle of Germantown; but by that time the main body of the Engliſh army had taken the alarm, and the raw troops of the States were obliged to give way before the veteran valour of their enemies. The inclemency of the ſeaſon ſoon after ſuſpended their mutual animoſity; the Britiſh forces were quartered in Philadelphia. and the villages adjacent, and general Waſhington with the army of the States, occupied a ſtrong camp on the banks of the Schuylkill, about ſixteen miles from that city.

If in the ſouth of America the events of the campaign furniſhed matter of triumph to Great-Britain, the United States received ample compenſation by an an advantage on the nothern ſide, as deciſive as it was unexpected. After the expulſion of the Americans from Canada, the miniſters of England were determined to purſue their advantages in that quarter; an army of near eight thouſand men was diligently collected, and entruſted to general Burgoyne, an officer who had acquired ſome reputation in the laſt war in Portugal: The chief object of his deſtination was to penetrate from Canada through Albany, to New-York: and ſcattering terror as he paſt, at length to effect a junction with general Howe. His ſucceſs at firſt was rapid and uninterrupted; the Americans, ſeized with panic abandoned Ticonderoga, a ſtrong fort between Lake-George and Lake-Champlain, and retired precipitately towards Fort-Edward, upon the Hudſon river.

Towards the banks of that river the Britiſh army alſo directed its march; but whether the general himſelf was too dilatory in his motions, or the roads oppoſed inſuperable obſtacles to troops incumbered with heavy baggage and a vaſt train of artillery, certain it is that their progreſs was ſlow and laborious; and the interval was aſſiduouſly employed by the United States in reſtoring the courage of their adherents, and ſummoning their ſcattered forces to their defence. General Arnold, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the attack of Quebec, advanced from Connecticut with a conſiderable corps, and ſeveral pieces of cannon; and general Gates, who had been trained to arms in the Britiſh ſervice, but who had joined the ſtandard of the Americans, ſoon collected a formidable army, to the command of which he was nominated by the Congreſs.

General Burgoyne had no ſooner prepared to paſs Hudſon's River, than he was fatally convinced of the number and ſtrength of his adverſaries. A detachment of near nine hundred men, which had marched into the country to procure a ſupply of cattle, was almoſt totally cut off; and a ſecond, that had been directed to ſupport them, effected their retreat with conſiderable loſs. Yet theſe inauſpicious events did not deter that commander from paſſing the North-River near Saratoga; and probably the ſtrict tenor of his orders allowed him not to decline a meaſure pregnant with every ſpecies of calamity. The Americans, under general Gates, were encamped at a ſmall diſtance, at a place called Still-Water; and no ſooner did they perceive the approach of the Britiſh forces, than they quitted their lines and preſſed forward to engage them; the action was long maintained with mutual rage and obſtinacy; at length the troops of the States gave way; but the darkneſs of the night covered their retreat; the victors obtained at an irreparable loſs only the empty honours of the field; while the vanquiſhed, confiding in their numbers, prepared to renew the conflict.

In two ſucceſſive actions the hoſtile armies again encountred each other with ſimilar courage but with different ſucceſs; and the Britiſh troops in their turn were broken and overwhelmed by the ſuperior numbers of their enemies. Though they recovered their camp, and ſtill maintained ſome appearance of reſiſtance, their ſituation was deſparate: Reduced to half their original number, worn out with toil, and diſtant from all hopes of ſuccour, their general conſented to open a negociation; and an army that had threatened to carry deſtruction through the continent of America, was compelled to pile their arms before a general of the United States; who, in the name of Congreſs, ſubſcribed a treaty by which the vanquiſhed troops were to be tranſported to England on condition that they ſhould not ſerve again in America during the courſe of the war.

A. D. 1778.] The ſucceſs of the Americans in the laſt campaign was received at Paris with unbounded exultation; monſieur Sartine, who preſided over the marine department, was impatient to meaſure the naval ſtrength of France with that of Great-Britain; the queen, who had long ſeconded the applications of the agents of the United States, now eſpouſed their cauſe with leſs reſerve and with encreaſed ardour; the phlegmatic temper and the pacific diſpoſition of Lewis were overborne by the reiterated zeal, imperceptible but weighty, of the numerous body of philoſophers which pervaded every rank of life—by the ſuggeſtions of his miniſters, and the influence of his royal conſort; and it was at length determined openly to acknowledge the independence of the United States of America.

The ſituation of Europe at this juncture was peculiarly favourable to the determination of the king of France, and the ambitious views of his council. Some differences between the court of Peterſburg and the Ottoman Porte, reſpecting the Crimea, threatened a revival of theſe hoſtilities which had been ſo lately adjuſted; and had the empreſs of Ruſſia been willing, muſt have precluded her from affording any aſſiſtance to the Engliſh. The flames of war had been rekindled between the houſes of Auſtria and Brandenburg; and the claims of the former to ſome part of the ſucceſſion of the electorate of Bavaria, had ſummoned the rival monarchs to the field. Spain, by the family-compact, was bound to accede to the deſigns, and to ſtrengthen the arms of France: Portugal, by her late treaty with Spain, had formed an intimate union with the houſe of Bourbon; and if her weakneſs prevented her from joining the hoſtile confederacy of that family, her neutrality was at leaſt ſecured; while Holland purſuing thoſe pacific maxims which the policy of commerce dictates, avoided every overture which appeared likely to involve her in the war which now extended to the principal powers of Europe, and transferred to her peaceful ports all the advantages of trade and neutrality.

Such was the state of the most considerable European powers, whose dangerous enmity might have controlled the designs of the court of Versailles; and Lewis, satisfied that he had nothing to apprehend from their interference, now turned his whole attention to the approaching contest with the ancient rival of his kingdom. For a considerable time his internal regulations had proclaimed a degree of wisdom and liberality, rarely to be found in a crown that had been long characterised by blind superstition and jealous despotism. The transcendant genius of Turgot had for a short term presided over the policy of France; but although the combined resistance of superstition and Gothic institutions was opposed to the bold and comprehensive measures of this philosophical statesman, and prevailed so far as to remove him from the helm which he had directed with the most beneficient effects but without a sparkle of ostentation, the spirit of the minister triumphed after he had retired into private life, and his plans which remained on record became the guides, as his friendships greatly influenced the measures pursued by Lewis, in the internal concerns of his own and the future destinies of other nations. The elevation of a Protestant to the direction of the finances, was one of the most signal effects of this great change, a new spirit seemed to breathe throughout the cabinet; and a royal ordinance was issued, that suppressed several of those numerous holidays so injurious to the industry of the people and the resources of the state.

The councils of Lewis had been long suspended on the manner of procedure proper to be adopted with regard to America; the constant declarations of the British ministry appeared to be corroborated by the numbers of the colonists which joined the royal army, and the vigorous cruelty of their enterprizes; a much more numerous body was known to have adopted a passive but suspicious neutrality; and the progressive steps by which the colonists had arrived from resistance to oppression at a complete declaration of national independence, accompanied in every stage by the most liberal and manly offers of accommodation from the Amercans, and the most blind and confident rejection of every measure short of implicit submission, tended to enforce an opinion which appears not to have been confined to the cabinet of Versailles, that the great body of the Americans were not earnestly disposed to an irrevocable separation from Great-Britain. The quarrel became every day more serious, and the private activity united with sagicity of the principal agent of th United States removed every impression which retarded the decisive and effectual measures of France.

Doctor Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane, who had hitherto acted as private agents, were now acknowledged as public ambassadors from the United States to the court of Versailles; and a treaty of amity and commerce was signed between the two powers in the month of February. The principal articles of it, after ſtipulating the mutual advantages of trade and the liberty and ſovereignty of the United States, formed a confederacy againſt Great Britain, or any other power that ſhould preſume to interrupt their commercial intercourſe: they provided alſo againſt either of the contracting powers, ſhould war break out between France and Great-Britain during the continuance of the preſent rupture between the United States and England, concluding any truce or peace without the formal conſent of the other firſt obtained; and they finiſhed with an invitation to any other powers that might have received injuries from England, to make a common cauſe with them, and to accede to the preſent alliance.

The duke of Noailles, ambaſſador to the court of London, was in the month of March inſtructed to acquaint the miniſters of Great-Britain, that his ſoverign had formally acknowledged the independence of, and ſigned a treaty of commerce with the United States of America; at the ſame time he declared, that the contracting parties had paid great attention not to ſtipulate any excluſive advantages in favour of France; and that the United States had reſerved the liberty of treating with every nation whatever on the ſame footing of equality and reciprocity: but this ſtipulation was affected to be treated by the Engliſh with contempt; and the recall of lord Stormont their ambaſſador at Verſailles, was the ſignal for the commencement of hoſtilities.

But Lewis had already prepared for this event; and in the month of April the count d'Eſtaign, who, during the courſe of the laſt war, had in the Eaſt-Indies maintained the glory of his country, ſailed from Toulon, with twelve ſhips of the line, and four frigates. On board this fleet were embarked eight hundred ſelect ſoldiers; and Silas Deane, who had been deputed by Congreſs to the court of Verſailles, and Conrad Alexander Gerard, ſecretary to the council of ſtate, and appointed miniſter plenipotentiary to the United States of America, accompanied the count on board the Languedoc.

While this armament directed its courſe to the coaſt of America, a more conſiderable fleet was aſſembled at Breſt, to vindicate the ſeas from the enterpriſes of the Engliſh, who had intercepted the trade, and captured the Licorne, a frigate belonging to France. This fleet conſiſted of thirty-two ſhips of the line; the command was entruſted to the count d'Orvilliers; the van was led by the count de Chafault, and the rear was animated by the preſence of the duke of Chartres, by the death of his father now duke of Orleans. Off Uſhant the count d'Orvilliers diſcerned and engaged the Engliſh fleet, equal in force, and commanded by admiral Keppel. The event of the action was indeciſive; the French on the approach of night, withdrew to their own coaſts; and the Engliſh, ſoon after, retired within their harbours to refit.

But though in this engagement France had acquired no advantage, and by firſt retreating ſeemed to yield the glory of the day to her rival, yet it afforded no inconſiderable triumph to that nation, that ſhe had been able to face without loſs her powerful adverſary on an element that had ſo frequently proved fatal to her.

In a letter written by his own hand, the king beſtowed the moſt liberal commendations on the count d'Orvilliers; he condoled with the count de Chafault, who had been wounded in the action; and added, that proper care ſhould be taken of the widows of thoſe who had fallen in ſupporting the honour of his flag. The fleet was once more refitted with all poſſible expedition; the duke of Chartres was raiſed to the command which before had been occupied by the count de Chafault; and count de Guichen ſucceeded to the duke of Chartres; after a cruize uninterrupted by the ſight of an enemy, it re-entered the harbour of Breſt.

In the mean time the count d'Eſtaign purſued his courſe to America; and though his voyage was tedious, yet he arrived in the middle of July in ſight of the Britiſh fleet at Sandy-Hook. Since the laſt campaign, the face of affairs in America had undergone a conſiderable change; general Howe had been recalled by the miniſters of Great-Britain, and the chief command devolved on general Clinton; that officer had deemed it prudent to evacuate Philadelphia; and general Waſhington, during his retreat towards New-York, had preſſed cloſe upon his footſteps, and even engaged him with ſome advantage; but the perſevering valour of the Britiſh troops, and the diſobedience of general Lee, an officer of high rank in the ſervice of the States, as it was alledged, fruſtrated the hopes of Waſhington; and general Clinton, after a long and toilſome march, reached Navefink, in the neighbourhood of Sandy-Hook; and by the fleet, ſtill commanded by lord Howe, was conveyed to New-York.

Count d'Eſtaign had reaſon deeply to regret the unfavourable winds which had prevented him from more ſpeedily reaching the place of his deſtination; had he arrived a few days ſooner, it is more than probable he would have intercepted the Britiſh tranſports on their paſſage from the Delaware, eſcorted only by two ſhips of the line and ſome frigates; theſe muſt have fallen an eaſy prey to his ſuperior force. From the coaſt of Virginia he now ſteered his courſe to New-York, in expectation of overwhelming lord Howe in the unequal conteſt: but that admiral, whoſe ſquadron was compoſed of only ſix ſhips of ſixty-four guns, three of fifty, with ſome frigates and ſloops, was already in poſſeſſion of the harbour that is formed by Sandy-Hook: and the French commander deemed it expedient not to hazard his own large ſhips in the paſſage of the bar.

He, therefore, immediately ſteered towards Rhode-Iſland, the invaſion of which he had planned in concert with the United States. While the French fleet occupied Newport harbour, and the ſeveral inlets to that iſland, general Sullivan, an American officer, landed on the North-point with a conſiderable army: they had ſcarce commenced their joint operations before lord Howe, reinforced by ſeveral ſhips from England, appeared in ſight; and count d'Eſtaign, unwilling to be braved by an enemy ſtill inferior to him in ſtrength, quitted his ſituation in ſearch of naval laurels. The two fleets conteſted during the firſt day, for the weather-gage with rival ſkill; but on the ſecond, when every thing indicated an immediate action, a violent tempeſt aroſe, which ſcattered both. It was not till ſeveral days after that the French admiral was able to collect his ſhattered veſſels; and after tranſiently viſiting Rhode-Iſland, he ſailed for Boſton to repair the damages that he had ſuſtained.

General Sullivan, deprived of the aſſiſtance of his ally, ſoon after abandoned the attempt on Rhode-Iſland; and the reader, perhaps, will not be ſorry for a moment to withdraw from hoſtile fleets and armies, and attend the different negociations which were carried on during their operations. Monſieur Gerard, the plenipotentiary from France, had been received by the Congreſs with every mark of reſpect and regard: but a ſhort time previous to the appearance of that miniſter, commiſſioners from Great-Britain had arrived, impowered to treat with the Congreſs, and effect a reconciliation between the colonies and the mother-country. Theſe commiſſioners were the earl of Carliſle, Mr. Eden, and governor Johnſtone, with whom was joined the commander in chief, ſir Henry Clinton. They propoſed to conſent to an immediate ceſſation of hoſtilities by ſea and land; to extend every freedom to trade that the reſpective intereſts on both ſides ſhould require; to agree that no military force ſhould be kept up in the different States of North-America without the conſent of the general Congreſs, or of the particular aſſemblies; to concur in meaſures calculated to diſcharge the debts of America, and to raiſe the credit and value of the paper circulation; to perpetuate the common union by a reciprocal deputation of an agent or agents from the different ſtates, who ſhould have the privilege of a ſeat and voice in the parliament of Great-Britain; and in ſhort, to eſtabliſh the power of the reſpective legiſlatures in each particular ſtate, to ſettle its revenue, its civil and military eſtabliſhments, and to give to the ſtates of North-America, acting with Great-Britain under one common ſovereign, the irrevocable enjoyment of every privilege that was ſhort of a total ſeparation of intereſt, or conſiſtent with that union of force on which their common ſafety depended.

Though the Congreſs had been informed ſome days before of the favourable diſpoſition of the court of Verſailles, and had even received copies of the two treaties of alliance and commerce which had been concluded between France and the United States, yet the terms now offered by Great-Britain were the object of ſerious deliberation; Mr. Laurens, the preſident of that aſſembly had, with the approbation of it, refuſed indeed a paſſport to the ſecretary of the commiſſioners; but the papers with which he had been charged, were received through a different channel, and the debates on them were reſumed during ſix ſucceſſive days; if the Congreſs, however, were dilatory, they were deciſive in their anſwer. They obſerved, that the commiſſion ſuppoſed the people of thoſe ſtates to be ſubjects of Great-Britain, an idea that was totally inadmiſſable: they added, that they were ſtill inclined to peace, notwithſtanding the injuries they had ſuffered during the courſe of the war; that they were ready to enter into a treaty of commerce, not inconſiſtent with treaties already ſubſiſting, when the king of Great-Britain ſhould demonſtrate a ſincere diſpoſition for that purpoſe; but the only ſolid proof of that diſpoſition would be an explicit acknowledgement of the independence of thoſe ſtates, and the withdrawing of his fleets and armies.

This peremptory language precluded all further hopes of negociation, and the diſappointment of the commiſſioners was rendered ſtill more mortifying by the reception that was immediately after given to Monſieur Gerard: but their publications afforded the marquis de la Fayette another opportunity of diſplaying his vivacity; ſome expreſſions he conceived had fallen from the pens of the commiſſioners injurious to the honour of his country, and he challenged the earl of Carliſle, as chief of the commiſſion, to anſwer for theſe reflections. That noble lord, however, conſidered the propoſal as reſulting from the fire of youth; and declined to grant, in a national concern, that ſatisfaction which has ever been confined to perſonal differences.

If the fortitude of Congreſs in their late reſolutions excited the admiration of Europe, the good faith of that aſſembly, in a previous tranſaction, had not been leſs ſeverely arraigned. The army of general Burgoyne had capitulated, on the expreſs condition that it ſhould be allowed to return to England, but not to bear arms in America during the preſent war. This ſtipulation had been long artfully eluded; it was now openly violated; and when the tranſports for the conveyance of theſe troops were aſſembled at Rhode-Iſland, the Congreſs paſſed a reſolution, that the ſoldiers not having delivered up all their accoutrements, the convention was not binding; and continued ſtill to detain them priſoners, notwithſtanding the repeated remonſtrances of the Britiſh commanders.

From the continent of America the flame of war had been rapidly communicated to the Weſt-India iſlands. The marquis of Bouille, governor-general of Martinico, was informed of the defenceleſs ſtate of the iſland of Dominica, which on the late peace had been ceded by France to England. The works had indeed been repaired and augmented by the miniſters of Great-Britain; but theſe, deſtitute of a ſufficient garriſon, only enhanced the value of the temptation. Under the cover of ſome frigates and privateers, the marquis landed unexpectedly on that iſland, at the head of two thouſand men: he ſoon overpowered a handful of regulars that had been entruſted with the defence of the forts and batteries; and in the courſe of the ſame day advanced to attack the capital of Reſeau. The garriſon, incapable of reſiſtance, ſolicited terms of capitulation; and the generoſity of the marquis, beſides allowing to the troops all the honours of war, and the liberty of retaining their arms, granted to the inhabitants the fulleſt ſecurity of their eſtates and property of every ſort; the maintenance of their rights, privileges, and immunities; and permiſſion to retain their civil and religious government until the concluſion of the war; when, if the iſland ſhould be ceded to France, they ſhould be left at liberty to adhere to their own political form of goverment, or to accept that eſtabliſhed in the French iſlands.

In the ſame quarter France was, in her turn, ſoon after taught to regret the viciſſitudes of war. General Clinton had detached from America a body of troops, under the command of general Grant; and theſe, in their attack on the French iſland of St. Lucia, were ſeconded by a Britiſh fleet under admiral Barrington. The chevalier de Michoud, the French commandant, with his ſmall band of regulars and militia, were ſucceſſively puſhed from poſt to poſt; and his fate appeared inevitable, when his hopes were revived by the unexpected appearance of the French fleet, commanded by count d'Eſtaign.

That officer had diligently occupied every moment at Boſton, ſince the tempeſt that had ſeperated him from lord Howe, in refitting and revictualling his ſhips; he had received on board a body of land forces, amounting to near eight thouſand men; and had ſailed with a lively expectation of overwhelming in his courſe all the Britiſh Leeward-iſlands. In his paſſage he received intelligence of the attempt on St. Lucia; and was not diſpleaſed at an expedition, which he flattered himſelf would be the means of throwing an eaſy prey into his hands, the whole Britiſh force by land and by ſea. His own fleet conſiſted of twelve large ſail of the line, beſides frigates: that of admiral Barrington, of one of ſeventy-four, one of ſeventy, one of ſixty-four, two of fifty, and three frigates. Yet the French admiral could not entirely conceal his chagrin at the precautions that his adverſary had taken, and the ſecurity he derived from his poſition in the harbour. He determined, however, to riſk the event, in hopes that his formidable force might ſtrike terror into the breaſt of the Engliſh commander; but that veteran had diſtinguiſhed himſelf through a ſeries of ſervice, by ſteady courage and undaunted reſolution; he received the attack of the count with calm intrepidity; and ſeconded by the batteries from the ſhore, in two ſucceſſive days repelled the fury of the aſſailants. The French convinced, under theſe unfavourable circumſtances, that no effectual impreſſion could be made on the fleet, now directed their attempts againſt the land-forces. The count d'Eſtaign landed his troops, and marched at the head of them to attack general Medows, a Britiſh officer, who occupied a ſtrong poſt on the iſland. Though his ſuperior numbers might juſtly inſpire him with the moſt ſanguine hopes of ſucceſs, yet he was compelled again to endure the mortification of defeat; the advantages that the Engliſh poſſeſſed by their ſituation, they maintained by their deſparate valour; and the count d'Eſtaign, after the loſs of near five hundred of his men, thought proper to retire to his ſhips: he ſoon after hoiſted ſail fot Martinico; and the chevalier de Michoud, thus deprived of all expectations of ſuccour, abandoned the idea of further reſiſtance, and ſurrendered to the Engliſh.

In the Eaſt-Indies the ſettlements of France were ſtill more fatally expoſed to the enterprizes of her enemies: theſe, in the courſe of the laſt war had been totally ſubdued; and though reſtored on the peace, were by the conditions of it left in a ſtate of weakneſs and degradation. Before any public declaration of war, the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, appriſed of the diſpoſition of the court of Verſailles to vindicate the independence of America, diſpatched orders to their governors to anticipate all dangers in that quarter, by immediately attacking the ſettlements of the French. Though the preparations of the governor of Madras could not eſcape the vigilance of Monſieur de Bellecombe, governor of Pondicherry, and commandant of all the French ſettlements in the Indies, yet, deſtitute of reſources, he could only aſpire to the glory of a gallant defence. Monſieur Tronjolli, the French commodore, had indeed diſputed the ſovereignty of the ſeas, in an obſtinate action with the Engliſh admiral, Sir Edward Vernon; but inſtead of returning to the road of Pondicherry, he ſteered his courſe for the Mauritius to repair the damages he had ſuſtained; and Monſieur de Bellecombe, with about three thouſand men, ſcarce one fourth of whom were Europeans, was cloſely inveſted by general Munro, at the head of fifteen hundred Britiſh and nine thouſand black troops, and ſupported by the Engliſh ſquadron under admiral Vernon.

The fortifications of Pondicherry had in ſome meaſure emerged from the ruins in which they had been left at the concluſion of the preceding war; but they were ſtill feeble and incomplete; and the gallantry of the governor and reſolution of the garriſon alone ſupplied the numerous deficiencies to which they were expoſed: for a month they nobly ſuſtained the attacks of the beſiegers, and protracted the hour of ſubmiſſion; but in that time they had loſt, in killed and wounded, one-fourth of their original number, and the reſt were worn down by inceſſant fatigue. The artillery of the enemy had already made a practicable breach; and general de Bellecombe, ſenſible that he had uſed every poſſible exertion to preſerve the ſettlement, determined not to involve the garriſon and inhabitants in total deſtruction by a fruitleſs perſeverance. On the day preceding that intended for a general aſſault, he propoſed a capitulation, which was readily liſtened to by the Britiſh commanders, who, in the terms of it, gave the moſt honourable teſtimony to the gallantry of his conduct. The regiment of Pondicherry, in honour of Monſieur de Bellecombe, and at his particular requeſt, were allowed to keep their colours; the European part of the garriſon were to be tranſported to France; and the Sepahis, or black troops, were to be diſbanded in the country.

The victors, at the ſame time, ſwept away the different factories of the French in Bengal, and on the coaſt of Coromandel; the Engliſh flag was erected on the walls of Chandernagore, Gemaun, Carical, and Maſulipatam; the fort of Mahé, in the domininions of Hyder-Ali, and protected by the name of that prince; but the iſlands of Mauritius and Bourbon, ſtrong in the number of their inhabitants and the advantages of their ſituation, alone defied the ſtorm.

While France was thus ſtripped of her ſettlements in the Eaſt, the attention of her people at home was in a great meaſure occupied in reſtoring the memory of a man to whoſe miſconduct the loſs of thoſe very ſettlements in the courſe of laſt war had been imputed, and who had fallen a victim to the public indignation. Count Lally, who from the original ſtation of an adventurer, had raiſed himſelf by his valour and enterpriſing genius to the command of the French forces in India, after the reduction of Pondicherry by general Coote, had returned to France; and was there purſued by the accuſations of the governor and ſuperior council of Pondicherry. To his violence, extortion, and oppreſſion, they attributed that ruin in which they had been involved; and his impetuous temper and unbridled arrogance, unhappily furniſhed but too much advantage to the enmity of his accuſers. The parliament was authoriſed by the late king to proceed againſt him; and their report was fatal to that brave but imprudent officer. He was declared convicted of having betrayed the intereſts of the king and the Eaſt-India company; and of having oppreſſed with impartial rapacity, every deſcription of perſons that had ſought refuge or protection within the walls of Pondicherry. He was ſtripped of his croſs, the honorary reward of his former ſervices; and after having received fourteen wounds in advancing the glory and intereſts of France, was condemned to fall by the hands of the executioner. He heard his ſentence with the indignation of injured innocence; and poured forth the moſt violent imprecations againſt the malice of his accuſers, and the ſanguinary partiality of his judges; but in the laſt hour of his life he reſumed, however, his wonted firmneſs, aſcended the ſcaffold quietly, and received the fatal ſtroke without uttering a word.

But the ſentence that terminated his life, could only for a time obſcure his honour; and his natural ſon, ſince known by the title of count Lally-Tollendal, roſe to vindicate the memory and juſtify the fame of his father. Devoted to this pious care, renouncing the frivolous amuſements of his youth, and endowed with every talent of nature and art, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the ſeveral criminal codes of Europe; he even found acceſs to the throne; and Lewis the Fifteenth who had been inexorable to the father, ſuffered himſelf to be moved by the virtues of the ſon. He extended to him the royal favour, and honoured him with his particular eſteem; on the death of that monarch, count Tollendal deſiſted not from his unwearied aſſiduities; his conſtancy and importunities at length triumphed over the power of his opponents; the voice of juſtice was heard; and this year crowned his long labours with ſucceſs, by the reſtoration of the memory of count Lally, and the diſgrace of his accuſers.

The ſame year that beheld that officer's innocence legally eſtabliſhed, was alſo rendered remarkable by the death of one of his ableſt and moſt celebrated champions. It is the lively expreſſion of Voltaire, "That count Lally was a "man on whom every one had a right to lay his hand, except the executioner." But it was not permitted Voltaire to witneſs that juſtification for which he had combatted; and that wonderful genius, who has filled ſo diſtinguiſhed a place in the republic of letters, expired only a few days before the ſentence of the count was reverſed. His private character, ſince his death, has been attacked by thoſe who in the carreer of his genius had ſmarted under his pen; but whatever might be his faults as a man, as an author he perhaps ſtands unrivalled; and the various compoſitions to which he has given birth, all of them entertaining, and many of them inſtructive, are the beſt monuments to perpetuate his name.

Amidſt the horrors of war and the deſtruction of the human ſpecies, France received ſome ſatisfaction in the pregnancy of the queen; that princeſs, whoſe free and amiable manners had endeared her to her ſubjects, was ſafely delivered of a daughter; the royal infant was baptized by the name of Maria-Thereſa-Charlotta; and the count of Provençe, and the princeſs Elizabeth, repreſented on this occaſion, as ſponſors, the king of Spain and the empreſs-queen.

A. D. 1779.] In the mean time the war raged in the weſtern part of the world with unabated fury. Count d'Eſtaign, after his double repulſe at St. Lucia, had retired to Martinico, from whence the Britiſh fleet, now rendered equal to to him by the arrival of admiral Byron's ſquadron, in vain endeavoured to allure him. His conduct at this moment was as cautious as it had been formerly bold and enterpriſing; the junction of Monſieur de Graſſe with a conſiderable convoy made no difference in the comparative ſtrength of the hoſtile fleets, ſince the Engliſh about the ſame time received a reinforcement under admiral Rowley; and the count continued ſtill to remain inactive within the harbour; or if he ventured forth, retreated immediately on the appearance of the enemy.

At length he reaped the harveſt which his perſeverance had ſown. Admiral Byron deemed it expedient to quit his ſtation, and convoy to a certain latitude the trade of the Britiſh Weſt-India Iſlands; and the French commander was now left to turn his arms againſt whatever place he ſhould think fit. St. Vincent's, one of the neutral iſlands, and which had been ceded to England, at the concluſion of the laſt war, was the firſt object of enterpriſe. The count d'Eſtaign detached againſt it the chevalier Rumain, with near four hundred men; and though the garriſon exceeded the number of the French, and the inhabitants had long been accuſtomed to war in their domeſtic conteſts with the Charibbs, yet ſo great was their terror, that they ſurrendered on the firſt ſummons, and thought themſelves happy in obtaining the ſame terms as had been granted to the inhabitants of Dominica.

During this expedition count d'Eſtaign had been joined by monſieur de la Motte Piquet from Europe, who brought with him not only a ſupply of troops, but, what was at leaſt equally neceſſary, of naval and military ſtores and proviſions. Strengthened by this reinforcement, and animated by the eaſy acquiſition of St. Vincent's, he meditated new and more important conqueſts. With twenty-five ſhips of the line, ten frigates, and near ten thouſand troops, he arrived off the iſland of Grenada, which at that time was governed by lord Macartney, and was defended only by about one hundred and fifty regulars, and three hundred armed inhabitants, who occupied a fortified hill that commanded the fort, harbour, and capital town of St. George.

The French landed between two and three thouſand regular forces, under the conduct of count Dillon; who the next day inveſted the hill, and made the neceſſary preparations for carrying it by ſtorm on the following night. Lord Macartney had placed great reliance on the natural and artificial ſtrength of this poſt; and the inhabitants deemed it to afford ſo perfect a ſecurity, as to render it a depoſit for plate, jewels, and their moſt valuable moveables. Their reſiſtance was proportioned to the booty it contained; and though count de Eſtaign headed a body of the French troops in perſon, they were repulſed on the firſt onſet. The ſuperiority of their numbers were at length deciſive, and they entered the lines after a hard conflict that laſted about an hour and a half: without loſing a moment or even halting to recruit their waſted ſtrength, they dragged their artillery to the top of the hill that commanded the fort; and the governor, ſenſible of his dangerous ſituation, now ſolicited terms of capitulation, which he had before rejected. But the favourable moment was paſt; and count d'Eſtaign would only grant ſuch conditions, as lord Macartney and the principal inhabitants thought it better to truſt to the law and cuſtoms of nations than ſubſcribe to: they therefore ſubmitted without any ſtipulations whatſoever, and abandoned themſelves to the diſcretion of the victor.

Whatever luſtre might accrue to the count d'Eſtaign from the reduction of the iſland, was ſullied by the ſeverity and rapacity which he exerciſed over the vanquiſhed; but he was ſoon ſummoned from the ſweets of plunder to maintain his new acquiſition by arms. Admiral Byron, on his return to St. Lucia, had been acquainted with the loſs of St. Vincent's, and in conjunction with general Grant, had concerted a plan for the recovery of that Iſland. But while they were on their paſſage, they received the diſagreeable intelligence of the invaſion of Grenada, and they immediately changed their courſe in hopes of yet preſerving that valuable ſettlement.

A ſignal from a battery on the iſland firſt appriſed count d'Eſtaign of the approach of the Engliſh fleet; he immediately commanded his own to ſtand out to ſea, and though ſuperior in number to admiral Byron, deemed it more prudent to ſecure his preſent acquiſition than to hazard it in ſearch of freſh laurels. The Engliſh attacked with great ſpirit, but during the continunce of the action they were informed of the total reduction of the iſland of Grenada; the object of enterpriſe was thus at an end; their ſhips had ſuffered conſiderably in the engagement, and they determined to retreat to St. Chriſtopher's; while d'Eſtaign, ſatisfied with having protected his new conqueſt, returned during the night to Grenada.

But no ſooner had he regulated the government of that iſland than he ſteered for Martinico, and thence ſupplied with naval ſtores, proceeded towards St Chriſtopher's, and defied the Engliſh to battle; incapable of forcing them in their own harbour, and having thus retorted the inſult that had been formerly offered to him at Martinico, he directed his operations to a different quarter, and ſailed to America, to ſecond the deſigns of the United States.

The ſouthern provinces of America had, in a great meaſure been exempt from thoſe calamities which had afflicted the other parts of that continent; but towards the cloſe of the laſt campaign, general Clinton had extended his views to the recovery of South-Carolina and Georgia. The chief command was veſted in general Prevoſt, who, after experiencing ſome viciſſitudes of fortune, gained conſiderable footing in the latter province, and had eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at the town of Savannah. The United States were not inclined patiently to ſubmit to this diſgrace; but the ſcene of action was ſo remote from the centre of force and the ſeat of council, that the war there was in a great meaſure beyond their reach; and the Britiſh marine afforded ſuch deciſive advantages to the operations of their troops, in countries every where bordered by the ſea and interſected by inland navigations, as could ſcarcely be counteracted with effect by any moderate ſuperiority at land.

Under theſe conſiderations, they implored the ſupport and aſſiſtance of France; and the court of Verſailles, deſirous of affording eſſential aid to her allies, directed count d'Eſtaign, as ſoon as he had fulfilled the objects of enterpriſe in the Weſt-Indies, to haſten to America; that commander accordingly, having ſeen the homeward bound Weſt-India trade clear of danger, proceeded with twenty-two ſhips of the line and ten frigates to that coaſt, in hopes not only of overwhelming the force under general Prevoſt, and delivering the ſouthern colonies from apprehenſion, but with the intention, in conjunction with general Waſhington, of attacking the Britiſh troops at New-York, and by one deciſive ſtroke bringing the war on that continent to a final concluſion.

No ſooner had the count arrived on the coaſt of America, than he was informed that general Lincoln, who commanded at Charleſton, was inſtructed to act in concert with him; ſome few days were naturally loſt in adjuſting the future operations of their united forces; and it was not till a week from his firſt appearance that he anchored off the bar of the Tybee, near the mouth of the river Savannah. The French troops were landed at Beaulieu, about thirteen miles from Savannah-town; the frigates were poſted ſo as to ſecure the different inlets of the river; and the French, with the American light-horſe, having driven in the outpoſts of the enemy, count d'Eſtaign ſummoned general Prevoſt, the Britiſh commander, to ſurrender.

Though that officer had diligently employed the interval in ſtrengthening the works of the town, he yet was in hourly expectation of being joined by a conſiderable detachment then abſent on an expedition againſt South-Carolina: this circumſtance obliged him to return an ambiguous anſwer: and count d'Eſtaign, in hopes of obtaining poſſeſſion of the town without bloodſhed, conſented to a truce for twenty-four hours. He had ſoon reaſon to lament the addreſs that had deceived him into this ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities; in the ſhort ſpace mentioned, the expected detachment re-entered Savannah, and the anſwer of general Prevoſt announced his reſolution to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity.

The French forces conſiſted of upwards of four thouſand regular troops, and the Americans who joined their ſtandard might ſwell the army of the beſiegers to about ſeven thouſand men: the Britiſh garriſon that defended Savannah could ſcarce be eſtimated at three thouſand; every appearance promiſed count d'Eſtaign the moſt rapid and brilliant ſucceſs; and to augment the diſtreſs of the beſieged, the allied generals refuſed a paſſage through their lines to the women and children in the town. The regular approaches that had been firſt determined on but ill ſuited the impetuoſity of the French commander; he was ſenſible of the danger that his fleet of capital ſhips was expoſed to, in lying without ſhelter upon an inhoſpitable coaſt at that critical ſeaſon of the year; he obſerved that his batteries had produced but little effect on the Britiſh works; he was impatient to proceed in queſt of new enterpriſes; and he relied with implicit confidence on the ſuperiority of his force and the goodneſs of his troops.

Theſe various motives induced a reſolution which, had it been adopted previous to the return and junction of the Britiſh detachment to general Prevoſt, might have been attended with ſucceſs; the works, then feeble and incomplete, were open to an aſſault, and would probably have been penetrated by the lively valour of the French; but they had now been ſtrengthened by the aſſiduous labour of three weeks, and were covered by a numerous artillery amounting to near one hundred pieces, and directed by captain Moncrieffe, an engineer of approved and conſummate ſkill. Yet theſe obſtacles, though they eſcaped not the obſervation, could not extinguiſh the ardour of count d'Eſtaign; before the dawn of day a heavy cannonade and bombardment uſhered in the attack; the count himſelf in perſon led the flower of both armies, and was accompanied by the principal officers of each. But this enterpriſe was not attended with the ſucceſs the gallantry of it deſerved; the allies were encountered with obſtinate reſiſtance; they were entangled in their approach by ſwampy ground; though they perſevered in their attack with extraordinary courage, and for ſome hours rivalled each other with mutual acts of valour, they were at length obliged with conſiderable loſs, to retire from the field, and yield to the advantageous poſition and calm intrepidity of their ememies.

This repulſe entirely broke the deſigns of the count d'Eſtaign; ſeverely wounded himſelf, he lamented the fate of ſome of his moſt gallant officers who had fallen on the field: in about a week after he abandoned the unpropitious coaſt; and after detaching one ſquadron of his fleet to St. Domingo, a ſecond under Monſieur de la Motte Piquet to Martinico, and a third under Monſieur de Vaudrieul to the Cheſapeak, whoſe preſence prevented the invaſion of Virginia, and retarded that of Carolina, the count himſelf, with the ſhips leaſt fit for ſervice, ſailed for Europe.

Whatever diſappointments might have attended the arms of France in America, her negociations in Europe afforded her ample compenſation; and the court of Spain, arouſed from the neutrality ſhe had hitherto obſerved, and diſguſted with the miniſters of Great-Britain, who had rejected her proffered mediation, now reſolved to fulfil the conditions of the celebrated family-compact; and to efface the unfortunate and diſgraceful events of the laſt war, by uniting in this the ſtrength of the houſe of Bourbon, while vigorous and yet unimpaired. Her ambaſſador, the marquis of Almadovar, after having preſented a memorial to the court of St. James's, in which he declared the inſults offered to his ſovereign amounted exactly to one hundred, quitted London and returned to Spain.

France immediately prepared to avail herſelf of the preſent diſpoſition of the court of Madrid; count d'Orvilliers ſailed with the grand fleet from Breſt, and joined that of Spain; and the combined fleets of the houſe of Bourbon preſented to their enemies the formidable ſight of ſixty-ſix ſhips of the line; with this prodigious force they entered the Britiſh-Channel, and ſcattered terror and diſmay throughout the coaſts of that iſland. Admiral Hardy, who commanded the Engliſh fleet, was happy to find refuge in the convenient harbours of Great-Britain; Plymouth trembled for her ſafety; and that people who had ſo often vaunted their dominion over the ſeas, in their turn were taught to dread the calamities of a menaced invaſion. The dread of the approaching equinoctial ſtorms, after the capture of the Ardent, an Engliſh ſhip of the line, induced the fleets of France and Spain to ſeparate; but the naval campaign proved more glorious than advantageous to the former; a peſtilential diſorder which the ſailors on their return communicated to their countrymen, raged for a long time throughout France with fatal fury.

To increaſe the embaraſſments of the Engliſh, and to divide their force, Spain, with a conſiderable army, formed the ſiege of Gibraltar; a fortreſs, which, ſituated on a rock, and occupied by the Engliſh, had long derided the attempts and wounded the pride of the court of Madrid. The land forces were entruſted to the command of Don Alvarez; Don Barcello blocked up the harbour with a number of xebecques and frigates; while Don Lewis de Cordova, with twelve ſhips of the line, was ſtationed near to afford ſupport to his operations.

Amidſt the fury of war Lewis diſplayed that regard for ſcience which had early formed the prominent feature of his reign; and while he poured the thunder of his arms on his enemies, two ſhips were marked by an honourable exemption from the attacks of the hoſtile fleets of France. Previous to the commencement of hoſtilities, the Engliſh had ſent two veſſels into the South Seas, commanded by captains Cook and Clerke, to explore the coaſts and iſlands of Japan and California; the return of thoſe veſſels was hourly expected in Europe; and Lewis, with a conſiderate humanity which reflects the brighteſt luſtre on his character, by a circular letter to all his naval officers, commanded them to abſtain from all hoſtilities againſt theſe ſhips, and to treat them as neutral veſſels. The letters mentioned alſo in terms of the higheſt reſpect captain Cook, who had long diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſucceſſive voyages of diſcovery. But death allowed not that celebrated navigator to enjoy this grateful teſtimony of his merit; and in one of the newly diſcovered iſlands he had already fallen a victim to the blind fury of the ſavage inhabitants.

Though Italy had eſcaped the deſtructive rage of war, and the ſanguinary effects of ambition, yet the fertile fields of Naples were afflicted by a calamity not leſs fatal and more tremendous. A dreadful eruption from Mount Veſuvius, which far exceeded any that had been known in the memory of man, overwhelmed in horror and ruin the adjacent country; in the diſtrict of Ottaiano, the habitations of twelve thouſand perſons were deluged or conſumed by a ſtream of liquid fire; its fatal influence extended for above three miles; the hopes of the peaſant and the wealth of the huſbandman were in a moment blaſted and deſtroyed, and the elements ſeemed to conſpire with man in ſpreading miſery and devaſtation throughout the human ſpecies.

A. D. 1780.] The public opinion that had raiſed monſieur Necker to the obſervation and favour of his ſovereign, ſtill continued to follow him; and his talents were aſſiduouſly employed to merit applauſe. Under his direction a general reform took place throughout every department of the revenue; the people, inſtead of being burthened with new taxes, beheld the public income augmented by the œconomy and improvements that were introduced into the management of the finances; a variety of unneceſſary offices in the houſehold of the king and queen were aboliſhed, and other important regulations adopted for the eaſe of the ſubject and the general benefit of the kingdom.

The zeal and induſtry of the director-general of the finances were rivalled by the addreſs of the miniſters of France at the different courts of Europe. The emperor of Germany and the king of Pruſſia, after a ſhort trial of each others ſtrength, had agreed to ſheath the ſword; but they continued ſtill agitated with mutual jealouſy, and ſtill maintained on foot the ſame armies as if in a ſtate of actual hoſtility. But if the reciprocal ſuſpicions of theſe rival courts diverted their attention from the neighbouring belligerent powers, the ſituation of Ruſſia allowed her to contemplate at leiſure what advantages ſhe might derive from the general ſtate of affairs. That empire at no time had appeared more formidable; and the ſucceſs of her arms in the laſt war againſt the Ottoman Porte, had received additional luſtre from the acquieſcence of the divan in the conditions ſhe had dictated with reſpect to the Crimea. A long and intimate connection had ſubſiſted between the courts of Peterſburg and London; and ſhould the myriads of Ruſſia be added to the wealth of England, it was preſumed that Lewis thought the houſe of Bourbon muſt have ſunk in the unequal conteſt.

The French ambaſſador at the court of Peterſburg was therefore inſtructed at this critical juncture to conciliate the inclinations of the empreſs, by every compliance that the honour of his country would permit; and the fears of France were ſoon extinguiſhed by a manifeſto as favourable to the views of the court of Verſailles, as it was unpropitious to thoſe of St. James's. The jealouſy that had been excited by the former aſcendancy of Great-Britain, and the dominion that ſhe had attained on the ſea, had even extended to, and been nouriſhed by, the moſt diſtant powers of the north: the empreſs of Ruſſia embraced the favourable opportunity to emancipate her commerce from the controul of thoſe haughty iſlanders; and was readily perſuaded by the ambaſſador of France to place herſelf at the head of a confederacy formed of her northern neighbours. She accordingly addreſſed a declaration to the courts of London, Verſailles, and Madrid, in which, after dwelling on the juſtice and moderation of which ſhe had given ſuch convincing proofs in the courſe of her war with the Ottoman Porte, and the ſtrict regard that ſhe had always ſhewn for the rights of neutrality and of commerce in general, ſhe lamented that her example had not been permitted to influence the preſent belligerent powers, but that her ſubjects had been precluded from enjoying peaceably the fruits of their induſtry, and the advantages belonging to neutral nations: that they had been moleſted in their navigation, and retarded in their operations by the ſhips and privateers of the contending ſovereigns; and that ſhe found herſelf, with concern, under the neceſſity of removing thoſe vexations which were offered to the commerce of Ruſſia in particular, and to that of Europe in general, by all the means compatible with her dignity and with the welfare of her ſubjects.

She proceeded to demand, that neutral ſhips ſhould enjoy a free navigation, even from port to port, and on the coaſts of the belligerent powers; that all effects belonging to the belligerent powers ſhould be looked upon as free on board ſuch neutral ſhips, excepting only ſuch goods as were expreſsly ſtipulated to be contraband, as arms, ammunition, and warlike ſtores; that if any ſuch were found, beyond what might properly appertain to the ſhip's crew or paſſengers, they might be ſeized and confiſcated according to law; but neither the veſſels, paſſengers, or the reſt of the goods were to be detained for that reaſon, or hindered from purſuing their voyage; that theſe principles were to ſerve as rules in the judicial proceedings and ſentences upon the legality of prizes; and her imperial majeſty declared, to render them ſtill more reſpected, and to protect the honour of her flag, ſhe had given orders to fit out a conſiderable naval force. The kings of Denmark and Sweden immediately acceded to the language and declarations of the empreſs of Ruſſia; the ſtates-general of the United Provinces, after that delay that has always prevailed in the deliberations of the republic, followed their example; and this formidable confederacy aſſumed the title of the armed neutrality, and engaged to make a common cauſe of it at ſea, againſt any of the powers that ſhould violate the principles which had been laid down in the memorial of the empreſs of Ruſſia.

The anſwer of the king of France proclaimed how acceptable the nature of that memorial was to the court of Verſailles. He declared that what her imperial majeſty claimed from the belligerent powers, amounted to no more than was already preſcribed in the rules for the French navy; the execution of which was maintained with an exactneſs known and applauded by all Europe. He expreſſed his approbation of the principles and views of the empreſs; and aſſerted, that from the meaſures ſhe had now adopted, ſolid advantages would undoubtedly reſult, not only to her ſubjects but to all civilized nations.

While France by her intrigues ſecured the friendſhip of the north, ſhe ſuffered a deep and fatal wound in the calamity of her kindred ally. A Spaniſh ſquadron of eleven ſhips of the line and two frigates, cruiſing near Cape St. Vincent, under the command of Don Juan de Langara, was ſurrounded by the Engliſh fleet under admiral Rodney, then proceeding to the relief of Gibraltar. The Spaniards for a long time maintained the conflict with great gallantry; but they were at length forced to yield to the ſuperior numbers of their enemies. The St. Domingo a Spaniſh ſhip of ſeventy guns and ſix hundred men, was blown up in the action. The admiral's ſhip, the Phœnix of eighty guns, with four more ſhips of the line, were taken; another of the ſame rate was driven on ſhore and deſtroyed; and the ſcattered remnant eſcaped with difficulty the purſuit of the victors. Admiral Rodney immediately after purſued his courſe to Gibraltar, relieved the garriſon of that fortreſs, repaſſed the ſtreights, and ſteered in triumph for the Weſt-Indies; after detaching admiral Digby with his prizes and part of his ſquadron to Great-Britain, who on his paſſage fell in with and captured the Prothée, a French man of war of ſixty-four guns.

This was not the only diſaſter that aroſe from the perſevering attachment of Spain to the ſiege of Gibraltar. The naval preparations of France had been continued during the winter at an expence that bordered on profuſion; and the united fleets of the houſe of Bourbon might have eſtabliſhed their ſovereignty in the Channel, and once more inſulted the coaſts of Great-Britain; but Spain, occupied in fruitleſs attempts on that fatal rock, ſuffered the moment for their junction to elapſe; the fleet of France was confined to her harbours by the ſuperior force of Great-Britain, whoſe naval armaments ſhe was not able to encounter ſingly. Admiral Geary, with the Engliſh fleet, continued vigilantly to obſerve their motions; and the Artois, the Capricieuſe, the Nymphe, and the Belle Poule, were ſucceſſively taken by Britiſh cruiſers. The chevalier de Kergarion, who commanded the latter, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a bloody and gallant reſiſtance. Though the ſhip that attacked him mounted ſixty-four guns, and the Belle Poule carried only thirty-two, he maintained the combat with undaunted reſolution; mortally wounded, he continued to exclaim, "Courage my children, "courage!" and expired while he yet endeavoured to animate by his expreſſion and example his faithful crew. On his death the command devolved on his firſt lieutenant M. la Motte Tabourell, who defended the Belle Poule, with ſimilar reſolution, for three quarters of an hour. He then reluctantly ſtruck his flag, as it was impoſſible any longer to keep the ſhip from ſinking, had the engagement been continued. Six feet water were in the hold, ſixteen ſhot in the body of the ſhip, the maſts and yards broken, the ſails and rigging cut to pieces, the captain and twenty-four men killed, and the ſecond captain, with fifty men wounded. The chevalier du Remain, in the Nymphe, had defended himſelf with ſimilar courage; equal in force to the Engliſh ſhip, he only yielded to her ſuperior fortune; before the colours of the Nymphe were ſtruck, two-thirds of her crew were killed and wounded, and among the former was the chevalier du Remain himſelf.

The French ſhips of war, impatient of the delay of the Spaniards, had eſcaped from Breſt in ſmall diviſions, and rendezvouſed at Cadiz. There they had joined the fleet of Spain, and once more united, were occupied in cruizing off Cape St. Vincent, when fortune ſeemed inclined to compenſate for their former diſappointments. A rich and conſiderable convoy for the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, under the protection of one ſhip of the line and two frigates, had ſailed from England,and Don Lewis de Cordova, who commanded the combined ſquadrons, was agreeably ſurpriſed with the ſight of this invaluable and defenceleſs fleet. A ſignal was made for a general chaſe; the men of war eſcaped by their ſuperior ſailing: but five Eaſt-India men, and fifty veſſels bound to the Weſt-Indies, were taken and carried into Cadiz, the former, beſides arms and ammunition, with a train of artillery, conveyed naval ſtores for the ſupply of the Britiſh ſquadron in that quarter, and the latter contained tents and camp equipage for the troops deſigned for active ſervice in the Leeward-Iſlands: but the moſt irreparable loſs to Great-Britain were fifteen hundred and twenty ſeamen, and twelve hundred and fifty-five ſoldiers, who became by that event the captives of the houſe of Bourbon.

In the Weſt-Indies Monſieur de la Motte Piquet, with four ſhips of the line, attacked a ſquadron of the Engliſh under commodore Cornwallis.—The latter, during the action, was joined by another ſhip of the line, which rendered their force more equal to the encounter, and monſieur de la Motte, having received already conſiderable damage, and impatient to join the grand fleet, bore away for Cape-Francois. The count de Guichen had ſailed from Breſt to ſupply the place of count d'Eſtaign:—the fleet under his command, when united, conſiſted of twenty-three ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, and ſoon after he fell in with admiral Rodney and twenty ſhips of the line. An engagement enſued, long, obſtinate, and indeciſive. The French retired to refit to Guadaloupe, and the Engliſh, reſolute to renew the action, cruized off the iſland of Martinico,

The count de Guichen, whoſe gallantry in the laſt engagement had extorted the admiration of his adverſaries, was not diſpoſed to ſuffer the Britiſh fleet to inſult by their preſence a ſettlement belonging to France. On intelligence of the ſtation of admiral Rodney, he quitted Guadaloupe, and ſteered to meet the rival of his glory. But the engagement did not commence till evening, and night ſoon after ſeparated the combatants. A third encounter was equally partial and indeciſive; and count de Guichen ſoon after joined a Spaniſh ſquadron, which, though it gave him a decided ſuperioity, yet refuſed to concur in any attack on the ſettlements of the Engliſh; the French commander, by the ſuperfluous caution of his colleague, thus rendered incapable of availing himſelf of his immediate ſtrength, ſeized the opportunity to eſcort the homeward-bound trade towards Europe; the ſickly ſtate of his men induced him to continue his voyage, and he conducted his wealthy convoy in ſafety to Cadiz, there he was joined by the count de Eſtaign, who aſſumed the chief command; the fleet of France by this union was ſwelled to thirtyſix ſhips of the line; but the ſhips themſelves were foul and out of repair, and the feeble condition of the crews has already been noticed. Under theſe circumſtances, and incumbered by the protection of his convoy, though count d'Eſtaign on his paſſage fell in with the Britiſh fleet under admiral Darby, conſiſting of only twenty-two ſhips of the line, yet he deemed it unadviſable to hazard an engagement, and purſued his courſe to the ports of France.

The repulſe of count d'Eſtaign at Savannah had revived the hopes of the Britiſh commanders in America; they now aſpired to the final reduction of the ſouthern colonies, and the inclemency of the winter was not permitted to ſuſpend their hoſtile opperations. At the cloſe of the laſt year, general Clinton ſet ſail from New-York with a conſiderable body of troops for the attack of Charleſton, the capital of South-Carolina; he was eſcorted and ſupported by a Britiſh fleet commanded by admiral Arbuthnot; after a tedious voyage they reached Savannah, and having refreſhed the troops and repaired the damages the fleet had ſuſtained, in the middle of March they arrived within ſight of the place of their deſtination.

Though the Americans were not ignorant of the intentions of the Britiſh commander, yet the forces in Charleſton, including every deſcription, ſcarce amounted to ſix thouſand men, and were by no means equal to the extent of the works; many of theſe alſo were but little accuſtomed to military ſervice, and very ill provided with clothes and other neceſſaries. This omiſſion was not to be attributed to the ſupineneſs of Congreſs, but to the nature of the military eſtabliſhment; the men in general enliſted but for a ſingle campaign, and on the approach of winter were impatient to return to their farms or families; it was this very circumſtance that probably induced general Clinton to engage in the expedition at the particular ſeaſon when he knew the United States were leaſt capable of affording ſuccour to the beſieged; but though general Lincoln was ſenſible of the difficulties that he was expoſed to, yet he rejected the terms of capitulation that were offered by the Britiſh commander, and prepared to diſcharge the truſt repoſed in him with fidelity and honour.

But perſonal courage could not alone ſupply the deficiency of every other requiſite for a ſucceſsful defence; and general Lincoln beheld with regret, while his own hopes diminiſhed, the ſtrength of the enemy increaſe. A detachment from the Britiſh ſhips poſſeſſed themſelves of Sullivan's-iſland, which, from its ſituation might greatly incommode the garriſon; a body of cavalry that had been collected in the adjacent country for the ſupport of the beſieged, was routed and totally diſperſed; in the progreſs of a month, the approaches of the beſiegers had been ſucceſsfully advanced; and general Lincoln, unwilling by a fruitleſs perſeverance to involve the town and inhabitants in certain deſtruction, reſumed the negociation that had been broken off, and ſubſcribed the terms of capitulation; theſe preſerved to the inhabitants their lives and property; the militia were permitted to retire to their reſpective homes; but the regulars of the American army were to remain priſoners of war until exchanged.

The danger and loſs of Charleſton had excited conſiderable alarm throughout America; the United States had ſolicited in the ſtrongeſt terms the ſupport of France; and Lewis, attentive to the intereſts of his allies, detached in the beginning of May from Breſt the count de Rochambeau, with twelve thouſand ſelect troops, and the chevalier de Ternay, with ſeven ſhips of the line and ſeveral frigates. Theſe arrived about the middle of June at Rhode-iſland, which, during the courſe of the preceding year had been evacuated by the Britiſh, and now acknowledged the authority of the United States.

Count Rochambeau was received by the Americans with every mark of cordial eſteem; a committee from the general-aſſembly of Rhode-iſland was appointed to congratulate him on his arrival; and their ſatisfaction was not diminiſhed by the declaration of the French commander, that his ſovereign would never ſheath the ſword until the independence of America was acknowledged; that the troops he had brought over were only the vanguard of a much greater force that was deſtined to their aid; and that the king had ordered him to aſſure them, that his whole power ſhould be exerted for their ſupport; he added, that the French troops were under the ſtricteſt diſcipline; and acting under the orders of general Waſhington, would live with the Americans as their brethren.

The United States allotted Rhode-iſland to their allies as a place of arms; and count Rochambeau while he waited the promiſed reinforcement, diligently employed his troops in repairing and augmenting the works on the iſland. He had ſoon after reaſon to congratulate himſelf on this precaution. General Clinton and admiral Arbuthnot, returned from the reduction of Charleſton to New-York, formed a plan of attack againſt the French fleet and army; but their deſigns could not elude the penetration of general Waſhington; he rapidly croſſed the North-river with twelve thouſand men, and general Clinton perceiving the danger to which his abſence muſt expoſe New-York, relinquiſhed his attempt againſt Rhode-iſland.

The marquis de la Fayette, who had been ſo much diſtinguiſhed by the early part that he took in the American cauſe, long before the court of Verſailles had thought it prudent to avow their inclination, returned from his native country, to which he had paid a tranſient viſit, to join again the ſtandard of freedom. His early engagement, and great zeal and activity in the ſervice of the United States, rendered him peculiarly acceptable to general Waſhington, and the commendations of that commander were productive of the moſt flattering attentions from Congreſs to the marquis.

But the viſit of that nobleman to Philadelphia, where the Congreſs had again eſtabliſhed their reſidence, was principally to concert and adjuſt the plan for the reſt of the campaign. He, as well as count Rochambeau, held forth aſſurances of the moſt powerful ſupport from France, and it was expected that monſieur de Guichén from the Weſt-India iſlands would ſteer his courſe to America, that he would join the freſh ſhips of monſieur Ternay; and that the grand army under general Waſhington, being alſo reinforced by the troops of Rochambeau, an attack by ſea and land might be made on the Britiſh troops at New-York, with ſuch a ſuperiority of force as muſt have enſured ſucceſs; the reduction of lord Cornwallis's detachment to the ſouthward muſt naturally have enſued; and the marquis de la Fayette was to have proceeded with a conſiderable army on a winter expedition againſt Canada.

In expectation of theſe events, the marquis de la Fayette publiſhed a preparatory memorial addreſſed to the French Canadians, and calling upon them by all the ancient ties of allegiance, blood, religion, and country, as well as by the natural deſire of recovering their freedom, to be ready to join and aſſiſt him; and holding out all the ſeverities of war, and all the terrors of military execution, to thoſe, if any ſuch there were, who, blindly perverſe to their own intereſts, and forgetful of all thoſe ties and duties, ſhould in any manner oppoſe the arms or impede the generous deſigns of their deliverers; but when Waſhington had recruited his army with ſuch diligence as to have ſwelled it to twenty-thouſand men, the whole project was diſconcerted by a circumſtance that has been already related; and the count de Guichen, in proceeding with his fleet to Europe, expoſed the Americans to as ſevere a diſappointment as any they had experienced during the courſe of the war.

This conduct of monſieur de Guichen, however fatal to the ſplendid proſpects of the allies of France, was ſufficiently juſtified by the bad ſtate of his ſhips when he arrived at Cadiz; and his departure from the Weſt-Indies preſerved him from the calamities in which thoſe iſlands were ſoon after involved. A hurricane, the fury of which exceeded any thing that ever was known or can be conceived, ſwept throughout that quarter of the world, the ſeas and land, with wild and undiſtinguiſhed rage. At Martinico the beautiful town of St. Pierre, built on the ſhore, was entirely overwhelmed and waſhed away; the town of Baſſeterre in Guadaloupe ſhared the ſame fate; ſixty ſail of tranſports from France, that had arrived that morning at Martinico, with ſtores, and two thouſand five-hundred troops on board, were driven out to ſea, and almoſt all ſwallowed up by that ungovernable element. The Experiment of fifty guns, with the Juno of forty, and ſeveral other French frigates, were entirely loſt. Grenada and St. Vincents equally preſented a ſcene of deſolation; and in the latter not a ſingle houſe was capable of withſtanding the fury of the tempeſt. The Britiſh ſettlements and marine ſuffered alſo proportionably; Jamaica, Barbadoes, and St. Lucia, were the principal victims of its rage; admiral Rodney, with eleven ſhips of the line, had fortunately proceeded to the coaſt of America; but the Andromeda and Laurel, Britiſh frigates, were both wrecked on the coaſt of Martinico. The humanity of the marquis de Bouille, governor-general of the French Weſt-India iſlands, on this occaſion ſhone forth with diſtinguiſhed luſtre; thirty-one Engliſh ſailors, the ſcanty remnant that was ſaved from the crews of the Andromeda and Laurel, were ſent by that commander under a flag of truce to the Britiſh commodore at St. Lucia. The marquis declared in the letter that accompanied them, that he could not conſider in the light of enemies, men who had ſo hardly eſcaped in a contention with the force of the elements; he only lamented that their number was ſo ſmall, and that none of the officers had been ſaved.

By the expedition of admiral Rodney to America, he had eluded the deſtructive rage of that tempeſt which deſolated the Weſt-India iſlands; but his continuance on the American coaſt was of ſhort duration; and informed that the count de Guichen had proceeded for Europe, he himſelf ſoon after returned to Barbadoes. In the mean time the hoſtile armies in the neighbourhood of New-York continued vigilantly to obſerve each other's motions. But while the Britiſh commander appeared ſunk in ſupineneſs, he meditated a deep and dark ſcheme, which could it have taken effect in its full extent, would probably have brought the war to a final concluſion, and for ever extinguiſhed the independence of America.

In the courſe of the war we have already noticed the early attack on Quebec, in which the courage and conduct of general Arnold had been diſplayed to the higheſt advantage; the reputation he had acquired there, he continued to maintain by a ſeries of bold and enterpriſing exertions: and the final capture of the Britiſh army under general Burgoyne, was in a great meaſure attributed to his counſels and gallant example. As a reward, congreſs had beſtowed on him the government of Philadelphia; but the affections of his countrymen accompanied him not in that peaceful occupation; his profuſion had plunged him into diſtreſſes from which he endevoured to extricate himſelf by the oppreſſion of the inhabitants of Philadelphia; their complaints expoſed him to the judgment of a court-martial; that court declared his conduct highly reprehenſible, and ordered that he ſhould be reprimanded by general Waſhington. This cenſure firſt alienated his mind from the United States; and though ſoon after he was taken into actual ſervice, and appointed to a principal command under general Waſhington, his pecuniary embarraſſments, or reſentments, triumphed over his fidelity, and he entered into a cloſe correſpondence with the enemies of his country.

The American commander had ſtationed his army for the winter on both ſides of the North-River; and the important poſt of Weſt-Point, with its neighbouring dependencies, and a conſiderable diviſion of the army, were entruſted to general Arnold. That officer had agreed to make ſuch a diviſion of the wing under his command, as would enable general Clinton completely to ſurpriſe them; and the Engliſh troops once admitted within the lines, might have availed themſelves of the rout and confuſion, to the total deſtruction of the whole army. The loſs of their only diſciplined force, with moſt, if not all, of their experienced officers, muſt have blaſted for ever the infant greatneſs of the United States.

From this melancholy cataſtrophe they were preſerved by the fidelity of three young men, educated in the humbleſt walks of life, and who nobly diſdained to betray their truſt, though tempted by the moſt faſcinating offers. To adjuſt the plan of attack with general Arnold, major André, adjutant-general to the Britiſh army, had accepted the perilous commiſſion of entering the American lines. When there, he had been perſuaded by the caution of Arnold to lay aſide his regimentals, aſſume a private dreſs, and return with a paſſport under the feigned name of Anderſon; under that name he had already eluded the different guards and poſts of the camps, when, at a ſmall diſtance from the Britiſh lines, he was ſtopped by three young volunteers; theſe, notwithſtanding his paſſport, inſiſted on examining him more ſtrictly; and the major, whoſe ingenuous diſpoſition but ill fitted him for deception, increaſed their ſuſpicions by endeavouring to purchaſe his freedom with his purſe and watch; to theſe he added offers of permanent proviſion and future promotion, on condition of their accompanying him to New-York; but the Americans were proof to the allurements of affluence and ambition, and they inſiſted on conducting him to their commanding officer.

Some delay in his examination allowed general Arnold to be appriſed of his misfortune before his own connection with the priſoner was diſcovered. He immediately abandoned his quarters, and eſcaped to the protection of the Britiſh lines; but the unhappy major André fell the victim of the fatal project. Fourteen general officers were appointed by the American commander to determine on his caſe, and the puniſhment that ought to be inflicted; among theſe was the marquis de la Fayette; and the board, with the regret that was excited by the frank and noble demeanour of the priſoner, pronounced that he ought to be conſidered as a ſpy from the enemy, and agreeable to the laws of nations ought to ſuffer death. The repeated applications of general Clinton, to avert the ſtroke of juſtice, were in vain; but the laſt hours of the unfortunate victim were ſoothed by every mark of reſpect and even of regard; and the execution of the ſentence was accompanied by the tears of the very judges who had pronounced it.

But though the vigilance of general Waſhington guarded againſt the dangerous effects which were to be apprehended from Arnold's treachery, he found ſtill greater difficulties to encounter in the univerſal diſtreſs that reigned throughout the provinces. The troops under his command, deſtitute of clothing of every kind, could not be reſtrained from giving open vent to their diſcontents; they were again ſoothed into obedience by the addreſs of their commander, and by the promiſes that were held out of liberal ſupport from France.

The events of the campaign, though by no means adverſe, had not anſwered the ſanguine expectations of the court of Verſailles, and thoſe advantages which the miniſters of France expected to derive from the united force of the houſe of Bourbon. But that confederacy acquired new ſtrength by the preſumption of their enemy; and Great-Britain having, by the capture of an American packet, obtained poſſeſſion of a treaty of amity and commerce between the republics of Holland and the United States of America, gave looſe to her indignation, and at the cloſe of the year commenced hoſtilities againſt the Dutch; a meaſure which was received at Paris with open exultation, and which neceſſarily threw that republic into the arms of France.

During the operations of the contending fleets and armies, ſome changes had taken place among the miniſters of France. Monſieur Bertin had reſigned the office of ſecretary of ſtate. The prince de Montbarey had retired from the poſt of ſecretary at war, and was ſucceeded by the marquis de Segur; but the moſt important removal was that of monſieur Sartine, who had for five years preſided over the marine-department; and whoſe unwearied application and ability had raiſed the naval power of France to a height that aſtoniſhed Europe; but his colleagues in the cabinet loudly accuſed him of a profuſion, which would have diverted into one channel the whole reſources of the kingdom; the extent of his projects, and the expence of the armaments he ſuggeſted, were by no means conſiſtent with the ſevere œconomy that characteriſed the comptroller-general of the finances; and his retreat opened a road to the ambition of the marquis de Caſtries, who was appointed in his place to the department of marine.

Whatever alteration Lewis might make in his miniſters, his own diſpoſition remained the ſame, and his mind was inceſſantly employed in augmenting the happineſs of his ſubjects. He fixed on the anniverſary of his birth-day to render it memorable by a new inſtance of humanity; and he aboliſhed for ever the inhuman practice of putting the queſtion, as it was called, by torture; a cuſtom which had been ſo eſtabliſhed by the practice and concurrence of ages, that it ſeemed to be an indiviſible part of the conſtitution of the courts of juſtice of France. At the ſame time, to defray the expences of war, he continued to diminiſh his own expenditure; and ſacrificing his magnificence to the eaſe of his ſubjects, diſmiſſed at once no leſs than four hundred and ſix officers belonging to his court.

A. D. 1781.] It was indeed alone by the moſt rigid economy that France was able to ſupply the demands for the diſtant and various warfare in which ſhe had engaged. The councils of Spain were ſtill marked by that imbecility which for near a century had characteriſed them; and Holland ſyſtematically ſlow in her deliberations, long diſuſed to war, and ſurprized into hoſtilities, at firſt required, rather than imparted ſupport to her allies; in Europe, in America, the Weſt-Indies, and the Eaſt, the burthen was to be borne by France; and though ſhe could not but ſeverely feel the inceſſant weight, yet her preparations ſtill kept pace with the extent of the ſervice.

In the commencement of the campaign the baron de Rullecourt, with a ſmall band of adventurers, had meditated an attack on the iſland of Jerſey; he embraced the opportunity of a favourable wind, and in the night traverſed the ſea which ſeparates that iſland from France; he landed his men at dawn of day, and his firſt ſucceſs ſeemed to ſanction the temerity of the enterprize. The lieutenant-governor, with the principal inhabitants, were ſurprized, and in the moment of aſtoniſhment ſigned a capitulation; but the major part of the garriſon refuſed to accede to the conditions; their numbers were ſwelled by the natives, who had recovered from their firſt panic; and the detachment of the baron de Rullecourt was encompaſſed and aſſailed on every ſide. The baron himſelf fell, gallantly fighting at the head of his faithful adherents, the greater part of the French were either cut to pieces or taken priſoners, and a few only with better fortune regained their veſſels, and eſcaped to the coaſt of Normandy, with the melancholy intelligence of the fate of their companions.

Towards the latter end of June the fleet of France, conſiſting of eighteen ſhips of the line, under the command of the count de Guichen, quitted Breſt, and joined the fleet of Spain at Cadiz. The united ſquadrons, which preſented the formidable ſpectacle of fifty ſhips of the line, ſteered ſouth-eaſt, and detached two ſhips of the line with ſeveral frigates, to eſcort the duke de Crillon and a conſierable body of land forces to Minorca: the invaſion of which iſland had been determined on by the courts of Verſailles and Madrid. After performing this ſervice, the combined naval ſtrength of the houſe of Bourbon directed their courſe towards the Engliſh coaſts; admiral Darby, with the Britiſh fleet of twenty-three ſhips of the line, haſtily retired before them into the friendly harbour of Torbay; but the elements warred in favour of the Engliſh; a violent tempeſt diſperſed the united fleets, and compelled each of them to ſeek ſhelter from its fury in their own ports.

The French availed themſelves of their ſuperiority at ſea, to reinforce the duke de Crillon in his attack on Minorca, with ſeveral veteran regiments, under the command of the baron de Falkenheyn; but it was in the Weſt-Indies and America that their principal efforts were directed. Towards the end of March monſieur de Graſſe, with twenty ſhips of the line, one of fifty-four guns, and ſeveral frigates, with ſix thouſand land forces, ſailed from Breſt for Martinico. Off Fort-Royal he diſcerned the Baitiſh fleet of ſeventeen ſail of the line commanded by admiral Hood. The convoy with which monſieur de Graſſe was encumbered, compelled him at firſt to prepare for action with caution; but four ſhips of the line having eluded the endeavours of the Britiſh admiral, and joined the French from Fort-Royal, he now determined to avail himſelf of this decided ſuperiority, and to bring on a general engagement. In the mean time the Engliſh had been reinforced alſo by a ſhip of ſeventy-four guns, and their commander diſplayed admirable ſkill in his manœuvres; yet the advantages of the French were numerous and evident, and a conflict of three hours was only terminated by night. On the return of day monſieur de Graſſe would have renewed the engagement; but the Engliſh, who had ſuffered ſeverely, bore away to Antigua; they were purſued by the French, who, incapable of forcing them, under the batteries of that iſland, directed their operations to the reduction of the Britiſh ſettlements.

In the beginning of the war France had been ſeverely mortified by the loſs of St. Lucia, and ſhe now aſpired to the recovery of that iſland; great part of the Engliſh garriſon had been drafted away for the capture of St. Euſtatius, a wealthy ſettlement belonging to the Dutch; and while the captors revelled in their ſpoils, the marquis de Bouille, whoſe enterpriſing genius had already been repeatedly diſplayed, with the viſcount Damas, and a conſiderable body of troops, landed on St. Lucia. They immediately occupied the town of Gros-Iſlet, and ſummoned brigadier-general St. Leger, the commanding officer, to ſurrender; but the marquis was ſoon convinced that the ſtrength of the Engliſh far exceeded what the natives, impatient to return under the government of France, had deſcribed; a greater object, and leſs difficult of acceſs, was in view; and the French commander, having diſguiſed his intentions from the enemy, by every preparation for a vigorous aſſault, ſuddenly reimbarked his troops in the night, and ſteered his courſe towards Tobago.

Againſt that iſland he had previouſly detached a ſmall French ſquadron, with a conſiderable body of troops, under the conduct of monſieur de Blanchelande, late governor of St. Vincent's. The feeble garriſon of Tobago, ſcarce amounting to five-hundred men gradually retired before the invaders to Concordia, a high ground, naturally ſtrong, and which commands a view of both ſides of the iſland. They were there inveſted by monſieur de Blanchelande; and the marquis de Bouille, ſoon after arriving with the fleet of France, aſſumed the ſupreme command.

Though that nobleman was poſſeſſed of ſuch a ſuperiority in the number of his troops, yet the reſiſtance of the garriſon of Tobago was long and obſtinate; during ſix days in the poſt of Concordia they maintained an undaunted countenance; and when the French had occupied the adjacent hills, which in ſome meaſure commanded the poſt, the Engliſh on a ſudden quitted it, and retreated to another ſtation almoſt equally ſtrong, and at a conſiderable diſtance.

But theſe efforts, though they protracted, could not avert the final ſubmiſſion of the iſland; the ardour of the marquis de Bouille was increaſed by the difficulties that ſucceſſively aroſe; under a burning ſun, he in perſon conducted his troops through the moſt intricate paſſages of the iſland; to unite terror to force, he reduced to aſhes two of the neighbouring and moſt capital plantations; a ſquadron, that had been diſpatched by admiral Rodney to the relief of Tobago, had been chaced, and with difficulty eſcaped the purſuit of the French fleet, and the inhabitants, hopeleſs of ſuccour, at length conſented to ſurrender. The marquis, inſtead of being irritated by the obſtacles their perſeverence had preſented, diſplayed an example of generoſity worthy of imitation by all other ſucceſsful commanders, and granted to the vanquiſhed the ſame favourable conditions as had been granted to the inhabitants of Dominica.

Tobago had ſcarce ſubmitted to the dominion of France, before the Britiſh fleet, under admiral Rodney, appeared in ſight. Monſieur de Graſſe immediately got under ſail, and offered his rival battle; the Engliſh, informed of the total loſs of the iſland, the relief of which was moſt probably their ſole object, thought proper to decline the encounter; and the French admiral, inſtead of conſuming his hours in a fruitleſs purſuit, re-convoyed the marquis de Bouille to Martinico, touched at the Havannah to receive a conſiderable ſupply of money, and with twenty-eight ſail of the line and ſeveral frigates directed his courſe towards America, and anchored in the Cheſapeak the laſt day of Auguſt.

From the deſertion of General Arnold, the principal army of the Americans under general Waſhington had remained in a ſtate of inaction within their lines near New-York, and were content with vigilantly obſerving the Britiſh commander at that place, who ſeemed ſatisfied with maintaining his ground, without attempting to extend his limits The French under count Rochambeau, incapable of undertaking any important enterpriſe alone, had diligently employed themſelves in ſtrengthening the fortifications of Rhode-Iſland. But the war that languiſhed in this quarter, was revived with increaſe of fury in the ſouthern provinces. In South and North-Carolina, and Virginia, a variety of obſtinate and indeciſive engagements had taken place between the generals Gates, Greene, and Sumpter, in the ſervice of the United States; and the lords Cornwallis and Rawdon, who commanded the Britiſh forces. At Camden general Gates had ſuffered a ſevere defeat from an inferior army under lord Cornwallis; and though that nobleman had afterwards in his turn reaſon to lament the viciſſitudes of war, and was mortified by the total deſtruction of ſeveral detachments, yet a ſecond victory that he obtained at Guildford, in North-Carolina, over general Greene, had confirmed his reputation, and extended the terror of his arms throughout the adjacent country.

The miniſters of Great Britain had early entertained an opinion that ſeems to have accompanied them throughout the whole courſe of the war; and the idea that the greateſt part of the Americans were ſtill inclined to ſubmit to the ancient form of government, was induſtriouſly inculcated in England, where it was neceſſary to deceive the people into the pecuniary grants requiſite for the continuance of hoſtilities. but the fallacy of this opinion was ſufficiently expoſed by the victories of lord Cornwallis; even after the ſplendid action of Guildford, the friends that joined the Britiſh ſtandard were few, and inconſiderable in point of conſequence; and the victorious commander was ſoon obliged to abandon the ſcene of his triumph, and conſult his ſafety by a precipitate retreat into the province of Virginia.

The Engliſh had ſome time before detached their new convert Arnold, to invade that country, which, interſected with wide and navigable rivers, afforded a proper theatre for their naval exertions, and which had largely contributed from its flouriſhing plantations to furniſh the reſources of Congreſs. The ardour of that officer, in the cauſe he had lately eſpouſed, was not inferior to that which he had formerly diſplayed in the ſervice of the United States. His ravages ſoon drew the attention of general Waſhington; and the marquis de la Fayette was detached with a ſmall but ſelect corps to obſerve his motions and haraſs his rear. The French at Rhode-iſland alſo thought that a proper opportunity offered of atoning for their former inactivity; and that they might render a moſt effectual ſervice to their allies, by cutting off the retreat of Arnold and his party from the Cheſapeak. To reconnoitre that bay they diſpatched a ſhip of the line and ſome frigates; this ſmall ſquadron fell in with and captured the Romulus, a Britiſh man of war of forty-four guns; and ſoon after count Rochambeau having embarked the land forces, with the French fleet under monſieur Ternay, ſailed from Rhode-iſland.

A dreadful tempeſt had driven the Engliſh fleet from its ſtation before that iſland; but monſieur Ternay had ſcarce made Cape-Henry, before he was diſagreeably ſurpriſed by the appearance of the Britiſh ſquadron under admiral Greaves; an action immediately enſued, which though indeciſive, and attended with no particular loſs on either ſide, yet ſo far diſabled the French ſhips, as to render it prudent to return to Rhode-Iſland, and diſconcerted the ſanguine hopes they had formed of affording their allies the moſt eſſential aſſiſtance.

In the interval general Clinton had ſtrongly reinforced the detachment in Virginia, and nominated to the chief command of it general Phillips, an officer of approved abilities. The inferiority of the marquis de la Fayette allowed him only to obſerve the motions of the enemy, and while he remained on the oppoſite ſide of James-River, he witneſſed with indignation thoſe devaſtations which he was too weak to reſtrain.

It was at this critical juncture, when general Phillips had juſt fallen a victim to the heat of the climate, and the fatigues he had endured in a toilſome and deſultory war, that lord Cornwallis, unable any longer to ſubſiſt in the exhauſted province of Carolina, directed his attention to Virginia: with his way-worn army he traverſed a hoſtile country of above three hundred miles, and arrived at Peterſburg a few days after general Phillips had breathed his laſt. He immediately aſſumed the chief command, was reinforced by about two thouſand infantry from New-York, and diſplayed that active vigour, the prominent feature of his charcter. He completed the devaſtation which had been left unfiniſhed by Arnold, puſhed his ſucceſs as far as Williamſburg, the capital of Virginia, on his retreat defeated a conſiderable corps which the marquis de la Fayette preſſed forward to impede his paſſage of James-River, and eſtabliſhed his place of arms at York-Town, ſituated on the banks of the river of that name, and which, as it was navigable for ſhips of great ſize and burthen, enabled him to receive any ſuccours or ſupport by ſea.

This poſt, which at leaſt promiſed ſecurity, lord Cornwallis diligently applied himſelf to fortify; but the hour was now rapidly approaching, deſtined to terminate the carreer of that commander, and by a deciſive blow finally to eſtabliſh the independence of America. By a ſeries of the moſt artful addreſs, general Waſhington had deceived his antagoniſt Clinton; count de Rochembeau had paſſed over from Rhode-Iſland; and in conjunction with the American army, menaced New-York with an immediate attack; that poſt, with its dependencies, was kept in a continual ſtate of alarm for above ſix weeks; when the combined army of French and Americans rapidly traverſed the Jerſeys, croſſed the Delaware, paſſed through Philadelphia, and arrived at the head of the river Elk, at the bottom of the Cheſapeak.

On the ſame day monſieur de Graſſe, with his fleet from the Weſt-Indies, arrived alſo in the bay, where, after blocking up York-River, he inſtantly applied himſelf to ſecure the river James, which he occupied with his armed veſſels and his cruiſers to a conſiderable diſtance; by this manœuvre he not only precluded lord Cornwallis from any retreat to the Carolinas, but alſo was enabled to convey in ſecurity the marquis de Saint Simon, with three thouſand three hundred land forces from the Weſt-Indies, eighteen leagues up that river, where he formed a junction with the marquis de la Fayette, who had already been reinforced by general Wayne, and the ſuccours from Pennſylvania.

The fleet of monſieur de Graſſe conſiſted of twenty four ſhips of the line; and the approach of the Britiſh ſquadron of nineteen ſhips of the line under the admirals Greaves and Hood, might rather have furniſhed matter of exultation than dread; but the operations of monſieur de Graſſe chiefly tended to the reduction of lord Cornwallis's army at York-Town; he expected every hour to be joined by the ſquadron from Rhode-Iſland, commanded ſince the death of monſieur Ternay, by monſier de Barras, whom he knew had already ſailed with ſeveral tranſports, and a train of artillery for the ſiege of York-Town, and fifteen hundred of his ſeamen were ſtill employed in tranſporting the French troops up James River. Under theſe circumſtances he conſidered it as unadviſable to hazard much; and though he ſtood out to ſea, and engaged the Engliſh fleet, he was ſatisfied with maintaining the honour of the flag of France; and without attempting to improve his advantage, he retired to his former ſtation in Cheſapeak bay, where he was ſoon after ſtrengthened by the arrival of monſieur de Barras.

The united forces of France and America now diligently proceeded cloſely to inveſt lord Cornwallis, who with ſeven thouſand ſelect troops ſtill occupied York-Town. The count de Rochambeau, and the marquis de la Fayette, with an equal number of French, extended from the river above the town to a moraſs in the centre, where they met the Americans under Waſhington, who occupied the oppoſite ſide from the river to that ſpot. Monſieur de Graſſe was entirely maſter of Cheſapeak-bay; and the duke of Lauzun with his legion, and a body of Virginia militia under general Wieden, already preſſed the poſt at Glouceſter-Point, which was defended by colonel Tarleton with about ſix hundred infantry and cavalry.

Thus having ſurrounded their prey on every quarter, the different commanders began to urge their attacks with a vivacity that precluded every hope of relief; the works of the Engliſh were penetrated by an hundred pieces of heavy ordinance; their defences were in many places ruined; and moſt of their guns were ſilenced; two redoubts ſtill incommoded the progreſs of the allied army, but the trenches had ſcarce been opened a week before it was determined to attack theſe as ſoon as the approach of the evening ſhould conceal the motions of the aſſailants. To balance the honour as well as the duty between both nations, the attack of one was committed to the French, and of the other to the Americans. The former advanced with that impetuoſity which ever has been their characteriſtic; and though the reſiſtance of the Engliſh was firm and gallant, they were at length driven from their poſt, and the ſtandard of France was diſplayed from the redoubt; the Americans on their ſide had been equally ſucceſsful, and the fate of lord Cornwallis appeared unavoidable; ſome damage occaſioned by two ſallies that he had made was quickly repaired; and his attempt to eſcape to the oppoſite ſide of the river was fruſtrated by the tempeſtuous weather and the vigilance of the French ſhips of war.

The ardour of count Rochambeau and general Waſhington was ſtimulated by the rumour of relief from general Clinton; and ten days after the trenches were firſt opened, every preparation was made for a final aſſault; but this ſcene of carnage was averted by the prudence of the Britiſh commander, who, ſenſible of his hopeleſs ſituation, reſolved not to ſacri ce wantonly the lives of the gallant men entruſted to his care: he accordingly opened a negociation, by which the troops under his command ſubmitted to become priſoners of war; the Guadaloupe frigate of twenty-four guns, with ſeveral tranſports, and fifteen hundred ſeamen, in the diviſion of the ſpoils were aſſigned to monſieur de Graſſe, in return for the French naval power and aſſiſtance; but the land forces, amounting to between five and ſix thouſand men, became the captives of the United States of America.

Such was the important and deciſive atchievement of France and America, which may be conſidered as ultimately ſealing the independence of the latter. The conduct of the French officers in the mom nt of victory had been as conſpicuous for humanity, as their valour had been diſtinguiſhed in the hour of danger; ſuch was the teſtimony of the vanquiſhed commander, who, in his official diſpatches to the miniſters of Great-Britain, declared "their delicate ſenſibility of "our ſituation, their generous and preſſing offers of money, both public and "private to any amount, has really gone beyond what I can poſſibly deſcribe; "and will I hope make an impreſſion on the breaſt of every Britiſh officer, whenever the fortune of war ſhould put any of them into our power."

It was not alone the elder branch of the houſe of Bourbon that triumphed on the northern continent of America. An armament had been fitted out by Spain from the Havannah, and though at firſt it was ſcattered by a ſudden and violent tempeſt, yet a perſevering people continued their attempts, penetrated deep into Weſt-Florida, and with an army of eight-thouſand men, inveſted Penſacola, the capital of that province; general Campbell, the governor, made a gallant defence; but the weakneſs of his garriſon compelled him at length to ſurrender. The Spaniards, brave themſelves, reſpected the valour of their enemy; the moſt favourable terms of capitulation were granted, and the ſtandard of Spain was erected on the walls of Penſacola.

But Gibraltar, the favourite object of the court of Madrid, ſtill continued to deride her attempts, and fruſtrate her inceſſant enterpriſes. A ſcheme to deſtroy the Panther and Experiment, two Britiſh ſhips of war, by means of fire ſhips, was rendered abortive by the vigilance and intrepidity of the Engliſh captains; and Spain, throughout the whole ſiege, had reaſon to regret her treaſures laviſhly expended, and her troops fruitleſsly employed.

Holland, unprepared abroad and diſunited at home, was an ally that claimed the more immediate attention and ſupport of the court of Verſailles; in the Weſt-Indies the Britiſh commanders had eagerly invaded the iſland of St. Euſtatius; that ſettlement during the war had become the general magazine of all nations; and the valuable commodities which it contained, became a prey to the rapacity of the victors. Yet the conquerors reaped not that advantage which they expected from their indiſcriminate confiſcation; ſeveral of the veſſels richly laden with ſpoil were intercepted on their voyage to Europe, and even in ſight of the Britiſh coaſt, by monſieur de la Motte Piquet, who was cruizing off the Lizard with ſix ſhips of the line and five frigates. And before the cloſe of the year the iſland itſelf was recovered by the activity of the marquis de Bouille, who ſuddenly landed with a ſelect body of troops from Martinico, ſurpriſed colonel Cockburn the Engliſh commandant, and reſtored St. Euſtatius to the dominion of the Dutch, the very day before count de Graſſe caſt anchor at Fort-Royal from his deciſive triumph on the coaſt of America.

But it was in the Eaſt that the republic of Holland was moſt vulnerable; and her excluſive poſſeſſions of the ſpice iſlands, her wealthy and populous ſettlement of Batavia, afforded the moſt faſcinating allurements to the avarice of her enemies. In the beginning of the war France had received with indignation the intelligence that her ſettlements throughout Aſia had been ſwept away by the power of the Engliſh; ſhe therefore readily liſtened to propoſals which tended to reſtore her own colonies in the Eaſt, and to ſecure thoſe of her ally; ſhe ſigned a treaty with the republic, which was to put her troops in poſſeſſion of the Cape of Good Hope, a port on the African coaſt, the moſt convenient for refreſhments on the long voyage to India; and ſhe alſo engaged to detach an armament to act in conjunction with the Dutch forces in the Eaſt.

To fulfil this treaty, at the ſame time that the count de Graſſe ſailed from Breſt to the Weſt-Indies, monſieur de Suffrein with five ſhips of the line and a conſiderable body of land forces was detached to the Eaſt, and the Cape of Good Hope. On his arrival at St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd iſlands, he diſcerned a Britiſh ſquadron of nearly equal force at anchor within the harbour; this had ſailed from England under the conduct of commodore Johnſtone, much about the ſame time as Suffrein had quitted Breſt, and was deſigned to ſurpriſe the Dutch ſettlement at the Cape of Good Hope. The impetuoſity of Suffrein, who was ſenſible how deeply the intereſts of his country were concerned in the deſtruction of this armament, prevailed over his reſpect to the crown of Portugal; and he heſitated not to enter a neutral harbour as an enemy, and to attack the Engliſh. But though in this enterpriſe he diſplayed the moſt daring ſpirit and undaunted reſolution, yet all the efforts of courage ſerved only to expoſe his ſhips to the deſtructive fire of his adverſary, who derived advantages from his ſituation that neither ſkill nor courage could compenſate. The French commander was reluctantly compelled to abandon the attack, and after touching at the Cape of Good Hope, and reinforcing that ſettlement with a ſufficient number of troops to ſecure it from inſult, he ſteered to the iſland of Mauritius, to join the count d'Orves, who, after the loſs of Pondicherry, had aſſembled at that place the ſcattered remnant of the French forces.

But while France rather hoped than expected to eſtabliſh her ancient power and influence on the coaſt of Coromandel, her ambitious views were ſeconded by a new and formidable enemy to Great-Britain, who ſuddenly burſting through the unguarded paſſes, deluged with his myriads the devoted ſettlements of the Engliſh. This daring invader was Hyder-Ali, whoſe ſucceſsful ambition had raiſed him from an humble ſituation to an extenſive empire in the Eaſt, and who had eſtabliſhed ſuch a military force as India had never beheld, and was thought incapable of producing. He had more than once diſputed the honour of victory with the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company; and though frequently defeated, yet he ſtill appeared terrible, and had even menaced with his martial ſquadrons the capital of the victors, who were confounded by the rapid evolutions of a cavalry that precluded all flight, and derided all purſuit.

In the hour of preſumptuous confidence, the Engliſh had violated the dignity of his throne by the reduction of Mahé, a French ſettlement eſtabliſhed within his dominions, and under his protection. This inſult had awakened thoſe reſentments which had rather been ſuſpended than extinguiſhed by former treaties; the ſupineneſs of the government of Madras encouraged his hopes; he penetrated through the ghauts, or narrow paſſes in the mountains, which ſeperate his territories from thoſe of the Engliſh, and with a celerity that exceeds deſcription, extended his bloody ravages over the face of the Carnatic. A conſiderable detachment, the flower of the Engliſh army on that coaſt, was overwhelmed after a gallant reſiſtance by the irreſiſtable weight of his cavalry. General Munro, who commanded the principal army belonging to the ſettlement of Madras, was reduced to retreat before the torrent of his arms; Madras even trembled for her ſafety; and the progreſs of the victor was only checked by the arrival of general Coote with a large reinforcement from the province of Bengal. After an obſtinate conflict Hyder was compelled to relinquiſh the field to the ſuperior ſkill of that veteran commander, and the perſevering valour of his troops; but his numerous cavalry were ſtill ſpread over the fertile fields of the Carnatic, and extended on every ſide the terror of his name.

It was under the preſſure of this unexpected and formidable invaſion that the Engliſh firſt received the intelligence of a rupture with the United States of Holland; and they diſplayed no ſmall degree of vigour in cruſhing the ſettlements of this new enemy before they could co-operate, or receive aſſiſtance from Hyder; in Bengal, Chinſura; on the coaſt of Coromandel, Negapatam; and Trincomalé in the iſland of Ceylon, were ſurprized or reduced by the Engliſh; and Holland beheld with terror the ſtorm that threatened her ſettlements in Sumatra, Java, and the Moluccas.

But if in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies the Dutch ſcarce diſplayed the ſhadow of reſiſtance, in Europe they diſcovered a degree of reſolution that aſtoniſhed their friends, appalled their enemies, and reſtored that reputation for patient and obſtinate courage which had emancipated them from the fetters of the houſe of Auſtria, and had raiſed them to conteſt with Great-Britain the dominion of the ſeas. The Dogger-bank was the ſcene where the Dutch and Engliſh encountered each other with equal valour and mutual animoſity; their ſquadrons, which conſiſted of the ſame number of ſhips, ſeemed animated with a rage that knew no alternative between victory and death. The diſabled ſtate of their veſſels compelled at length the combatants to deſiſt; and though the Dutch, by retiring to their harbours, acknowledged the victory to the Engliſh, yet theſe were incapable of improving their advantage, and were glad alſo to ſhelter their ſhattered ſhips in port.

But whatever ſatisfaction France might derive from the ſpirit of her ally, it ſerved not to counterbalance that diſcontent with which the people in general beheld the diſmiſſal of a miniſter in whom they placed the moſt unbounded confidence. Monſieur Necker, in the management of the finances had acquired the reputation of activity, induſtry, and ſevere integrity; he had conceived the arduous, but popular project of maintaining a war by loans without taxes; and the rigid economy that he had introduced into all the departments of the royal houſhold, and the various reſources that preſented themſelves to his fertile genius, had ſupported him amidſt the difficulties that attended this ſyſtem. But his auſterity of temper, had not rendered him equally acceptable to the ſovereign and his ſubjects; the repeated reforms he had recommended, were repreſented as inconſiſtent with the dignity of the crown; he was diſmiſſed from his office of comptroller-general, and monſieur Joli de Fleuri, counſellor of ſtate, was appointed to that important department.

The birth of the dauphin cloſed the memorable occurrences of the year, and though it could not extinguiſh the regret, ſerved to divert the attention of the Pariſians; the young prince was baptiſed by the cardinal de Rohan; the count of Provençe and the princeſs Elizabeth, repreſented as ſponſors the emperor of Germany and the princeſs of Piedmont, and beſtowed on their royal nephew the names of Lewis, Joſeph, Xavier, and Francis.

A. D. 1782.] The advantages which, at the close of the last campaign, had been obtained by the arms of France, were at the commencement of this, diligently improved by the ministers of Lewis; and the greatest exertions were called forth by the house of Bourbon to bring the war to a speedy and successful conclusion. The siege of Minorca, which had been undertaken in the preceding year, was terminated in the beginning of the present by the surrender of St. Philips; the garrison were made prisoners of war; and their commander, general Murray, acknowledged in the most express terms the humane treatment they experienced from the victorious leaders, the duke de Crillon and the baron de Falkenhayen.

The capture of the army under lord Cornwallis had insured the independence of America, and the subsequent operations in that quarter were confined to some faint struggles made by the English in the Carolinas and Georgia. France was now at leisure to direct her attention to the East and West-Indies; and monsieur de Grasse from the Chesapeak had steered his course to Martinico; his naval force when collected, consisted of thirty ships of the line; but he had already detached four to convoy from St. Domingo the homeward bound trade to Europe. The court of Versailles, to supply this deficiency, had fitted out at Brest nine ships of the line, under the command of the marquis de Vaudreuil; these were accompanied by a numerous convoy of transports, destined for the service of the East and West: and they were escorted by the count de Guichen, who sailed at the same time with ten ships of the line to join the grand-fleet of Spain off Cadiz. Off Scilly they were intercepted by the British fleet of thirteen ships of the line under admiral Kempenfelt; the admirable manœuvres of that officer were seconded by the favourable state of the wind, and the count de Guichen had the mortification to behold his convoy dispersed, and several of them taken by an inferior force. He himself continued his course to Cadiz, while the marquis de Vaudreuil, having detached part of his squadron to the Cape of Good Hope, with the rest joined monsieur de Grasse at Martinico.

That commander immediately prepared to avail himself of his decided superiority over the English squadron in those seas. With the marquis de Bouille, who had already erected the standard of France on the island of Nevis, he planned the attack of St. Christopher's, one of the most considerable of the West-India islands that yet remained to Great-Britain. The marquis landed with eight thousand men and a formidable train of artillery, while the count de Grasse, occupied with his fleet Basseterre-road, and seem to preclude every hope of relief; general Frazer, the English commander, immediately retired to Brimstone-hill, a strong post, which he declared he would defend to the last extremity. But the operations of the French were soon interrupted, by the appearance of a British squadron of twenty two ships of the line, conducted by admiral Hood, an officer of approved skill and experience. The count de Grasse, whose naval force consisted of twenty-nine large ships, hesitated not to quit his station to encounter his daring adversary. The action was partial and indecisive; but in the course of it admiral Hood, by a ſudden change of diſpoſition, deceived the count de Graſſe, eluded his attack, and preſſing towards the iſland, gained the very anchorage in Baſſeterre-road which the French fleet had quitted.

Though the count de Graſſe could not but admire the ſuperior dexterity of his adverſary, he was by no means inclined to leave him in quiet poſſeſſion of his advantage. The next morning with his whole force he attacked the Engliſh ſquadron from van to rear; but theſe ſuſtained with a ſteady fire the repeated efforts of the French; and though the count in the courſe of the evening renewed the attempt, the damage that his ſhips had incurred compelled him reluctantly to deſiſt.

The marquis de Bouille could not be indifferent to the operations of the hoſtile fleets, whoſe fate was likely to involve his own; but inſtead of deſponding or endeavouring to retreat, he puſhed his attacks with encreaſe of ardour. Brimſtone-Hill was cloſely inveſted on every ſide; and while he conſided the blockade of that poſt to the marquis of St. Simon, he himſelf marched with four-thouſand troops to encounter a detachment that had been landed from the Britiſh ſhips. Although the ſtrong ſituation and number of theſe, amounting to two-thouſand four-hundred men, rendered an aſſault imprudent, yet the marquis continued vigilantly to obſerve their motions; till, hopeleſs of joining or ſuccouring their countrymen, they re-embarked; in the mean time every moment was aſſiduouſly employed in the annoyance of the Engliſh entrenched on Brimſtone-Hill; the marquis de Bouille had again reſumed the command of the beſiegers; and the inceſſant fire of his artillery had reduced the works and buildings to a heap of ruins. The Engliſh, under the terror of immediate deſtruction, conſented to ſurrender a poſt that they were incapable of defending any longer; and the humanity of the marquis granted the ſame favourable terms of capitulation as had been agreed upon at the reduction of Dominica.

The Engliſh admiral was no ſooner informed of the fate of St. Chriſtophers, than he determined to abandon a ſituation which was no longer either ſecure or uſeful; and this reſolution he executed with a ſecrecy and celerity that prevented all danger from the ſuperior force of count de Graſſe. Under cover of the night he cut his cables; and ſailing from Baſſeterre-Road, directed his courſe towards Barbadoes, in hopes of joining a conſiderable ſquadron that was hourly expected from England; while the count de Graſſe and the marquis de Bouille, after the reduction of Montſerrat, returned to Martinico.

In that road had been aſſembled one hundred and fifty tranſports, with a large quantity of artillery, and a conſiderable body of land forces.—Theſe were deſtined for an enterprize which, had it proved ſucceſsful, muſt have extinguiſhed in the Weſt-Indies the power of Great Britain. The count de Graſſe, whoſe fleet already amounted to thirty-three ſail of the line fit for action, was to have been joined by a ſtrong Spaniſh ſquadron from the Havannah; and the united force of the houſe of Bourbon was to have been directed againſt Jamaica, the moſt flouriſhing ſettlement belonging to the Engliſh in that quarter of the globe.

In purſuance of this deſign, the count quitted Fort-Royal bay about the beginning of April, to proceed to the place of his deſtination; but he ſcarce loſt ſight of the iſland of Martinico, before he deſcried the Britiſh fleet, commanded by admiral Rodney, and by late reinforcements from Europe ſwelled to thirty-ſix ſail of the line. He immediately hoiſted the ſignal for action, and ſuſtained with great gallantry the attack of the enemy; but intent on the grand object of his court, he availed himſelf of a favourable wind, and bore away towards Guadaloupe.

But that proſperous fortune which hitherto had attended the enterprizes of France, on this occaſion deſerted her.—In the late action the Zele, a ſeventy-four, had ſuffered material damage; and though the count de Graſſe had gained a conſiderable ſtart of admiral Rodney, yet the ſhattered condition of that ſhip allowed her not to keep up with the reſt of the fleet. The French admiral was now reduced to the painful alternative of hazarding the ſucceſs of his expedition by a ſecond action, or to indure the diſgrace of abandoning the Zele a prey to the purſuing enemy.

On this trying occaſion he determined to preſerve inviolate the honour of the French flag; and though his judgment has been arraigned, ſince, in relinquiſhing the Zele, and haſtening to join the Spaniſh ſquadron, he might have ſeverely revenged the loſs of that ſhip by the probable reduction of Jamaica, yet the more honourable reſolution was in ſome meaſure ſanctioned by the ſtate of the fleet under his command, and the probability that this engagement, like all the preceding ones, might prove indeciſive.

In this hope he bore down to ſuccour the Zele, and compelled the moſt forward of the Engliſh ſhips to retire at the moment that they were ready to attack her; the approach of night precluded all immediate action; but in the morning the French admiral found the Engliſh had gained the wind of him, and that he muſt ſtake the fortune of France on a deciſive engagement. This was continued from ſeven in the morning till half paſt ſix in the evening, when the ſetting ſun put an end to the conteſt and to the hopes of France. The Ville de Paris, of one hundred and ten guns, commanded by count de Graſſe himſelf, the Glorieux, the Hector, and the Cæſar of ſeventy-four, with the Ardent of ſixty-four, were compelled to ſtrike to the ſuperior fortune of Great-Britain; the Cæſar ſoon after caught fire and blew up; while the marquis de Vaudreuil collected part of the ſcattered fleet, and with nineteen ſhips of the line eſcaped to Martinico; the reſt, ſhattered and diſperſed, endeavoured to reach the neareſt ports and elude the purſuit of the victors.

If the prudence of the count de Graſſe was in ſome meaſure impeached, his courage was univerſally acknowledged: though wounded, he defended his ſhip to the laſt extremity; and before he conſented to ſtrike his flag, the Ville de Paris reſembled a wreck. He was received on board the Barfleur with thoſe marks of reſpect that the brave never fail to ſhew to each other; after continuing a ſhort time at Jamaica, he was conveyed to England, and was there honoured by the conſtant attention of the royal family; while the applauſe of the multitude, who admired the perſonal gallantry of their enemy, contributed to ſooth the painful recollection of defeat.

The misfortunes of France ended not with the twelfth of April. The Cato and the Jaſon, two men of war of ſixty-four guns each, with the Amiable of thirty-two, and the Ceres of eighteen guns, were taken by a ſquadron under admiral Hood, detached from the main Engliſh fleet; the ſame baneful influence ſeemed alſo to extend to Europe; and in that month the Pegaſe of ſeventy-four guns, and the Actionnaire of ſixty-four, which had ſailed from Breſt for the Eaſt-Indies, with ten ſhips of their convoy were captured by the Engliſh off Uſhant.

The marquis de Vaudreuil, after the late defeat, ſteered with the remnant of the fleet that he could collect from Cape-Francois to America; but riſing under the preſſure of calamity, he previouſly detached monſieur Peyrouſe in the Sceptre of ſeventy-four guns, with two large frigates, againſt the remote poſſeſſions and property of the Engliſh Hudſon's Bay Company. As the marquis was unacquainted with the defenceleſs ſtate of theſe ſettlements, he added three hundred ſoldiers, with ſome mortars and cannon for the ſieges that might preſent themſelves.

But the only difficulties that monſieur Peyrouſe encountered were thoſe which attended the navigation of obſcure ſtreights and gulphs, among the frozen regions of the north; and for three weeks, from the moment that they paſſed the iſlands of Reſolution, which mark the entrance into Hudſon's-Straits, they were inceſſantly expoſed to new and imminent peril; notwithſtanding the power of the ſun in the month of July, the ſhips at one time were ſo faſt locked up in the ice, that the ſeamen went on foot from one to the other; and when after they had extricated themſelves, things appeared ſo hopeleſs, that monſieur Peyrouſe even meditated on ſending back the Sceptre with one of the frigates to the Weſt-Indies, and of wintering himſelf with the other frigate and a part of the troops in the Bay. So ſevere a trial of his conſtancy was however prevented by the appearance of a ſmall opening in the ice two days afterwards; through this the ſhips forced their way with a preſs of ſail, and afterwards diſcovered, to their no ſmall joy, the Engliſh colours flying from a fort on the banks of Churchill-River.

If the toils and dangers of the voyage had been great, ſome compenſation was afforded by the facility of the conqueſt; the forts of the Hudſon's-Bay Company were only garriſoned by a motley crew of ſtore-keepers, clerks, and ſervants, who ſurrendered on the firſt appearance of an European enemy. Some few ſought ſhelter in the deep and impenetrable woods; and monſieur Peyrouſe having by the deſtruction of the forts and merchandiſe completed the object of his expedition, had yet the humane precaution to preſerve one of the magazines, in which he depoſited proviſions, arms, and ammunition for the uſe and ſubſiſtence of the fugitives who had eluded his purſuit, and who during the long and approaching winter could not have received any relief from home.

While France in every quarter of the globe diſplayed that active ſpirit which could not be repreſſed by defeat, the patient courage of the Spaniards was ſtill exerciſed in the ſiege of Gibraltar. The duke de Crillon, adorned with the laurels of Minorca, aſpired to additional fame from this more arduous enterpriſe; and the count d'Artois, and the duke of Bourbon, diſdaining the eaſe and luxury of Verſailles, animated the camp of St. Roche by their preſence. But they had ſcarce arrived before they endured the mortification of beholding the principal works of the beſiegers deſtroyed. A heavy fire of hot ſhot and ſhells from the batteries of the garriſon ſoon communicated the deſtructive flames to the batteries and magazines of the Spaniards, and the labour of months was conſumed in a few hours.

Yet the court of Madrid though often baffled, ſtill perſevered: and to preclude the garriſon of Gibraltar from the hope of relief, the combined fleets of France and Spain, conſiſting of forty-four ſhips of the line, were directed to block up the harbour. This was but the prelude to a new and different mode of attack, which had long been meditated, and on which the moſt ſanguine expectations were grounded. Ten ſhips of different ſizes, from ſix hundred to fourteen hundred tons burthen, were converted into floating batteries. They were ſecured by every art that ingenuity could deviſe, and provided with every offenſive or defenſive material that experience ſuggeſted, or the wealth of Spain could furniſh. Two hundred and twelve braſs guns, each of them carrying balls of twenty-ſix pounds, menaced from their maſſy decks immediate deſtruction; they were ſupported by a ſufficient number of frigates; and three hundred large boats were alſo collected for the conveyance of the troops that were ready to avail themſelves of the confuſion of the garriſon, and the breaches that it was expected the floating batteries muſt ſoon occaſion. But Gibraltar was entruſted to the care of general Eliott, an officer whoſe vigilance, courage, and unſhaken reſolution were never excelled; and who with the caution and experience of age, preſerved the activity and enterpriſe of youth. The fire from the floating batteries was indeed terrible; but they were ſoon anſwered by the thunder of the garriſon; and the ſame engines of deſtruction that had proved fatal to the Spaniſh preparations on ſhore now blaſted their hopes at ſea. A ſhower of hot balls and ſhells in a few hours involved the floating batteries in flames; the gun-boats of the Engliſh prevented the Spaniards from approaching to the aſſiſtance of their conntrymen; to avoid the rapid progreſs of one deſtructive element, the miſerable men were compelled to confide themſelves to another; part periſhed by the fire, part were overwhelmed by the ſea, and the ſcanty remnant was only ſaved by the Britiſh ſeamen, who diſcovered the ſame ardour in relieving their enemies, as they had diſplayed an hour before in conquering them.

One reſource ſtill remained to the houſe of Bourbon; and the beſiegers, thus fatally baffled in every aſſault, now reſolved patiently to await the ſlow but certain effects of famine. To prevent the garriſon from receiving any ſupplies, the combined fleets were directed to ſtretch acroſs the bay; but even this diſpoſition could not enſure ſucceſs; a violent tempeſt that aroſe ſhattered their ſhips, and drove on ſhore the Triumphant, a Spaniſh man of war of ſeventy-four guns; and the Engliſh fleet of thirty-four ſail of the line, and a conſiderable convoy, before they could recover from their confuſion, entered the Straits, and landed the troops and proviſions for the relief of Gibraltar. On their return a partial and undeciſive action took place off the Straits-mouth; but the Engliſh had already effected the object of their expedition; and the French and Spaniſh commanders judged it not prudent to preſs an engagement, which, if adverſe, might be attended by the moſt fatal conſequences, and, if ſucceſsful, could not tend to the immediate reduction of that fortreſs.

If the war languiſhed in America, it was reſumed with increaſe of ardour in the Eaſt, and the coaſts of Coromandel were ſtained with the blood of the contending powers. From the Cape of Good Hope monſieur Suffrein had proceeded with favourable winds to the iſland of Mauritius; he there reſigned the command to his ſenior officer, the count d'Orves; and the French fleet, increaſed by this junction, to ten ſhips of the line, and one of fifty guns, beſides ſeveral large frigates, ſailed for the coaſt of Coromandel, accompanied by a number of tranſports and ſtore-ſhips, with a conſiderable body of land forces. On the voyage the count d'Orves, whoſe zeal in the ſervice had roſe ſuperior to the infirmities of a debilitated conſtitution, expired; and the ſole command of the fleet devolved on monſieur Suffrein, whoſe ſkill and courage have deſervedly ranked him among the moſt celebrated naval characters of the age.

On his paſſage he fell in with the Hannibal, a Britiſh man of war of ſixty-four guns, which after a gallant but fruitleſs reſiſtance, was compelled to ſurrender, and ſwelled the number of the French ſquadron. With this addition to his ſtrength he ſwept the Coromandel coaſt, and entered Madras roads in hopes of ſurpriſing, according to the intelligence he had received, the Engliſh admiral, ſir Edward Hughes, with only ſix ſhips of the line. This force he conſidered himſelf capable of eaſily overwhelming; the loſs of the numerous trading ſhips and tranſports in the road muſt have attended the deſtruction of the fleet; and while ſuch an unexpected calamity ſpread terror through the town of Madras, the French forces, joined by Hyder-Ali's numerous army, would have carried on their attacks againſt it by land, and the victorious ſquadron would have aſſailed it by ſea.

From this flattering illuſion, which promiſed to determine the war at a ſingle blow, monſieur Suffrein was awakened to a diſappointment as mortifying as it was unexpected; a few days before the Engliſh ſquadron had been joined by a reinforcement from Europe; they had at the ſame time been apprized of the approach of monſieur de Suffrien; three hundred land forces had been detached from Madras to ſtrengthen their numbers; and the French admiral now beheld, inſtead of the defenceleſs ſquadron, he fondly expected to ſurprize, nine ſhips of the line, drawn up in proper order and ready to receive him.

Under theſe circumſtances all views of attack were abandoned, and monſieur Suffrein ſtood out to ſea with the intention of diſembarking the land forces to the ſupport of Hyder-Ali. The Engliſh, who penetrated his deſign, immediately followed, and an action enſued the next morning, long, bloody, but indeciſive. The preſervation of his convoy was now the chief object of the French commander, but in the courſe of the engagement he diſplayed a degree of intrepidity that extorted the applauſe of his adverſaries. Night only parted the combatants; and monſieur Suffrein repreſſing his ardour, and anxious to ſecure the retreat of his convoy, ſtood off to the north-eaſt.

This important object was no ſooner attained then the French admiral once more directed his courſe in ſearch of the Engliſh. The latter, during this interval, had been reinforced from Europe by two men of war of ſeventy four guns each; but this formidable acceſſion of ſtrength could not damp the courage or alter the reſolution of monſieur Suffrein; he himſelf led the attack on board the Heros of ſeventy-four guns, and continued to engage for a conſiderable time the Engliſh admiral within piſtol-ſhot. The damages ſuſtained by the Heros induced him to ſhift his flag into the Hannibal, a French ſhip of equal force; and by his ſuperior fire he diſabled and drove out of the line the Monmouth of ſixty-four guns.—Though every effort was made to board that ſhip, ſhe was reſcued by the approach of three other Engliſh ſhips; the hoſtile fleets, after a fierce and bloody conteſt, in which they had diſplayed ſimilar gallantry, and ſuffered ſimilar loſs, ſeparated as if by mutual conſent; for ſeveral days following they however kept in ſight of each other: but their reciprocal damages ſuſpending on both ſides all idea of attack; the Engliſh retired to Trincomalé and the French ſquadron proceeded to Batacalo, a Dutch port in the iſland of Ceylon, and about twenty leagues to the ſouthward of Trincomalé.

The war on land raged not with leſs fury than at ſea. In the general deſtruction of the French ſettlements on the commencement of hoſtilities, a ſmall band had found ſhelter in the dominions of Hyder-Ali, and ever ſince under the command of monſieur Lally, had given ſtability to the opperations of that enterpriſing prince. They now, in conjunction with Tippoo-Saheb, the ſon of Hyder, and who inherited the daring ſpirit of his father, attacked a Britiſh detachment under colonel Braithwaite, that had encamped on the banks of the Coleroon, for the protection of Tanjour and the adjoining provinces. This ſmall but ſelect corps conſiſted of two thouſand veteran infantry, with thirteen field-pieces, and two hundred and fifty cavalry. For two ſucceſſive days they repulſed with undaunted reſolution the reiterated attacks of Hyder's cavalry, though amounting to the formidable number of twenty thouſand; but on the third they were broken by the charge of four hundred French, who advanced with bayonets fixed, and were led on by monſieur Lally himſelf. The humanity of that officer was not leſs conſpicious than his courage; he not only iſſued orders for putting a ſtop to the carnage; but haſtened perſonally, and with apparent hazard, to chaſtiſe and reſtrain the cruel fury of the black cavalry, five of whom periſhed by his own hand in the generous exertion. He alſo prevailed on Tippoo-Saheb to commit the priſoners to his care, and endeavoured to ſoothe their misfortues by every mark of kindneſs and reſpect; nor can it have eſcaped the reader, that during the whole courſe of the war, the French and Engliſh mutually vied with each other in acts of generous compaſſion as well as daring valour.

In the firſt engagement with the Engliſh fleet, the ardour of monſieur Suffrein had been reſtrained by a prudent attention to his convoy. He ſoon after landed at Porto-Novo the land forces and artillery that had been entruſted to his care. Theſe were joined by a body of native troops from Hyder-Ali; and the combined army immediately marched to the ſiege of Cuddalore. The feeble garriſon in that place was not long able to reſiſt their arms; and monſieur Duchemin, the French commander, having ſecured a future poſt for the reception of ſuccours, which France before was deſtitute of, now proceeded to more diſtant conqueſts. He accordingly inveſted Permacoil to the northward; and after the reduction of that fort, effected a junction with the main army of Hyder-Ali, and in concert with that prince meditated an attack on Wandiwaſh.

The approach of the Engliſh compelled them to abandon that enterpriſe; and the combined army, ſtrong in their numbers, poſſeſſed themſelves alſo of ſuch advantageous poſts as defied any aſſault. But the Britiſh commander, general Coote, having menaced the ſiege of Arnee, a ſtrong fortreſs in which Hyder's great magazines were depoſited, that prince relinquiſhed his ſituation, and advanced to the protection of it. A battle enſued, in which the allies were routed by the ſuperior diſcipline of their adverſaries. But the native troops, chiefly compoſed of cavalry, eaſily eluded the purſuit of the victors; and monſieur Duchemin had cautiouſly avoided expoſing the French; whom he wiſhed to preſerve entire, till the arrival of the marquis de Buſſy with a conſiderable force, an event that was daily expected, might enable them to act with efficacy.

In conſequence of this plan he retired to Cuddalore, which he induſtriouſly ſtrengthened by new works, and rendered ſecure from any ſudden inſult. The indiſpoſition of general Coote about the ſame time compelled him to quit the field; and the exhauſted ſtate of the country affording ſcarce any ſubſiſtance to the hoſtile armies, no event of any conſiderable importance took place in the Carnatic during the remainder of the year.

But this ceſſation was entirely confined to the land; and the Indian-ocean was ſtill deſtined to be the ſcene of hard and bloody action. Monſieur Suffrein had returned from Batacalo to the coaſt of Coromandel; and having refreſhed his fleet at the Daniſh ſettlement of Tranquebar, he proceeded from thence to Cuddalore, which the French had rendered their ſtrong and great place of arms, both for the land and ſea ſervice. It was his object to attack the Engliſh ſquadron before the arrival of a reinforcement, which he knew had ſailed from England, and was impatiently expected at Madras. He was furniſhed at Cuddalore with four hundred French and as many Sepahis; and to theſe were added three hundred artillery-men, than which no aid could be more thoroughly effective.

Thus ſtrengthened, he appeared off Negapatam, where the Engliſh fleet lay at anchor; and admiral Hughes, impatient of the inſult, immediately quitted the ſecurity of his ſtation to meet his rival. The number of ſhips on each ſide was the ſame as in the laſt engagement; the ſame courage and ſkill were diſplayed, and the event was nearly ſimilar; the French fleet was however reduced to retire firſt from action; the captain of the Severe of ſixty-four guns even ſtruck his colours; but the officer next in rank immediately aſſumed the command, renewed the engagement, and brought off the ſhip, which, with the reſt of the ſquadron, reached Cuddalore; while admiral Hughes, having kept the ſea about a fortnight longer, proceeded to Madras.

Monſieur de Suffrein uſed the utmoſt induſtry and diſpatch in refitting his ſquadron; and having received advice from the ſieur d'Aymar, that he was arrived at Point de Galles, which lies on the ſouth ſide of the iſland of Ceylon, in his own ſhip the St. Michael of ſixty-four guns, accompanied by the Illuſtre of ſeventy-four, and the ſecond diviſion of the marquis de Buſſy's troops, the French admiral immediately ſailed from Cuddalore, and having joined this ſquadron, proceeded with his whole force to the attack of Trincomalé, where he arrived towards the end of Auguſt.

The fire of the Engliſh batteries from that place could not prevent his fleet from anchoring in the moſt advantageous ſtation for the annoyance of the garriſon, the landing of the troops under the conduct of the baron d'Agoult was effected the next day, and the place was immediately inveſted. After two days employed in erecting batteries, thoſe on the left were opened early in the morning, and ſoon gained ſuch a decided ſuperiority, that the Engliſh cannon were ſilenced before night. On the following day monſieur de Suffrein, encouraged by this ſucceſs, ſummoned the garriſon, and captain Macdowal, the Britiſh commandant, convinced that all further defence was fruitleſs, conſented to capitulate.

The terms that he demanded were immediately ſubſcribed by the generoſity and prudence of the French commanders. The hononrs of war were granted in the fulleſt extent; the garriſon was to be directly conveyed to Madras, in ſhips provided at the expence of France; the Dutch inhabitants, as well as the garriſon, were to be ſecured in their private property; and all the rights and privileges of the former were to be preſerved inviolate.

Monſieur de Suffrein had but ſcarce time to poſſeſs and ſecure his new acquiſition, when the Engliſh fleet, on the ſecond of September, was deſcried off Trincomalé; admiral Hughes had been lately joined by a ſhip of ſeventy four guns; but ſtill the advantage was on the ſide of the French, and they were ſuperior to their adverſaries by one ſhip of the line and two of fifty guns. Monſieur de Suffrein now flattered himſelf the moment was arrived when he might eſtabliſh the dominion of France in thoſe ſeas by a glorious and deciſive victory. He accordingly got under ſail, and ſtood out to ſea; and about three o'clock in the evening the action became general. Monſieur de Suffrein himſelf in the Heros again encountered admiral Hughes in the Superbe, and the rival commanders maintained a cloſe and bloody conflict till half paſt five; had the other French officers imitated the conduct of their chief, that day had probaly avenged the fatal defeat of monſieur de Graſſe; but ſeveral ſeemed to conſider their own perſonal ſafety beyond the honour of their country; and though the admiral himſelf, with his ſhip nearly diſmaſted, and one third of his gallant crew killed and wounded, bravely perſevered, he perceived with indignation his hopes of conqueſt blaſted by the cautious manœuvres of his followers. Under cover of the night he reluctantly condeſcended to retire to Trincomalé, whence, no longer under the neceſſity of diſguiſing his ſentiments, he ſent ſix of his captains under arreſt to the iſland of Mauritius; the approach of thoſe hurricanes which, at a certain ſeaſon of the year ſweep with deſtructive fury the coaſt of Coromandel, compelled the hoſtile ſquadrons to conſult their mutual ſafety; and while the French ſought ſhelter at Achèn, a port belonging to the iſland of Sumatra, the Engliſh retired to the friendly harbour of Bombay.

While the fleets and armies of France were thus occupied in the Faſt, the attention of her miniſters at home was directed to the commotions which agitated the republic of Geneva. By the original conſtitution of Geneva, the ſovereign power of the ſtate was veſted in the general council, which conſiſted of the citizens promiſcuouſly aſſembled. By degrees the magiſtrates and ſenate had encreaſed their own authority, and diminiſhed the privileges of the people. The latter had not ſuffered theſe innovations without repeated remonſtrances, and the taxes which the ſenate impoſed, and the ſeverity with which they puniſhed thoſe who were moſt loud in their oppoſition, increaſed the number of the diſaffected. Such a ſtate of things naturally occaſioned frequent conteſts; and to prevent a continuance of diſputes, the democratical party required a regular code of laws, which ſhould be for the rulers the foundation of their authority, and for the people the known ſtandard of their obedience. This ſalutary project, which might have reſtored mutual confidence, was defeated by the intrigues of the ariſtocracy; the magiſtrates were determined not to circumſcribe the authority they had hitherto poſſeſſed; and in ſupport of their juriſdiction ſolicited the interference of foreign powers.

Of theſe the moſt conſiderable was the king of France, who, as protector of the republic, concerted with the king of Sardinia and the cantons of Zurich and Bern, the means of reſtoring tranquillity to Geneva. They at length formed a code, which lodged the ſupreme power in the magiſtrates; and to give weight to their mediation, an army of twelve thouſand men, belonging to the king of France, the king of Sardinia, and the Swiſs cantons, encamped under the walls of the city. The leaders of the democratic party were unable to contend with their rivals, thus formidably ſupported, the gates of the city were opened to the combined forces; and the pretenſions of the ſyndics were eſtabliſhed by the count de Jancourt, the count of Marmora, and meſſieurs Stigeur and Valtevalle, the miniſters plenipotentiary of the mediating powers. A general amneſty was at the ſame time publiſhed, out of which only nineteen perſons were excepted: two of theſe were deprived of their employments, ſeven were condemned to perpetual exile, and the reſt were baniſhed for ten years; but the ſpirits of the inhabitants were ſeverely wounded by theſe new regulations; and a great number heſitated not to quit their ancient habitations, in ſearch of that freedom which they conſidered themſelves deprived of in their native country.

Paris, amidſt the gloom which naturally accompanies a long and extenſive war, received a tranſient ray of ſplendor from the viſit of the grand-duke and ducheſs of Ruſſia; theſe illuſtrious travellers were peculiarly gratified by the marked attention of Lewis and his royal conſort; but the viſits of ſovereigns, and their apparent ſucceſſors, have become ſo frequent of late years, as no longer to excite the ſpeculations of ſtateſmen; and the grand-duke and ducheſs, after taſting, during a ſhort month, the ſplendid enjoyments of the capital of France, directed their ſteps again towards the north.

With the adminiſtration of monſieur Necker had expired the great and popular ſyſtem of ſupporting a war without encreaſing the burthens of the people. The management of the finances had not long been entruſted to monſieur Fleuri, before the people were again awakened to a ſenſe of their ſituation, by a variety of edicts and impoſts, all of them probably neceſſary, but ſome of them undoubtedly grievous. Theſe could not fail of recalling to their remembrance the virtuous economy of the late miniſter, whom they had beheld diſmiſſed with regret, and for whoſe reſtoration they inceſſantly languiſhed.

To multiply the reſources of government, without augmenting the burthens of the public, the miniſters endeavoured to kindle throughout the capital and different provinces, a flame of enthuſiaſm, which, if productive of no ſolid advantage, might yet dazzle the eyes of the multitude and awe the enemies of France. The defeat of the count de Graſſe had impreſſed the kingdom with general grief and conſternation; and to repair the loſs that the national marine had ſuſtained, ſeveral ſtates and wealthy communities were prevailed upon to diſplay their zeal in building and fitting out ſhips of war, according to their reſpective ſtrength and affluence.

The liberality of the clergy this year was ſtill more honourable to themſelves, and more conſiſtent with their ſacred profeſſion. To the exigencies of the ſtate they granted a free-gift of fifteen millions of livres. At the ſame time they requeſted the ſovereign to accept an additional million, to be inviolably applied to the comfort and maintenance of thoſe ſeamen who had been wounded in the courſe of the war, and to the ſupport of the widows and orphans of thoſe who had fallen, gallantly fighting in the defence of the naval glory of France.

A. D. 1783.] Yet theſe contributions, though they reflected the higheſt honour on the donors, were but a partial and ſcanty ſupply, while the immenſe preparations of France demanded the moſt ſolid and effectual ſupport. In conjunction with the courts of Madrid and the Hague, Lewis was determined this year to make the moſt powerful efforts to bring the war to a concluſion. The combined fleets of the houſe of Bourbon ſtill maintained their ſuperiority, in Europe over the Engliſh. The marquis de Buſſy with three ſhips of the line, three thouſand land troops, and a conſiderable train of artillery, ſupported the hopes of France in the Eaſt, and already aſpired to the conqueſt of the coaſt of Coromandel. Nine ſhips of the line, and thirty tranſports, in which were embarked ſeven thouſand five hundred ſelect ſoldiers, ſailed from Breſt to America, under the conduct of monſieur de Vialis, to reinforce the marquis de Vaudreuil, and to complete the expulſion of the Engliſh from that continent: while the ſtate-sgeneral of Holland agreed to ſupply, at their own expence, ten ſhips of the line, which were to rendezvous at Breſt, and to act in concert with the ſquadrons of France. The count de Eſtaign, grown grey in naval combats, was called by the general applauſe to the ſupreme command, and in the room of don Lewis de Cordova, was appointed to lead to victory the combined fleets of the houſe of Bourbon.

Such were the preparations for the enſuing campaign, which promiſed the moſt important advantages to France, when the voice of peace was again heard, and Lewis conſented to ſacrifice his ambition to the eaſe and happineſs of his people. The miniſters of great Britain, whoſe imprudence and incapacity had plunged their country in a war as calamitious in the concluſion, as it was impolitic in the origin, were at length, by the clamours of the multitude, and the indignation of parliament, removed from the councils of their ſovereign; and they were ſucceeded by men who no longer nouriſhed the frantic idea of controlling the independence of America; the freedom of that continent had been the grand object of France; the defeat in the Weſt-Indies, and the repulſe at Gibraltar, were ſtill deeply impreſſed on the mind of Lewis; and though his vaſt armaments, and the reſources of his allies, preſented the faireſt proſpect of ſucceſs in the enſuing campaign, he was not inſenſible of the various accidents to which military operations were liable, and how little he could confide in a naval ſuperiority, which in a moment might be annihilated by the rage of a fickle and turbulent element.

Theſe conſiderations induced him to liſten to the proffered and powerful mediation of the two firſt potentates in Europe, the emperor of Germany and the empreſs of Ruſſia; and the count de Vergennes, who ſtill occupied the poſt of ſecretary of foreign affairs, was appointed to treat with Mr. Fitzherbert the Engliſh miniſter at Bruſſels, but who had lately proceeded to Paris to conduct this important negociation. The way was already ſmoothed for the reſtoration of the public tranquillity by proviſional articles ſigned at the concluſion of the laſt year, between the States of America and Great-Britain, and which were to conſtitute a treaty of peace finally to be concluded, when that between France and Great-Britain took place.

By theſe articles the freedom, ſovereignty, and independence of the Thirteen United States were individually by name, and in the fulleſt and moſt expreſs terms acknowledged; and all claims to their government and territorial rights were for ever relinquiſhed by the crown of Great Britain. Several lines were drawn to preclude all future diſputes about boundaries; and on the ſea-coaſts, as the Britiſh forces were to be withdrawn from all the territories of the United States, New-York, Long-Iſland, Staten-Iſland, Charleſton, and Nova-Scotia, with all their dependencies, were given up; and an unlimited right of fiſhery on the banks of Newfoundland, in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, and all other places where both nations had been hitherto accuſtomed to fiſh, was granted to the Americans.

Thus had France the ſatisfaction of ſtripping Great-Britain of thoſe colonies ſo long her pride and boaſt, and in erecting a new power acroſs the Atlantic, to have ſecured to herſelf a grateful and potent ally. This primary object was therefore no ſooner attained, than the count de Vergennes quickened the negociations of his own court; and on the twentieth of January ſigned at Paris, with Mr. Fitzherbert, the preliminary articles of peace.

By theſe France acquired an extent of fiſhery on the coaſt of Newfoundland, which extended from Cape St. John in about fifty degrees north latitude, on the eaſtern ſide of the iſland, round by the north to Cape-Ray, on the weſtern coaſt, in forty-ſeven degrees and fifty minutes latitude; ſhe alſo regained the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, in full right, and tacitly delivered from any reſtriction in point of fortification, with which they had before been diſgracefully incumbered

In the Weſt-Indies, England reſtored to her the iſland of St. Lucia, and ceded and guaranteed to her the iſland of Tobago; but France conſented to relinquiſh in return the iſlands of Grenada and the Grenadines, with thoſe of St. Vincent, Dominica, St. Chriſtopher's, Nevis, and Montſerrat.

In Africa, France was inveſted in full right with the river Senegal, and all its dependencies, with the forts of St. Louis, Podoz, Galem, Arguin, and Portendia; and obtained alſo in reſtitution of the iſland of Gorée; but, on the other hand, ſhe guaranteed to Great-Britain the poſſeſſion of Fort-James, and of the river Gambia.

In the Eaſt, France regained, with conſiderable additions, all that had been wreſted from her by Great-Britain in the courſe of the war; all her eſtabliſhments in Bengal and Orixa were to be reſtored, and liberty was given for ſurrounding Chandenagore with a wet ditch; Pondicherry and Carical were likewiſe reſtored to her; her ſtandard was again to be erected on Mahé, and ſhe was once more reinſtated in her factory at Surat; while the king of Great-Britain was bound to procure from the princes, whoſe property they were, certain ſpecified neighbouring diſtricts round theſe places, which were to be annexed to them as dependencies.

In Europe, where the dominion of France could not be extended, her dignity and glory were ſtudiouſly conſulted. The degrading conditions which had marked the calamitous cloſe of the reign of Lewis the Fourteenth, which had been revived in that of his ſucceſſor, and which ſtipulated the demolition of the works round Dunkirk, were for ever abrogated and ſuppreſſed; and Lewis the Sixteenth enjoyed the ſplendid ſatisfaction of reſtoring to France the entire ſovereignty over her own territories.

Nor was the other branch of the houſe of Bourbon neglected on this occaſion; long diſuſed to victory, and accuſtomed to behold her boundaries gradually recede, Spain now taſted the ſweets of acquiſition; though continually baffled and repulſed before Gibraltar, her pride was ſoothed by the ceſſion of the important iſland of Minorca in the Mediterranean; and to the boundleſs poſſeſſions which ſhe already held in South-America, were now added the fertile provinces of Eaſt and Weſt-Florida, on the northern continent. Some retribution was however to be made; and the Bahama-Iſlands, the moſt unworthy of her conqueſts, were reſtored to Great-Britain.

But Holland had entered too late into the war, and had been guided by too evident a tardineſs in her operations againſt an unprovoked and unſparing enemy; the characteriſtic induſtry of the Dutch and their neceſſary attachment to the ſpirit of commerce unpremeditatedly co-operated with that ſecret influence which for ſo many years the Engliſh had maintained in the operative counſels of Holland; divided into two powerful factions, diſtinguiſhed by the titles of the Louveſteins and Orangiſts, at the head of the latter was the Stadtholder, connected by ties of blood and proſpects of ambition with the court Great-Britain; the other without any fixed leader, from neceſſity became attached to that power which from political circumſtances and local relation, promiſed to afford them aid or protection; the States-General, compoſed of theſe partiſans, nevertheleſs afforded ſufficient teſtimony of the predominancy of that which was adverſe to the intereſts of Great-Britain; but the immenſe executive power lodged in the Stadtholder, ſo effectually counterbalanced on the other ſide, that the energies of the ſtates were palſied, and France left Holland at the at the concluſion of the peace, a ſtriking example to nations of the fatal influence of foreign influence and domeſtic treachery. The cloſe connection which had ſubſiſted between the Hague and London, was not ſhaken by the events of inveterate hoſtility, and the Dutch diſcovered that while they ſuffered from the deſtructive enmity of an old ally, that they incurred by the diſordered and corrupt condition of their government, the contempt of the only power from whom they could expect ſuccour.

Though tranquillity was thus reſtored to Europe, Africa, and America; Aſia, diſtant from the ſcene of negociation, continued ſtill expoſed to the ravages of war. Hyder-Ali, whoſe aſpiring genius had ſo long and ſeverely agitated that quarter of the globe, had ſunk into the grave, and had left behind a character ſcarce to be paralleled in the annals of the Eaſt. His mind was ſo vaſt and comprehenſive as at once to reach and embrace all the parts of war and of government; as a warrior, the Carnatic was a mournful teſtimony of his atchievements; as a ſtateſman, the internal regulation of his own territories proclaimed his ſagacity; though daring in war, he was far from being naturally cruel; and ſtrictly obſervant of his own word; he puniſhed with rigour in others that breach of faith which he abhorred. He deſpiſed, and diſpenſed with, as far as with propriety it could be done, the vain pageantry and haughty pomp of the Indian courts; living in habits of great intimacy and familiarity with his friends, courtiers, and officers; and diſplaying in his own perſon the frank manners of a camp, inſtead of the proud diſtance and auſtere reſerve of an Eaſtern deſpot.

His ſon, Tippoo-Saheb, equally bold, prompt, and vigilant, but leſs ſcrupulous, and more ferocious, was the heir of his throne and enterprizes; he was already diſtinguiſhed by his ſucceſſive victories over colonel Baillie in the Carnatic, and colonel Braithwaite on the banks of the Coleroon; and his enemies were ſoon convinced that the acceſſion to royalty had not damped his ardour, nor chilled his martial ſpirit. General Mathews, a Britiſh officer, had penetrated with a ſelect detachment to Bedanore, the capital of the wealthy kingdom of Canore; his progreſs had been marked by cruelty and avarice; and his rapacity not only ſtimulated him to plunder with unfeeling aſſiduity the proſtrate city, but even to defraud his companions of their portion of the ſpoils. The avenger of his country's injuries was however at hand, and general Mathews had ſcarce time to indulge in the contemplation of his newly acquired riches, before he was alarmed by the approach of Tippoo-Saheb, who, with an hoſt of cavalry, and a ſmall corps of French, under the command of monſieur Lally, preſſed forwards to chaſtiſe the temerity of the invader. The Engliſh commander marched out to meet the exaſperated prince; but neither his ſtrength nor ſkill ſeemed proportioned to his preſumption; his ranks were inſtantly broken by the charge of the French; with the loſs of five-hundred men he retired within the walls of Bedanore; and ſoon after ſigned a capitulation, which, on promiſe of their lives and liberties, delivered himſelf and his troops into the power of Tippoo-Saheb. That capitulation was ſoon violated by the faithleſs victor; he even juſtified the infraction of the treaty, by the evaſion of the vanquiſhed to reſtore the ſpoils of Bedanore, which they had ſtipulated to refund, but had endeavoured to conceal. The general was the unlamented victim of his own avarice, and is reported to have periſhed by poiſon; ſeveral of the principal officers were barbarouſly murdered; and the ſcanty remnant, that were releaſed at the concluſion of the peace, had experienced ſufferings that rendered the fate of their ſlaughtered companions enviable.

The hoſtile ardour of the French and Engliſh ſquadrons had been mutually repreſſed by a ſenſe of their own danger, and to avoid the monſoons, that ſcatter deſtruction along the coaſt of Comorandel, each ſought ſhelter in their reſpective harbours; but that tempeſtuous ſeaſon was no ſooner elaſped, than the ſpirit of enterpriſe revived; and monſieur Suffrein, early in the year, proceeded from Trincomalé to Cuddalore; he was there reinforced by twelve hundred European troops, which he diſperſed among his ſhips, and was lying at anchor in the road of Pondicherry, when he diſcovered the approach of the Engliſh fleet under admiral Hughes.

The Britiſh ſquadron had been joined by five ſhips of the line from Europe, and was now ſuperior in number to the French by two ſhips of the line. But monſieur Suffrein was not diſmayed by this diſparity; and with the ſame ſpirit that had marked his former conduct, he prepared to maintain the honour of the French flag; the action began about four o'clock in the afternoon, and a heavy cannonade was continued until ſeven; at that hour the conflict ceaſed without any deciſive conſequences; each ſquadron had to lament the unavailing ſlaughter of a number of gallant men; and with this ſevere trial of their ſtrength, concluded the naval warfare in India; admiral Hughes ſoon after retired to Madras; and monſieur de Suffrein, who throughout the whole war had ſuſtained the character of a bold and ſkilful commander, proceeded to Cuddalore to return the land forces with which had been reinforced, and to which he added two thouſand four hundred men from his own fleet.

This ſuccour, though important, was not more than neceſſary to the immediate defence of that place. The marquis de Buſſy, who had lately arrived in India with a conſiderable body of European troops, found his ſituation far from enviable; general Coote, whoſe ſkill, experience, and enterpriſing genius had been confirmed and diſplayed in the courſe of long ſervice, was indeed no more; and by his death the command of the Britiſh forces had devolved on general Stuart. But the marquis de Buſſy was ſoon taught that this officer aſpired to rival the fame of his predeceſſor; and he was ſcarce arrived at Cuddalore before he beheld himſelf inveſted by the Britiſh troops, conducted by their new general; who had ſeized the favourable moment of enterpriſe when Tippoo-Saheb had evacuated the Carnatic for the recovery of Bedanore.

The works of Cuddalore had been ſtrengthened by unwearied labour and diligence; and the marquis de Buſſy was ſtill employed in the conſtruction of new fortifications, when his progreſs was interrupted by the menacing manœuvres of the Engliſh, who rapidly advanced to aſſault the lines before they could be completed. The attack and defence were both maintained with a degree of reſolution that had ſeldom been experienced in that quarter of the globe, and perhaps never ſurpaſſed in Europe; the aſſailants, though frequently repulſed, as conſtantly returned to the charge; but the French were at length overwhelmed by numbers, and were compelled to abandon their out-poſts with the loſs in killed and wounded of near ſix hundred of their beſt troops.

The arrival of the fleet under monſieur Suffrein, and the reinforcement that he landed from the ſhips, determined the marquis de Buſſy to hazard a vigorous ſally, in hopes of recovering the poſts that he had loſt, and of making ſome impreſſion on the works of the beſiegers. The conduct of this enterpriſe was entruſted to the chevalier de Damas, a knight of Malta, and colonel of the regiment of Acquitain, and the hour fixed for the execution of it was three o'clock in the morning. But though under cover of the darkneſs a tranſient advantage was gained, yet the Engliſh were ſoon alarmed; as light opened their numbers increaſed; the French were puſhed on every ſide; a complete rout enſued; the chevalier de Damas with about one hundred and fifty ſoldiers were taken priſoners, and near two-hundred fell in the conflict.

It was at this critical juncture that the Medea frigate arrived from Madras at Cuddalore, and brought information of the concluſion of peace between the two nations; a mutual ceſſation of hoſtilities, and reſtoration of priſoners, immediately took place; and that tranquillity which the French already enjoyed in Europe, Africa, and America, was now extended to their tottering ſettlements and war-worn veterans in Aſia.

A. D. 1783. The preliminary articles which had been ſigned at Verſailles, were ſoon after ſucceeded by a definitive treaty; and France, throughout her extenſive dominions, beheld peace once more eſtabliſhed. Though the late war had been attended by the moſt brilliant ſucceſs, and the independence of America ſtruck deep at the ſource of her rival's power, yet ſhe herſelf had not been entirely free from inconvenience; the retreat of monſieur Necker from the management of the finances, had, as we have already obſerved, diminiſhed the public confidence; three different perſons, who ſince his reſignation had tranſiently occupied the poſt of comptroller-general, encreaſed the jealouſies of the people; and the failure of the celebrated Caiſſe d'Eſcompte, completed the univerſal conſternation.

That bank had been eſtabliſhed in the year ſeventeen hundred and ſeventy-ſix. The plan was formed by a company of private adventurers, and its capital was fixed at five hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. Its profeſſed deſign was to diſcount bills at ſhort dates, at the rate of four per cent. per annum; but as this intereſt could never be an equivalent for the capital ſunk by the proprietors, they were entruſted with the additional power of iſſuing notes to the amount of their capital, which, as they were capable at any time of being converted into ſpecie, might be often voluntarily taken by their cuſtomers from mere convenience.—The reputation of the bank ſoon cauſed its ſtock to ſell above par, and its credit was ſtill at the higheſt, when to the aſtoniſhment of the nation, the ſecond day it ſuddenly ſtopped payment. The cauſe aſſigned was an uncommon ſcarcity of ſpecie; but the public imagined that it originated in a loan ſecretly made to the government; and what confirmed the ſuſpicion was, that government, about the ſame time, ſtopped payment of the bills drawn upon them by their army in America.

Whatever was the ſource of this event, the king was prevailed on to extend his protection to the falling company; four ſucceſſive edicts were publiſhed by adminiſtration tending to relieve the diſtreſs under which it laboured; by theſe the banks in Paris were ordered to receive the notes of the Caiſſe d'Eſcompte at currency; a lottery with a ſtock of one million ſterling, redeemable in eight years, was alſo eſtabliſhed, and the tickets were made purchaſable in notes of the Caiſſe d'Eſcompte; by theſe expedients the public confidence in that bank was again revived, its buſineſs increaſed, and its ſtock roſe to a ſurprizing amount, above double the original ſubſcription; the bills from America were at the ſame time put in a train of payment, and public credit was happily reſtored throughout the kingdom.

Some compenſation for the expences that had been incurred during the late war, was drawn from a treaty with the United States of America. Theſe engaged to reimburſe France in the ſum of eighteen millions of livres, which had been advanced in the hour of their diſtreſs, and Lewis conſented to receive the money, as more convenient to the ſtates, in the ſpace of twelve years, by twelve equal and annual payments.

With the return of peace, it might naturally have been expected that France would have delivered herſelf from the heavy demands occaſioned by her numerous armies; yet inſtead of diſbanding her forces, ſhe continued diligently to fill up all deficiencies; and her military eſtabliſhment in the midſt of tranquillity, rivalled that which was collected for a ſtate of profeſſed hoſtility; nor could this afford aſtoniſhment to her neighbors, ſince the peace of Europe was already menaced by reſtleſs ambition and the inſatiate luſt of dominion.

The emperor of Germany had long cheriſhed the hope of wreſting from the Dutch the principal fortreſſes of the Auſtrian Netherlands, which had been depoſited in their hands at the concluſion of the ſucceſſion war, for the mutual ſecurity of the court of Vienna and themſelves. The advantages of this arrangement had been repeatedly experienced during the ſucceeding depreſſion of the houſe of Auſtria; but the preſent emperor felt his own power fully competent to the protection of his dominions; and he thought it derogatory to his honour, that a number of his principal cities ſhould be garriſoned, and at his own expence too, by foreigners; he availed himſelf of the juncture when Great-Britain, the guardian of the barrier, was become the enemy of Holland, and extorted from the ſtates in their diſtreſs a reluctant compliance. The Dutch garriſons and artillery were ſilently withdrawn from the barrier towns; and the emperor's order for diſmantling the fortreſſes was immediately executed.

Though France, bound to the emperor by ties of alliance, friendſhip, and blood, had tacitly acquieſced in this claim, yet the court of Verſailles did not regard with equal indifference his pretenſions to the free navigation of the Schelde. That court for ſome years had been divided into two parties, and the moſt diſtinguiſhed characters were the count de Vergennes, and the mareſchal de Caſtries; the former, who had long reſided at the Ottoman Porte, and was celebrated for his addreſs in negociation, poſſeſſed the confidence of Lewis, who himſelf mild and humane, admired thoſe talents in his miniſter which had been diſplayed in the reſtoration of peace; the latter, who had ſucceeded monſieur de Sartine in the marine department, was bold and enterpriſing, and had continually ſtood forth the advocate for war; he was ſupported by the queen, who, intelligent, active, and fond of public buſineſs, aſpired to diſpoſe of every lucrative or honorary appointment, and afforded no indifferent contraſt to the mild indolence of her royal conſort.

A. D. 1784, 1785.] Though Holland had in ſome meaſure been deſerted at the concluſion of the peace, and ſuffered in her foreign poſſeſſions and her character as a nation, through the ſecret machinations of the Britiſh cabinet, yet the protection the republic had received from France during the war, was ſtrongly enforced by the faction in the intereſt of the court of Verſailles, and which conſiſted of the enemies of hereditary privileges and of the Orange family. Their aſcendancy was become open and uncontrouled; they purſued with a degree of political violence, the duke of Brunſwick Wolfenbuttle, field-mareſchal of the Dutch forces, and intimately connected with the houſe of Orange and the royal family of England; the duke conſidered it as moſt prudent to bend before the ſtorm; he reſigned the offices that he had been entruſted with; and the democratic party having thus eſtabliſhed their triumph over their domeſtic enemies, depended on the friendſhip of France for protection againſt their foreign foes.

The immediate conſequence fully juſtified the confidence they had thus once more placed in their ally. The emperor, encouraged by the facility with which he had atchieved the demolition of the Dutch barrier, now extended his pretenſions to a free navigation beyond fort Lillo, as far as the land of Seftingen, ſeven miles up the Schelde; and inſiſted that the guardſhip that had been uſually ſtationed by the ſtates at fort Lillo, ſhould be immediately withdrawn.

An acquieſcence with this demand would have ſtruck at the root of the wealth and power of the United States of Holland: the city of Antwerp, formerly renowned for its commerce, and ſtill celebrated for its opulence, is ſituated on the banks of the Schelde; and Spain, the former ſovereign of Antwerp, while ſhe conſidered the greatneſs and opulence of that city as inconſiſtent with her views of deſpotiſm, had concurred with Holland in ſhutting up the Schelde; trade thus diverted, flowed into different channels; and Amſterdam, though long before conſiderable, had from that period riſen on the ruins of Antwerp to be the firſt commercial city of Europe.

Her inhabitants, therefore, could not be indifferent to pretenſions which ſo materially affected their intereſts. Memorials and remonſtrances had in vain been preſented; in vain did they inſiſt that the whole courſe of the two branches of the Schelde, which paſſed within the dominion of Holland, was entirely artificial; that it was formed by and owed its exiſtence to, the hands of Dutchmen: that its banks were the produce of ages of inceſſant labour; that they were ſtill maintained at a great and conſtant expence; that if it had not been for thoſe ſtanding monuments of Dutch enterpriſe, thoſe admirable dykes which excite the aſtoniſhment of mankind, the waters of the Schelde, ſtagnating in immenſe marſhes and ſhallow lakes, had never reached the ſea in any diſtinct or ſufficient portion for navigation. And to theſe claims of natural right was to be added a ſeries of treaties which fortified them in the moſt expreſs and ſolemn terms in the excluſive poſſeſſion of the Schelde. To diſarm their formidable enemy by ſubmiſſion, they alſo removed the obnoxious guardſhip at Lillo, and rejected the propoſal for repairing the works of Maeſtricht, a fortreſs to which the emperor had urged a claim, leſt its being adopted at ſuch a ſeaſon ſhould give umbrage to that prince.

But the arguments and pacific meaſures of the ſtates were equally diſregarded by the emperor, and even the mediation of France was liſtened to with cold indifference; a brig was directed to proceed down the Schelde from Antwerp to the ſea, and his imperial majeſty declared that he would conſider the firſt inſult offered to his flag on this occaſion, as an act of formal hoſtility, and a declaration of war on the part of the republic; the brig was however ſtopped by the Dutch naval officer; on the Auſtrian commander reſuming his courſe, ſome ſhot, though without any fatal conſequence to the crew, compelled him to deſiſt; and he was detained for ſome days by the Dutch admiral at the mouth of the Schelde.

From this moment the ſeeds of diſcontent ſeemed to ripen; the imperial ambaſſador was recalled from the Hague, and all negociation was ſuſpended; an army of ſixty-thouſand men was under orders for marching from the Auſtrian hereditary dominions to the Netherlands; and immenſe trains of artillery, and all the other apparatus of war were put in motion; the republic, alarmed at theſe menacing appearances, now redoubled their ſolicitations to the court of Verſailles; the diſmiſſal of the duke of Brunſwick obliged the ſtates to apply to France for a general, whoſe abilities and experience might enable him to conduct their arms with effect in the war they expected; and Lewis granted to their diſtreſs the count de Maillebois, an officer of undoubted talents, who had ſeen much ſervice in the late reign, but whoſe jealouſy of mareſchal d'Etrees, in the laſt German war, had precipitated him into intrigues, which had drawn upon him a ſevere cenſure from the tribunal of the mareſchals of France.

But the king confined not his friendſhip to the republic within the narrow limits of recommending a commander; the Pruſſian monarch was equally intereſted with Lewis in reſiſting the pretenſions of the emperor; prince Henry of Pruſſia, at this critical juncture, made a long viſit at the court of Verſailles; from that moment the count de Vergennes expoſtulated with the court of Vienna with more freedom and in leſs equivocal terms. To give weight to his negociations, the ſtanding forces of France were ſilently and gradually thrown into quarters on the borders of Alſace, Lorrain, and the Low Countries; and orders were given to form a camp of eighty thouſand men in the plains of Lens, which had been rendered memorable by one of the great Condé's moſt ſplendid victories.

The emperor, though appriſed of the numerous enemies that he muſt encounter, ſtill appeared inflexible in the proſecution of his deſign; and the queen of France could not be inſenſible to a conteſt which involved her neareſt and deareſt connections, and armed the hand of her conſort againſt her brother. On the morning when a grand council was to be held, the reſult of which was to be concluſive in reſpect to the part that France ſhould take, if the emperor perſiſted in his pretenſions againſt Holland, that princeſs took an opportunity of meeting monſieur de Vergennes before he entered the cabinet, and deſired that he would not on that day forget that the emperor was her brother; the miniſter replied that he certainly ſhould not; but that he was bound likewiſe to remember that the king of France was her huſband, and the dauphin her ſon.

The ability and firmneſs of that ſtateſman was the effectual ſecurity of the republic; and while the mind of the emperor was ſuppoſed to be entirely occupied by the navigation of the Schelde, the world was aſtoniſhed by his opening a new ſource of jealouſy and diſcord in Germany. With a levity which for ever extinguiſhed his reputation as a politician, he now meditated to exchange for the duchy of Bavaria the Auſtrian Netherlands, thoſe very Netherlands, upon whoſe account he ſeemed at the point of encountering all the hazards of a war, the conſequences of which, as had been ſtrongly urged by the court of Verſailles, could not even be calculated. Though this project was baffled by the firm and formidable interpoſition of the king of Pruſſia, the diverſion that it occaſioned allowed Holland leiſure to recover from its firſt ſurpriſe; it enabled France to complete her preparations; and facilitated the negociations of the count de Vergennes.

Inſtead of overwhelming in his career a diſtracted and defenceleſs multitude, the emperor perceived he muſt have encountered a people ſtubborn by nature, and highly irritated by a ſenſe of the injuries and indignities that had been impoſed on them; they were alſo ſupported by an ally, whoſe friendſhip it was his intereſt to conciliate, and whoſe power, even ſingle, had more than once menaced to ſubvert the houſe of Auſtria. He now aſſumed a more moderate language, and to the deputies of the republic, who profeſſed their reſpect for his imperial majeſty, anſwered, that he ſhould order his ambaſſador at Paris to reſume the negociations, under the mediation of his brother the king of France; and he did not doubt but a ſpeedy concluſion would prevent the unhappy occurrences which muſt be the unavoidable conſequence of a farther delay.

The addreſs and abilities of the count de Vergennes contributed to remove every obſtruction, and under his auſpices the preliminary articles of peace were ſigned at Paris about the middle of September; and two months afterwards the definitive treaty was ſubſcribed at Fontainbleau, under the guarantee of his moſt chriſtian majeſty.

The treaty of Munſter was laid down as the baſis of the preſent, and its ſtipulations to be in all caſes binding, where they were not expreſsly excepted by the new clauſes. The principal articles were, that the States acknowledged the emperor's independent ſovereignty over every part of the Schelde, from Antwerp to the limits of the county of Seftingen; they bound themſelves not to interrupt, in any manner the commerce or navigation of his ſubjects thereon; but that the reſt of the river beyond thoſe limits to the ſea, with the canals of the Sâs, the Swin, and other neighbouring mouths of the ſea, were to continue under the ſovereignty of the States-general; they agreed to evacuate and demoliſh the forts of Kruiſchens, and Frederic-Henry, and cede the territories to his imperial majeſty; they alſo ſubmitted to his diſcretion the forts of Lillo and of Liefkenſhoek, with the fortifications in their preſent condition, only reſerving to themſelves the right of withdrawing the artillery and ammunition. They alſo ſtipulated to pay to his imperial majeſty the ſum of nine millions and a half of florins in the current money of Holland, in lieu of all his rights and pretenſions on Maeſtricht and its adjacent territories; and half a million more as an indemnification to his ſubjects for the damages they had ſuſtained from the inundations when the dyke near Lillo had been broken down by the Dutch.

While the count de Vergennes acquired the glory of having conducted this delicate negociation, he was not inattentive to the immediate intereſts of his own court. In two days after the treaty of peace between the emperor and Holland had been ſigned, a new treaty of alliance between France and that republic was likewiſe concluded and finally ratified, the ſtipulations were ſuch as might have been expected from the gratitude of the States, and the addreſs of the court of Verſailles. It included all the principles which can ſerve to bind or cement, in the cloſeſt and moſt indiſſoluble union, diſtinct nations under diſtinct governments; and by which they may mutually participate, in peace or in war, of good or of evil; and in all caſes adminiſter the moſt perfect aid, counſel, and ſuccour to each other.

It alſo preſcribed, if their united good offices for the preſervation of peace ſhould prove ineffectual, the aſſiſtance they were to impart to each other by ſea and land; France was to furniſh Holland with ten thouſand effective infantry, two thouſand cavalry, with twelve ſhips of the line and ſix frigates; and their high-mightineſſes, in caſe of a marine war, or that France ſhould be attacked by ſea, were to contribute to her defence ſix ſhips of the line and three frigates; and in caſe of an attack on the territory of France, the States-general were to have the option of furniſhing their land contingent either in money or in troops, at the eſtimate of five thouſand infantry, and one thouſand cavalry; and if the ſtipulated ſuccours ſhould be inſufficient for the defence of the party attacked, or for procuring a proper peace, they engaged to aſſiſt each other with all their forces, if neceſſary; it being however agreed that the contingent of troops to be furniſhed by the States-general ſhould not exceed twenty thouſand infantry and four thouſand cavalry.

It was alſo added, that neither of the contracting powers ſhould diſarm, or make, or receive propoſals of peace or truce, without the formal conſent of the other; they promiſed alſo not to contract any future alliance or engagement whatever, directly or indirectly, contrary to the preſent treaty; and on any treaties or negociations being propoſed, which might prove detrimental to their joint intereſt, they pledged their faith to give notice to each other of ſuch propoſals as ſoon as made.

Thus was Holland, after beholding for above a century her fertile fields ravaged and her cities aſſaulted by the ambition of the houſe of Bourbon, now become the firm ally of that power againſt whoſe encroaching ſpirit ſhe had formerly armed the moſt powerful kingdoms in Europe; while France having aſſerted the independence of America againſt Great-Britain, having reſcued the States-general from the reſtleſs rapacity of the houſe of Auſtria, and having converted an ancient and formidable foe into an uſeful friend, ſeemed to have attained an influence over the nations of the earth that ſhe had never been poſſeſſed of from the firſt foundations of her monarchy.

But however exalted her preſent ſituation might appear, the ſeeds of future commotion were already apparent to the eye of an accurate obſerver; the applauſe that had attended the parliament of Paris in their ſtruggles with Lewis the Fifteenth, might be conſidered as the firſt dawn of freedom; the language of that aſſembly had boldly inculcated to their countrymen their natural rights, and taught them to look with a more ſteady eye on the luſtre that hitherto had encompaſſed the throne. The war with America had contributed to enlarge the political ideas of the French; they had on that occaſion ſtood forth as the champions of liberty, in oppoſition to regal power; and the officers who had acted on that conſpicuous ſtage, accuſtomed to think and ſpeak without reſtraint, on their return imparted the glorious flame to the provinces of France, which had been kindled in the wilds of America; from that moment the French, inſtead of ſilently acquieſcing under the edicts of their ſovereign, canvaſſed each action with bold and rigid impartiality; while the attachment of the army, which has ever been conſidered as the ſole foundation of deſpotiſm, gave way to an enthuſiaſtic admiration of freedom.

We have already noticed the public diſſatisfaction that had attended the diſmiſſal of monſieur Necker; his tranſient ſucceſſor, monſieur de Fleuri, had retired from the management of the finances in eighty-three, and the more tranſient adminiſtration of monſieur d'Ormeſſon had expired in the ſame year that gave birth to it. On his retreat monſieur de Calonne, who had ſucceſſively filled with acknowledged reputation the office of intendant of Metz, and afterwards of the provinces of Flanders and Artois, was nominated to the poſt of comptroller-general; flexible and inſinuating, eloquent in converſation, and poliſhed in his manners, fertile in reſources and liberal in the diſpoſal of the public money, he ſoon rendered himſelf acceptable to the court, and acquired the favour of his ſovereign. But he did not enter upon his new and arduous ſtation favoured by the breath of popularity; he was reported to be more able than conſiſtent, and not to have tempered the ardour of his ſpirit by the ſeverity of deep reſearch; and the people, amidſt repeated loans, regretted that ſevere ſimplicity which had characterized the adminiſtration of monſieur Necker.

A.D. 1784.] Yet the firſt operations of monſieur Calonne had extorted the general approbation; and it was his bold and judicious meaſures that had reſtored credit to the Caiſſe d'Eſcompte, the only incorporated banking company then in France, and which had ſtopped payment a few weeks before his acceſſion. In the eſtabliſhment of the Caiſſe d'Amortiſſement, or ſinking-fund, he merited a ſtill higher degree of applauſe. The plan of that fund was ſimple and moderate; it was to pay annually by government, into the hands of a board ſet apart for that purpoſe, the entire intereſt of the national debts, whether in ſtock or annuities, together with an additional ſum of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds. The annuities that would be extinguiſhed every year were eſtimated at fifty thouſand pounds; and in that proportion, the ſum ſet apart for the redemption of the national debt, would annually encreaſe. The operation of this new fund was limitted to the term of twenty-five years; and during that term the annual receipt of the Caiſſe d'Amortiſſement was declared unalterable, and incapable of being diverted to any other object.

From the diſcuſſion of theſe new regulations of finance, the public attention was directed to the conduct of thoſe officers who, during the courſe of the war, had been entruſted with the naval forces of France. A council of war, which had been commiſſioned to try the count de Graſſe, and other captains of the fleet defeated by admiral Rodney, honorably acquitted the commander with the majority of the officers, and ſlightly cenſured a few, among whom was monſieur Bougainville, who had acquired a diſtinguiſhed reputation in exploring new coaſts, and navigating the moſt diſtant receſſes of the ocean.

If the perſonal gallantry of the count de Graſſe, though unfortunate, could ſecure him an honorable acquittal, the ſucceſsful courage and conduct of monſieur de Suffrein could not fail of commanding the moſt flattering reception. All ranks and orders of men vied with each other in marks of gratitude and attachment to the man who had ſo nobly ſuſtained the glory of the French flag, and who had ſhewed his countrymen the way to conqueſt on an element which had ſo repeatedly witneſſed their defeat and diſgrace. The compliment which was paid him by the queen, whether conſidered as a mark of the ſenſibility of her character or the elegance of her taſte, cannot be unacceptable to the reader. Introducing him to the dauphin, a boy of three years old, ſhe added, "this is monſieur de Suffrein, " to whom we owe the greateſt obligations; obſerve him well, and remember " his name; it is one of the firſt of thoſe which you muſt learn to repeat, in order " that you may never forget it."

A. D. 1785.] During the laſt year, if the conduct of monſieur Colonne had not attached popularity to his adminiſtration, it yet might defy cenſure; but the principal meaſure of the year eighty-five was not equally guarded from reproach. From the year ſeventeen hundred and ſeventy-three France had been without an Eaſt-India company; and though the idea of a free trade to that part of the world had hitherto been untried in Europe, ſhe did not appear to ſuffer in an experiment; on the contrary, her annual importation from India during this time was conſiderably greater than during any former period. Yet not content with the ſilent profit that thus accrued to the public, the court was induced to liſten to propoſals for eſtabliſhing a new Eaſt-India company; their privilege was for ſeven years, with the ſpecial proviſo, that years of war which ſhould occur in the interim, ſhould be excluded from the computation.

In the preamble of the act, by which the ſcheme was adopted, it was aſſerted; " that the commodities of Europe not having of late been regulated by any " common ſtandard, or proportioned to the demands of India, had on the one " hand ſold at a low price, while on the other the competition of the ſubjects of " France had raiſed the price of the objects of importation; that upon their " return home, a want of ſyſtem and aſſortment had been univerſally complained " of, the market being glutted with one ſpecies of goods, and totally deſtitute of " another; that theſe defects muſt neceſſarily continue as long as the trade " remained in private hands; and that on theſe accounts, as well as of the capital " required, the eſtabliſhment of a new company was abſolutely neceſſary."

Theſe reaſonings appeared by no means ſatisfactory to the perſons principally intereſted; it was remarked, that the arguments of the preamble did not apply more to the trade of India than to any other trade; and that if they were admitted in their entire force, they were calculated to give a finiſhing blow to the freedom of commerce. A proviſion in the act, directing that the prices of Eaſt-India goods in the iſlands of Mauritius and Bourbon ſhould be regulated by a tariff fixed by the court of Verſailles, excited ſtill louder exclamations; in this inſtance it was ſaid, that the firſt principles of commerce were trampled upon in a manner the moſt wanton and abſurd; inſtead of ſuffering it to find its own level, by the mutual colliſion of the wants of one party, and the labour of another, it was arbitrarily to be faſhioned by a power, whoſe extreme diſtance muſt naturally render its deciſions ill-timed and inapplicable. The very mode in which the monopoly was introduced was a ſubject of complaint: it was determined by a reſolution of the king in council; a proceeding totally inadequate to the importance of the ſubject, and which was to be regarded as clandeſtine and ſurreptitious. In all former inſtances ſuch meaſures had aſſumed the form of edicts, and were regiſtered in the parliaments; it was the prerogative of theſe courts to verify them; that is, to enquire into the facts that had led to the adoption of them. The injured parties had an opportunity of being heard before the privilege assumed the form of a law; not privately by the ministers of the sovereign, but publicly by the most considerable bodies in the kingdom, and in the face of the nation.

Such were the free and animated strictures with which the establishment of a new East-India company was attended; nor could it escape observation, that the writers of the day had not only assumed a bolder and more independent style, but that they were desirous of reviving the pretensions of the parliament, and of raising the tribunal of that assembly above the will of the crown.

To monsieur de Calonne these discussions were far from favourable; and the time was now rapidly approaching, when the necessities of the state would compel him to measures still more unpopular, and destined to undergo a severer scrutiny; though peace had been re-established throughout Europe for three years, yet the finances of France seemed scarce affected by this interval of tranquillity, and it was found requisite to close every year with a loan; the public expenditure of the year eighty-five might probably seem to sanction this measure. It had been thought proper to fortify Cherbourg upon a large and magnificent scale; the claim of the emperor to the navigation of the Schelde, had obliged the French to increase their land forces, either to form a respectable neutrality, or to assist effectually their Dutch allies; and the marquis de Castries, fond of war, and profuse in his designs, had not suffered the navy, which monsieur Sartine had surrendered into his hands, to moulder away during the interval of peace.

A. D. 1786.] The treaty of commerce concluded this year with Great-Britain was a new source of discontent; though regarded by the English manufacturers as far from advantageous, it excited in France still louder murmurs, and was criticised with an uncommon degree of asperity. It was considered as likely to extinguish those infant establishments which were yet unable to vie with the manufactures of England, that had attained to maturity; and the market that it held out for the wines and oils of France was passed over in silence, while the distress of the artisan was painted in the most striking and lively colours.

But when the edict for registering the loan at the conclusion of the last year, and which amounted to the sum of three-millions three-hundred and thirty-thousand pounds, was presented to the parliament of Paris, the murmurs of the people, seconded by that assembly, assumed a more legal and formidable form. The king however signified to the select deputation that was commissioned to convey to him their remonstrances, that he expected to be obeyed without further delay; accordingly the ceremony of the registering took place on the next day; but was accompanied with a resolution, importing that public economy was the only genuine source of abundant revenue, the only means of providing for the necessities of the state, and restoring that credit, which borrowing had reduced to the brink of ruin.

This proceeding was no ſooner known than the king required the attendance of the grand deputation of parliament; he eraſed from their records the reſolution that had been adopted; and obſerved, though it was his pleaſure that the parliament ſhould communicate by its reſpectful repreſentations whatever might intereſt the good of the public, yet he never would conſent that they ſhould ſo far abuſe his confidence and clemency as to erect themſelves into the cenſors of his adminiſtration; he expected in future that they ſhould confine their expreſſions within the limits of wiſdom and loyalty; he declared himſelf ſatisfied with the conduct of the comptroller-general, and determined on no account to ſuffer groundleſs apprehenſions to interfere with the plans calculated for the good of the ſtate and the eaſe of the nation; and more ſtrongly to mark his diſpleaſure at their expoſtulations, he directed the diſmiſſion from further ſervice, of one of their officers, who had appeared moſt active in forwarding the late reſolution.

Though the approbation and ſupport of his ſovereign was doubtleſs highly gratifying to monſieur de Calonne, yet he could not fail of feeling himſelf deeply mortified by the oppoſition of the parliament; his addreſs to concilitate that aſſembly had proved ineffectual, and he experienced their inflexible averſion at the critical juncture when their acquieſcence might have proved of the moſt eſſential ſervice. An anxious enquiry into the ſtate of the public finances, had convinced him that the expenditure by far exceeded the revenue; in the preſent ſituation, to impoſe new taxes was impoſſible, to continue the method of borrowing was ruinous, and to have recourſe only to œconomical reforms, would be found wholly inadequate; and he heſitated not to declare that it would be impoſſible to place the finances on a ſolid baſis, but by the reformation of whatever was vicious in the conſtitution of the ſtate.

To give weight to this reform, the miniſter was ſenſible that ſomething more was neceſſary than the royal authority; he perceived that the parliament was neither a fit inſtrument for introducing a new order into public affairs, nor would ſubmit to be a paſſive machine for ſanctioning the plans of a miniſter, even if thoſe plans were the emanations of perfect wiſdom. Though originally a body of lawyers, indebted for their appointments to the king, there was not an attribute of genuine legiſlative aſſembly that they did not ſeem deſirous to engroſs to themſelves; and they had been ſupported in their pretenſions by the plaudits of the the people, who were ſenſible that there was no other body in the nation that could plead their cauſe againſt royal oppreſſion; to ſuppreſs therefore the only power of control that remained, and to render the government more arbitrary, was deemed by the comptroller-general a meaſure of too much hardihood; yet to leave the parliament in the full poſſeſſion of their influence, an influence that he was convinced would be exerted againſt him, was at once to render his whole ſyſtem abortive.

Under theſe circumſtances, the only alternative that ſeemed to remain was to have recourſe to ſome other aſſembly, more dignified and ſolemn in its character, and that ſhould conſiſt in a greater degree of members from the various orders of the ſtate, and the different provinces of the kingdom. This promiſed to be a popular meaſure; it implied a deference to the people at large, and might be expected to prove greatly acceptable; but the true and legitimate aſſembly of the nation, the ſtates-general, had not met ſince the year ſixteen hundred and fourteen; nor could the miniſter flatter himſelf with the hope of obtaining the royal aſſent to a meeting which a deſpotic ſovereign could not but regard with ſecret jealouſy. Another aſſembly had occaſionally been ſubſtituted in the room of the ſtates-general; this was diſtinguiſhed by the title of the Notables, and conſiſted of a number of perſons from all parts of the kingdom, chiefly ſelected from the higher orders of the ſtate, and nominated by the king himſelf. This aſſembly had been convened by Henry the Fourth, and again by Lewis the Thirteenth; and was now once more ſummoned by the authority of the preſent monarch.

The writs for calling together the aſſembly of the notables were dated on the twenty-ninth of December eighty-ſix; they were addreſſed to ſeven princes of the blood, nine dukes and peers of France, eight field mareſchals, twenty-two nobles, eight counſellors of ſtate, four maſters of requeſts, eleven archbiſhops and biſhops, thirty-ſeven of the heads of the law, twelve deputies of the pays d'etats, the lieutenant-civil, and twenty-five magiſtrates of the different towns of the kingdom. The number of members was one hundred and forty-four; and the twenty-ninth of January eighty-ſeven was the period appointed for their opening.

A. D. 1787.] It was at the moment when the members of the notables had arrived at Paris, and that the attention of all the claſſes in the kingdom was fixed upon their meeting as an important æra in the national hiſtory, that the miniſter found himſelf yet unprepared to ſubmit his ſyſtem to their inſpection, and poſtponed the opening of the council to the ſeventh of February. This delay was injudicious in the higheſt degree; politics had occupied the minds of men, particularly in the metropolis, to the excluſion of every other ſubject; ſome of the plans of the comptroller-general had not been entirely concealed; and it was natural that they ſhould engage the premature reflections of the notables, forced from their uſual employments, and left without any other occupation for their leiſure; yet it was the deſign of the miniſter rather to dazzle their imagination, than to derive information from their debates; and he well knew if once they proceeded to doubt, they would aſſume the guiſe of a legiſlature, inſtead of a council of ſtate, a circumſtance the fartheſt from his intentions.

A ſecond delay to the fourteenth of the ſame month was occaſioned by the indiſpoſition of monſieur de Calonne himſelf, and that of the count de Vergennes, preſident of the council of finance, and firſt ſecretary of ſtate; and a third procraſtination was the neceſſary reſult of the death of the count on the day previous to that fixed for the opening of the meeting. He was ſucceeded in the department of foreign affairs by the count de Montmorin, a nobleman of unblemiſhed character. But his loſs at this critical juncture was ſeverely felt by the comptroller-general; he alone of all the miniſters had entered with warmth and ſincerity into the plans of monſieur de Calonne. Monſieur de Miromeſnil, keeper of the ſeals, was avowedly the rival and enemy of that ſtateſman. The mareſchal de Caſtries, ſecretary for the marine department, was perſonally attached to Mr. Necker, and preferred the intereſts of friendſhip to conſiderations which might otherwiſe have engaged his ſupport; and the baron de Breteuil, ſecretary for the houſhold, was the creature of the queen, and deeply engaged in what was called the Auſtrian ſyſtem.

It was under theſe difficulties that monſieur de Calonne, on the twenty-ſecond of February, firſt met the aſſembly of the notables, and opened his long expected plan. He began by ſtating that the public expenditure had for centuries paſt exceeded the revenue, and that a very conſiderable deficiency had of courſe exiſted; that the Miſſiſippi ſcheme of ſeventeen hundred and twenty, had by no means, as might have been expected, reſtored the balance; that under the œconomical adminiſtration of cardinal Fleuri the deficit ſtill exiſted; that the progreſs of this derangement under the laſt reign had been extreme; at the appointment of the abbé Terray it had amounted to three millions ſterling; that miniſter had reduced it to one million ſix hundred and ſeventy-five thouſand pounds; it became ſomewhat leſs under the ſhort adminiſtrations that followed; it roſe again in conſequence of the war, under the adminiſtration of monſieur Necker; and at his own acceſſion to office, it was three millions three hundred and thirty thouſand pounds

To remedy this evil the comptroller-general recommended a territorial impoſt, in the nature of the Engliſh land-tax, from which no rank or order of men were to be exempted; an enquiry into the poſſeſſions of the clergy, which hitherto had been deemed ſacred, from their proportion of the public burthens; the various branches of internal taxation were alſo to undergo a ſtrict examination; and a conſiderable reſource was preſented in mortgaging the demeſne lands of the crown.

The very neceſſity for theſe reforms was combated with a degree of boldneſs and depth of reaſoning that could not fail of ſtrongly impreſſing the aſſembly; and from the hope of ready acquieſcence, the miniſter was now launched into the boundleſs ocean of political controverſy. Before monſieur Necker retired from the management of the finances, he had publiſhed his Compte rendu au Roi, in which France was repreſented as poſſeſſing a clear ſurplus of four hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds ſterling; this performance had been read with avidity, and had been regarded as marking a new era in the hiſtory of France; it probably contributed to eſtrange from the author the royal countenance; but the credit of it was ably vindicated by monſieur de Brienne, archbiſhop of Thouloufe, a prelate eloquent and ambitious, and the paſſionate advocate and admirer of monſieur Necker.

A ſtill more formidable adverſary preſented himſelf to the comptroller-general in the count de Mirabeau. This extraordinary man, has been characteriſed as reſtleſs in his diſpoſition, licentious in his morals, but bold, penetrating, and enterpriſing; yet envy which rarely admits perfection of character to exiſt with tranſcendant genius has never queſtioned his ſuperiority as a politician and an orator. He had occaſionally viſited every court in Europe; he had at one time been admitted to the confidence of the miniſter, and had been directed, though in no oſtenſible character, to obſerve at Berlin the diſpoſition of the ſucceſſor of the great Frederic; in this capacity he was frequently expoſed to neglect and diſappointment; his letters were often left unanſwered; diſguſt quickly ſucceeded to admiration; and he who entered the Pruſſian court the intimate friend, returned to Paris the avowed enemy of monſieur de Calonne: while the archbiſhop of Thouloufe arraigned the underſtanding, the count de Mirabeau impeached the integrity of the comptroller-general; he heſitated not to rank him among thoſe who preferred their fortune to their honour; and who had augmented their wealth by the moſt diſhonourable ſpeculations in the funds; he added that all his operations bore the ſtamp of deſpotiſm and perſonal intereſt; and he called upon the notables to addreſs their ſovereign in the honeſt language of truth; "let "them tell him," ſaid he, "that a man, who was eſtranged to every principle "of good faith, of fidelity in engagements, of reſpect to property, was unfit to "remain at the helm of commerce, of contracts, and of law. Let them tell "him that pliancy of ſpirit, facility of ſtudy, correctneſs of ſtyle, the elegance "of his preambles, the charms of his elocution, were but ſo many new crimes "in a miniſter, who developed with ſkill the principles of an honeſt policy, and "eluded and inſulted them in his practice."

The eloquence of monſieur de Calonne might have poſſibly vindicated his ſyſtem and his reputation againſt the calculations of Brienne, and the ſplendid invectives of Mirabeau; but the genius of the comptroller-general ſunk under the influence of the three great bodies of the nation; the grand and eſſential object of reform, was to equalize the public burthens, and by rendering the taxes general, to diminiſh the load of the lower and moſt uſeful claſſes of the people. The ancient nobility and the clergy had ever been free from all public aſſeſſments; and had the evil gone no further, it might have been ſtill perhaps borne with patience; but through the ſhameful cuſtom of ſelling patents of nobility, ſuch crowds of new nobleſſe ſtarted up, that every province in the kingdom was filled with them; the firſt object with thoſe who had acquired fortunes rapidly, was to purchaſe a patent, which, beſides gratifying their vanity, afforded an exemption to them and their poſterity from contributing proportionably to the exigencies of the ſtate; the magiſtracies likewiſe throughout the kingdom enjoyed their ſhare of theſe exemptions; ſo that the whole weight of the taxes fell on thoſe who were leaſt able to bear them.

The deſign of equalizing the public burthens, though undoubtedly great, thus united againſt the miniſter, the nobility, the clergy, and the magiſtracy; and the event was ſuch as might have been expected; the intrigues of thoſe three bodies raiſed againſt him ſo loud a clamour, that finding it impoſſible to ſtem the torrent, monſieur de Calonne not only reſigned his place on the twelfth of April, but ſoon after retired to England from the ſtorm of perſecution; yet one ray of royal favor ſtill gilded the evening of his adminiſtration; and his rival, monſieur Miromeſnil, received at the ſame time orders to reſign the ſeals.

While the mind of Lewis was aſſiduouſly occupied by the riſing ſpirit of diſcontent at home, the republic of Holland, his new and cloſe ally, preſented a ſcene of anarchy and faction that demanded his moſt ſerious attention. The prince of Orange had been ſtripped of all authority by the democratic party and retiring from the Hague, maintained the ſhadow of a court at Nimeguen; yet feeble as his influence might appear in the United Provinces, he was ſtill formidable from his powerful connections. His brother-in-law, the new king of Pruſſia, for Frederick the Great had cloſed his long and ſplendid career, was indefatigable in his endeavours to promote the intereſts of the ſtadtholder; and had offered, in concert with France, to undertake the arduous taſk of compoſing the differences which diſtracted the republic; the propoſal was received with apparent cordiality by the court of Verſailles; and monſieur de Rayneval, who had already acquired conſiderable credit in negociation, particularly in concluding the late treaty of commerce with England, was appointed to be repreſentative of Lewis in the office of mediation.

Notwithſtanding theſe pacific meaſures, it could ſcarce be expected that France would become the inſtrument of reſtoring the prince of Orange to that ſhare of weight and power which he had before occupied in the republic; and thus abandon one of the longeſt and deareſt objects of her policy, the eſtabliſhing a ſupreme and permanent controul in the affairs of Holland; the conditions that were framed by the Louveſtein faction as the baſis of reconciliation, were ſuch as plainly implied their deſign to contract the influence and authority of the ſtadtholder within very narrow limits; on his renouncing his right of filling up the occaſional vacancies in the town-ſenates, he was to be reſtored to the nominal office of captain-general; but he was to be reſtrained from marching the troops into or out of any province, without leave from the reſpective provinces concerned; and he was alſo to ſubſcribe a reſolution, paſſed ſome time before by the ſenate of Amſterdam, that the command ſhould at all times be revocable at the pleaſure of the ſtates.

Had the prince of Orange acquieſced in theſe preliminaries, France would have completely attained the object of her long negociations, and by means of the Louveſtein faction have acquired the aſcendancy that ſhe had repeatedly ſought in the councils of Holland; but however unequal the prince of Orange might ſeem to the difficulties that ſurrounded him, every deficiency was ſupplied by the genius, the ſpirit, and the abilities of his royal conſort; ſhe pertinaciouſly refuſed to give up any rights that had been attached to the office of ſtadtholder; and mon-ſieur de Rayneval having in vain endeavoured to overcome her inflexible reſolution, broke off the correſpondence between the Hague and Nimeguen, and returned to Paris about the middle of January eighty-ſeven.

A. D. 1787.] It was about this time that the republican party brought forward the propoſal of ſuſpending the prince of Orange from his offices of ſtadtholder and admiral-general; the queſtion was agitated with the utmoſt warmth and acrimony for two ſucceſſive days; but thoſe who had propoſed it found the oppoſition ſo formidable, and the aſpect of the independent members ſo doubtful, that they did not chooſe to hazard the deciſion of a vote.

To this defeat it is not improbable that the abſence of Van Berkel, the firſt penſionary of Amſterdam; in a great meaſure contributed; this man had long been the leader and ſoul of the republican party, and was well qualified by his various talents for that lofty ſituation; by his opponents it has been aſſerted, that his ambition was boundleſs; but that his love of power was ſtill exceeded by his luſt of wealth; and tempted by the emoluments of office alone, he had ſacrificed his influence at home to the lucrative appointment of repreſenting, the republic as miniſter to the United States of America. His adherents have placed him in the firſt rank of their patriots and ſages, and repreſent him as ſacrificing his perſonal fortune in an embaſſy where he could acquire only danger and honour.

The abſence of this celebrated demagogue, though it embarraſſed the counſels, did not extinguiſh the zeal and ſpirit of his party. They were convinced that their power could only be retained by prompt and deciſive meaſures. In the ſenate of Amſterdam their influence daily diminiſhed; in that of Rotterdam they had been out-voted by a conſiderable majority; the provinces of Zealand, Frieſland, Utrecht, and Guelderland, had evinced the ſtrongeſt inclination towards the prince of Orange; and the ſmall provinces of Groningen and Overyſſel alone remained firmly attached to them. Thus, already tottering, they had recourſe to the reſtleſs multitude; aſſociations were formed, and large ſums of money ſubſcribed; and the burghers, provided with arms, ſoon proceeded to acts of open outrage. At Rotterdam they ſurrounded the ſenate-houſe, compelled the ſenate to depoſe ſeven of their body, whom they conſidered as moſt adverſe to their deſigns; and veiling their violence under the form of an election, they filled the vacant places with ſeven of the moſt zealous of their own party; and as the degraded ſenators compriſed the deputies of the city in the aſſembly of the provincial ſtates, the repreſentation of Rotterdam was of courſe totally changed.

On the very ſame day that the ſenate of Rotterdam was purged in this manner by the armed burghers, ſimilar meaſures were purſued by their brethren at Amſterdam. They ſurrounded the ſenate houſe early in the morning: and the affrighted magiſtrates entered into a negociation with them, which was ſpun out until the evening, when finding they had no alternative, they were obliged to ſubmit to the demands of the populace, by declaring that nine members of their body, whom the republican party had proſcribed, had abdicated their offices. Among theſe victims to the revolution, were three deputies to the aſſembly of the provincial ſtates, who had lately voted on ſome occaſions on the ſide of theſtadtholder. At the ſame time that they were clearing the ſenate of their adverſaries, the four colonels of the city militia, and conſequently the only legal commanders of the burghers, were doomed to undergo their perſecution, and obliged to ſend in their reſignations.

The court of Verſailles had hitherto reaſon to exult in the ſucceſs of their party; the republican faction ſeemed every where triumphant, and the trembling adherents of the prince of Orange, each moment expected to be overwhelmed by the headlong torrent; but the turbulent diſpoſition of the people had at length arouſed from their lethargy the ſtates-general, who, accuſtomed ſolely to guard the republic from foreign invaſion, regarded with no little emotion the diſſentions of the different provinces. The dread of beholding the whole commonwealth involved in anarchy, awaked the latent ſparks of power which, however concealed, muſt ſubſiſt in all ſtates. The preſumption of the city of Utrecht in withdrawing its allotted quota of revenue from their diſpoſal, ſeemed an object that merited immediate chaſtiſement; and a body of troops was commanded by the provincial ſtates to beſiege and humble the haughty inhabitants of that opulent capital. This feeble detachment was however encountered by a band of armed burghers: it was on this occaſion that the firſt blood was ſhed in this civil conflict, and the regulars endured the mortification of retiring before an inferior number of undiſciplined citizens.

Yet while the republicans received with avowed triumph the ſucceſs of their firſt eſſay in arms, they were blind to the tempeſt that impended over them: whether too confident of their own ſtrength, they had neglected to ſooth, or were incapable of aſſuming thoſe conciliating manners neceſſary to command the affections of the military:—the ſkirmiſh near Utrecht had ſcarce taken place, before the province of Holland was alarmed by the defection of two thirds of its regular forces, who quitted the poſts that had been aſſigned them, and declared in favour of the prince of Orange. To ſupply the deficiency, the volunteers and armed burghers were ſummoned to the defence of their country, and were appointed to guard the frontiers.

While the ſtates of that province were occupied in repreſſing the ſpirit of deſertion among their troops, an event took place which introduced new and more important actors on the ſtage, and abſorbed every other conſideration. The princeſs of Orange, who had been driven by the violence of the adverſe party from the Hague, now determined to return to the vicinity of that place, with the intention, as ſhe declared, of communicating with the ſtates-general, and bringing forward ſuch conciliatory propoſitions, in the name of the prince, her huſband, as might avert if poſſible the evils and horrors of a civil war.

But the adverſe party regarded this journey in a different light; they ſaid, that in order to facilitate the ſtadtholder's open operations againſt them in the field, the princeſs had come into Holland, with a view of exciting inſurrection and rebellion; and that the debauching the troops of the ſtate, and increaſing their late defection, was alſo probably included in the ſyſtem; by theſe pretences they endeavoured to conciliate the minds of the populace to the rash and imprudent meaſure on which they now ventured; for the princeſs had ſcarce paſſed Schoonhoven, on the borders of Holland, before ſhe was ſurrounded by a party of armed burghers, and was conveyed with every mark of licentious brutality to a ſmall town at a conſiderable diſtance; ſhe was thence eſcorted by the ſame guards to Schoonhoven; and hopeleſs of being permitted to purſue her journey to the Hague, ſhe ſet out the next day for Nimeguen.

The king of Pruſſia, who had beheld with ſecret indignation, but with well-aſſumed indifference, the rights of his brother-in-law invaded by the turbulent ſpirit of the ſtates of Holland, now found in the inſult offered to his ſiſter, that pretence for interference that he had ſo long ardently wiſhed for. He ordered a ſtrong memorial to be preſented to the ſtates of Holland, in which he inſiſted on the moſt ample and ſpeedy ſatisfaction; at the ſame time he repreſented the indignity that he had ſuffered, in the perſon of the princeſs, to the court of Verſailles; and Lewis in pointed terms condemned the inſult, and recommended to the ſtates to efface the affront by the moſt liberal reparation.

The republican party could not conceal their mortification at finding their conduct condemned by that ally on whoſe ſupport they depended; yet whatever appearances the court of Verſailles might think proper to preſerve, the ſtates of Holland ſtill implicitly relied on the faith of France, and concluded that in the hour of extremity her aſſiſtance would be proportioned to their diſtreſs. In this confidence they ſtill rejected all language of ſubmiſſion; they refuſed to enter into any diſcuſſion of the ſubject, and iſſued orders that every thing ſhould be prepared for laying the country under water, the moment any foreign troops ſhould violate the territories of the republic.

The court of Berlin immediately made every diſpoſition for entering into action; nine thouſand Pruſſian troops lined the frontiers of the duchy of Cleves, bordering on the territories of the republic; the governor of Weſel received orders to prepare accomodations for the reception of an army of ſixty or ſeventy thouſand men; and the celebrated hereditary duke of Brunſwick, who by the death of his father was now become the ſovereign and reigning duke of that country, was called from his tranquil enjoyments, to command the forces of his royal kinſman, the king of Pruſſia.

The prince of Orange himſelf was not entirely inactive during theſe tranſactions. With the ſmall army that he had aſſembled, he poſſeſſed himſelf by a coup de main of the fortified town of Wick, in the province of Utrecht; a place eminently noted for its early adoption of the moſt violent republican principles; and which, from its ſituation, was of ſtill more importance, ſince eſtabliſhed on the borders of Holland, twenty-four miles only from Amſterdam, it commanded the courſe of that part of the Rhine called the Lech, and might be conſidered as the key of the province on the ſide of Utrecht: he ſoon after reduced Harderwycke, a town in Guelderland, erected on the Zuyder-ſea, was acknowledged by the city of Middleburg and the whole province of Zealand, which declared without reſerve in his favour, blocked up the city of Utrecht, and repulſed an attempt that was made by the ſuperior numbers of the garriſon and inhabitants on one of his out-poſts.

Theſe ſucceſſes probably ſerved to quicken the motions of the Pruſſians; and the duke of Brunſwick, at the head of an army which conſiſted of about eighteen thouſand men, furniſhed with a train of light artillery, advanced from the duchy of Cleves, and about the middle of September entered the province of Guelderland in three columns; that on the right, which directed its courſe to the northward, was under the command of general Lottum; the centre was entruſted to the generals Waldeck and Gaudi; and the left, which pointed its march to the ſouth, was led by the duke in perſon.

The ſucceſs of each diviſion was ſuch as might have been expected from the dread conceived of the Pruſſian arms; and no ſuperiority of number could embolden either the regular or irregular forces of the province to endure any thing like a conflict even with the huſſars and chaſſeurs. Gorcum, though in a conſiderable ſtate of defence, and under the government of the celebrated colonel and chamberlain Capelle, ſo eminent for his republican principles, ſurrendered after a few ſhots; and the garriſon and governor yielded themſelves priſoners of war to the duke of Brunſwick; Newport and Schoonhoven, both capable of a long reſiſtance, were abandoned by their garriſons: Dort, Leyden, and Haerlem, ſubmitted on the firſt ſummons; and Rotterdam, on the appearance of the Pruſſians, threw open her gates and received the invaders with the loudeſt acclamations.

The progreſs of the column in the centre was equally rapid and ſplendid; on the approach of it, the turbulent city of Utrecht, which had derided the ſmall army under the prince of Orange, was thrown into the utmoſt conſternation; every other object and conſideration immediately gave way to the deſire of eſcape; the city was evacuated by all orders of armed men; the artillery was left on the works without ſentinels or guards; and the prince of Orange, without oppoſition, took poſſeſſion of a city which had long been conſidered as the great bulwark of the province of Holland, and, next to Amſterdam, as the principal ſeat and grand citadel of the republican party.

The column led by general Lottum on the right, met with rather more reſiſtance; Naarden, a ſtrong place, lying at the ſouth end of the Zuyder-Sea, within thirteen miles of Amſterdam, rejecting the ſummons of the Pruſſian commander, and gallantry prepared for defence. But general Lottum, whoſe detachment was by no means provided for a ſiege, turned aſide from the walls and received the ſubmiſſion of Nieuwerſluys, a ſtrong fortreſs, with a garriſon of near eight hundred ſoldiers, who ſurrendered priſoners of war.

During theſe military tranſactions, an unexpected revolution had taken place at the Hague; that town, the reſidence of the ſtates of Holland, was yet ſtrong-ly attached to the perſon and intereſts of the prince of Orange; the governing party, well aware of this diſpoſition, had brought in a ſtrong body of volunteers, to overawe the ordinary garriſon and inhabitants; but under the diſmay which the progreſs of the Pruſſians had excited on the republican ſide; it was eaſily ſeen that the volunteers would not long be able to keep the populace in ſubjection, and ſeveral principal perſons of that party accordingly retired for ſafety to Amſterdam.

The event juſtified their precaution; the Swiſs ſoldiers, who formerly compoſed the ſtadtholder's ſtate-guard, boldly aſſembled, and carried off the two pieces of cannon that had been aſſigned for the ſupport of the volunteers—their zeal ſoon communicated to the inhabitants—the republicans on every ſide were diſarmed—the moſt violent members of the ſtates retired to Amſterdam—and the reſt of that aſſembly immediately ſent a deputation to ſolicit the return of the prince of Orange.

The prince accepted with tranſport the invitation, and with his conſort was received at the Hague with every demonſtration of joy; the ſtates, without heſitation, reſtored him to all thoſe offices and rights from which he had been ſuſpended, and conſequently annulled all proceedings which had been purſued againſt him in that province; they likewiſe iſſued an edict forbidding all attempts to inundate the country, and ſtrictly commanding the governors of all cities to give free admiſſion to the Pruſſian troops; in conſequence of this baron Matha, governor of Naarden opened the gates of that town, on the ſame principles of duty on which before he had kept them cloſed.

All oppoſition was now centred in the city of Amſterdam, and its environs, whither the moſt active and moſt obſtinate of the republican party had fled from all quarters. That proud capital, undiſmayed by the general defection, made every preparation for the moſt deſparate reſiſtance. The ſurrounding country was laid under water, ſtrong batteries were every where erected, all the poſts capable of commanding the roads leading into the town were entrenched and fortified; and the citizens declared they would hold out to the laſt extremity.

The danger was indeed already at their gates; for the duke of Brunſwick had eſtabliſhed round the city a chain of poſts whereever the nature of the ground and the interſection of the dykes would admit; a tranſient negociation was ſcarce ſuffered to interrupt his ardour; and on finding the ſpirits of the Amſterdammers yet unſubdued, he determined to force their boaſted barrier. In order to render the alarm and conſternation more general, he not only ordered all the poſts to be attacked at the ſame inſtant, but that each ſhould be attacked in every quarter that it could be approached; in a defence ſo extenſive, it is not ſurpriſing that ſome weak point ſhould have eſcaped the vigilance, or exceeded the ſtrength of the beſieged; the military talents of the duke of Brunſwick had never been diſplayed to more advantage, he availed himſelf of every favourable occurrence, and notwithſtanding the gallantry of the republicans, penetrated and eſtabliſhed his poſts within their boaſted barrier.

The haughty city of Amſterdam was now for the firſt time delivered to the diſcretion of a victor, and, open on every ſide to bombardment, reluctantly condeſcended to the language of ſubmiſſion. The magiſtracy declared themſelves obliged by the impending danger to ſubſcribe conditions which they yielded to, leſt others more ruinous might be impoſed. Sixteen perſons moſt obnoxious to the princeſs of Orange, were deprived of their reſpective offices; the members of the regency, who had been tumultuouſly depoſed for their attachment to the ſtadtholder, were immediately reſtored; the burghers, and all perſons in the town, except the legal militia, were to be diſarmed; and the Leyden-gate was delivered up to the Pruſſians, to facilitate the performance of the laſt condition.

The court of Verſailles had long truſted to the natural ſtrength of the republican party, and had been aſſiduous throughout the whole ſummer in endeavouring to ſecond them by every deſcription of ſuccours that could be privately imparted. Crowds of French officers arrived every day in Holland, and either received commiſſions in the ſervice of the ſtates, or acted as volunteers in their troops. Several hundreds of tried and experienced ſoldiers, whoſe fidelity and diſcretion could be relied on, were ſelected from different regiments, and being furniſhed wih money for their journey, and aſſurances of future favour, were diſpatched in ſmall parties to join the troops, and to diſcipline the burghers and volunteers. A conſiderable corps of engineers, diſguiſed as mechanics, and inſtructed what anſwers to make to any enquiries, were directed to proceed towards Amſterdam, and to aſſiſt in ſtrengthening the works of that city.

Theſe aids, which might have proved effectual had the conteſt been confined to the ſtates of Holland and the prince of Orange, were overwhelmed in the rapid invaſion of the Pruſſians; and the court of Berlin had taken its meaſures with ſo much celerity, and the ſituation of the republicans was already become ſo deſparate, that it was doubtful whether their affairs could be reſtored by any aſſiſtance that France was capable of immediately adminiſtering. Yet on Great-Britain fitting out a ſtrong ſquadron of men-of-war at Portſmouth, to give confidence to the operations of the king of Pruſſia, the court of Verſailles alſo ſent orders to equip ſixteen ſail of the line at Breſt, and recalled a ſmall ſquadron which had been commiſſioned on a ſummer's cruiſe on the coaſt of Portugal.

In theſe preparations the king of France ſeemed rather to regard his own dignity, than to be actuated by any hopes of affording effectual relief to his allies. All oppoſition in Holland might be already conſidered as extinguiſhed. The ſtates aſſembled at the Hague, had officially notified to the court of Verſailles, that the diſputes between that province and the ſtadtholder were now happily terminated; and as the circumſtances which gave occaſion for their application to that court no longer exiſted, ſo the ſuccours which they then requeſted would be now unneceſſary.

Under theſe circumſtances France could only wiſh to extricate herſelf from her preſent difficulty with honour; and the French king therefore readily liſtened to a memorial from the Britiſh miniſters at Paris, who propoſed, to preſerve the good underſtanding between the two crowns, that all warlike preparations ſhould be diſcontinued, and that the navies of both nations ſhould be again placed on the footing of a peace eſtabliſhment. This was willingly acceded to by the court of Verſailles; a ſhort inſtrument was ſigned by monſieur de Montmorin and the duke of Dorſet, in the names of their reſpective ſovereigns; and that harmony which had been tranſiently interrupted, was reſtored between France aud Great-Britain.

Though Lewis could not but ſeverely feel the mortification of thus relinquiſhing the aſcendancy that he had attained in the conucils of Holland, and was not inſenſible to the diſgrace of abandoning a people who had implicitly relied on his faith, yet every other conſideration was abſorbed by the ſtate of his own domeſtic concerns, and the internal ſituation of his kingdom, which furniſhed matter for deep and ſerious reflection. The diſmiſſal of monſieur de Calonne had left France without a miniſter, and almoſt without a ſyſtem; and though the king bore the oppoſition of the notables with admirable temper, yet the diſappointment which he had experienced was grievous and highly diſcouraging. Without obtaining any relief for his moſt urgent neceſſities, he perceived too late that he had opened a path to the reſtoration of the ancient conſtitution of France, which had been undermined by the crafty Lewis the Eleventh, and had been nearly ſwept away by the daring and ſanguinary counſels of Richelieu, under Lewis the Thirteenth. The notables had indeed conducted themſelves with reſpect and moderation, but at the ſame time they had not been deficient in firmneſs; the appointment of monſieur de Brienne, archbiſhop of Thouloufe, and the vigorous adverſary of monſieur de Calonne, to the office of comptroller-general, probably contributed to preſerve the appearance of good humour in that aſſembly; yet the propoſed territorial impoſt or general land-tax, which was an object ſo ardently coveted by the court, was rejected and, on this occaſion the attorney-general of Provençe was bold enough to declare, that neither that aſſembly, the parliaments, nor the king himſelf, could aſſeſs any ſuch impoſt in the country which he repreſented, ſince it was directly contrary to the ſpecific and indefeaſible rights of the people.

The king now deprived of any further hope of rendering the convention the inſtrument for extricating him from his embarraſſments, determined to diſmiſs the meeting; his ſpeech on diſſolving the aſſembly was well calculated to engage the inclinations of the members. He acknowledged that they had fulfilled his expectations in aſſiſting him with their counſels; that they had not only properly enquired into various abuſes, but had ſuggeſted the means of reforming them; that they had done much towards the attainment of the grand object of reducing the expences of the ſtate to a level with the public revenues, by the proviſional taxes which they had recommended as the moſt proper to be laid on his ſubjects; and he concluded by declaring the ſatisfaction that he enjoyed in the hope, that theſe new impoſts would not be ſo burthenſome as thoſe of former times; the only wiſh of his heart being that of rendering his people as contented and happy as poſſible.

Lewis thus diſappointed of thoſe advantages, which he had flattered himſelf that he ſhould have drawn from the acquieſcence of the notables, was obliged now to recur to the uſual mode of raiſing money by the royal edicts; among the meaſures propoſed for this purpoſe was the doubling of the poll-tax, the re-eſtabliſhment of the third twentieth, and a ſtamp-duty; the whole was ſtrongly diſapproved by the parliament of Paris, but the laſt in particular was the immediate object of contention; and that aſſembly in the moſt poſitive terms refuſed to regiſter the edict. The king was obliged to apply, as the laſt reſort, to his abſolute authority, and by holding what was called a bed of juſtice, compelled them to enroll the impoſt.

The parliament, though defeated, were far from ſubdued; on the day after the king had held his bed of juſtice, they entered a formal proteſt againſt the conceſſion that had been extorted from them. They declared that the edict had been regiſtered againſt their approbation and conſent, by the king's expreſs command; that it neither ought, nor ſhould have any force; and that the firſt perſon who ſhould preſume to attempt to carry it into execution, ſhould be adjudged a traitor and condemned to the gallies.

This declaration left to the crown no other alternative than either proceeding to extremities in ſupport of its authority, or giving up for ever after the power of raiſing money upon any occaſion, without the conſent of the parliament; painful as every appearance of violence muſt have proved to the mild diſpoſition of Lewis, he could not conſent to ſurrender, without a ſtruggle, that authority which had been ſo long exerciſed by his predeceſſors. Since the commencement of the preſent diſcontents, the capital had been gradually filled with conſiderable bodies of troops; and about a week after the parliament had entered the proteſt, an officer of the French guards, with a party of ſoldiers, went at break of day to the houſe of each individual member, to ſignify to him the king's command, that he ſhould immdiately get into his carriage, and proceed to Troyes, a city of Champagne, about ſeventy miles from Paris, without writing or ſpeaking to any perſon out of his own houſe before his departure; theſe orders were ſerved at the ſame inſtant; and before the citizens of Paris were acquainted with the tranſaction, the parliament were already on the road to the ſcene of their baniſhment.

But previous to their removal, they had preſented a remonſtrance on the late meaſures of government, and the alarming ſtate of public affairs; in ſtating their opinions on taxes, they declared that neither the parliaments, nor any other authority, excepting that of the three eſtates of the kingdom, collectively aſſembled, could warrant the laying of any permanent tax upon the people; and they ſtrongly enforced the renewal of thoſe national aſſemblies, which had rendered the reign of Charlemagne ſo great and illuſtrious.

The ardent deſire of the parliaments to re-eſtabliſh the national council, or ſtates-general, was the more honourable, as the former aſſemblies muſt have ſunk under the influence of the latter, and returned to their original condition of mere regiſters and courts of law. The confidence and attachment of the people of conſequence roſe in proportion to this inſtance of diſintereſtedneſs; their murmurs were openly expreſſed in the ſtreets of the capital; and the general diſſatisfaction was augmented by the ſtop that was but to public buſineſs, by the exile of the chief magiſtrates.

The court at the ſame time was apparently weak and divided, and continual changes took place in every department of the ſtate. The king, averſe to rigorous counſels, wiſhed to allay the growning diſcontent by every conceſſion that was conſiſtent with his dignity; but it was generally believed that his royal conſort ſtrongly diſſuaded him from any ſtep that might tend to the diminution of the regal authority; the influence of that princeſs in the cabinet was undoubtedly great; but the popularity which once had accompanied her was no more; and ſome, imputations of private levity, which had been rumoured through the capital were far from rendering her acceptable to the majority of the people; while the count d'Artois, the king's brother, who had expreſſed himſelf in the moſt unguarded terms againſt the perſeverence of the parliament, ſtood expoſed to all the hatred of a lively and inſulted people.

It was not only in Paris that the flame of liberty once more burſt forth; the provincial parliaments imitated that of the capital; among various inſtances of this nature, the parliament of Grenoble paſſed a decree againſt lettres de cachet, the moſt odious engine of arbitrary power, and declared the execution of them, within their juriſdiction, by any perſon, and under any authority, to be a capital crime.

The king had endeavoured to ſooth the diſcontented minds of the Pariſians by new regulations of œconomy, and by continual retrenchments in his houſhold; but theſe proofs of attention, which once would have been received with the loudeſt acclamations, were now loſt in their open affliction for the abſence of their parliament; and the monarch, to regain the affections of his ſubjects, after an exile of a month, conſented to reſtore that aſſembly; the ſources of diſpute on the territorial impoſt, and ſtamp-duty, were abandoned by Lewis; and the parliament on their ſide conſented to regiſter an edict, by which the archbiſhop of Thouloufe was conſtituted firſt miniſter of ſtate.

This harmony was not of long duration; the neceſſities of the ſtate ſtill continued, nor could the deficiency of the revenue be ſupplied but by extraordinary reſources, or a long courſe of rigid frugality; about the middle of November, in a full meeting of the parliament, attended by all the princes of the blood, and the peers of France, the king entered the aſſembly, and propoſed two edicts for their approbation; the firſt was for a new loan for four hundred and fifty millions; near nineteen millions ſterling; the ſecond was for the re-eſtabliſhment of the proteſtants in all their ancient civil rights, a meaſure which had long been warmly recommended by the parliament, and which was probably now introduced to ſecure a better reception to the loan.

In uſhering in theſe edicts, the king had delivered himſelf in a ſpeech of uncommon length, replete with every ſentiment of regard for the people, but at the ſame time full of intimations to the parliament of the obedience he expected. It is poſſible that Lewis imagined that the dread of that baniſhment from which they had been ſo lately recalled, would have enſured the acquieſcence of the aſſembly; but no ſooner was permiſſion announced for every member to deliver his ſentiments, than he was convinced their ſpirits were unſubdued by their recent exile. An animated debate was continued for nine hours, when the king, wearied by inceſſant oppoſition, and chagrined at ſome freedoms uſed in their arguments, ſuddenly roſe, and commanded the edict to be regiſtered without further delay. This meaſure was moſt unexpectedly oppoſed by the duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood, who, conſidering it as an infringement of the rights of parliament, proteſted againſt the whole proceedings of the day as being thereby null and void. Though Lewis could not conceal his aſtoniſhment and diſpleaſure at this deciſive ſtep, he contented himſelf with repeating his orders, and immediately after, quitting the aſſembly, retired to Verſailles.

On the ſovereign's departure, the parliament confirmed the proteſt of the duke of Orleans, and declared, as their deliberations had been interrupted, they conſidered the whole buſineſs of that day as of no effect. But it was not to be ſuppoſed that Lewis would ſilently paſs over ſo bold an attack on the authority of the crown. The Baron de Breteuil next day delivered a letter to the duke of Orleans, in which he was commanded to retire to Villars Cotterel, one of his ſeats, a mile from Paris, and to receive no company there, except his own family; at the ſame time the abbé Sabatiere, and monſieur Freteau, both members of the parliament, and who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the debate, were ſeized under the authority of lettres de cachet, and conveyed, the firſt to the caſtle of Mont St. Michel in Normandy, the laſt to a priſon in Picardy.

The parliament were not ſlow in proclaiming their feelings at this act of oppreſſion; on the following day they waited on the king, and expreſſed their aſtoniſhment and concern that a prince of the blood royal had been exiled, and two of their members impriſoned, for having declared in his preſence what their duty and conſciences dictated; and at a time when his majeſty had announced that he came to take the ſenſe of the aſſembly by a plurality of voices. The anſwer of the king was reſerved and forbidding; "When I put away from my "preſence a prince of my blood, my parliament ought to believe that I have ſtrong "reaſons for doing it; I have puniſhed two magiſtrates, with whoſe conduct I "ought to be diſſatisfied."

This cold and ſtately repulſe did not diſcourage the parliament from preſenting a long addreſs, in which they repreſented in glowing colours the conſequence of the late acts of violence, and painted the unworthy treatment of the two ſuffering magiſtrates confined in horrid and unwholſome priſons, where life was a continual puniſhment; "if exile," they add, "is the recompence of fidelity to the princes "of your blood; if outrage and captivity threaten the ingenuouſneſs of the firſt "magiſtrates of the kingdom, we may aſk ourſelves with terror and grief, what "will become of the l ws—of the public liberty—of the honour—and of the man-"ners of the nation?"

Yet this ſpirit of reſentment did not prevent the parliament from attending to the exigencies of the ſtate; and convinced of the emergency, they conſented to regiſter the loan for four hundred and fifty millions of livres, which had been th. ſource of this unfortunate difference; it is probable this conceſſion coucurred to act upon the mind of the king, naturally humane; and the ſentence of the two magiſtrates was in conſequence changed from impriſonment to exile; monſieur Freteau being ſent to one of his country ſeats, and the abbé Sabatiere to a convent of Benedictines.

The parliament was however unwilling to give up the points againſt which they had originally remonſtrated; and in a petition conceived with freedom, and couched in the moſt animated language, they boldly reprobated the late acts of arbitrary violence:—"We do not come," they declare, "ſo much to claim your "compaſſion, as the protection of the laws. It is not to your humanity alone "that we addreſs ourſelves; it is not a favour your parliament ſolicits; it "comes, ſire, to demand juſtice. That juſtice which is ſubject to regulations, in-"dependent of the will of man; even kings themſelves are ſubſervient to them; "that glorious prince Henry the Fourth acknowledged that he had two ſovereigns, "God, and the laws.

"One of theſe regulations is to condemn no one without a hearing; it is a duty "in all times, and in all places; it is the duty of all men; and your majeſty "will allow us to repreſent to you, that it is as obligatory on you, as on your "ſubjects.

"It is therefore in the name of thoſe laws which preſerve empires; in the name "of that liberty of which we are the reſpectful interpreters and the lawful medi-"ators; in the name of your authority, of which we are the firſt and moſt con-"fidential miniſters, that we dare to demand the trial or the liberty of the duke "of Orleans, and the two exiled magiſtrates, who are impriſoned by a ſudden "order, as contrary to the ſentiments as the intereſts of your majeſty."

A. D. 1788.] Such pretenſions ſtruck at once at the root of arbitrary power; and while they delivered the ſubject from fear, would have diſarmed the vengeance of the ſovereign. But we have already noticed the fluctuating counſels of the court of Verſailles; and Lewis, as often as he was left to purſue his own inclinations, adopted meaſures of reconciliation; in the beginning of the year he recalled the duke of Orleans to court, and permitted the return of the abbé Sabatiere and monſieur Freteau.

The parliament of Paris had not confined their demands to the liberation of theſe gentlemen, but had echoed the remonſtrances of the parliament of Grenoble, and had loudly inveighed againſt the execution of lettres de cachet. Theſe repeated remonſtrances, mingled with perſonal reflections, ſeconded moſt probably the ſuggeſtions of the queen, and Lewis was once more prevailed on to recur to ſeverity. Monſieur de Lamoignon, on the diſmiſſal of monſieur de Miromeſnil, had, on the recommendation of monſieur de Calonne, been entruſted with the ſeals, and he ſtill continued to hold them under the adminiſtration of the archbiſhop of Thouloufe. The chancellor was ſummoned by monſieur de Brienne, to the arduous taſk of compoſing a new court of juriſprudence; the Cour Pleniere was to be the reſult of their joint counſels; each meaſure for the eſtabliſhment of that court was taken with the greateſt ſecrecy; a preſs was erected at Verſailles; printers were employed night and day; and the avenues were ſtrictly guarded from the approach of curioſity by a triple row of bayonets.

Theſe appearances of myſtery ſerved to excite freſh alarms; and the parliament of Paris conceived themſelves too deeply intereſted in the event to be deterred by any obſtacles. Monſieur d'Eſpremenil, a member of that aſſembly, poſſeſſed himſelf of the important ſecret; he divulged it to his aſſociates; and animated them to oppoſe with their combined ſtrength a project which aimed at nothing leſs than their final extinction.

The court of Verſailles, but little ſatisfied with the diſcovery of monſieur d'Eſpremenil, was enflamed by the boldneſs with which he harangued againſt its deſigns; the king was perſuaded that examples of puniſhment were become neceſſary to the ſupport of his power, and meſſieurs d'Eſpremenil and Monſambert, whoſe open and pointed language had preſſed moſt cloſely on the royal authority, were doomed to experience its immediate reſentment. A body of armed troops, provided with axes to force the doors in caſe of reſiſtance, ſurrounded the Palais; the Sieur Vincent d'Agouſt, who commanded them, entered the aſſembly, and ſecured the perſons of the obnoxious members. Monſieur d'Eſpremenil was conducted to the ſtate-priſon of the iſland of St. Marguerite, and monſieur Monſambert to that of Pierre-Enciſe.

The activity of monſieur de Brienne had advanced him from the chief of the council of finance to the poſt of firſt miniſter, and his zeal had been rewarded with a rich abbey and the archbiſhopric of Sens: But this tranſient proſperity was already in the wane; the late inſtance of deſpotiſm was followed by a remonſtrance of the parliament, which exceeded in boldneſs all the former repreſentations of that aſſembly. They declared they were now more ſtrongly confirmed, by every proceeding, of the entire innovation which was aimed at in the conſtitution. "But, ſire," added they, "the French nation will never adopt the "deſpotic meaſures to which you are adviſed, and the effects of which alarm the

" moſt faithful of your magiſtrates; we ſhall not repeat all the unfortunate " circumſtances which afflict us; we ſhall only repreſent to you, with reſpectful " firmneſs, that the fundamental laws of the kingdom muſt not be trampled " upon; and that your authority can only be eſteemed, ſo long as it is tempered with " juſtice."

Language ſo bold and deciſive, and which aſſerted the controuling power of the laws above the regal authority, could not fail of ſeriouſly alarming the royal boſom. To diminiſh the influence of parliament, it was determined again to convene the notables; and about the beginning of May, Lewis appeared in that aſſembly; and after complaining of the exceſſes in which the parliament of Paris had indulged themſelves, and which had drawn down his tardy indignation on a few of the members, he declared his reſolution, inſtead of annihilating them as a body, to bring them back to their duty and obedience by a ſalutary reform. Monſieur de Lamoignon, as keeper of the ſeals, explained his majeſty's pleaſure to eſtabliſh a cour pleniere, or ſupreme aſſembly, to be compoſed of princes of the blood, peers of the realm, great officers of the crown, the clergy, mareſchals of France, governors of provinces, knights of different orders, a deputation of one member from every parliament, and two members from the chambers of councils; and to be ſummoned as often as the public emergency, in the royal opinion, ſhould render it requiſite.

If the aſſembly of the notables liſtened in ſilent deference to the project of their ſovereign, the parliament of Paris received it with every ſymptom of rooted averſion; they ſtrongly proteſted againſt the eſtabliſhment of any other tribunal, and declared their final reſolution not to aſſiſt at any deliberations in the ſupreme aſſembly which his majeſty prepared to inſtitute. A more unexpected mortification occurred to the king, in the oppoſition of ſeveral peers of the realm; theſe expreſſed their regret at beholding the fundamental principles of the kingdom violated; and while they were laviſh in their profeſſions of attachment to the perſon of their ſovereign, concluded with apologizing for not entering on thoſe functions aſſigned them in the plenary court, as inconſiſtent with the true intereſts of his majeſty, which were inſeparable from thoſe of the nation.

The new archbiſhop of Sens was ſtartled by theſe appearances of general diſcontent; and his advice to his ſovereign, was to recall once more monſieur Necker to the adminiſtration of the finances. This counſel, which had it been urged and adopted ſooner, might have been productive of the moſt ſalutary effects, was now only agreed to as the laſt reſource; even in the very moment of giving it, the miniſter heſitated: He had flattered himſelf with the idea of ſtill retaining the nominal direction of affairs; but his rival ſuffered him not long to deceive himſelf with that vain hope; and the firſt ſtipulation of monſieur Necker was the immediate diſmiſſal of monſieur de Brienne, who, deſpoiled of power, was left to conſole himſelf with the dignity of cardinal, and an immenſe revenue, the fruits of his miniſterial influence.

Monſieur de Lamoignon, whoſe elevation had a ſhort time preceded that of the archbiſhop, was ſoon after included in his diſgrace. Though the court was ſtill deſirous of retaining him in office, the parliament purſued him with implacable hatred; the firmneſs of that aſſembly had triumphed over the propoſed eſtabliſhment of the plenary court; but their unwearied reſentment ſtill continued to attend every patron of that obnoxious project. Monſieur de Lamoignon was unable to withſtand their repeated and inceſſant attacks; he demanded and obtained his diſmiſſion from office, and ſeemed at firſt to ſupport the reverſe of fortune with becoming magnanimity; but the myſterious circumſtances of his death have left it doubtful how far his fortitude was equal to the appearances he aſſumed. He was accuſtomed to amuſe himſelf with ſhooting; a few days after his reſignation, he had walked out as if in purſuit of his uſual ſports: in little more than an hour afterwards he was diſcovered by a labourer in a grotto of the garden, dead, and weltering in his blood; the fuſil, the inſtrument of his fate, was by his ſide; but whether diſcharged by accident or deſign has never been aſcertained. Though neither addicted to play nor pleaſures, and long in poſſeſſion of the royal favour, monſieur de Lamoignon left his paternal eſtate deeply burthened with debt; and was accompanied to the tomb by the unfeigned tears of a wife and children, whoſe fortunes he had ruined: An upright magiſtrate and ſincere patriot, he ſhook to the foundation, the magiſtracy and the kingdom; and he bequeathed his example as a ſalutary leſſon to thoſe ambitious ſpirits who beſiege thrones, and aſpire to places of eminence, without firſt enquiring whether they poſſeſs the abilities neceſſary to fill them.

The citizens of Paris had received the diſmiſſal of the late miniſter with the loudeſt acclamations; but the joy of the public was ſoon converted into mourning by an event diſaſtrous and ſanguinary. The populace, in the exceſs of their tranſports, had aſſembled at the Place-dauphine; they had carried about in triumph a figure clothed in epiſcopal robes, of which three-fifths were ſattin, and two of paper; a ſatirical alluſion to a late decree, which authoriſed the different banks to make two-fifths of their payments in paper. The figure itſelf was judged with ludicrous ſolemnity, and condemned to the flames. An eccleſiaſtic, who happened to paſs by at that moment, was arreſted by the crowd; they beſtowed on him the name of the abbé Vermont, who was ſuppoſed to enjoy the confidence, and direct the counſels of the late miniſter; under this fictitious title, they compelled him to confeſs the image; which was immediately after burnt with much ceremony: and the people, gratified with this ideal vengeance, diſperſed without any other marks of diſorder.

The populace had been too much pleaſed with their harmleſs triumph, not to be deſirous of enjoying it again; they accordingly aſſembled the ſucceding day on the ſame ſpot; but that which they conceived as an innocent amuſement appeared in a very different light to the chevalier Dubois who commanded the marechauſſée at Paris. Zealous in the diſcharge of his duty, and eager to diſtinguiſh himſelf by his peculiar vigilance, he prepared to interrupt theſe tumultuous meetings, which he conſidered as endangering the tranquility of the capital. The obvious method would have been to have occupied the paſſes leading to the Place-Dauphine early in the morning, and before the people began to aſſemble. But whether this meaſure eſcaped the penetration of that commander, or that he deſpiſed too much the unarmed and undiſciplined multitude to execute it, it is certain near twenty thouſand people were collected before he thought the numbers worthy his preſence; even then the feeble guard that accompanied him proclaimed his contempt of reſiſtance. His ſlender troop conſiſted only of twenty marechauſſée mounted on horſeback, ſuſtained by fifty on foot. His appearance at the head of this eſcort was by no means productive of the terror that he flattered himſelf he ſhould inſpire; the people, equally deaf to his threats and admonitions, ſtill kept their ground, and refuſed to diſperſe; and the chevalier Dubois, fatigued with ineffectual remonſtrances, at length gave the reins to his natural impetuoſity, and commanded his followers to charge.

The croud, unable to ſuſtain the fury of the firſt attack, were broken by this handful of ſoldiers; ſeveral were trampled down by the horſes of the cavalry, ſeveral were wounded by the ſwords and bayonets of their enemies, and not a few loſt their lives amidſt the general confuſion. But no ſooner were the firſt moments of ſurpriſe over, then ſhame and indignation triumphed over their tranſient fears: The ſpirit of the citizens were reſtored by the ſmall number of their adverſaries; their courage was confirmed by the diſorderly purſuit of the marechauſſée, who in the exultation of ideal victory had quitted their ranks, and renounced thoſe advantages which they might have derived from ſuperior diſcipline; in a moment they were aſſailed on every ſide by thoſe arms which the immediate fury of the people ſupplied; the ſcene was inſtantly changed; the late victors now abandoned themſelves to a precipitate flight, and the chevalier Dubois was the foremoſt of the fugitives.

The people, elated by this eſſay in arms, proceeded to force the guard placed near the ſtatue of Henry the Fourth; all reſiſtance was ſwept away by the torrent of the aſſailants; the vanquiſhed were deſpoiled by their conquerors; their arms were ſeized; their uniforms were burnt; but ſome praiſe was due to the moderation of the multitude, who in the midſt of popular inſurrection reſpected the lives of theſe unfortunate men; and diſmiſſed them after this ſevere leſſon of humiliation, to join their companions.

Hundreds of the lower claſs of people diſperſed themſelves through the city; ſeveral guard-houſes, which ſtood ſeparate from other buildings, were ſet on fire by this diſorderly troop; but on attempting to poſſeſs themſelves of the Greve, the place of execution in Paris, they were repulſed by a body of regular troops; and many attoned with their lives for the tumult they had engaged in. The next morning order ſeemed reſtored throughout the city; but the minds of people ſtill remained agitated; the embers of inſurrection were concealed, but not quenched, and the breath of occaſion was only wanting to wake again the dormant flame.

This was ſupplied by the retreat of Monſieur de Lamoignon; on that event the ſame ſcenes were re-commenced; and the figure of that miniſter was burnt in effigy without any interruption from the police. But it is equally dangerous to treat with ſeverity, or abandon the multitude to their own caprice; and the people from burning in effigy Monſieur de Lamoignon, ruſhed, with torches in their hands, to communicate the flames to the houſes of the late miniſters, and that of the chevalier Dubois.

It was at that inſtant that monſieur de Brienne, the brother of the archbiſhop, and ſecretary of war, arrived from Verſailles. His own hotel was threatened by the inſurgents; and his concern for the public ſafety was ſtimulated by perſonal intereſt: Immediate orders were given for the French guards to march; two different detachments entered at each end of the ſtreet of St. Dominique, where the greateſt number of the populace had aſſembled; theſe were inſtantly pierced by the charge of the regulars; a number periſhed on the ſpot, and the reſt fled in confuſion, and concealed themſelves in the adjacent houſes, at the ſame time the ſtreet Melée, where the chevalier Dubois reſided, preſented a ſcene equally fatal and ſanguinary.

Amidſt theſe diſorders the weak and fluctuating counſels that diſgraced the cabinet of Verſailles preſent themſelves as a predominant feature. On the firſt tumultuary aſſemblage of the people, had a ſtrong body of troops been poſted in the different ſtreets of the capital, the crowd over awed muſt inſtantly have diſperſed; their momentary rage would ſoon have given way to their natural levity; their minds would not have been irritated by the loſs of their companions; nor their ſpirits elated by their vaunted triumph over a feeble band of marechauſſée; but the imbecility of the court neglected the firſt ſparks of inſurrection, and afterwards endeavoured in vain to extinguiſh the flame with the blood of the people.

Another effect, which was little apprehended, but which was attended by conſequences of the utmoſt magnitude, was produced by theſe tumultuary conflicts. In every government the citizens are accuſtomed to regard the military with terror and ſuſpicion; ſtanding armies ever have been, and ever muſt remain, an object of jealouſy to the bulk of mankind: But the ſoldier, though in ſome meaſure ſeparated by his profeſſion from his fellow-citizens, is by no means indifferent to their reproaches, or inſenſible of their hatred. In the late diſturbances the French guards beheld themſelves loaded with the invectives of the capital; they were perſuaded to bluſh at the part they had acted in obedience to the orders of their officers; ſentiments of patriotiſm ſucceeded to thoſe of implicit ſubmiſſion; they wiſhed to be reſtored to the favourable opinion of their countrymen; they declared they were engaged to defend, and not to oppreſs the people, and the language of an individual corps was ſoon generally diffuſed throughout the army.

The parliament, ſo lately reſtored, beheld not in ſilence the commotions which ſhook the capital. The chevalier Dubois was commanded to appear before that aſſembly. The orders which he produced ſtifled all judicial proceedings againſt him, but could not extinguiſh the reſentment of his fellow-citizens; the public tranquillity ſeemed to require his abſence, and government, though reluctantly, conſented to the ſacrifice, and removed him to a diſtance from the capital.

The mareſchal Duc de Biron, who had accepted the command of Paris, was alſo ſummoned before the tribunal of the parliament. He pleaded his age and infirmities, which no longer allowed him to partake the active duties of life; and this excuſe, which ought to have prevented him from aſpiring to a truſt which he was no longer capable of diſcharging, was received by the compaſſion of the parliament as a palliation of his conduct; but the popular indignation augmented the weight of years, and in leſs than a month from this event, the Duc de Biron, oppreſſed by regret breathed his laſt.

The late unhappy diſturbances had caſt a gloom over the minds of the Pariſians, but a ray of hope burſt upon them from the recall of monſieur Necker to the adminiſtration. We have already noticed how invariably hitherto the public confidence had been attached to the meaſures of that gentleman—the credit of an individual ſeemed at this moment to ſupport the tottering ſtate of France—and the people flattered themſelves that the national wealth, which had been ſo long diverted from its proper courſe, would by his integrity and ability, be again reſtored to its natural channel

Few characters have been more ſeverely ſcrutinized than that of monſieur Necker; while his friends and partizans, zealous and grateful, have attributed to him every quality that can adorn a great miniſter, his rivals and opponents have endeavoured to ſtrip him of every pretenſion to merit: In a commercial line, the facility and depth of his calculations had challenged the approbation of his contemporaries; as comptroller-general, his ſplendid project of ſupporting a war by loans without taxes, had attracted the admiration of his countrymen; while the ſevere reform which he had introduced into the royal houſhold, flattered and gratified the applauding multitude. But the commerce of a great people is not to be arranged like that of a ſimple individual. Frugality, induſtry, and probity, are the baſis on which the latter is founded; while the former requires in addition, liberality of ſentiment, expanded ideas, and penetration ſeldom to be eluded. The project of monſieur Necker, in maintaining a war eſtabliſhment without encreaſing the burdens of the people, was indeed captivating and magnificent; but it was attended by two fatal conſequences, it opened to his ſucceſſors the facility of borrowing, a meaſure which muſt ever ultimately prove fatal to a nation; while no ſecurity being immediately appropriated to the payment of theſe new loans, the monied men availed themſelves of this defect to advance the ſupplies at an exorbitant advantage.

If the talents of monſieur Necker had been ſeverely exerciſed, when, amidſt a war which agitated almoſt all Europe, he formerly occupied the poſt of comptroller-general, his ſituation was not leſs delicate, when, on the eve of civil commotion, he was called again to direct the finances of France.

That government poſſeſſed indeed the reſources of an immenſe territory; a country fertile in every neceſſary production; ports and harbours which invited to commerce; and a people equally ſkilful to guide the plough or the loom. With theſe advantages its internal wealth and happineſs ought to have kept pace with its power and grandeur. But before the harveſts of the ſtate could arrive to maturity, before the revenues could be collected into the public treaſury, they for near a century paſt had been anticipated by needy and prodigal miniſters; and France groaned beneath a national debt of five milliards, or upwards of two hundred and eight millions ſterling.

The acclamations which welcomed monſieur Necker to the capital could not baniſh from his mind the difficulties he had to ſtruggle with; he was ſenſible that monſieur de Calonne and the archbiſhop of Sens had both ſunk under the public diſtreſs, and the impracticability of raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies: That diſtreſs had not diminiſhed, and unleſs ſome expedient could be adopted to re-eſtabliſh public credit, he foreſaw his own fate in thoſe of his predeceſſors.

The ſole expedient that appeared likely to produce the deſired effect was the aſſembly of the ſtates-general: That aſſembly had been demanded by the unanimous voice of the people; but it was certainly with reluctance that the ſovereign conſented to convene a body of men, whoſe powers and popularity muſt overſhadow his own authority, and whoſe juriſdiction would confine within narrow limits the ample prerogative he had inherited from his predeceſſors.

Even monſieur Necker himſelf was not a little embarraſſed by the choice of difficulties which preſented themſelves in aſſembling the ſtates-general. Theſe had been wholly diſcontinued during the two preceding reigns; and though the queen-regent, during the troubles which attended the minority of Lewis XIV. frequently expreſſed her intention of calling them together, ſhe was conſtantly diſſuaded by the perſuaſions of the crafty Mazarin. The parliament alſo, who now began to repent their late patriotic remonſtrances; and who recovering from the fumes of enthuſiaſm, beheld with terror, in the re-eſtabliſhment of the ſtates-general, the extinction of their own political conſequence, endeavoured to augment the perplexity of the miniſter, by ſupporting the pretenſions of the nobles and clergy againſt the commons; pretenſions which they themſelves had but lately proteſted againſt as unconſtitutional.

From the reign of Philip the Fair, the period in which the third eſtate, or repreſentatives of the commons, had firſt been admitted into the aſſembly of the ſtates-general, to the year 1614, the influence of that eſtate had undergone a conſiderable fluctuation; its numbers had been occaſionally varied; it had always poſſeſſed a greater number of voices than either of the other orders ſeparated, but had never been equal to the nobility and clergy united: The intereſting queſtion was now propoſed, whether the repreſentatives of the commons ought to be confined to a third in number of the ſtates-general, or, whether they ought to be allowed a number equal to the other two orders united?

An object ſo important could not fail of being diſcuſſed with warmth and ability; the partiſans of either party were numerous and active, the preſs groaned with inceſſant publications, even the ſentiments of the princes of the blood were divided, and while the the count d'Artois, the princes of Condé and Conti, with the duke de Bourbon, ſupported the ancient pretenſions of nobility, the duke d'Orleans, ſacrificing every narrow conſideration, ranged himſelf on the popular ſide, and declared openly for the commons. His ſentiments were received with the loudeſt applauſe, and the people looked with gratitude towards a leader, who in defending their rights was deaf to the voice of perſonal intereſt.

The declaration of the duke d'Orleans was ſoon after followed by the deciſion of monſieur Necker: his propoſal was, after long and ſerious deliberation, approved by the king, and regiſtered by the parliament. It fixed the number of the deputies to the ſtates-general at one thouſand and upwards; it ordained that the repreſentatives of the third eſtate, or commons, ſhould equal in number thoſe of the nobility and clergy united; and it decreed that the different bailiwicks, in returning their members, ſhould be guided by the ſtandard of population.

In the moment of fermentation, when the hopes and fears of people were equally awakened, the election of deputies for the ſtates-general was, with ſome few exceptions, conducted with tranquillity: At Paris indeed the conteſt was long and ſevere: monſieur d'Eſpremenil, who formerly had ſuffered from the royal indignation, and had been confined in the ſtate-priſon of the iſland of St. Marguerite; and the abbé Sieyes, who had defended with energy the pretenſions of the third eſtate, in a popular performance entitled, Qu'eſt-ce-que le Tiers-Etat, were named among the repreſentatives of the capital.

The advice of monſieur Necker had ſwelled the deputies of the third eſtate to an equality in number with the united orders of the clergy and the nobility; but this conceſſion, important as it ſeemed, might yet be evaded, and it was early foreſeen, by thoſe who conſidered with attention the ſituation of two parties, that the nobility and clergy, (who had already offered to bear their part of the burden of the ſtate) to preſerve their influence, would urge their claim to vote by order; while the repreſentatives of the commons would be equally ſtrenuous that every queſtion ſhould be decided by a plurality of voices; that this difference of opinion would ſoon increaſe into an open ſchiſm; and would deſtroy that unanimity ſo neceſſary to the public tranquillity, and ſo eſſential to the deliberations of the ſtates-general.

A. D. 1789. Thoſe who ventured to foretel theſe conſequences, were not diſappointed in the event. On the fifth of May, 1789, the king opened at Verſailles the long expected aſſembly of the ſtates-general. His ſpeech on this occaſion was ſuch as became the ſovereign and the friend of the people: He declared, " that the day which his heart had ſo long panted after was at length arrived, in " which he beheld himſelf ſurrounded by the repreſentatives of a nation, which it " was his glory to reign over.

" That though a long interval had elapſed ſince the ſtates-general had been " aſſembled, and though thoſe aſſemblies had appeared to have ſunk into diſuſe, " yet he had not heſitated to eſtabliſh them again, as a ſource from whence the " kingdom might derive additional ſtrength, and which might open to the nation " a new proſpect of happineſs.

" The national debt," he added, " ſo conſiderable at his acceſſion to the " throne, had been augmented during his reign; this was to be attributed to a " war expenſive indeed, but honourable; the increaſe of taxes had been the " neceſſary conſequence, and had rendered ſtill more apparent the inequality with " which they were levied.

" A general diſcontent, an eager thirſt for innovations had," he obſerved, " pervaded the minds of the people, and might finally tend to delude them from " their duty, if their opinions were not recalled by counſels at once wiſe, mode- " rate, and united.

" It was in that confidence, that he had aſſembled the ſtates-general: and " he beheld with pleaſure his expectations juſtified by the diſpoſition which the " nobility and clergy had already ſhewn to renounce all pecuniary advantages: " And he flattered himſelf that the hope he had conceived, to behold all the or- " ders unanimouſly concur with himſelf in purſuing the public good, would " not be diſappointed.

" In his own expences," he ſaid, " he had already made conſiderable reduc- " tions. But with every exertion of economy, he dreaded that he ſhould not be " able to diminiſh the burdens of his ſubjectsſo ſoon as he deſired; that he ſhould " ſubmit to their inſpection an exact account of the finances; and when they had " examined them, he was aſſured they would propoſe the means moſt efficacious " to eſtabliſh permanent order, and to raiſe the public credit: This grand and " ſalutary work, which would inſure the internal happineſs, and external grandeur " of the kingdom, ought continually to occupy their thoughts.

" The minds of the people ſtill indeed remained agitated; but the repreſenta- " tive body of the nation would doubtleſs only liſten to the language of wiſdom " and prudence; they themſelves had obſerved how often that language had " been neglected; but the ſpirit of their deliberations, (he doubted not), would " anſwer to the true ſentiments of a generous people, who had ever been diſtin- " guiſhed by their attachment to the throne.

" I know," continued the prince, " the authority and power of a juſt king in " the midſt of a people, faithful, and ever devoted to the principles of the mo- " narchy: That authority and power have conſtituted the glory and grandeur of " France; and it is my duty, and I ever will firmly maintain them.

" But whatever can be expected for the public welfare, whatever can be de- " manded of a ſovereign, the friend of his people, you may—you ought—to " hope, from my ſentiments.

" That a perfect unanimity may reign through this aſſembly; that this period " may become for ever memorable for the happineſs and the proſperity of the " kingdom, is the wiſh of my heart, is the moſt fervent of my prayers; it is the " reward that I expect for the uprightneſs of my intentions, and my love for my " people."

Such was the language delivered from the throne on the firſt meeting of the ſtates-general. The patriotic ſentiments of the ſovereign were followed by a cold and inſipid harangue from the keeper of the ſeals, which was received without attention, and immediately conſigned to oblivion.

But far different was the reception of the ſpeech of monſieur Necker; every word was ſtrongly imprinted on the minds of the auditors, and every ſentiment expoſed to the ſevereſt ſcrutiny. He ſtated, that the ſame power which had thought proper to ſummon, might alſo have prevented the meeting of the ſtates-general; though in reſpect to the finances, the public debt was conſiderable, that various reſources remained, without having recourſe to this extraordinary expedient. He then touched upon the difficulties that had occurred in convening the aſſembly; he repreſented the facility with which a king of France could always render himſelf maſter of their determinations, ſhould theſe depend upon a plurality of voices; and he concluded a ſpeech of three hours, by ſtrongly inſinuating the propriety of deciding every queſtion by a majority of the orders taken ſeparately.

It was the misfortune of monſieur Necker, on this occaſion, to be deſirous of pleaſing both parties, and of conſequence he obtained the permanent confidence of neither; the acclamations of the giddy multitude ſtill indeed attended him, but ſeveral deputies of the third eſtate or commons, regarded already with ſuſpicion the miniſter who repreſented the ſtates-general merely as the effect of royal compliance, inſtead of a conſtitutional right: They were ſtill leſs ſatisfied with the ſyſtem he inclined to, to decide every queſtion by a majority of orders inſtead of a majority of voices; while the clergy and nobility recollected with indignation, that his counſels had ſhaken their former ſuperiority, and had ſwelled the commons to equal in number the other two eſtates.

Neither the unanimity recommended by the king, nor the ſyſtem of policy inculcated by his miniſter, had a momentary effect on the ſtates-general. Scarce had the monarch left the hall, before the clergy and the nobility retired to their different chambers to verify their powers. The third eſtate regarded this ſeparation with evident jealouſy; they conſidered it as an open attempt in the other two eſtates to eſtabliſh the ſyſtem which had been alluded to by the miniſter of the finances. Compoſing in number one half of that aſſembly, the commons were determined never to ſubmit to the claims of the nobility and clergy to vote by orders, and thus to reduce themſelves to a third part of the aſſembly; a conceſſion which they aſſerted would have rendered illuſory the rights which had been acknowledged in the third eſtate: and why, added they, have we been granted a moiety of voices, if thoſe voices are to be conſidered as only compoſing a third?

The third eſtate, which had remained in the hall appointed for their deliberations, preſſed the other two orders to continue with them, and to verify their powers in common: They urged, that at preſent the important queſtion was by no means concerned, whether they ſhould deliberate by orders or by number; and th e ſole matter in diſpute was a ſimple verification of powers. Several days paſſed in fruitleſs invitations and negociations; the patience of the third eſtate was at length exhauſted; they determined to proceed to buſineſs, and they aſſumed the title of commons; a title which we have already beſtowed upon them by anticipation.

On the eleventh of May, the nobility alſo, after having verified their powers, declared themſelves a legal aſſembly; but the clergy followed their march with more cautious ſteps. They deferred the verification of their powers, and regarding themſelves as yet compoſing no conſtitutional body, they offered their mediation between the other two orders. But the minds of each party grew daily more hoſtile; the ſchiſm became ſtill wider; and at length the royal interpoſition was deemed neceſſary to compoſe thoſe differences which blaſted the happy fruits that had been expected from the meeting of the ſtates-general.

But the ſeeds of diſcontent had taken root too deeply to be eaſily eradicated; in vain did Lewis recommend, in the moſt perſuaſive terms, that unanimity which alone could give weight to the proceedings of the aſſembly; his plan of conciliation produced only debates, aſſemblies of commiſſaries, addreſſes, and deputations, eloquent but indeciſive. Several weeks were conſumed in ineffectual motions on the ſcarcity of corn, the diſtreſs of the people, the regulation of the police, and the validity of elections.

At length, about the middle of June, the impatience of the commons prevailed over every other conſideration; ſeveral of the clergy, already aſhamed of their inactivity, had conſented to verify their powers in the preſence of the third eſtate; their example had been followed by a ſmall body of the nobility; and on the fifteenth of June, the abbé Sieyes, availing himſelf of this event, made his celebrated motion.

He repreſented, "that the aſſembly already conſiſted of deputies returned by "a very conſiderable majority of the nation; that ſuch a body ought not to "remain inactive becauſe a certain deſcription of citizens obſtinately perſevered "in abſenting themſelves; that it belonged to them to proclaim the general "wiſhes of the nation; that no intermediate power could exiſt between them "and the throne; and that the title of known and acknowledged repreſentatives of "the nation belonged to that aſſembly: That it no longer became them to defer "the ſalutary work of reſtoring order to the nation, in the vain hope that the "deputies now abſent would unite with them, and partake in the labours of "re-eſtabliſhing the glory and happineſs of France."

After long and animated debates, the commons, on the ſixteenth of June, adopted the ſpirit of the abbé Sieyes' motion; rejecting at the ſame time the title of the known and acknowledged repreſentatives of the nation, and ſubſtituting in the place of it, that of the NATIONAL ASSEMBLY; thus aſſuming to themſelves the vaſt power of legiſlative government, amidſt the approbation of a vaſt concourſe of ſpectators, whoſe plaudits of "long live the national aſſembly" rung the hall. —With the birth of this illuſtrious title to the French repreſentation, a title and an era for ever memorable, we ſhall cloſe this volume.

THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.

THE REVOLUTION.

SOCIETY, like the individuals of which it is compoſed, is the creature of circumſtances, capable of being faſhioned by imperceptible cauſes, or ſwayed by the weakeſt no leſs than by the moſt violent paſſions. How lamentably fatal have been the effects of ignorance upon Nations! How baleful the effects of an inſinuating and effeminating Luxury! The one hath nurſed the horrid brood of error; the other hath ſunk man below himſelf, into all the debaſing ways of Vice; both have concurred to make man the ſlave of his equal; and to ſupercede for a time the bounties of providence.

It is from hiſtory that men ſhould draw that experience ſo neceſſary to guard againſt the moſt fatal of human evils. It is by the errors and crimes of mankind in paſt and preſent times, he ſhould learn to ſhun thoſe paths which inevitably lead to ſimilar ends. The records of departed time do not afford a topic ſo eventful and momentous as that of the French Revolution; perhaps it is not from the hand of a contemporary that a ſubject ſo powerful over the paſſions can be effectually illuſtrated; and it is not improbable that a future generation may derive more advantage from the terrible admonitions which it furniſhes, than the preſent.

But it will be admitted that no period can be more ſuitable than the preſent to collect the ſcattered and fugitive materials which have ariſen from the paſſing events. Theſe carefully teſted by the ſimple proceſs of taking evidence where the parties are oppoſed to each other in principles, but concur in the facts; or where the facts are diſputed; ſelecting that ſtatement which appears moſt probable, but without diſguiſing the objections which ſtand againſt it: Placing theſe in the moſt inſtructive point of view, the enquirer of the preſent day will poſſeſs the beſt information that is to be obtained; future times muſt develope thoſe ſecret operations which the intereſts and irritation of parties have alwayscarefully ſecluded from the ſcrutiny of their opponents.

Vanity engroſſes ſo large a portion of the human character, that it is not extraordinary to find different opinions upon the origin of the French revolution; or that eager to obtain the credit of the diſcovery, individuals have endeavoured to fix its origin to that ſingle cauſe which moſt concurred with his prejudices or his wiſhes. But however unſubſtantial the individual theory, perhaps the union of the many cauſes may be truly found to have produced this great event.

An examination of the hiſtory of the French monarchy, even from the period of the revival of letters, would alone furniſh evidence of a double progreſſion which muſt at ſome period end in a convulſion between the inſatiable rapacity of the monarchy and the accumulating enlightenment of the people.

Under the united extravagance of her kings the French nation for ten centuries exhibited an aſtoniſhing example of attachment and obedience; but although the rapid ſucceſſion of their afflictions tended to drown the recollection of the paſt in the pains of the preſent; the voice of remonſtrance was ſometimes heard. The parliaments at different periods had manifeſted a ſpirit worthy of the moſt happy days of ancient Athens, and beſides their ſucceſs in eaſing the people from particular burthens, we know that their power has proceeded ſo far with the ſupreme authority, as to beſtow the regency three times, and to annul the teſtaments of two kings.

The plenitude of power uſurped by Lewis the Fourteenth had thrown the nation into a lethargic apathy, which prevailed with odious uniformity during the reign of his ſucceſſor, Lewis the Fifteenth; whoſe debauched life and unprincipled extravagance contaminated by example while it ſapped the foundations of the people's domeſtic ſimplicity and comfort; he entailed on the nation thoſe antiſocial vices which proceed from luxury, while he encumbered them with an enormous addition to the public debt. Lewis the Sixteenth commenced his reign, it has been remarked, under the moſt ſiniſter and unpopular auſpices, with iſſuing lettres de cachet and diſputes with the parliaments; but he poſſeſſed ſome of the moſt happy qualifications to ſucceed at ſuch a critical juncture; auſtere in his obſervance of the ordinary moral duties, he exhibited in his own perſon a ſevere economy, and it has been urged as an extraordinary fact, claiming admiration, that during a reign of eighteen years he had neither miſtreſſes nor favourites.* But his wife unfortunately more than ſurpaſſed in profuſion the habitual parſimony of Lewis: ſhe diſliked expence and pomp; ſhe aſpired not only to the dominion over the graces, but over the government. —The habitual coldneſs of Lewis was ſubdued into a baleful ſufferance of every exceſs by the plaſtic allurements of his conſort; and in the already contaminated atmoſphere of the court, minions were not wanting capable of perfecting that ruin which already threatened the nation through the incumbrances of an immenſe debt.

At the commencement of the revolution, the debt of France, commonly known by the name of the deficit, conſiſted of two claſſes; one the annual expences above the actual receipts, which was eſtimated at fifty-ſix millions: the other of the ſum of five hundred and ſixty millions, payable at certain periods.

* Du Government des Moeurs, et des conditions en France, avant la Revolution, &c. printed at Hamburg, 1795.

A curſory review of the early part of the reign of Lewis XVI. will ſerve to diſplay the numerous calls for new taxes, and the ſyſtems adopted to ſatisfy the wants of the government: But it may be firſt neceſſary to exhibit the character of the nation in the aggregate, as drawn by the pencil of the moſt impartial, and the concurring teſtimony of writers of oppoſite opinions in politics. The character of the French could not be juſtly confounded with that of the court or its viſitors. The nobles who imported into the provinces ſcarcely any thing beſide vices and oppreſſion, exhibited each in their caſtles an epitome of the frivolity and debauchery of the capital; but the pride of birth on one hand, and unaſpiring ſimplicity on the other, fixed a barrier which reſiſted every inroad but that of oppreſſive levies and barbarous laws.

The inveterate deſpotiſm of ages and the accumulating burthens of taxation, had been in ſome meaſure countervailed by the gifts of nature; a happy climate and a fertile ſoil ſuſtained the ſimplicity of their manners and enjoyments; and the ſenſe of honor and the love of country animated the hearts of the people in the practice of the ſocial virtues, unleſs where titular honors had given a ſanction for every gradation of turpitude. That ſupercilious dignity which depends not on talents and the practice of virtue, but in a diſtinction which holds no other character but that of arbitrary regulation or in prejudice, was not yet ſo odious in its general operation in France as in other countries; we are told that there was a perpetual friction between the different claſſes, which rubbed off ſuch of the angles of ſociety as were too prominent; hence it may not be ſo much a matter of ſurpriſe that a people peculiarly ſuſceptible of complaiſance ſhould ſubmit to impoſitions laid in a manner flattering to the individuals though ultimately fatal to their proſperity. The domeſtic lives of the people were enviable objects of contemplation and deſire. A certain gaiety, a ſweet familiarity that looks innocent and unabaſhed in the face of the ſtranger or the great; an urbanity ſeldom to be met with in other countries, which ſoftens and reconciles the difference of years; a frank fondneſs which diſplayed the huſband and wife, if not lovers, the civileſt friends and the kindeſt parents—the only parents perhaps who treated their children like friends; the moſt affable maſters and miſtreſſes; the cold formality of invitation was unknown between relatives and friends, and the ſtranger, in partaking of their hoſpitalities, felt no anxiety but in the obligations which their courteſy laid him under. Such were the prominent features of the French character, as drawn by a diſcriminating hand.* But candour muſt allow that this preſents a large calculation on the ſtock of happineſs; to meaſure the miſery of the nation by an equable proceſs, it would be neceſſary to eſtimate the progreſſive exceſſes of the government, which had been growing up for ſo many reigns. This properly belongs to the prior hiſtory; however it may be ſatisfactory to preſent a brief outline of the public grievances at this period.

Under the monarchy of France that eternal principle of Juſtice, which makes mutuality of allegiance and protection, the only baſis and bond of civil government, was utterly diſregarded, or not recognized; that the will of the king is the will of the law, had become a maxim of the government; hence it is not a matter of ſurpriſe that the limitted capacity of a monarch, bred up enſtranged from the wants and cares of ſociety, ſhould either impoſe inefficient or oppreſſive laws himſelf, or be betrayed into them by the intrigues of the more crafty and ambitious. The oppreſſive inſtitution of the corvee, had been aboliſhed a few years prior to the revolution, through the ſalutary advice of Turgot. But the greater feudal ſuperiorities ſtill maintained their oppreſſive influence in the utmoſt plenitude; to theſe were attached a monopoly of entails, a diſcretionary power in the ſuperiors over their vaſſals; the nobles totally exempted from contribution to the wants of the ſtate, and nobility was purchaſeable; hence as the nation became opulent the rich became noble, and the weight of the public burdens became heavier on the poor:—barbarous foreſt laws, which put the life of the peaſant in conſtant jeopardy; an oppreſſive ſtanding army, to ſupply which the multitudinous inferior ranks of ſociety were arbitrarily torn from their families, their children doomed to indigence and ignorance; the national wealth, both in collection and expenditure, at the entire and unqueſtioned diſcretion of the crown, levied without any previous conſent of the contributors, and without any other form than that of a royal edict—and in the rare inſtances of remonſtrance, enforced by a compulſive regiſtration;—Places created and penſions laviſhed without neceſſity or merit, the offices of public truſt, honour, and emolument, military and civil and the adminiſtration of juſtice put up to ſale; unbounded ſecondary offices of oppreſſion, and immenſe patronage of eccleſiaſtical preferments, ſecular and regular, diſpoſed of without any viſible advantage to the ſtate, and repeatedly employed as the price of corruption, crimes, and intrigue; the public roads infeſted by an inſolent marechauſſée, who maltreated or pillaged the poor without mercy or fear of puniſhment; barriers of inquiſition on the public roads; all correſpondence by poſt violated; all communication of thought by the medium of the preſs, philoſophical, moral, civil, political, or religious, equally enthralled by public examination and conditional licenſe; an inquiſitorial police invading the private receſſes of ſociety; and lettres de cachet conſtantly iſſuing by the influence or the reſentment of courtiers, and often of the moſt abandoned proſtitutes.

Such was the great outline of national oppreſſions at the period which we have taken up the hiſtory of France; the people, however, ſeemed to bear with extraordinary patience ſuch an enormous aggregation of wrongs; the ſucceeding pages will develope ſtill further cauſes of complaint, for it was not until the national ſpirit had began to awake, that the grievances which had been long ſanctioned by patient endurance were found not to be therefore juſt.

We may now reſume the conſideration of thoſe circumſtances which peculiarly marked the reign of Lewis XVI. The evil moſt ſenſibly felt by the government, was the deficiency of funds to ſupply the exigencies of the public ſervice; Necker thought to ſubdue the difficulty by loans, and the moſt rigid œconomy; by reforming ſome of the expences of the houſhold and retrenching ſuperfluous offices in the various departments of the adminiſtration; but while he acquired popular applauſe, he alſo incurred the enmity of a numerous and powerful nobility, to whom his ſyſtem was particularly obnoxious, and through whoſe intrigues he was at length diſmiſſed from office. His ſucceſſor, monſieur Calonne, commenced his adminiſtration with great popularity, but the maſk with which he had at firſt ſeduced their applauſe was ſoon removed from this penetrating people, and his meaſures not only incurred their diſapprobatinon but that of their repeſentatives; however, the power of the ſovereign for a time ſtamped ſufficient importance on every proceeding of his miniſter; To give a more effectual ſanction to the increaſing loans and taxes now in contemplation, the assembly of notables was convened; but the minister derived no advantages from this body, and they were soon dissolved. The king now had recourse to the accustomed measure of a royal edict. A double poll-tax, a third twentieth, and a stamp-duty were thus ordained to be levied. The parliaments oppосed these taxes, and the king had immediate recourse to the compulsive authority of a bed of justice. The banishment of the parliament was the consequence of their remonstrances; but with an instability that signalised Lewis, they were soon recalled. New measures were formed by the court; the king call d another assembly of the notables, with a view to sanction the establishment of a cour pleniere; by this project it was intended that all royal edicts should be registered, and the painful remonstrances of the parliaments avoided: but opposition strangled this monstrous measure in its birth, and with it terminated th administration but not the influence of Calonne. Necker was soon after recalled, whose first measure was to give way to the popular desires, in advising the assembly of the states-general.

The principles of liberty now began to manifest themselves in memorials from various parts of the kingdom, on the nature of the representation to the states-general. The principles of the election to that body were discussed fully in the assembly of the notables, representation fixed, but so as to alarm many of the nobles, and particularly the prince of Conti, whose predictive fears were considerably heightened by the nature of the numerous publications disseminating throughout France. He caused a note to bedelivered to the king, expressive of his uneasiness for the result of these unusual productions of the press. Monarchy, he said, was attacked, and its existence endangered! The moment was near, and it comported with the necessity of the times to proscribe this licentious liberty, and blast these new systems in their bud. But the king received this note with his accustomed coldness, This was followed soon after by another memorial presented to the king, by the princes of the blood, excepting Monsieur and the duke d'Orleans. They affirmed that the state was in instant danger, that a revolution was gradually undermining the vitals of the government, and that institutions by which the monarchy had been upheld for ages, were now derided as unjust; that the publications and representations from the provinces were alarming, evincing a contempt of the law; such was the excess of popular innovation, that men void of ability or information, had been invested with the fate of empires; inflamatory publications were read with avidity, and their poison of such a nature that no power could set bounds to opinion?—already had the rights of the throne been disputed; those of the two higher orders were next questioned; it had even been proposed to suppress the feudal lordships, as a system of oppression, and a remnant of barbarism; that there only remaine the uneqnal distribution of property, which would soon be deemed an infringement requiring reform.

These representations appear at first sight in a degree prophetical; but on a closer examination will be found to be the result of an intimate acquaintance with humann nature, and of the particular circumstances of France. The claim of a representation for the commons, equal in number to that of the other two estates united, was the first result of of national opinion; it was determined also that the great principle of proportioning the representation to the population and financial contribution of the different bailliages, should be the adopted. It was at this this period of public agitation the memorable society of The Friends of the People, since called Jacobins in allusion the hall where they met, was formed.

Its members held correſpondence with all parts of France; poſſeſſed of a rare union of talents and enthuſiaſm, it gave a tone to the national voice that reſponded with impreſſive harmony from all points of the nation. The agitations which prevailed among the three eſtates of nobles, clergy and the commons, on the important queſtion whether they ſhould vote by ſeparate houſes, ſo that an union of any two could ſuppreſs the reſolutions of the other, or whether the tiers état ſhould, being equal in numbers, have an equal vote with the other two orders united, were now carried to a great height. On the motion of Rabaut de St. Etienne (a proteſtant clergyman) commiſſioners were appointed to negotiate an accommodation, but, without the deſired effect, the nobles continuing obdurate. No mode of conciliation appearing practicable, conſiſtent with the dignity of the repreſentatives, who being adhered to by ſome of the nobility and clergy, the tiers état, upon the ſuggeſtion of the abbé Sieyes, took the important reſolution of aſſuming the ſupreme legiſlative authority, under the famous title of the National Aſſembly.

From the period of this event, which took place on the ſixteenth of June, 1789, may juſtly be dated the commencement of the revolution—when privileged orders and feudal diſtinctions—the ſtupendous fabric of eccleſiaſtical authority and the magnificence and power of the hoary monarchy of France, crumbled into ruin beneath the breath of a nation awakened into action by the weight of their grievances.

The new aſſembly immediately took the neceſſary oaths, and, as the firſt act of authority, they declared that the different taxes collected throughout the kingdom, as never having received the aſſent of the nation, were illegal and null; but at the ſame time, that the preſervation and ſafety of the ſtate demanded the continuation of them; and they therefore decreed, that they ſhould be levied as before, until the time that the national aſſembly ſhould be prorogued; but from the moment that event, from whatever cauſe it might proceed, ſhould take place, then all impoſts and contributions, which had not been nominally, formally, and freely granted by the aſſembly, ſhould entirely ceaſe in every province of the country.

At the ſame time the aſſembly declared, that as ſoon as they had aſcertained the principles of the conſtitution, they would direct their attention to the public debt; placing from this moment the creditors of the ſtate under the ſafeguard of the honour and faith of the French nation: And, to alleviate the fears of the people, a committee of ſubſiſtence was immediately eſtabliſhed, to enquire into the cauſes of the dearth which at that moment afflicted the kingdom.

It is ſcarce poſſible to deſcribe the different ſenſations and effects which this memorable day produced. The people, in the moment of triumph, abandoned themſelves to all the intoxications of joy: "One hour," ſaid they, "has deſtroyed the prejudices and ſlavery "of fourteen centuries; the nation has once more reſumed its rights, and reaſon "has again aſſerted her ſway. The clergy and nobles, beneath whoſe uſurpations we "have ſo long groaned, have vaniſhed from our ſight; the charm is broken, and the "voice of the repreſentatives of the commons is become the voice of the nation."

On the other ſide, the nobility and clergy watched the courſe of the torrent with a mixture of terror and indignation; they beheld the pretenſions of the commons ſweeping before them thoſe excluſive privileges which had long been attached to their orders, and which long cuſtom had almoſt converted into rights: "It is not," exclaimed "they, our own deſtruction that we lament; it is the ſubverſion of the monarchy."

Nor could the ſovereign himſelf be indifferent to the proſpect before him: He had liſtened to the complaints of the people; he had reſtored the commons to their deareſt and moſt ancient rights; but he had moſt probably given way to the flattering illuſion, that it would always be in his power to reſtrain their zeal within certain bounds; it is not impoſſible that he had even conceived the hope, after uſing their influence to eſtabliſhed the new taxes, and reſtore regularity to the finances, that he might be able to let this popular aſſembly ſink once more into diſuſe. But if he had indulged this pleaſing dream, he was ſoon awakened from it by new pretenſions and declarations of the third eſtate. Borne away by the ſtream, the clergy and nobles ſeemed to ſtretch forth their hands and implore the protection of the crown; his favourites aſſailed his ears with dark and gloomy repreſentations; even his royal conſort is ſuppoſed to have joined in predicting the dangerous influence the commons were likely to acquire: The flexible deſpoſition of Lewis was unequal to the weight of united ſolicitation; he yielded to the intereſted importunities of thoſe around him; and determined once more to oppoſe the royal authority to the enthuſiaſm of the people.

The moment was now rapidly approaching, when that authority which the national aſſembly had acquired by its eloquence, was to be maintained by its courage and perſeverance. On the twenty-firſt of June the deputies, on preſenting themſelves at the entrance of the ſaloon, found the door ſhut, and all admiſſion precluded by a numerous guard. The reaſon aſſigned for this extraordinary ſtep was the preparations for the king, who had declared his intention to be preſent on the twenty-third. Surpriſed, but undaunted, the members immediately adjourned to a neighbouring tennis-court where they reſolved, that in this alarming juncture the deputies of the nation ought to ſwear, "that "they conſidered themſelves inſeparable; and that they would continue to aſſemble in "every place practicable." A general enthuſiaſm prevailed; all unanimouſly crowded to take the oath; and their ſolemn aſſociation in defence of the common cauſe was reduced into writing by the ſecretary, and ſigned by every one preſent.

On the enſuing morning that aſſembly met in a church; and its numbers were again augmented by a conſiderable body of clergy, who preſented themſelves to verify their powers. This freſh acceſſion of ſtrength, with the ſanctity of the place, affected every mind; it was a moment of triumph to Mr. Bailly in particular, who having long diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an academician, was in this important criſis nominated to preſide in the national aſſembly.

On the twenty-third of June, the day that had been appointed by the king, the three orders aſſembled in the grand ſaloon of Varſailles. His majeſty opened the aſſembly by a ſpeech, in which he complained of that diviſion which prevailed among them, ſo fatal to the hopes of the people, and ſo contrary to the views of the ſovereign. This diſcourſe was followed by a declaration from the keeper of the ſeals: In the moſt deciſive language it inſiſted on the ancient diſtinction of the three orders as eſſential to the exiſtence of the ſtate; it eſtabliſhed particular rules in future for their deliberations; it aboliſhed, and declared void, the celebrated declaration of the commons on the ſeventeenth of the month, with all thoſe that had followed, as illegal and unconſtitutional; and finiſhed by declaring that the ſaloon, which hitherto had been open, ſhould be cloſed to the public in general.

A ſecond declaration followed the firſt, in which the king announced all the favours which it was his intention to grant to his people; and concluded with, "I may truly ſay "that no king has ever done ſo much for any nation whatſoever; but what ſubjects can "have merited ſo much from their natural deſpoſition as my own?"

The ſecond declaration conſiſted of thirty ſix articles, all of the utmoſt importance; taxes, loans, the actual ſtate of the finances, the ſums allotted to different departments for the maintenance of the king's houſehold, the conſolidation of the public debt, and the abolition of the pecuniary privileges of the clergy and nobility; letters de cachet, liberty of the preſs, of commerce, civil and crimnal code, perſonal liberty, equality of impoſt, with the eſtabliſhment of provincial ſtates, were points on which his majeſty explained his wiſhes and his will. In addreſſing the aſſembly he added, "If you abandon "me in this honourable enterpriſe, I alone will eſtabliſh the happineſs of my people; "it is ſeldom perhaps that the ſole ambition of a ſovereign is to prevail on his ſubjects to "receive his favours."

On retiring, the king had commanded the three orders to ſeparate immediately, and the next morning to aſſemble each in its reſpective chamber. The clergy, with the exception of a few, and the nobility, in obedience to the royal injunction, quitted inſtantly the ſaloon; but the commons ſtill remained, and debated with firmneſs on the meaſures likely to avert the deſtruction with which they were menaced from the intrigues of the court.

The aſſembly purſued their diſcuſſions with extrordinary freedom and animation, and at length Lewis thought it neceſſary once more to interpoſe; the marquis de Breze, grand-maſter of the ceremonies was injudiciouſly choſen to be organ of his will; he entered the hall, and addreſſed himſelf to the preſident thus, "You know, ſir, the intentions "of the king." The ſignificant brevity of this communication, and the haughty levity of the meſſenger, were calculated rather to encreaſe the heat and jealouſy which already prevailed, than to obtain that effect which was intended to be produced. Nevertheleſs, the preſident anſwered in a manner reſpectful and dignified, that the aſſembly was not conſtituted to receive orders from any perſon. Mirabeau then roſe from his ſeat, and addreſſed himſelf to M. de Breze, "The commons of France have determined to debate; "we have heard the intentions which have been ſuggeſted by the king; but you, who "cannot be his agent to the ſtates-general—you, who have neither ſeat nor voice here, "have no right to remind us of his ſpeech: go, and tell your maſter, that we are here "by the power of the people, and nothing ſhall expel us but the bayonet." Unanimous approbation ſeconded this ſpirited ſpeech, and the grand-maſter retired confuſed from the hall. M. Camus in an animated harangue pointed out the neceſſity of deciſive meaſures for their ſecurity; he enveighed ſeverely on the royal ſeſſion, which he contemptuouſly ſtigmatized with the title of the bed of juſtice; and concluded with propoſing a decree declaratory of their adherence to their former decrees, which he aſſerted no power could annul. Meſſrs. Barnave, Fethion, Gregoire, and ſeveral others ſupported the propoſition, which paſſed with the unanimous concurrence of the aſſembly. Soon after they broke up, having firſt agreed to a motion of Mirabeau, "That the perſon of every deputy ſhould be con-"ſidered inviolable."

It was fondly expected at Verſailles, that the interpoſition of the king would be attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences; and it is not improbable, that had the king's declaration been announced earlier, and in a ſuitable form, the commons would not have ventured to oppoſe themſelves to the effects of his indignation; but they had already tried their own ſtrength and plainly ſaw the wavering inſtability of the monarch: they felt their own importance as the repreſentatives of the nation at large, they knew the influence attached to that character in the preſent awakened ſtate of public ſentiment, and they were determined to preſerve it or to periſh in the attempt.

Another circumſtance that greatly diminiſhed the effects of the king's declaration was the abſence of monſieur Necker; that miniſter was ſtill the idol of the multitude, and even many of the deputies regarded his experience and abilities as abſolutely requiſite to reſtore order to the finances. From his abſenting himſelf at ſo critical a juncture, it was concluded that he by no means approved the royal declaration; this ſuppoſition was confirmed by his offering at that moment to reſign; the populace, who conſidered on his retreat the veſſel of the ſtate as deſerted, crowded round his houſe, and when aſſured that he was ſtill to remain at the helm, teſtified their joy by acclamations and illuminations

Every circumſtance, however trifling, ſerved to agitate and inflame the minds of the people; th court and capital about this time began to divide into two parties; thoſe who adhered to the pretenſions of the clergy and nobility, were di inguiſhed by the title as Ariſtocrats; while thoſe who declared themſelves on the popolar ſide, were deſcribed as Democrats. The angry countenances of the Pariſians alſo foretold the ſtorm that was brooding; ſeveral priſons were forced, the debtors and criminals were ſet at liberty; and the French guards were loudly called upon by their fellow citizens to quit the cauſe of deſpotiſm, and to range themſelves beneath the ſtandard of liberty.

The clouds gathered on every ſide; the weakneſs of the royal councils, the boldneſs of the commons, and the enthuſiaſm of the people, all demanded the moſt mature reflection; the court of Verſailles no longer inſpired confidence or terror; and even could its fortitude have been relied on, to eſtabliſh its former aſcendancy, it was neceſſary to wade through torrents of blood. The flames of civil war muſt have been kindled, and the ſubject who had fought the battles of deſpotiſm, at beſt, could but have found his reward in a ſplendid ſlavery.

The pretenſions of the commons, on the other hand, ſeemed to have paſt the bounds of moderation; but the road which they had choſen led to liberty: It was indeed thorny and rugged; it had been long left unexplored; but the toil of the traveller was cheered by hope; and his labour was to be rewarded by the moſt ineſtimable of human bleſſings.

To that bleſſing the nobility themſelves were not entirely inſenſible. From the firſt moment that the voice of freedom had been heard, we have beheld the duke of Orleans attentive to her ſummons: As firſt prince of the blood, his ſituation allowed of no increaſe of dignity; his immenſe revenue, perhaps, exceeded that of any other ſubject in Europe; to theſe advantages no change of government could add; but he was conſcious they muſt have been conſiderably diminiſhed by that ſyſtem which adopted as its baſis the equality of mankind.

Yet one reward remained, the approbation of his fellow-citizens; to merit this he had early ſubjected himſelf to the royal diſpleaſure; in the beginning of the preſent reign we behold him, with his father, exiled from the court; his proteſt in eighty-eight had been attended with his baniſhment to Villars Cotterel; on his recall his conduct had ſtill been conſiſtent, and he had ſupported the demand of the third eſtate to an equality of voices in the ſtates-general with the clergy and the nobility; he now, in concert with about fifty of the nobility, determined to join the national aſſembly; and endeavoured to put an end to that ſchiſm which threatened to ſhake the kingdom to its very foundation: this occurred on the twenty-fifth of June. The people were not indifferent to this freſh inſtance of his zeal for the public welfare; and they beſtowed on their illuſtrious champion, the glorious title of prince of patriots.

The clergy and nobility who yet remained ſeparate, had publiſhed their reſolution to adhere to the royal declaration of the twenty-third; but whether the influence of the miniſter of the finances for a moment prevailed, or the king yielded to his natural inſtability and deſire of peace, in a letter that his majeſty addreſſed to the two privileged orders, after aſſuring them how ſenſible he was of their fidelity in accepting his declaration, he added, that in the preſent ſituation of affairs, he could not diſpenſe with recommending them to join thoſe, who had refuſed to accede to the propoſal he had made.

This celebrated junction was effected on the 27th of June. Several of the nobility and the higher rank of the clergy, ſtill combated againſt the deciſions of the aſſembly being determined by a majority of voices inſtead of orders; but their feeble attempts were overwhelmed by the numbers of the commons; and a proteſt was the only fruit of their long and unſucceſsful oppoſition.

The re-union of the different orders had inſpired the people with the moſt lively hopes of tranquillity; but thoſe hopes were ſoon blaſted; the influence of the queen and the baron de Breteuil ſeemed again to predominate at Verſailles; and the ſovereign had ſcarce conſented to the wiſhes of his people, before he was perſuaded to repent of the conceſſions he had granted. Large bodies of troops were directed to march towards Paris; a conſiderable camp was formed near the gates of the capital; the avenues to Verſailles were guarded by a formidable artillery; numerous ſentinels were planted round the palace; and the mareſchal de Broglio, grown grey in the wars of Germany, was ſummoned to command the forces aſſembled in the iſle of France.

The hoſtile preparations neither eluded the vigilance of the national aſſembly, nor were beheld with indifference by the citizens of Paris. They formerly contented themſelves with addreſſing his majeſty to withdraw thoſe troops which filled with apprehenſions the minds of his faithful ſubjects; aſſuring him at the ſame time, that he might rely on the loyalty of the national aſſembly. But the latter, impatient of the controul with which they were menanced, had already proceeded to acts of violence, and had delivered by force ſome ſoldiers of the French guards, who had been confined by their colonel for military offences.

The indiſcretion of the citizens of Paris was overlooked and pardoned by Lewis; but to the addreſs of the national aſſembly, the ſovereign replied, that the diſorder of the capital had rendered it neceſſary to aſſemble an armed force in its neighbourhood; but that the deliberations of the national aſſembly ſhould ever be re..rded as free and ſacred; and if the deputies entertained any apprehenſions, they were at liberty to adjourn to Soiſſons or Noyon.

July 4.] The fortitude of the national aſſembly diſdained an alternative, which muſt for ever have alienated from them the minds of the capital: The moment was arrived for the election of a new preſident, in the room of monſieur Bailly; a conſierable majority of voices were in favour of the duke d'Orleans; but that prince, at the ſame time that he expreſſed himſelf ſenſible of the honour, with ſentiments of moderation and diffidence, declined the offer; and the archbiſhop of Vienne was elected in his place.

The ſtate of the colonies had claimed the attention of the aſſembly; that of St. Domingo had obtained the right of naming ſix deputies; and the national aſſembly to accelerate the public buſineſs, determined in future to divide itſelf into a number of committees.

The ſcarcity with which France was afflicted became the principal and moſt important object of deliberation; the capital bore with impatience the high price of corn, and the murmurs of the inhabitants were loud and general: It was at this moment when the greateſt addreſs was neceſſary to ſooth their diſcontented minds, that the court ventured on a meaſure as unpopular as it was impolitic.

On the eleventh of July, monſieur Necker, who had ſo long commanded the confidence of the multitude, received the royal orders to quit ſuddenly the kingdom. The firſt intelligence of his departure filled Paris with conſternation; he was conſidered as a ſacrifice to the patriotic ſentiments he had avowed; the people regarded his exile as the firſt ſtep to the ſubverſion of their freedom; the exchange was ſhut; the public ſpectacles were ſuſpended; and the crowds that aſſembled tumultuouſly in the ſtreets, proclaimed by their countenances their grief and indignation. Their fury at laſt blazed out with open violence; the bells were ſounded on every ſide as ſignals for the citizens to arm: The licentiouſneſs of the rabble, who, during the night, had pillaged ſeveral houſes, ſeemed to authoriſe this meaſure. The city, to facilitate the election of deputies, had been divided into ſixty diſtricts; and the electors, on the firſt alarm, repaired to their reſpective departments; they were claſſed into different regiments, they aſſumed a cockade of various colours, which was dignified with the title of National; while the court, whoſe verſatility had provoked the inſurrection, ſeemed loſt in aſtoniſhment at its progreſs.

The national aſſembly were no ſooner informed of the diſorders which raged through the capital, than they diſpatched a numerous deputation to the king, to repreſent their concern, and the dangers which threatened the ſtate. The favourites who had deſpiſed in the moment of tranquillity the rage of the populace, now trembled for their perſonal ſafety; the anſwer from the throne was conceived in terms the moſt ſatisfactory; the king aſſured the deputies that he would withdraw the regular troops from the environs of the capital; that he deſired his intentions might be known to the Pariſians; and that, to maintain the public order, he permitted the citizens to form themſelves into military bodies, while he himſelf would ſelect the proper officers to command them.

But before Paris could be aſſured of the favourable intentions of the ſovereign, her ſtreets had already been ſtained with civil blood; the regiment of Royal-Allemand, commanded by the prince de Lambeſc, had been ſtationed in the gardens of the Thuilleries; but the colonel, apprehenſive that the increaſing numbers of the people might preclude his retreat, gave orders to his ſoldiers to force their way through the crowd; in this attempt, the prince is reported to have wounded himſelf an unarmed citizen. This unfortunate accident awakened again the fury of the people; the regiment of Royal-Allemand was attacked by every weapon that inſtant rage could ſupply. The French guards ranged themſelves on the ſide of the populace; and it was not without ſome loſs that the prince de Lembeſc ſecured the retreat of his reigment.

The croud, elated by ſucceſs, precipitated themſelves on the hotel of invalids; they there poſſeſſed themſelves of thirty thouſand fuſils; while the guards, that might have defended this important charge, waited in vain the orders of monſieur de Bezenval, the general of the Swiſs troops, and were tame ſpectators of the inſult. Each attempt confirmed the populace; armed with the trophies of their new victory, they now preſſed forward to the Baſtile, and with loud cries devoted to deſtruction that celebrated fortreſs of deſpotiſm.

The maſſy walls of the Baſtile, with the wide and deep ditch that ſurrounded them, might have defied the frantic valour of the inſurgents, had they been confided to any other perſon than the marquis de Launay. But the conduct of that officer was equally fatal tohis life and reputation; he rejected the demand of the people to remove the artillery from the ramparts, yet he neglected to raiſe the draw-bridge, and ſuffered a crowd to place themſelves upon it: On theſe unhappy people, who peacably awaited the effect of a parley which he held, he ſuddenly fired—ſeveral were the victims of this guilty raſhneſs—but the populace inſtead of being intimidated, were only irritated by the fate of their companions—they preſſed forwards in thouſands to avenge them—in vain did the wretched governor propoſe terms of capitulation—their fury was deaf to every entreaty, and ſuperior to every obſtacle: Reſiſtance was in vain—each avenue was forced—monſieur de Launay, a priſoner, loaded with inſults, was dragged to the place of public execution—and his head ſevered from his body, was carried in triumph through the ſtreets.

Monſieur de Loſme Salbrai, the major of the Baſtile, whoſe blameleſs life had been paſſed in alleviating the ſufferings of his priſoners, with ſeveral other officers of inferior note, were the victims to the miſconduct of the governor, and the undiſcerning rage of the people: once having taſted of blood, the multitude became inſatiate; and the guilty day was marked by the deſtruction of monſieur Desfleſſelles, prevot de Marchands: The refuſal of that officer to deliver the arms entruſted to him to the inſurgents, and a rumour that he had excited the unfortunate Launay to reſiſtance, proved fatal to his life; and he was torn to pieces by the barbarous madneſs of the ſanguinary populace.

If the ſtate of the capital was deplorable, that of the army was ſcarce leſs critical; the example of the French guards had pervaded the camp; the ſoldiers openly declared their reſolution not to arm againſt their fellow-citizens; the defection became general, and the mareſchal de Broglio was reluctantly compelled to inform the king, that his majeſty muſt no longer place any dependence on the army that he had been appointed to command.

The deputies, who had been diſpatched from the national aſſembly to reſtore order to the capital, had been witneſſes of the late ſanguinary ſcenes of commotion; they now returned to inform that aſſembly, that the voice of the nation at large demanded the recal of monſieur Necker, as a pledge of the ſincerity of the court; and a ſecond deputation was appointed to repreſent to his majeſty, the dangers with which every moment was pregnant.

The flattering proſpect which the courtiers had placed before the eyes of the king, was now vaniſhed from his ſight: The dream, that the royal authority would have inſpired inſtant and implicit ſubmiſſion, was no more; a people without government, an army without obedience, the provinces diſcontented, and the capital in revolt, formed a picture hediouſly alarming. Nothing remained but to ſooth the minds of the people by compliance; the camp, which had ſpread the fatal alarm throughout Paris, was inſtantly broken up; the different reigments were diſmiſſed to the diſtant quarters they had before occupied; the new miniſters, who had ſcarce yet entered upon their employments, were removed; and numerous couriers were diſpatched after monſieur Necker, to ſolicit his return. The letter from his majeſty to that ſtateſman, expreſſed his regret at yielding to the miſrepreſentations of his enemies; it invited him once more to ſhare his confidence, from which he never again ſhould be excluded; and expreſſed his hope that he would comply with the wiſhes of his ſovereign and fellow-citizens.

The royal letter to monſieur Necker was accompanied by the following from the national aſſembly: "The national aſſembly has already, Sir, declared by a ſolemn act, "that you carried with you their eſteem and regret; this honourable teſtimony has been "ſent to you on their part, and you muſt have received it. This morning they had "come to a reſolution to addreſs the king, requeſting your return; this was the reſult "of their own wiſhes, united to thoſe of the capital, which loudly demands you.

"The king has deigned to anticipate our deſire, and has announced to us your recal; "gratitude immediately impelled us to wait on his majeſty, who has given a freſh token "of his confidence, by charging us to ſend you this letter.

"The national aſſembly, Sir, preſs you to yield to the deſires of his majeſty; your "virtues and your talents cannot receive a more glorious or a more flattering incite-"ment. This will juſtify our confidence—you will not prefer your own repoſe to that of "the public—you will not decline to aid the beneficent intentions of his majeſty in "favour of his people. Every moment is precious—the nation, its king, its repreſen-"tatives await you."

While the royal couriers, with theſe flattering marks of approbation, were purſuing the flying ſteps of monſieur Necker, the ſovereign himſelf was employed in endeavouring to eſtabliſh harmony again in the capital. For this purpoſe his preſence at Paris was deemed neceſſary, and he entered the city amidſt the acclamations of its inhabitants; he was met by monſieur Bailly, who, during the late diſorders, had been choſen mayor of Paris, and whoſe election the king had been pleaſed to confirm; that officer preſented to his majeſty the keys of the capital, addreſſing him at the ſame time in the following memorable words: "Theſe, Sire, are the ſame keys which were preſented to Henry "the Fourth; he came to conquer his people; this day it is the people who re-conquer "their king."

Whatever might be the ſecret mortification of the ſovereign at this ſingular harangue, his whole conduct was ſuch as could not but challenge the applauſe of the moſt zealous champions of patriotiſm. The marquis de la Fayette, whoſe enthuſiaſtic ardour had impelled him to croſs the Atlantic, and to fight beneath the banners of America, was now ſelected by his countrymen to command the militia they had newly formed; and the choice of the Pariſians was ſanctioned by the approbation of his majeſty; who preſented a new inſtance of compliance with the wiſhes of the multitude, by ſhewing himſélf at the windows of the Hotel de Ville with the national-cockade.

After theſe repeated conceſſions, the king was permitted to return once more to Verſailles, but the calm that his preſence had diffuſed throughout the capital was deceitful and of ſhort duration; the minds of the people ſtill remained agitated; diſtruſt and cruelty ſtill characteriſed the multitude; and the ſlighteſt ſuſpicions were ſufficient in their eyes to ſanction the moſt barbarous executions. Each day beheld ſome new ſacrifice to their ſanguinary caprice; but the ſuperior ſituations of meſſieurs Foulon and Berthier, have diſtinguiſhed their fate from more innocent though leſs conſpicuous, victims of popular fury.

The unfortnnate monſieur de Foulon, on the diſmiſſal of Necker, had been named to a poſt in the new adminiſtration; though in conjunction with his colleagues he had retired from office on the recall of that ſtateſman, yet his retreat ſerved not to extinguiſh the hatred of the Pariſians; his diſpoſition, naturally ſevere and uncomplying, probably encreaſed the general diſlike; and an expreſſion that public rumour had once attributed to him, "that hay was food good enough for common people," inflamed the murmurs of diſcontent into open menaces of deſtruction. Senſible of the ſtorm that threatened him, he had retired into the country, and hoped in diſguiſe and privacy to await the return of general tranquillity. But it was the misfortune of this gentleman to be equally obnoxions to his tenants and the Pariſians; by the former his place of retreat was diſcovered to the latter; he was dragged in bloody triumph to the capital; judges were appointed to try him; but the impatience of the multitude could ill brook the ſlow forms of juſtice; he was forced from the guards; the cord of a lanthorn ſupplied the inſtrument of execution; his body was dragged through the kennels; and his head, with the mouth filled with hay, was carried in cruel exultationthrough the ſtreets of the capital.

Monſieur de Berthier, the ſon-in-law of Foulon, though more amiable in his character, was ſcarce leſs culpable in the eyes of the people. A rumour prevailed that he had furniſhed the troops lately encamped in the environs of Paris with a conſiderable quantity of ammunition; he was alſo accuſed with not only having monopolized great quantities of corn, but alſo with having deſtroyed the growing harveſt to enhance the price of the grain in his poſſeſſion. Though his fate was longer deferred, he had reaſon to regret the more ſpeedy death of his father-in-law. The head of the unfortunate Foulon was thruſt into his carriage, and he was compelled by the enraged populace to ſalute it. This painful compliance ſerved only to procraſtinate the hour of his deſtruction; the populace were deaf to every ſolicitation, and the laſt moments of his life were embittered by reproach, inſult, and torture.

The fate of meſſieurs Foulon and Berthier, was an awful warning to thoſe who by their inefficacious diſdain for the ignoble multitude, and the arrogance and cupidity of ſucceſsful avarice, were alike liable to the effects of an unbridled vengeance; to the leading characters of the popular party it preſented a leſſon no leſs ſtriking; and meſſieurs Bailly and de la Fayette were taught, that it is more eaſy to attain the dignity than to exerciſe the authority of office: the former diſtinguiſhed by his extraordinary talents as an aſtronomer, from a peaceful academician, was tranſferred to a high political ſituation, and inveſted with the new title of mayor of Paris; and the ambition of the latter, which had early precipitated him amidſt the ſtorms of civil commotion, had been gratified with the title of commander of the militia. Both had ſtrenuouſly exerted themſelves in favour of the late unhappy victims; but the crowd were equally deaf to their intreaties and remonſtrances; and they were now taught, though too late, how much more eaſy it is to excite than to appeaſe the paſſions of the multitude.

The flight of more illuſtrious perſonages probably only preſerved them from the fury of the people. The count d'Artois and the prince of Condé were avowedly attached to the ancient government; the former, it was ſuppoſed influenced the diſmiſſal of Necker, and had adviſed his royal brother to the moſt rigorous meaſures in ſupport of his authority; the mareſchal duke de Broglio had braved the reſentment of the Pariſians by accepting the command of the army which had been lately encamped at their gates, and rumour had attributed to him the projection of meaſures of coercion extenſive and ſanguinary, rumours which ſubſequent events corroborated; the family of Polignac, in partaking the favours of the queen, more than partook of the odium which at this period purſued that princeſs: but theſe had all found their ſafety in a precipitate flight, and had quitted a kingdom where their ſentiments had rendered them eminently obnoxious, and where the regard of their ſovereign could no longer afford them protection.

The ſituation of that ſovereign was dreary and forlorn; a gloomy ſilence reigned through his palace of Verſailles—his courtiers and familiars had been torn from his ſide—his brother terrified into exile—his capital polluted with the blood of his ſubjects—that loyalty and obedience, ſo long the characteriſtic of his people, extinguiſhed—that fidelity to the royal perſon and veneration for the regal authority, which ſignaliſed his troops, were no more; and ſome painful ſenſations muſt have accompanied a letter which he addreſſed to the marquis de la Fayette, and by which even the French guards were permitted to enter into the national militia, and at the ſame time to receive their former pay.

The influence of the national aſſembly had riſen in proportion to the diminution of the royal authority; yet that body could not behold the late frantic and ſanguinary exceſſes of the capital without ſecret anguiſh and horror. A populace maddened into all the extravagance of revenge, inſatiate of blood, and enamoured of cruelty—deaf to entreaty, and impatient of authority; the ſcourge of deſpotiſm wreſted from the hand that had held it, but that of anarchy impending over their heads.

Yet amidſt every danger their conſtancy never forſook them; the archbiſhop of Vienne had conducted himſelf through his ſtormy preſidency with firmneſs and ability, and in his place the duke of Liancourt, who had been early diſtinguiſhed by his zeal, was called to the temporary dignity. To appeaſe the capital, corn was brought from the moſt diſtant parts of the kingdom, and agents were diſpatched to every court in Europe to ſolicit ſupplies. The minds of the citizens were aſſuaged by the hopes of returning plenty, and the affections of the ſoldiers were confirmed by a decree which aboliſhed corporal puniſhment; part of a ſyſtem of diſcipline which had been received in the armies of France with univerſal deteſtation, and which while it marked the unfeeling cruelty of the government that adopted it, ſerved to undermine the military ſpirit and defeat the purpoſes of its inſtitution—by degrading the ſoldier from his manlineſs of mind, ſinking him below the level of a ſlave into the condition of a brute, and at once blotting out from his heart every confidence in religious precept, every bias to moral and ſocial affections; a mode of puniſhment, in a word, that ſubverted perſonal valour and diſgraced the nation.

The tempeſt which commenced in the capital agitated the moſt diſtant provinces, the example of Paris and Verſailles prevailed throughout; the national-cockade was univerſally diſplayed; and from the frontiers of the Mediterranean-ſea to the Alps, from the Pyrennees to the ocean, the defection was general.

Two millions of peaſants in arms ſeverely avenged the injuries they had formerly endured, and thoſe of their progenitors; with ſavage joy they directed the flames of deſtruction againſt the ſeats of their religion and nobility. The rich edifices of the church, the lofty caſtles of the nobles were confounded in one general ruin; the archives of the great, the titles of ancient poſſeſſions, were in a moment deſtroyed; thoſe owners deemed themſelves happy who could eſcape by a precipitate flight; while thoſe who were more tardy or leſs fortunate, frequently were expoſed to the moſt barbarous and lingering deaths. Some imperfect eſtimation may be formed of the general devaſtation, ſince in the province of Burgundy alone, thirty-two ſeats of the nobility were levelled to the ground; while in Brittany, and Normandy, the ravages of the inſurgents were the more conſiderable.

The departure of Necker had blown the embers of diſcontent into open flame, but his return it was ſtill hoped would extinguiſh the conflagration. That gentleman had directed his haſty ſteps from Bruxelles toward his native country of Geneva; at Baſle he was informed of the arrival of the Ducheſs of Polignac, who was flying the bloody reſentmeut of the inſurgents; from her he firſt learnt the events which had immediately taken place on his departure; the inſurrection of the capital, the defection of the troops, and the preſent intentions of the ſovereign; under theſe circumſtances he determined to remain at Baſle, and await the orders of the king.

Theſe ſoon arrived, accompanied by the letter of the national aſſembly: To the firſt he replied with every expreſſion of gratitude, and every aſſurance of attachment; to the laſt he anſwered, by declaring, that though it had long been his wiſh, at this late period of his life, no further to have intereſted himſelf in the fate of France, than by fervent prayers for her proſperity, yet on receiving the letter of the national aſſembly, he thought it his duty to preſent to them his reſpectful acknowledgements in perſon; and to prove to the king and the nation, that nothing could relax that zeal which had ever been the leading principle of his life.

In conformity with theſe declarations he quitted Baſle, and preſſed forwards to Verſailles; on his route at Villenau, he found the Baron de Bezenval, late general of the Swiſs troops, and who was travelling towards Swiſſerland with a royal paſſport, arreſted by the militia of the town. On this occaſion monſieur Necker endeavoured to avail himſelf of his own popularity, and the temporary enthuſiaſm of the people, by attempting to procure the releaſe of that gentleman, but it was in vain that he urged his own reſponſibility for the liberty of the baron, and acknowledged the obligation that would be conferred; the militia were deaf to his ſolicitations, and notwithſtanding his remonſtrances, determined to retain their captive.

Whatever mortification monſieur Necker might have endured by the refuſal of the militia of Villenau, was immediately effaced by his reception at the capital. His entry there was regarded as a public triumph; an immenſe concourſe of people preſſed to meet him, a numerous guard conducted him with military honours through the city; the air reſounded with acclamations of "Long live the Nation! Long live Necker!" Every houſe was illuminated; but it could not eſcape the obſervation of the ſpectator, that the ſtreet of Vivienne, the chief reſidence of bankers and ſpeculators, who had enriched themſelves by the loans of the miniſter, was the moſt ſplendid in diſtinguiſhing its zeal.

Though the humanity of monſieur Necker had not availed in extricatiug the Baron de Bezenval at Villenau, he could not but flatter himſelf, that his ſolicitations would have been attended with better ſucceſs in the capital. He had been followed by the plaudits of the citizens; he had been loaded with the panegyrics of the national aſſembly—and when he preſented himſelf at the hall of the electors, he ſeized the favourable moment, and urged the propriety of a general amneſty.

This requeſt was ſeconded by the eloquence of the Count de Clermont Tonnerre; and a decree was immediately drawn up and ſigned by the electors, importing, that at the interceſſion of monſieur Necker, and to render memorable the day that had reſtored that miniſter to France, the aſſembly, in the name of the citizens of the capital, pardoned all its enemies proſcribed all acts of violence in oppoſition to the preſent decree, and conſidered thoſe only as enemies of the nation, who ſhould hereafter interrupt by any exceſſes the public tranquillity.

The ſatisfaction of Necker at this deciſion was but of ſhort duration; and to explain the revocation of a decree ſo conſiſtent with true policy, and ſo honourable to humanity, it is neceſſary to recur once more to circumſtances which we could not with ſo much propriety touch upon, in tracing the firſt ſteps to the revolution.

To facilitate the nomination of deputies, on firſt convening the ſtates-general, Paris had been divided into ſixty diſtricts: theſe diſtricts had appointed a certain number of electors, as they were termed, whoſe voices were finally to decide the choice of the deputies. But the electors, though certainly compoſing no legal body, confined not their cares to that ſingle object—they demanded an apartment of the Hotel de Ville to aſſemble in—and the eſſential ſervices they had rendered in contributing towards ſupplying Paris with proviſions, for ſome time endeared them to the citizens.

But the firſt moments of tranſport were ſcarce over, when the inhabitants began to regard the electors with ſuſpicion and diſtruſt: a rumour that this aſſembly propoſed to render itſelf perpetual, increaſed the public jealouſy and diſlike; and in lieu of this illegal maſs, it was determined that each diſtrict ſhould appoint two deputies, who ſhould occupy themſelves in tracing a plan for the municipality, and in providing the ſubſiſtence of the capital.

It was theſe hundred and twenty deputies, who had again proclaimed monſieur Bailly, mayor, and the marquis de la Fayette, commander-general of the militia of Paris; theſe two civil and military chiefs had hitherto held their ſituation rather by the acclamations than the ſuffrages of their fellow-citizens: They now addreſſed a circular letter to all the diſtricts, in which they invited them to approve their nomination; and having received a ſolemn confirmation of the choice of the deputies, they took the neceſſary oaths.

But the appointment of the deputies, though it controuled, did not diſſolve the general aſſembly of the electors; the former had preſented themſelves before the latter, and after thanking them for their zeal, and inviting them to concur in mutual efforts for the public benefit, they had even confirmed the ſeveral committees for the ſubſiſtence of the city, and the regulation of the police, contenting themſelves with adding four of the new deputies to each committee.

It muſt yet be allowed that on this occaſion, the general aſſembly of the electors conducted themſelves with great moderation: they declared they were ready to deſiſt from the exerciſe of all authority, as ſoon as a majority of the diſtricts ſhould command, and as the new deputies could take charge of the public affairs; and they added, that if they did not immediately ſuſpend their meetings, it was that the deputies themſelves had entreated them to continue their labours, ſo neceſſary to the general good.

Yet this declaration was far from recovering the public opinion, and their ſteps were ſtill attended by jealouſy: It was at the moment when affairs were thus delicately ſituated that monſieur Necker arrived at Paris; and in ſoliciting the pardon of the baron de Bezenval, and a general amneſty, unfortunately addreſſed himſelf to the general aſſembly of the electors.

We have already related the compliance of that aſſembly with his wiſhes; but no ſooner was their concurrence made known than the diſtricts took fire at their preſumption, "What," exclaimed the people, "at the moment that the national aſſembly prepares to appoint a committee, to enquire out thoſe whoſe treaſonable practices have been levelled at the nation; at the moment that it has promiſed to eſtabliſh a tribunal to puniſh thoſe traitors to the people, does an aſſembly without power, without title, without character, dare to pronounce an amneſty, a general pardon? The electors pardon! Then alſo they have a right to puniſh; but who has inſtituted them judges of the enemies of the ſtate? Who has given them the power to annul the decree of the national aſſembly?"

Even the reputation of monſieur Necker did not entirely eſcape that odium which attended the late decree of the electors: It was inſinuated, that he had ſacrificed the public cauſe to his own private intereſts; and in ſcreening the baron de Bezenval from impending puniſhment, it was aſſerted that he had purchaſed the ſupport of a powerful party: "We ſhall ſoon," ſaid they, "behold the conſpirators againſt the ſtate triumphant "again at the court; braving the indignation of an injured nation, and exerciſing their "vengeance on the champions of freedom."

Such were the rumours circulated with induſtry, and received with facility; and while the capital blazed with illuminations for the return of its favourite miniſter, his firſt, and perhaps his moſt ſalutary counſel, was accompanied by every mark of public diſapprobation.

The deputies of the diſtricts had joined in condemning the arret of the electors in the moſt pointed terms; they commanded the baron de Bezenval ſtill to be detained a priſoner; or if already releaſed, they authoriſed the different municipalities to exert the utmoſt diligence in again ſecuring him, and keeping him in confinement, till they ſhould receive further inſtructions.

The fortitude of the electors was not proof againſt the clamours that purſued them. By a ſecond decree they endeavoured to explain away the firſt; and aſſerted that their indulgence extended no further than to ſecure the accuſer from inſtant and irregular execution; but was by no means to be conſtrued into an intention of ſcreening the guilty from that puniſhment which legal and deliberate juſtice might think proper to inflict on their crimes. After having thus attempted, by this ſpecious retraction, to efface the impreſſion occaſioned by their haſty but humane arret, they renounced all functions with which, during the public exigency, they had been charged; and reſigned their powers into the hands of the deputies of the diſtricts.

In conſequence of this explanation, monſieur de Bezenval, whoſe opportune abſence had preſented to pillage without reſiſtance the Hotel of Invalids, and had furniſhed the fury of the people with thoſe arms which they afterwards turned ſo ſucceſsfully againſt the Baſtile, was conveyed a priſoner to Brie-Comte-Robert—and was expoſed from popular caprice to a trial, which his negligence or deſertion might with more propriety perhaps have ſubjected him to, from the reſentment of his ſovereign.

Monſieur Necker could not entirely conceal his chagrin at the mortifying diſappointment he had encountered; "My happineſs has been of ſhort duration," was his conciſe but pathetic expreſſion, in a letter addreſſed to the late electors. That hope in which he had ſo lately dreſſed himſelf, was now vaniſhed; and he perceived too late, that though his name might be ſucceſsfully uſed to the deſtruction of his fellow-citizens, his influence was of ſmall extent when exerted to ſave his friends.

His retreat had excited a general inſurrection, but his return was far from inſpiring an univerſal calm. That ſcarcity, which had reſulted from the ſterility of the laſt autumn, was ſtill ſeverely felt; and if not immediately the ſource, furniſhed a frequent pretext for popular inſurrection. At St. Denys, the inhabitants ſurrounded the houſe of the Sieur Chatel, lieutenant to the mayor, and with loud menaces, compelled him to lower the price of bread to a penny in the pound. Even this conceſſion did not ſatisfy the multitude; their ſecret murmurs broke out into open rage; headed by three ſoldiers of the regiment of Provençe they forced the houſe of the unhappy object of their fury; for a moment, monſieur Chatel deferred his fate by eſcaping to a neighbouring ſteeple; but the place of his retreat was unfortunately diſcovered; he was dragged forth, and ſacrificed to the popular madneſs with circumſtances too barbarous to be related.

The city of Caen, in Normandy, was deſtined to partake the fatal effects of civil commotion, and to behold her ſtreets polluted with blood: Her citizens, on the firſt turbulent movements of Paris, had followed the example of the capital; they had aſſumed the national-cockade, they had ſeized the citadel, poſſeſſed themſelves of the arms, forced the ſtate-priſons, and releaſed thoſe criminals whom the government had confined for carrying on contraband trade. The municipality yielded to a ſtorm which they were unable to oppoſe with ſucceſs; to ſooth the minds of the inhabitants, the price of bread was diminiſhed, a militia was eſtabliſhed, and order ſeemed once more reſtored.

But a new incident ſerved to revive that diſcontent, which was rather concealed than extinguiſhed. Some ſoldiers of the regiment of Artois, then in garriſon at Rennes, happened to appear in the ſtreets of Caen, adorned with medals, the recompence of ſervices which they had rendered the patriotic party; between theſe ſoldiers and ſome dragoons of the regiment of Bourbon, a quarrel aroſe, in which the former were oppreſſed by the numbers of the latter, and their medals were wreſted from them. The vanquiſhed filled the city with their complaints: they accuſed the marquis de Belzunce, major of the regiment of Bourbon, of having excited his ſoldiers by the promiſe of pecuniary recompence to this outrage. The citizens ſided with the ſoldiers of Artois; the bells ſounded the alarm, the peaſants haſtened from the neighbouring villages, and the quarters of the regiment of Bourbon were inveſted by above twenty-thouſand men, provided with cannon.

The municipality of the city, equally deſirous with the officers of the regiment of Bourbon to prevent the effuſion of blood, entered into a parley; the marquis de Belzunce proteſted his innocence, and offered to appear before the Hotel de Ville, and give convincing proofs of his aſſertions: His regiment demanded hoſtages for his ſecurity, theſe were delivered, and the major, conſcious of his integrity, ſurrendered himſelf with an undaunted countenance: He was ſurrounded by the militia, and conducted to the citadel as the place of the greateſt ſafety. Soon after the marquis of Harcourt, who was governor of the province of Normandy, ſent orders to the regiment of Bourbon to quit Caen, in hopes that its departure would quiet the minds of the inhabitants: Tranquillity indeed ſeemed already eſtabliſhed; and ſuch was the confidence of the regiment of Bourbon in the citizens, that they voluntarily reſtored the hoſtages they had received. But they had ſcarce marched out of the city, when they had reaſon to repent their miſplaced generoſity; the crowd once more roſe in arms, pierced the feeble national guard, burſt open the gates of the citadel, dragged the helpleſs marquis de Belzunce from his aſylum, and after putting an end to his life, ſubjected his carcaſe to a thouſand unworthy inſults.

Straſburg was the theatre of ſcenes more ſanguinary: That city, in uniting herſelf to France, had preſerved he ancient cuſtoms and form of government, which in a meaſure reſembled thoſe of the other imperial cities of Germany. But that conſtitution, which in the beginning had been a pure democracy, had, through the unſuſpecting indolence of the people generally, and the activity and diſſimulation of the ambitious, been inſenſibly converted into an ariſtocracy; the citizens at length ſaw how baſely they had been betrayed by thoſe in whom they had placed the greateſt confidence, but too late—reſtrained by a numerous garriſon of mercenaries, they could only vent their complaints in ineffectual murmurs.

The election of repreſentatives to the ſtates-general revived the hopes of the citizens in general, and depreſſed thoſe of the magiſtrates of Straſburg, who trembled for the power they had uſurped. But the meaſures of the ſtates-general were at firſt tardy and indeciſive; and we have already noticed the embarraſſments that occupied their early moments; yet the inſtant that the ſtates had aſſumed the title of the national aſſembly, the acclamations of the citizens of Straſburg were mingled with the moſt menacing appearances; and the magiſtrates, to allay the immediate diſcontent, held forth promiſes as ſervile and flattering as their former conduct had been inſolent and rigorous.

But, no ſooner did the latter fondly imagine the hour of danger paſt, than theſe promiſes were as baſely evaded or retracted. The inhabitants enraged at their breach of faith, flew to arms; they ſurrounded the city-hall in thouſands; the rabble, impatient for pillage ſeized the favourable inſtant; they poured from their dark retreat, intermixed with the citizens, and urged that attack, from which the intreaties of the commander of the garriſon would probably have diſſuaded the more reſpectable claſs. Ladders were inſtantly procured; ſix or ſeven hundred men mounted with that alacrity which enthuſiaſm and revenge inſpire; the doors and windows were forced by the aſſailants, and the crowd diſperſed themſelves through the apartments.

The trembling magiſtrates eſcaped indeed their fury, by ſecret avenues which were unknown to the inſurgents; but the cheſts of the city treaſure were broke open: The fund for the ſupport of the orphans was ſeized and divided; the furniture was deſtroyed; and the thoughtleſs croud, exploring the cellars which were filled with the choiceſt wines, gave a looſe to intoxication, and were in ſeveral inſtances the victims of their own exceſs.

The diſorder now became general; the ſeditious multitude threatened to ſet fire to the city in ſeveral places; and the officers of the garriſon who had conducted themſelves throughout with the greateſt forbearance and moderation, now ordered the troops under arms. Strong detachments were appointed to the arſenals, the magazines, the treaſury, and the priſons; ſentinels were placed before the doors of the magiſtrates for their protection: But the ſame diſpoſition prevailed, to prevent the effuſion of blood; and the injunctions of the officers to their ſoldiers, were, to form a barrier with their ranks before their ſeveral poſts, and to make uſe of their arms only in their perſonal defence.

The inſurgents were leſs awed by the appearance of the military, than they were encouraged by their inactivity; ſeveral houſes were ſacked, and others were threatened with the flames. It was at length determined to employ force, as the only means of preſerving the city from general deſtruction; the diſorderly multitude were forced to yield to the charge of the regulars; ſeveral were dangerouſly wounded, and a great number were ſecured: Of the latter, one who had been moſt active was inſtantly executed and two more were condemned to the gallies.

The municipality, grateful for the ſervices which the troops had rendered, had ordered them a pecuniary gratification; this had been expended at the tavern; but no ſooner were the ſoldiers heated with wine than they plunged into exceſſes ſtill more fatal than thoſe which they had reſtrained: They ſeized their arms, and contemning the voice of their officers, diſperſed themſelves through the trembling city; pillaged the houſes, forced open the ſtate-priſons, and compelled the regiments of Alſace and Darmſtadt, who had hitherto preſerved their diſcipline, to partake in their guilty orgies.

Satiate of plunder, and oppreſſed by intoxication, they at length ſuffered themſelves to be conducted by their officers to their quarters: Shame the next morning extorted ſome marks of compunction, and a promiſe of future ſubmiſſion; and the prudent precautions of M. de Rochambeau, governor of the province, contributed to reſtore the long loſt tranquillity of Straſburg.

At the other extremities of the kingdom, the greateſt diſſentions prevailed between the garriſon and the citizens of Breſt. Two thouſand of the inhabitants of Nantes, completely armed, had marched to ſupport the cauſe of the latter; and the moſt fatal conſequences were only averted by the interpoſition and conceſſions of the municipality: The citizens, however, perſiſted in preſenting a detail of their grievances to the national aſſembly, and in demanding the count d'Eſtaign as a governor; whoſe nomination, it was expected, would extinguiſh the jealouſy and reſtore the harmony of the province of Brittany.

At Mans, monſieur de Monteſſon periſhed by a muſquet-ſhot, after beholding his father-in-law torn to pieces by the populace; in Languedoc, M. de Barras was murdered in ſight of his wife, then pregnant and ready to lie-in: In ſhort, from one frontier to the other, the enraged peaſantry were armed againſt their former lords; and the Seine and the Loire, the Soane and the Rhone, bluſhed with the nobleſt blood of France.

The national aſſembly could not but be deeply impreſſed with the diſorders and barbarities which afflicted and diſgraced the kingdom; but it was pointedly obſerved, that theſe unhappy tranſactions were to be conſidered as the temporary effect of a great revolution; that theſe cruelties, which made humanity ſhudder, were not to be attributed to a ſavage diſpoſition in the people, but to the united influence of indignation and reſentment againſt the arbitrary government which had ſo long trampled under foot the moſt ſacred rights of mankind—which had bound the majority of the nation in the fetters of ignorance and poverty—which ſtifled or circumſcribed the ſofter paſſions—and taught by its practice that revenge and ſanguinary puniſhment were concommitant with deſpotic power: It was added, that notwithſtanding the violence which had raged, there appeared no reaſon to be alarmed for the public ſafety from the proceedings of the people; that their turbulence would ſubſide if the national aſſembly would teſtify by its unanimity a ſincere diſpoſition to promote the true intereſts of the nation, by ſecuring its liberty and happineſs againſt any future innovations of the conſtituted authority.

But that aſſembly, to whom ſuch ſalutary admonitions were held forth, and from whoſe counſels and deciſions ſo much was expected, and on whoſe prudence and example the grandeur and happineſs of France appeared to depend, nouriſhed already in its boſom the ſeeds of faction and diviſion. The duke of Liancourt had now poſſeſſed the diguity of preſident for the alotted period of a fortnight; a conſiderable majority had given their votes to place M. Thouret in the vacant chair; but a party hoſtile to him, from jealouſy of his political opinions, oppoſed him by intrigues, and preferring tranquillity to the diſtinction conferred on him, he by a letter to his predeceſſor relinquiſhed the appointment, which was immediately transferred to M. Chappelier, an advocate by profeſſion, and deputy for Brittany, and who had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bold and impaſſioned eloquence.

The aſſembly immediately reſumed a ſubject, which for ſeveral days before had been the object of their diſcuſſion; and the celebrated declaration of "The rights of man" was agitated with unwearied zeal and ardour. The inconvenience of this declaration was urged by the duke de Levi, the biſhop of Langres, and ſeveral other members. They aſſerted that in a monarchy, where neceſſary circumſtances are ſo often oppoſed to theoretical principles, that the veil could not be totally removed from the eyes of the people without the greateſt imprudence; it was a ſecret, they ſaid, that ought to be concealed till a new and approved conſtitution had placed the ſtate in that ſecurity, that would not be expoſed to danger upon being revealed: a declaration of that nature, they obſerved, was not neceſſary to break the chains of tyranny; it was juſt laws and prudent regulations that the people demanded, and not abſtracted maxims of metaphyſics, uſeleſs to the multitude, which they were neither capable of comprehending, and which could not be ſubjected to their view without the moſt eminent hazard.

Arguments like theſe might ſeduce the ignorant; to the oppoſite party they appeared as ridicule, to which the champions of the declaration beholding themſelves attempted to be expoſed, were yet not prevented from manfully combating in its defence. The comte de Montmorenci, whoſe long and illuſtrious train of anceſtors placed him only ſecond to the princes of the blood, with meſſieurs Mounier, de Lally-Tollendal, de Mirabeau, Target, and Barnave, all diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion. They ſtrenuouſly maintained, that it was abſolutely neceſſary that this declaration ſhould precede the formation of a conſtitution: "That to form a free people, it was requiſite to "convince them in what conſiſted their rights and their liberty; that this declaration "led to two uſeful and important ends; the firſt, to fix the ſpirit of legiſlation, that in "future it might not wander from its proper courſe; the ſecond, to direct the repreſen-"tatives of the people in forming thoſe laws, which it was impoſſible to promulgate at "the inſtant, and which could only be the effect of long and mature reflection."

"It has been repreſented," they added, "that this declaration is uſeleſs, becauſe it "is already impreſſed in all hearts; and that it is dangerous, becauſe the people them-"ſelves may abuſe their rights: But though impreſſed on all hearts, it is not leſs neceſ-"ſary to renew the traces which may be weakened by time; and experience has already "taught us, that a nation can eaſily forget its advantages, and that it frequently wants "perſeverance to maintain its rights. If this declaration had exiſted, the abettors of "ſlavery had never preſumed to publiſh thoſe dangerons maxims which have over-"ſhadowed the true principles of freedom; and as to the dread that the people them-"ſelves ſhould abuſe thoſe rights in which they were inſtructed, every example of hiſtory "ſtands forth in oppoſition to theſe imaginary fears. You every where behold the peo-"ple tranquil and happy in proportion to their knowledge, whilſt it is ignorance alone "that agitates the minds and excites the troubled ſpirits of mankind."

The arguments of theſe gentlemen, were amply ſupported by the popular opinion. The majority within doors acquieſced in the ſentiments of thoſe without; and it was decided, that there ſhould be a declaration of the Rights of Man, and that, that declaration ſhould be diſtinct from and precede the conſtitution.

Melancholy diſorders ſtill ſorely afflicted the provinces, and which equally menacing the public revenue with private property and perſonal ſecurity, awakened the aſſembly from their metaphyſical diſcuſſions, and in an inſtant impreſſed their minds with the urgent neceſſity of proceediug to form that conſtitution, which was become ſcarce leſs neceſſary to the grandeur and exiſtence of France, than requiſite to preſerve the lives and fortunes of her citizens. The committee of reports had preſented a lively and affecting picture of the national calamities; and it was propoſed, as a remedy for the evils which daily multiplied, to publiſh a ſolemn declaration, in which all conditions of men were commanded, under penalty of the ſevereſt puniſhment, not only to contribute their proportions to the burden of the ſtate, but to with-hold on no pretence whatſoever, thoſe dues to which the original land-holders were entitled.

This propoſal was encountered by a vigorous reſiſtance; the one party repreſented that the feudal laws were too oppreſſive, the taxes too partially impoſed, and the public diſtreſs too general, to hope for any happy effects from ſuch a declaration; that it would fall ſoon into oblivion; that inſtead of diminiſhing it would encreaſe the evil, as it would betray the weakneſs of the national aſſembly; at the ſame time that it would irritate the minds of the people, which at preſent required to be ſoothed; and that it neceſſarily muſt become an object of deriſion, to demand the payment of taxes, the inequality and injuſtice of which every perſon was ſenſible of.

On the other hand, the aſſembly were reminded of the ſacred rights of property; the immenſe deficiency with which the public revenue was threatened; and the contempt into which they would fall, if they had not recourſe to inſtant and vigorous meaſures; that a gloomy ſilence pervaded the courts of juſtice; that their authority could only be reſtored by regulations the moſt deciſive; and that the means for enforcing might immediately follow the declaration itſelf.

In conſequence of theſe arguments, it was agreed, that a committee ſhould be entruſted to draw up a plan for the preſervation of the rights of the proprietors; and that plan on the fourth of Auguſt, was preſented to the inſpection, and for the approbation of the national aſſembly.

It ſtated, "That the national aſſembly taking into conſideration, whilſt it had been "ſolely occupied in erecting the happineſs of the nation on the baſis of a free conſtitution, "that the diſorders and violences which had afflicted the different provinces, had ſpread "the moſt boding alarms throughout the minds of the people, and had fundamentally "ſtruck at the ſacred rights of property, and at perſonal ſafety; and conſcious that theſe "diſorders could not but retard the labours of that aſſembly, and encourage the criminal "deſigns of the enemies of the public welfare:

It now declared, "That the ancient laws ſubſiſted, and were to be carried into exe-"cution to that moment when the nation might think proper to modify or aboliſh them; "that the taxes alſo, ſuch as they were at preſent, were punctually to be paid, according "to the arret of the national aſſembly of the 17th of June laſt, till other impoſts could "be deviſed, and new modes of collection leſs grievous to the people.

"That all cuſtomary rents and ſervices were to be diſcharged as formerly; and that "all eſtabliſhed laws, for the ſecurity of perſons or their property, were to be univerſally "reſpected.

"That the preſent declaration was to be diſperſed throughout the provinces; and "all vicars and curates were required to read it in their reſpective churches to their "pariſhioners, and to exhort them to obſerve and obey it."

It was this declaration that called up the Vicomte de Noailles, who, deſcended from a family long celebrated for its attachment and ſervices to the crown, had in the late oppoſition, eſpouſed the popular party, and diſplayed a zeal in reſtraining the royal influence, at leaſt equal to that which his anceſtors had manifeſted in extending it.

"The end," ſaid he, "to which this declaration tends, is to allay that fermentation "that reigns throughout the provinces; to aſſure the freedom of the ſubject, and to con-"firm the true right of the proprietor. But how is it poſſible for us to attain this "object, without clearly aſcertaining the ſource of inſurrection, and underſtanding the "nature of the diſeaſe, to which we would apply a remedy?

"The commons have proclaimed their demands to this aſſembly in too audible a voice "not have been clearly underſtood: It is not a new conſtitution which they require; "but it is the abolition of the exciſe; the ſuppreſſion of vexatious inferior officers; "and the mitigation, or extinction, of ſenorial rights, which they expect from your "juſtice.

"For three months the commons have beheld their repreſentatives excluſively occu-"pied in what they themſelves have called, and what truly are, the affairs of the public;

" but to the commons, the affairs of the public appear only thoſe objects which they " deſire, and moſt ardently wiſh to obtain.

" After all the different opinions which have exiſted among the repreſentatives of the " nation, the provinces have caſt their eyes only on two deſcriptions of people; the " one who have armed in their ſupport, and who have endeavoured to promote their " happineſs; the other, thoſe of rank and diſtinction, who have exerted themſelves " to oppoſe it. In theſe circumſtances they conceived it a duty to repel force by force; " and indulged in liberty, they will no longer bear the rein. There remains but one " method to reſtore tranquillity, and to reconcile them to civil government; it is by " giving them ſolid proofs, that we only reſiſt their deſires when they might prove dange- " rous to their own proſperity.

" To reſtore therefore that confidence which they once repoſed in this aſſembly, and " to re-eſtabliſh that tranquillity which every true Frenchman pants after, I propoſe firſt, " That in the preamble to the declaration intended, it ſhall be expreſſed, that the public " taxes ſhall be paid by every individual of the kingdom in proportion to his revenue; " ſecondly, that the burdens of the ſtate ſhall in future be equally diſtributed among all; " thirdly, that the feudal rights ſhould be redeemed at a certain price; and, fourthly, " that thoſe ſeignorial claims which fall under the deſcription of perſonal ſervitude, " ſhall be aboliſhed without any compenſation whatſoever."

Thus from long metaphyſical enquiries, accompanied by tedious debates and tardy deciſions, the national aſſembly had rapidly paſſed to decrees the moſt intereſting in their nature, and important in their conſequences. The feudal ſyſtem, that ancient oak whoſe extenſive ſhade had darkened the ſurface of the empire, whoſe roots, for ages, had drained the moiſture of, and whoſe branches had intercepted the ſun from the ſoil of France, was now doomed to feel the axe, and to fall proſtrate in one night, beneath the repeated ſtrokes of the public enthuſiaſm. The diſcuſſion of the ſubject ſerved but to render it univerſally hateful; although too much praiſe cannot be beſtowed on the moderation and regard to the rights of perſons that was maintained by the advocates of reformation.

The general revolution throughout the kingdom was ſcarce leſs extraordinary than that which had taken place in the ſentiments of different families. The late Duke d'Aiguillon had been proſecuted by the juſt reſentment of the parliament of Brittany, for exceſſive tyranny; he had been purſued by the active hatred of his fellow-citizens; and, loaded with the general execration, had ſcarce found an aſylum from deſtruction in the protecting favour of the late king, until death placed him and his crimes beyond human coercion. The ſucceſſor to his dignity now ſtood forward as the candidate for popular approbation: he not only ſeconded the motions of the Viſcount Noailles, but even paſſed the boundaries that had been traced by that nobleman. The voice of ſeveral of the principal nobility, and a popular aſſembly, were not tardy in receiving conceſſions, which were ſo advantageous to a majority of their own members, and which were propoſed by thoſe who would ſuffer moſt on their being adopted.

A diſtinction was made with ſtriking accuracy, by M. le Grand, between the different ſpecies of feudal property and rights; he deſcribed them under two heads perſonal and mixed; ſuch as mainmorte or vaſſalage, and the corvée or right to the labour of the peaſant; both of which he deſcribed as at variance with the laws of nature and of human juſtice, and ſuch as could not entitle the holders to any ſpecies of ranſom; real rights conſiſted of quit-rents, rents in kind, and the like; theſe he thought ought to be redeemed by purchaſe from the individual, but the whole of each individual's claims ſhould be conſolidated.

Mixed rights, ſuch as banalites, or the right in the landlord to compel the tenant or vaſſal to bake at his oven, and pay a toll of flour, was alſo an object, which as it produced a revenue to the proprietor and had been a frequent ſubject of ſale, deſerved a moderate remuneration on its abolition.

Cruel and outrageous parts of the feudal claims were ably expoſed by M. de Karengall, in ſome cantons the vaſſals were ſubjected to be yoked like cattle to the carriages of the nobility; in others they were compelled to paſs whole nights in beating the ponds, in order that the lord's reſt ſhould not be diſturbed by the croaking of frogs; in others the poor were obliged to maintain the nobleman's hounds; other privileges he noticed which from their very indecency forbid deſcription, but we ſelect two uſages that ſufficiently indicate the deteſtable exceſſes to which the unhappy French were liable from the arbitrary caprice of their noble tyrants, when practices ſo atrocious, ſo deſtructive of human happineſs, and oppoſite to the letter and ſpirit of religion, were ſanctioned by law—in many diſtricts the chief poſſeſſed the right to occupy the place and privileges of the bridegroom on the wedding-night; while in others the lord, upon his return from hunting, was authoriſed to rip open the bowels of two of his vaſſals, to foment his feet therein for his refreſhment.

The debates were followed by many other voluntary ſacrifices, and theſe by the moſt important regulations for the equalization of the public burdens; the corvée, to which the immortal Turgot firſt laid the axe was now felled totally and for ever; feudal ſervitude of every kind was ſuppreſſed; and the deſtruction of warrens and dove-cotes, followed. The inferior courts wherein feudal laws and uſages were litigated, next fell; to theſe ſucceeded the repeal of ſeveral taxes that were conſidered as moſt oppreſſive; a reſolution was then paſſed for the ſuppreſſion of penſions and gratifications given by the court, and that places and offices ſhould be aboliſhed which were obtained unworthily, or that were not required by neceſſity and ſanctioned by actual national ſervices.

The preſident was proceeding to the queſtion upon theſe patriotic meaſures, when recollecting himſelf, he obſerved, "that the clergy had not yet had an opportunity of "declaring their ſentiments, and that he ſhould deem himſelf indecorous were he to "neglect affording them an opportunity to manifeſt their diſintereſtedneſs on this happy "occaſion."

The biſhop of Nancy thereupon propoſed in the name of the clergy, that if the feudal rights ſhould be ranſomed, that the proceeds might not be applied to the profit of the eccleſiaſtical lords, but to the augmentation of poor livings.

The biſhop of Chartres propoſed the ſuppreſſion of the game-laws; he repreſented the abſurdity of ſubjecting the huſbandman to be the patient ſpectator of the ravage of his fields, or expoſed to arbitrary puniſhment if he preſumed to deſtroy thoſe animals which ravaged his corn and conſumed the fruits of his labours: a number of the nobility loudly acclaimed their concurrence, and demanded that the rights of the chace alſo ſhould be renounced, reſerving only the right of ſporting within their perſonal demeſnes.

M. de St. Fargeau, who now occupied the chair, demanded an explanation of the exclamations of the nobility and clergy concerning the equalization of taxes—"We have "given the people a ray of hope," ſaid he "let us make it a reality; I propoſe that "not only for the laſt ſix months of the year, but from the commencement of it, all the "members of the privileged claſſes, without exception, ſhall contribute their proportion "to the public impoſt; this will be but in accord with the inſtructions of all the orders; "and until this aſſembly ſhall fix the ſtandard for future taxation, the aſſemblies of the "departments ſhall adjuſt the rate."

Theſe ſeveral propoſitions were adopted and followed by the renunciation of the vicarial rights. The Vicar of Louppes offered, in the name of his brethren, the relinquiſhment of caulualties, and all fees exacted from the poor; ſeveral of the dignitaries ſignified that agreeable to the ſpirit of the canons of the church they were determined to reſtrict themſelves to a ſingle benefice.

All theſe propoſals having been confirmed by a general vote; the deputies from ſeveral provinces which enjoyed peculiar privileges, came forward with offerings of their charters and franchiſes. Dauphiné, which had been always the moſt forward in patriotic ſacrifices was the firſt, and was followed by Brittany its rival in this race of true glory; Languedoc, Paris, Marſeilles, Straſburg, and others ſucceeded.

Theſe ſacrifices truly glorious and virtuous, diſintereſted as they were, may be readily conceived not to be univerſally acceptable; the great body of the nobility and clergy denied or were diſpoſed to diſpute the power of their repreſentatives, which they alleged was unauthoriſed, that they had exceeded their powers and voted away what was not their own. That the public ſpirit diſplayed by the aſſembly ſhould not have made a ſudden impreſſion on the minds of the whole nation, will not be a ſubject of ſurpriſe to thoſe who conſider the ſlow progreſſion of information in a convulſed country, in a country too ſo extenſive as France, where the preſs had but juſt dared to erect its light in the ſhade of the throne of deſpotiſm; and even among the enlightened, a numerous body was to be found whoſe whole eſtate lay in the public grievances.

Among the ſacrifices of that day, the foreſt laws were not regarded at the leaſt important; and perhaps they were ſurrounded with the greateſt regret. In times of peace, the amuſement of the field had been conſidered as no indifferent repreſentation of the more noble toils of war; they enured the mind to danger, and the body to fatigue; and had been immemorially preſerved from the multitude as a diſtinction the moſt noble and ſacred: But as they were poſſibly the moſt prized by the nobility, ſo they were conſidered by the commons as the moſt obnoxious of the feudal rights, from the barbarous penalties which were allotted to them, and the ſtill more barbarous abuſes which they produced. The ſeverity with which ſeveral lords had maintained their pretenſions, and the unremitting rigour with which they had purſued their unhappy vaſſals, who had preſumed to treſpaſs upon their game, or when only ſuſpected; had kindled againſt this peculiar privilege a degree of odium, which was only to be extinguiſhed by its total abolition.

To commemorate a day which had given birth to ſo many, and ſo important reforms, the duke of Laincourt propoſed, that a medal ſhould be ſtruck with the following inſcription, to the abolition of all privileges, and the perfect re-union of all the provinces; and monſieur Lally-Tollendal having obſerved, that it was in the aſſembly of the ſtates-general, that Lewis the Twelfth had been named the Father of the People, moved, that Lewis the Sixteenth ſhould be ſtyled Reſtorer of the Liberties of France. The moment of enthuſiaſm was not yet paſſed, and every motion which flattered the conduct of the deputies themſelves, and impreſſed on the people the advantage they had gained, by the diminution of the royal power, was readily received, and inſtantly adopted.

Theſe decrees of the national aſſembly had been received by the inhabitants of Verſailles and Paris with the loudeſt and moſt heart-felt acclamations; and from the walls of the capital the patriotic ardour ſoon diffuſed itſelf throughout the diſtant provinces. Dauphiné, in whoſe boſom the ſeeds of liberty had long been foſtered; and who claimed the merit of firſt calling them into life, exulted in the example ſhe had ſet to the reſt of France, by her inſtant compliance with the views of the national aſſembly; her deputies were followed by thoſe of Brittany, Provençe, Burgundy, and Languedoc: The cities of Lyons, Marſeilles, Bourdeaux and Straſbourg were equally emulous to diſplay their zeal and concurrence; and approaching the bar of the aſſembly, ſurrendered, in the moſt univerſed terms, all thoſe excluſive privileges which they formerly had defended with the moſt unſhaken courage againſt the pretentions of the crown.

Even the breaſts of individuals were warmed by the general ardour: ſeveral of the nobility on this accaſion vied with the diſintereſted profeſſions of the provinces and the cities, and offered, as a ſacrifice on the altar of Liberty, thoſe privileges which they late declaration had left them; declaring, that they conſidered the title of a citizen of France, as the moſt honourable dignity they could poſſeſs.

The ſanctity of religion was called in, to add ſolemnity to the ſcene, and to conſecrate the hour of liberty: The archbiſhop of Paris, whoſe extenſive liberality and goodneſs of heart had long entitled him to that pre-eminence of dignity which he enjoyed, but who in the firſt ſtage of the revolution had nearly fallen a victim to the blind fury of the multitude, preſided on this awful occaſion; and by his preſence, ſerved in ſome meaſure to diminiſh that prejudice which hitherto had prevailed amongſt the populace againſt the clergy, and to reſtore his order to that confidence which their timely reſignation and diſintereſted conduct merited.

While the bold and deciſive meaſures of the national aſſembly excited or commanded general attention, the voice of the ſovereign was feebly and rarely heard: The little influence that had been left him daily diminiſhed; his grandeur was over-ſhadowed: his authority was eclipſed; his French and Swiſs guards had abandoned all duty; and retiring from their poſts at Verſailles, had marched with their arms and colours to join their companions, who had already ranged themſelves on the popular ſide: Each hour was marked with ſome new deſertion; whilſt by nature incapable of energy or enter-the impropriate tythes with thoſe of the church; it militated againſt the intention of the aſſembly, which was to relieve the farmer, or huſbandman; and afforded an endleſs ſource of litigation in aſcertaining the value at which that redemption was to be fixed.

Theſe objections were ably ſupported by the lively eloquence of the comte de Mirabeau, while the claims of the church found a warm and ſtrenuous defender in the abbé Sieyes, who had formerly ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf as the ſucceſsful champion of the Tiers-Etat. He urged, that it could not now be a queſtion, whether ſuch a tax was originally unwiſe or wrong in itſelf, as the tythe was not a tax eſtabliſhed by the nation, but a rent-charge to which the firſt proprietors had ſubjected their own private eſtates, for the ſupport of the church; that the nation was by no means competent to aboliſh it, to the benefit of the preſent poſſeſſors who had purchaſed their lands under the ſtipulation of conſtantly diſcharging it. The tythe was, therefore, in the hands of the clergy, a legal property; and, as injurious to the public welfare, it could only be aboliſhed by the ſame means as it was cuſtomary to obſerve in the abolition of other rights; that was to ſay, by a compenſation voluntarily agreed on between thoſe who received and thoſe who paid tythes; or eſtabliſhed by the moderation and equity of the national aſſembly;—that the ſums which might be drawn from ſuch a compenſation, might be placed in ſuch a manner as to contribute to the primitive object in the eſtabliſhment of tythes, and yet, under the preſent circumſtances, to furniſh moſt eſſential reſources to the nation; "If you wiſh to be free," ſaid he "begin by being juſt."

To this it was anſwered, that the tythes could not be converted into a ſettled income, as they were not immediately derived from the ground itſelf, but from the produce of it, which was various and uncertain, and might be left uncultivated; and as they had not originally been derived from any grant of land, they could not be conſidered as a real eſtate, but merely as a gratuitious gift which the nation had tolerated to recompenſe theſe who inſtructed the people in religion and morality; and ſince, by the confeſſion of the clergy themſelves, the tythes might be redeemed by individuals or communities, they certainly might be redeemed by the united voice of thoſe individuals or communities, by the nation at large, eſpecially when inſtruction could be more effectually provided and more ſuitably rewarded.

While yet the majority of the clergy ſtruggled againſt a propoſal, which, if adopted, they conceived would mortally wound the power of their order, the temporary enthuſiaſm of a few, rendered in a moment their exertions ineffectual. The debate which had been interrupted by the lateneſs of the hour was renewed the ſucceeding day; when monſieur Ricart de Séault read to the aſſembly, a deed ſubſcribed by fifteen or twenty curates, who voluntarily ſurrendered the tythes they enjoyed into the hands of the nation, and confided in its equity to provide for them a proper and decent ſubſiſtence. "Gentlemen," added monſieur Séault, amidſt the applauſes of the aſſembly, "I depoſit this act, with which I have the honour of being entruſted, on your table, to "afford an opportunity to all thoſe who are willing to ſign it."

Inſtantly the numerous body of curates, who had been nominated as deputies to the aſſembly, preſſed towards the table, and diſputed with each other the honour of firſt ſubſcribing their names. Their example was followed by the dignified clergy: "In " my own name," exclaimed the venerable archbiſhop of Paris, " and in thoſe of my " brethren preſent, I depoſit the tythes of the church in the hands of a nation juſt and " generous: That the goſpel ſhould be propagated, that divine worſhip ſhould be cele- " brated with dignity and decency, that the churches ſhould be provided with zealous and " virtuous paſtors, and that the poor ſhould be nouriſhed; theſe were the ends for which " thoſe tythes were allotted us; and we doubt not that the juſtice of the national aſſem- " bly will ſtill ſupply us with means for fulfilling duties ſo ſacred and eſſential." " This," added the cardinal de Rochefoucault, " is the ſole prayer of the clergy, who place " their whole confidence in the equity of the nation."

The national aſſembly received with tranſport an offer ſo conſiſtent with their views, and ſo ſuperior to their expectations; they were profuſe in their encomiums, and in their promiſes of compenſation: But the generality of the clergy throughout the kingdom diſcovered but little ſatisfaction at the liberality of their repreſentatives; they accuſed them of having annihilated, by their raſh or timid concurrence, the influence of the eccleſiaſtical order; and their clamours were encreaſed, when they perceived that the compenſation with which they had been allured, was by no means equal to the revenue they had ſurrendered.

But the reſources which the national aſſembly contemplated from the abolition of tythes were precarious and diſtant; the diſtreſs of the public was immediate and urgent; the pleaſing viſions of monſieur Necker had gradually receded from his ſight, and the horrors of a national bankruptcy opened to his view; however he might vary the ſhape in which he addreſſed it, the enthuſiaſm of the people was ſtill his only hope; he had now recourſe to it in a manner which nothing but the imperious voice of neceſſity could authoriſe, and nothing but the moſt unbounded zeal render ſucceſsful.

The idea of relieving a ſtate by voluntary contributions, poſſeſſes ſomething ſo natural and ſo faſcinating to an inexperienced ſtateſman, that it has been frequently recurred to, and almoſt as frequently been attended by diſappointment. But as the preſent ſituation of France was unprecedented, ſo alſo might the conſequences of this expedient; and the miniſter having already perceived that his influence among the repreſentatives of the people daily diminiſhed, was willing to aſcertain how far he retained his empire over the people themſelves.

Throughout the different provincial capitals, offices were opened, and the people were invited to depoſit on the altar of the new conſtitution, their plate, their jewels, and a fourth of their actual revenue. On this occaſion, the ſucceſs, though not ſufficient to extinguiſh the wants of the ſtate, exceeded the moſt ſanguine expectations of the miniſter; a general ardour ſeemed to pervade every rank and deſcription throughout the kingdom; the ſumptuous ſide-boards which had miniſtered to the vanity of the nobility, the ancient and maſſy veſſels which had been ſo long conſecrated to religious ſervices, the very ornaments of the fair-ſex, ſwelled the promiſcuous pile, and were cheerfully offered as a ſacrifice to freedom: Even thoſe who moſt dreaded, and in ſecret were moſt deſirous of embarraſſing, the new ſyſtem of government, endeavoured to elude the ſuſpicions of their countrymen, by the moſt liberal donations.

But at the ſame time that the people ſo largely contributed to alleviate the public diſtreſs, their clamours againſt the influence of the throne aſſumed a louder and more deciſive tone. In the capital eſpecially, the various clubs and popular aſſemblies boldly erected themſelves againſt the royal ſanction, while the committee which had been nominated by the national aſſembly to arrange the form of the new conſtitution, far from acquieſcing with the opinions without doors, repreſented it as eſſential to the very exiſtence of the government, that the king on every law ſhould be entruſted with an abſolute veto or negative.

The debates on this occaſion were long and vigourous, and the fermentation of the people violent. It was even though neceſſary to aſſure the ſafety of the capital by numerous guards of militia, and the protection of cannon. Thoſe who ſupported the royal ſanction were loudly menanced with the weight of the public indignation: Yet the dangers that environed them, did not prevent them from diſcharging their duty, and openly proclaiming their ſentiments.

Among thoſe who moſt eminently diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion were the comtes de Mirabeau, and Lally-Tollendal, the duke de Liancourt, and meſſieurs Trielhard, d'Antraigues, Mounier and Bergaſſe. They urged, that no legiſlative act could be conſidered as law till ſantioned by the king; that his conſent alone could render it binding, and ſtamp it ſacred and invoidable: And ſince no act could be conſidered as law ſtill confirmed by his ſanction, that ſanction ought to be free and voluntary; that if it was not, it could be conſidered only as a form, requiſite to the conſecration, and not as the eſſence of the act itſelf; and, and therefore, ought not to be placed in the rank of thoſe qualities which form the very exiſtence of the law.

They aſſerted that thoſe only who were attached to the two following propoſitions: The one, that all the legiſlative acts, which ought always to be propoſed, debated, and formed in the boſom of the national aſſembly, require, as eſtabliſhed law, to be ſanctioned by the approbation of the ſovereign; the other, that the monarch being free to conſent or diſſent, might give or refuſe indefinitely his ſanction, had conceived a clear and ſimple idea of thoſe maxims which had been received as the foundation of all monarchies.

Theſe principles were oppoſed by meſſieurs Chappilier, Barnave, Lameth, Landine, Garat, junior, and Sales, they preſented, that as all powers were to be conſidered as ſo many emanations from the people, it was moſt inconſiſtent and dangerous to allow to the will of an individual, a controuling authority over the will of a nation at large; that ſuch a propoſal could only be the reſult of a plan deliberately hoſtile to liberty, and, if adopted, could only be attended by the re-eſtabliſhment of deſpotiſm.

Amidſt theſe various diſcuſſions, a new expedient ſeemed for a moment to unite the diſordant opinions of the public: and while the abſolute veto appeared to yield to the jealouſy of the populace, a ſuſpenſive veto was propoſed to ſupply vacancy it had left. But this alſo was ſoon diſcovered to be liable to innumerable objections; to leave it unlimited, was again to fall into the ſyſtem of the abſolute veto, and only to change the name, and not the nature of that inviduous perogative, to ſuffer it to depend on the judgement of provincial aſſemblies, or the inſtructions of the conſtituent body, was to eſtabliſh an appeal to the people, far diſtant from the intentions of the national aſſembly, and moſt dangerous in its conſequences, from their preſent inexperience of a free form of government.—To reſtrain it to any fixed term, was at once to deſtroy the effect of it; to loſe the advantages, and to preſerve the inconveniencies with which it was pregnant.

Though monſieur Necker, from the moment that the terms he had recommended for the late loan were rejected, was convinced that his influence in the national aſſembly daily declined, yet he was perſuaded on this important occaſion, to try once more the effect of his ſentiments; theſe were generally known to be favourable to the expedient that had been propoſed in the ſuſpenſive veto; and that they might have more weight, and be more ſtrongly impreſſed on the minds of the aſſembly, he delivered them in writing. But the majority of the aſſembly conſidered this procedure as an innovation inconſiſtent with their dignity, and the letter of the miniſter of the finances was returned unopened.

Under circumſtances ſo critical the aſſembly preſerved an equanimity that commanded the admiration and reſpect of all deſcriptions of the people; having gratified the favorite wiſhes of the nation in the abolition of the feudal ſyſtem and tythes, they reſumed the great work of the declaration of rights. Three drafts were ſelected from a conſiderable number that had been preſented by various members; theſe were the productions of de la Fayette, abbé Sieyes, and Mounier; the firſt admired for its ſimplicity and cloſe reſemblance of the celebrated American declaration; that of Sieyes embraced the whole expanſe of human government from the firſt principle of ſocial union to the moſt minute member of law and delegated authority, exemplifying the rights and correſponding duties of men; but it was conſidered as too complex and profound for the occaſion, the object contemplated being to promulgate the declaration as a civic catechiſm; that of Mounier was not ſo complex as the ſecond nor ſo ſimple as the firſt, but it was wanting of clearneſs and deciſion of principle: After ſome diſcuſſion, they were finally referred to a committee of five members, who reported them to the aſſembly, and upon the motion of Mirabeau it was decreed that they ſhould be publiſhed and form the preamble to the conſtitution.

It was on the twenty-third, that the majority completed the decrees which were to form the foundation of a conſtitution for France, and condenſed them for general information in the following important nineteen reſolutions:—

1ſt. That all power originally was derived from the people, and could continue to flow from that ſource alone.

2d. That the French government was monarchical, but that there exiſted in France no authority ſuperior to the law; that the king reigned by the law, and in virtue thereof alone could claim the obedience of the people.

3d. That the national aſſembly has acknowledged and declared, as fundamental points of the monarchy, that the perſon of the ſovereign is ſacred and inviolable—the throne indiviſible—the crown hereditary in the preſent royal family, from male to male in order of primogeniture, to the perpetual and abſolute excluſion of females and their deſcendants, without deciding on the effect of renunciations.

4th. That the national aſſembly ſhall be permanent.

5th. That the national aſſembly ſhall be compoſed of only one chamber.

6th. That the return of the deputies to the national aſſemblies ſhall be for two years.

7th. That on the expiration of that term, an entire new election ſhall take place.

8th. That the legiſlative power is veſted in the national aſſembly, who ſhall exerciſe it as follows:

9th. No act of the legiſlative body can be conſidered as law, if it is not framed by the repreſentatives of the nation, freely and legally choſen; and if it is not ſanctioned by the monarch.

10th. The king can refuſe his aſſent to any act of the legiſlative body.

11th. In that caſe where the king ſhall interpoſe his negative, that negative ſhall be conſidered only as ſuſpenſive.

12th. The negative of the king ſhall ceaſe to exiſt on the election of the national aſſembly, which next follows that in which the law was propoſed.

13th. The king may invite the national aſſembly to deliberate on any ſubject; but to propoſe any new law is the excluſive prerogative of the repreſentatives of the people.

14th. The creation or ſuppreſſion of offices cannot take place, but in conſequence of an act of the legiſlative body, ſanctioned by the king.

15th. No tax or contribution in kind, or in money, can be levied; no loan direct or indirect can be negociated by any other means than by an expreſs decree of the aſſembly of the repreſentatives of the nation.

16th. The ſupreme executive power is excluſively veſted in the hands of the king.

17th. The executive power can enact no laws, not even proviſional; but only is allowed to iſſue proclamations conformable to the law, to recal or enforce obedience to it.

18th. The miniſters and the other agents of the executive power, are reſponſible for the application of the different ſums in their departments, as well as for every infringement of the laws, whatever orders they may have received; but no order of the king is to be executed, unleſs ſigned by his majeſty himſelf, and counterſigned by the ſecretary of ſtate, or the miniſter of the department.

19th. The judicial power can on no occaſion whatſoever be exerciſed by the king, nor by the legiſlative body; but juſtice is to be adminiſtered in the name of the king, by thoſe tribunals eſtabliſhed by law, according to the principles of the conſtitution, and the forms which the law preſcribes.

Such were the articles decreed as the future land-marks of the conſtitution of France, and as theſe, without expreſsly naming, completely extinguiſhed the abſolute veto, which comte Lally-Tollendal and meſſieurs Mounier and Bergaſſe had deſcribed as indiſpenſably neceſſary to the exiſtence of the ſtate, thoſe gentlemen declined continuing any longer members of a committee, whoſe repreſentations were diſregarded; and accordingly gave in their reſignation.

The declaration of the rights of men and citizens was ſcarce leſs remarkable for the ſolemnity with which it was introduced, than for the important matter which it contained.

The preamble ſtates, that the repreſentatives of the people of France, formed into a national aſſembly, conſidering that ignorance, neglect, or contempt of human rights, are the ſole cauſes of public misfortunes, and corruptions of government, have reſolved to ſet forth, in a ſolemn declaration, theſe natural, impreſcriptible, and unalienable rights. That this declaration being conſtantly preſent to the minds of the body ſocial, they may be ever kept attentive to their rights and their duties; that the acts of the legiſlative and executive powers of government being capable of a conſtant compariſon with the end of political inſtitutions, may be more reſpected; and alſo, that the future claims of the citizens being directed by ſimple and inconteſtible principles, may always tend to the maintenance of the conſtitution and the general happineſs.

For theſe reaſons, the national aſſembly doth recognize and declare, in the preſence of the Supreme Being, and with the hope of his bleſſing and favour, the following ſacred rights of men and citizens.

1ſt. Men are born and always continue free and equal in reſpect of their rights; civil diſtinctions, therefore, can be founded only in public utility.

2dly. The end of all political aſſociations, is the preſervation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of men; and theſe rights are liberty, equality, property, ſecurity, and reſiſtance of oppreſſion.

3dly. That the people compoſing the nation are eſſentially the ſource of all ſovereignty. nor can any individual, or any body of men, be entitled to any authority, which is not actually and expreſsly derived therefrom.

4thly. Political liberty conſiſts in the power of doing whatever does not injure another; the exerciſe of the natural rights of every man, has no other limits than thoſe which are neceſſary to ſecure to every other man the free exerciſe of the ſame rights, and theſe limits are determinable only by the law.

5thly. The law ought to prohibit only actions hurtful to ſociety; what is not prohibited by the law ſhould not be oppoſed; nor ſhould any one be compelled to that which the law does not require.

6thly. The law is an expreſſion of the will of the community; all citizens have a right to concur, either perſonally or by their repreſentatives, in its formation; it ſhould be the ſame to all whether it protects or it puniſhes; and all being equal in its ſight, are equally eligible to all honours, places, and employments, according to their different abilities, without any other diſtinction than that created by their virtues and talents.

7thly. No man ſhall be accuſed, arreſted, or held in confinement, except in caſes determined by the law, and according to the forms which it has preſcribed. All who promote, ſolicit, execute, or cauſe to be executed, arbitrary orders, ought to be puniſhed; and every citizen called upon or apprehended by virtue of the law, ought immediately to obey, and renders himſelf culpable by reſiſtance.

8thly. The law ought to impoſe no other penalties than ſuch as are abſolutely and evidently neceſſary; and no one ought to be puniſhed but in virtue of a law promulgated before the offence, and legally applied.

10thly. No man ought to be moleſted on account of his opinions, not even of his religious opinions, provided his irregular diſſemination of them does not diſturb the public order eſtabliſhed by law.

11thly. The unreſtrained communication of thoughts and opinions being one of the moſt precious rights of man, every citizen may ſpeak, write, and publiſh freely, provided he is reſponſible for the abuſe of this liberty in caſes determined by the law.

12thly. A public force being neceſſary to give ſecurity to the rights of men and citizens, that force is inſtituted for the benefit of the community, and not for the particular advantage of the perſons to whom it is entruſted.

13thly. A common contribution being neceſſary for the ſupport of the public force, and for defraying the other expences of government, it ought to be divided among the members of the community, according to their abilities.

14thly. Every citizen has a right, either by himſelf or his repreſentative, to a free voice in determining the neceſſity of public contributions, the appropriation of them, and their amount, mode of aſſeſſment and duration.

15thly. Every community has a right to demand of all its agents an account of their conduct.

16thly. Every community, in which a ſeparation of powers and a ſecurity of rights are not provided for, wants a conſtitution.

17thly. The right to property being inviolable and ſacred, no one ought to be deprived of it, except in caſes of evident public neceſſity, legally aſcertained, and on condition of a previous juſt indemnity.

The ſimplicity that reigns throughout this declaration was admirably ſuited to the purpoſes for which it was intended. A plain ſyſtem of government was preſented to the view and comprehenſion of the moſt limited capacity; and while each citizen was taught to look to thoſe rights which are inherent in man, he was inſtructed to ſubmit without repining to thoſe burdens, and that reſtraint, which were neceſſary to the preſervation of the ſtate, and to his own protection.

In the revolution that thus gradually unfolds itſelf, the mind of the reader is ſcarce cheered by the proſpect of tranquillity, before it is again overcaſt by the gathering ſtorms of civil commotion. The ſagacious and unprejudiced obſerver will, while he accompanies the hiſtorian, frequently have occaſion to admire the incidents unexpected and accidental, which ſo largely contributed to accelerate the progreſs of the revolution, and to ſupercede at once the wiſdom and the prudence of one party, and the power and conſequence of another. The declaration of right and the articles of the new conſtitution, might have ſoothed the angry ſpirits, and kindled the hopes of France; but her harveſt of ideal proſperity was blaſted by the chilling breath of famine; neither the exertion of the committee of ſubſiſtence, the precaution of the miniſter of the finances, nor the liberality of the duke of Orleans, who devoted his princely revenue to alleviate the public diſtreſs, could prevent the Pariſians from being aſſailed by that ſcarcity which ſtill afflicted France, and was alſo felt in ſome meaſure by the neighbouring kingdoms.

Even Verſailles, the royal reſidence, was not exempt from its ſhare of miſery; ſome popular tumults which prevailed in the ſtreets, and which were excited by the extravagant price of bread, ſerved as a pretext for the municipality to demand, and the king to conſent, to the regiment of Flanders being ſummoned to preſerve the public tranquillity. This meaſure, which at firſt appeared of no importance, was ſoon productive of conſequences the moſt unexpected and ſanguinary.

Though through every ſtage of this extraordinary revolution, the monarch himſelf appeared zealous to comply with the popular wiſhes, yet it was well underſtood that the high maſculine ſpirit of his conſort was ſeverely wounded, by the diminution of the regal authority, Whatever oppoſition had occurred from the throne, was therefore attributed to her counſels; and the influence which the count d'Artois poſſeſſed over his royal ſiſter-in-law, with the avowed ſentiments of that prince, induced the nation in general to regard the queen with jealouſy and ſuſpicion.

Theſe ſuſpicions were encreaſed by the arrival of the regiment of Flanders; and the capital, ever tremulouſly alive to danger, beheld with a jaundiced eye the vicinity of a body of regular troops, whoſe preſence, it was aſſerted, could be productive of no real advantage, who might be ſupported at a leſs expence in any of the provinces, and whoſe conſumption of corn would encreaſe that ſcarcity, from which the inhabitants of Paris already ſeverely ſuffered.

Such were the ſubjects of immediate remonſtrance, when a new and more lively cauſe of complaint and jealouſy preſented itſelf. The garde-du-cops, or houſhold troops of the king, had invited to an entertainment the regiment of Flanders. Though it had been an ancient cuſtom in the French ſervice to pay this compliment to every regiment that arrived, yet as it had been delayed ſome time, prudence at leaſt would have dictated the omiſſion of it at ſo critical a moment: but enthuſiaſm which is ſo often the parent of great actions and misfortunes, and which on ſo many occaſions during this unexampled revolution proved fatal to the royal cauſe, on this occaſion not only blinded the judgment of the adherents of the court, but plunged them into acts of extravagance, the meaning and conſequences of which could not elude the vigilance and diſcernment of the popular party.

The circumſtances that attended the entertainment, were far from allaying thoſe fears which had been excited by the arrival of the regiment of Flanders. Beſides that corps, the houſehold troops invited ſeveral officers of the national-guard of Verſailles, with their commander, the celebrated count d'Eſtaign. Even the common ſoldiers of the Swiſs-guards, the chaſſeurs of Trois-Evêchés, and the grenadiers of Flanders, were admitted into the ſaloon, where the feaſt was prepared; liquor was plentifully diſtributed; the health of the king, queen, and the dauphin, were drank with the loudeſt acclamations; but that of the nation was rejected. The royal family themſelves appeared on this occaſion;—the air of "Oh Richard! Oh my king!" an ancient chivalric ballad, was played by the band; and towards the cloſe of the evening ſeveral ladies of the court preſented themſelves, and diſtributed white-cockades, which were eagerly received, though the regiment of Flanders had previouſly worn that of the nation.

If in this tranſaction the court can be acquitted of any regular deſign, it yet muſt ſtand convicted of the higheſt imprudence. In the new and unſettled ſtate of affairs to countenance theſe Bacchanalian orgies, was at leaſt an unpardonable indiſcretion; the national-cockade was conſidered as the emblem of attachment to the new conſtitution; yet the ſoldiers of Flanders were prevailed on to abandon it, and reſume that which they had worn under the ancient government; while the female attendants of the queen diſplayed their zeal, by furniſhing theſe enſigns of open and undiſguiſed diſaffection.

The rumour of theſe occurrences rapidly ſpread from Verſailles to Paris; it had been preceded by a report that it was the intention of the king to quit his palace, and accompanied by the queen, whoſe reproaches it was ſuppoſed, had arouzed him to this deciſive meaſure, to eſcape to Metz; there to aſſemble what forces he could depend upon; and erect once more the ſtandard of deſpotiſm. The recall of regular troops to the neighbourhood of the capital gave weight to this report; and the Pariſians had no ſmall reaſon to apprehend that from the moment of the king's retreat, the ſcanty ſupplies of grain, which furniſhed at preſent but a bare ſubſiſtence to the capital, would be entirely intercepted.

Theſe diſcontents were not long confined to ſecret and ineffectual murmurs; on the intelligence of the myſterious entertainment at Verſailles, the clamours of the populace assumed a louder and more menacing tone. The militia of Paris, and the ancient French guards, joined in the general indignation. On the Fourth of October, the marquis de la Fayette, who was then at the committee of police, was addressed by six grenadiers, who informed him that they were deputies from the six grenadier companies; that though they entertained no doubt of his integrity, they believed he himself to be betrayed by the government; that it was time an end should be put to the public distress; that they could not turn their arms against women who demanded bread; that the committee of subsistence deceived them, and ought to be abolished. That they were determined to go to Versailles, and exterminate the garde-du-corps and the regiment of Flanders, who had trampled under foot the national cockade. That if the king of France was too feeble to bear the weight of the crown, they would depose him, and that they would crown his son, and then all would go well.

Language so alarming, it might have been naturally expected would have induced the marquis de la Fayette, as colonel-general of the militia, to have adopted every possible precaution; but whatever were his motives, that nobleman contented himself with simply haranguing the grenadiers, and recommending patience and forbearance.

His eloquence on this occasion was not attended with the effects that he might have fondly imagined. The progress of discontent was rapid and frightful. Some hundreds of the most licentious and daring of the rabble, chiefly women, collected from the markets and public halls, armed with staves, pikes, and every weapon that their blind fury could supply, poured from their dark and secret lurking places. They surrounded the Hotel de Ville with fearful cries, forced open the doors, and possessed themselves of the arms. Their numbers were soon swelled to several thousands, by successive and motly groups of both sexes, furnished with fusils and pistols, swords and poignards, lances and hatchets, and dragging two pieces of cannon. To this desparate and tumultuous host the marquis de Saint Huruge, a nobleman of ancient family in Burgundy but of sullied reputation, and doubtful intellects, joined himself.

These lawless insurgents, animated by a survey of their strength, and the seditious harangues of their new leader, at length took the road to Versailles. On their route they compelled the different passengers whom they met, and especially the women, to mingle in their train. Terror and dismay preceded their van; the villages through which they passed were diserted; the shops and houses were shut on their approach; and the inhabitants who remained in any town were happy to redeem themselves from pillage by a liberal distribution of bread and wine.

Intoxicated with rage and liquor, the frantic crowd about half after three o'clock precipitated themselves on Versailles. The king that morning had set out for Meudon, and was engaged in the amusements of the chace, when he was first informed of the march of the insurgents; he instantly returned to the castle, and arrived a quarter of an hour before the appearance of the hostile rabble; yet far from regarding their dispositions as really dangerous; to the prince of Luxembourg, the captain of his guards, and who enquired if his majesty had any orders to give; he replied, with a smile, "what "for women? you surely jest."

The national assembly was engaged in discussing the answer of the king to the articles of the constitution. His majesty had acceded to them, on condition that the executive power should remain whole and undiminished in his hands. But this reservation was far from meeting the general approbation. It was obſerved, that though the king had acceded to them, that he had not accepted them; it was propoſed, that he ſhould ſwear to obſerve them in the preſence of the aſſembly; and amidſt this diverſity of opinion, the fatal entertainment of the firſt of October, the ſource of ſo many ſuſpicions, and ſiniſtrous events, was introduced into debate.

While yet the minds of the deputies were agitated by this relation, and the various motions that attended it, monſieur Mounier, the preſident, communicated the alarming intelligence that he had juſt received; that an armed concourſe of thirty or forty thouſand people were on their march from Paris. On this news the aſſembly reſolved that the preſident ſhould wait upon the king to obtain a pure and ſimple acceptation of the articles of the conſtitution; and were already prepared to break up, when they were interrupted by the unwelcome and formidable preſence of the inſurgents.

Theſe preſented themſelves with loud cries and imprecations at the doors of the aſſembly, and threatened to force the guards that defended them. To avoid this dangerous extremity, it was decreed by a majority of voices to permit them to enter; they immediately preſſed forwards in great numbers, and the benches were inſtantly occupied by a crowd of women, diſtained with duſt and ſweat, deaf to reaſon, inflamed with liquor, and inſatiate of blood.

Two men, who aſſumed the tone of authority, appeared at their head. The firſt addreſſed the aſſembly, and informed them that they were come to Verſailles for bread and money; and at the ſame time to puniſh the garde-du-corps, who had inſulted the patriotic cockade. That like good patriots they had on their route taken away by force all the white and black cockades that they had met with; and, drawing one out of his pocket, he concluded with obſerving, "that he would have the pleaſure of tear-"ing it to pieces in the preſence of that aſſembly." His aſſociate added, that they would compel every one to wear the national-cockade. A murmur of diſcontent at this expreſſion ſpread itſelf through the aſſembly; which only produced from the undaunted and lawleſs orator the exclamation "what, are we not all brethren?" while the preſident, ſenſible of the danger which impended over him, condeſcended to anſwer in terms of the mildeſt expoſtulation.

This ſingnlar dialogue was interrupted by the tumultuous cries of the women, who demanded with menacing geſtures, bread for themſelves, and for Paris. In vain did monſieur Mounier repreſent the conſtant attention of the aſſembly to their diſtreſs; in vain did he hold up the flattering proſpect of future relief, and intreat them to retire in peace; his promiſes and ſolicitations were equally diſregarded; and the national aſſembly, diſmayed by the imperious voice of the inſurgents, ſought only to avert deſtruction by the moſt degrading compliances.

The majority confirmed again the decree reſpecting the articles of the conſtitution; they appointed once more the preſident, accompanied by a deputation, to return to the king to obtain not only his acceptation of thoſe articles, but alſo his aſſiſtance in relieving Paris, and allaying that ſcarcity which threatened the moſt fatal conſequences: but at the moment that monſieur Mounier roſe to depart, the women who ſurrounded him proclaimed their intention of accompanying him to the king; and it was with the greateſt difficulty they could prevail on them to limit their demand to ſix of their number.

The picture which this motly deputation preſented, and the embarraſments which attended it, cannot be better deſcribed than from the pen of the preſident himſelf; "we "were," ſays he, "on foot, expoſed to the mud and a heavy rain. A crowd of the "inhabitants of Verſailles lined on each ſide the avenuè that conducted to the caſtle; "the women of Paris were formed into different groupe, mingled with a certain number "of men, for the moſt part covered with rags, their countenances fierce, their geſtures "menacing, and raiſing the moſt fearful howlings. They were armed with fuſils, and "old pikes, with hatchets, with ſtaves guarded with iron, long poles, having at the end "the blades of ſwords or knives. Small detachments of the garde-du-corps formed "the patroles; and paſſed on full gallop, amidſt the cries and hiſſes of the populace.

"We advanced," continues monſieur Mounier; "and another party of men armed "with pikes, hatchets, and ſtaves, approached to eſcort the deputation. The ſtrange "and numerous train by which the deputies were followed, was miſtaken for a crowd "of the inſurgents. The garde-du-corps charged acroſs us. We were diſperſed in "the mud: we however rallied again, and proceeded towards the caſtle. We there "found the garde-du-corps, a detachment of dragoons, the regiment of Flanders, the "Swiſs guards, the invalids, and the militia of Verſailles, ranged in order of battle. "We made ourſelves known, and were received with reſpect; we traverſed the lines; "and it was with difficulty that we could prevent the crowd that had followed us from "entering with us; but in the place of ſix women, to whom I had promiſed admittance "into the caſtle, I was obliged to introduce twelve."

It was half paſt five, and a day the moſt wet and dreary, had given place to a night the moſt dark and inauſpicious; when the preſident of the national aſſembly, eſcorted by fifteen deputies, and twelve women of the dregs of Paris, entered into the royal preſence, and painted to his majeſty the diſtreſs of his capital. The king anſwered in the language of ſenſibility, and with every aſſurance of prompt and effectual ſuccour. Satisfied on this ſubject, monſieur Mounier ſtill ſolicited that ſome hour might be appointed to underſtand his majeſty's definitive anſwer to the articles of the conſtitution, and the rights of men and citizens. The king named nine; and retired to his cabinet to conſult with his miniſters on the difficulties which preſented themſelves. It was not till ten that this important deliberation was brought to a concluſion; monſieur Mounier, who had ſtill remained in waiting, was then called in, and received from the hands of the ſovereign his acceptation pure and ſimple.

But the triumph of the preſident was of ſhort duration; the multitude, whoſe fury had been excited by the ſtings of hunger, felt themſelves but little intereſted in the proſpect of future freedom, and future laws, while the diſtreſs of the preſent moment threatened inevitable deſtruction. Famine ſtill appeared before their eyes in its moſt hideous form. And monſieur Mounier entered exulting into the ſaloon of the aſſembly, and announced the acceptation of the king pure and ſimple, he was interrupted by the cries of the populace; "is it advantageous to us? will it procure us bread?" He was mournfully obliged to confeſs that the power of the king extended not to this, and that it was from time only they could expect an effectual remedy to their diſtreſs.

Even the female deputies who had accompanied monſieur Mounier, had reaſon to regret the unexpected honour which the voice of their comrades had conferred upon them; they had returned with the preſident and had announced the auſpicious promiſes of the ſovereign; but theſe were far from ſatisfying their impatient companions; they threatened them with punishment; they accuſed them of being corrupted; and compelled them to return to the caſtle, and to demand from the king that he would ſubſcribe his promiſe. Monſieur de St. Prieſt, miniſter of the home department, ſucceeded in calming for a moment their angry ſpirits. He condeſcended to explain to them the different meaſures that the king and the miniſters had adopted for the ſubſiſtence of the capital; and he delivered to them a paper ſigned by his majeſty, in which he engaged for the moſt ſpeedy and effectual ſuccours.

While M. Mounier and the deputation awaited in the royal apartment the anſwer of the king, the court of Verſailles diſplayed a ſcene of confuſion and horror. The diſorderly multitude that had accompanied the preſident to the caſtle, had returned and repoſſeſſed themſelves of the ſaloon of the national aſſembly. The deputies beheld themſelves ſurrounded by a mixture of men and women, whoſe infuirated viſages proclaimed their fell diſpoſitions; throughout the hall a thouſand voices demanded the ſuppreſſion of the garde-du-corps, or body-guard, the diſmiſſion of the regiment of Flanders; and the abolition of the parliaments. But theſe objects of popular hatred were loſt in the more general and importunate clamours for an abatement in the price of candles, of bread, and of meat.

Daring and licentious as the multitude appeared, it was ſtill hoped that they would have deſiſted from the laſt extremeties, and not ventured to have ſtained the reſidence of their ſovereign with civil blood. But each compliance, inſtead of extinguiſhing, ſeemed only to have added fuel to their rage. From the national aſſembly they had directed their tumultuous ſteps again to the caſtle. This was ſtill in appearance protected by the garde-du-corps, the regiment of Flanders, and the national-guard of Verſailles. But the latter, who had ſuffered equally with the Pariſians from the general ſcarcity, were ſoon ſeduced to join the party of the multitude; nor was it long before the defection gained the regiment of Flanders; and the garde-du-corps beheld themſelves alone, and without reſource expoſed to the headlong torrent.

It was about ſeven o'clock in the evening when the inhabitants of Verſailles were ſtartled at firſt by a ſcattering, and afterwards by a heavy but irregular diſcharge of muſquetry. The objects of this fire were the guard-du-corps; the marquis de Savonnieres, an officer in thoſe troops, had, by the imprudent purſuit of one of the national-guard of Verſailles, drawn upon them the hoſtile fury of the multitude; his temerity was ſeverely puniſhed, for his arm was broken in two places, and he fell in the midſt of his ſquadron, who, faithful to the orders of their ſovereign, ſtill preſerved their ranks, and reſtrained their own reſentment. However imprudent the behavior of this corps at the entertainment of the firſt of October, and of which the violence which they experienced on this occaſion was a conſequence, their moderation in this trying criſis is deſerving of admiration; but it failed of producing a like temper in their aſſailants, who taking advantage of their patient inactivity worried them on every ſide.

The king was yet engaged in council on the declaration of right, and the articles of the conſtitution, when he was appriſed of the danger which impended over his guards, and anxious for their ſafety, commanded them to retire to their hotel. This retreat was not effected without conſiderable hazard; and ſome men, with ſeveral horſes, were ſeverely wounded. They had not long gained the ſhelter of their hotel, when Lewis, always irreſolute and indeciſive, alarmed by the various reports which each moment grew more formidable, ſummoned to his defence once more his houſhold troops. They obeyed with alacrity, though not without experiencing the ſame riſk and oppoſition as before. They ranged themſelves in order of battle before the caſtle; and though ſome were the victims of the repeated attacks of the multitude, they ſtill diſplayed the ſame ſteady but paſſive conduct. At length the monarch, ſenſible that in that poſition their deſtruction would be inevitable without contributing to his ſecurity, gave orders for them to retire to Rambouillet, under the command of the duke de Guiche; and only retained ſome few whoſe duty it was to guard as ſentinels the royal apartments.

From the horrors which profaned Verſailles, the attention of the reader is recalled to the capital. Paris had indeed vomited forth her needy and rapacious thouſands, impatient of reſtraint, and greedy of plunder. But ſhe was too deeply intereſted in the fate of her monarch to rejoice at their abſence; and the loud and ſanguinary menaces which they had breathed. too plainly proclaimed the exceſſes which they were capable of. Soon after their tumultuous departure, the militia of Paris began to aſſemble in the ſtreets; yet ſcarce ſenſible of their own intentions, they awaited the commanding voice of their leader, and every eye was anxiouſly fixed on the marquis de la Fayette.

That nobleman, by the free choice of his fellow-citizens and the ſanction of his ſovereign, had attained to the dignity and authority of colonel-general of the militia of Paris. From the reputation he had hitherto enjoyed, vigilance and activity were at leaſt to be expected; and from the military power veſted in his hands, and from the confidence which had been fondly attached to his conduct, he alone was capable of reſtraining the blind fury of the populace. Yet whether from contempt or deſign, he ſeemed to perſevere in ſupine indifference; we have already beheld with what inattention he received the addreſs of the grenadiers; and though their diſpoſition promiſed conſequences the moſt fatal, yet no precautions were taken, no orders given, no poſts occupied; it appeared as if the marquis was willing to enhance the merit of his ſervices, and to ſuffer Verſailles to be reduced to the laſt extremities before he appeared to its relief.

At length when the marquis beheld ſeveral thouſands of the militia aſſembled, and was convinced that the force, which required him as a leader, was ſufficient to look into ſubmiſſion, either the diſorderly hoſt of inſurgents, or the ſcanty band of regular troops, he preſented himſelf at the Hotel de Ville, and demanded permiſſion of the commons to march to Verſailles; this was immediately granted, and at four in the evening, about five hours after the factious populace had quitted the capital, the marquis de la Fayette, at the head of eighteen thouſand men, directed his tardy ſteps towards Verſailles.

It was ten at night before an aid-de-camp of the marquis announced to the king and the national aſſembly the approach of the Pariſian army. Their commander, ſtill more deſirous of preſerving forms, than of rapidly advancing to protect the wretched inhabitants, halted his army at a ſmall diſtance from the town, and adminiſtered to his ſoldiers the oath to be faithful to the nation, to the law, and to the king. Fortified by this proof of allegiance, he next preſented himſelf to the national aſſembly, and aſſured the preſident both of his own pacific intentions and thoſe of his followers,

From the national aſſembly the marquis paſſed to the royal preſence; where he held the ſame language, and ſo fully poſſeſſed his majeſty of his ſecurity, that the king declined the preſence of the national repreſentatives, and contented himſelf with declaring that it was his intention never to ſeparate himſelf from the ſeat of their councils.

The deputies ſtill however continued ſitting, and were employed in diſcuſſing the code of criminal law, but their deliberations were interrupted by the frequent cries of the multitude for bread. At length the tempeſt ſeemed to have exhauſted its force; the crowd ſunk into a momentary ſilence; the militia who had marched from Paris, benumbed with cold and wet, ſought ſhelter in the taverns, the ſtables, and the courts of the different houſes; they were liberally ſupplied with liquor and proviſions; and the marquis de la Fayette, witneſs of their joy and abundance, again returned to the caſtle and communicated to the king the welcome tidings of public tranquillity. It was now about two o'clock in the morning, and his majeſty, oppreſſed by fatigue, prepared to retire to reſt.

The marquis fatally impreſſed by the deceitful quiet which prevailed, contented himſelf with placing a few ſcattered ſentinels, and haſtened to rejoin the national aſſembly. Though M. Mounier declared, that if any doubt remained he would ſtill keep the deputies ſitting, the marquis ſo confidently aſſured him of his reliance on the attachment of his own army, and repreſented ſo favourably the tranquillity which then prevailed, that the preſident conſented to diſmiſs the aſſembly, and reſigned himſelf to ſleep; an example that was ſoon followed by the general himſelf.

If the repoſe of the marquis de la Fayette was ſound and unalloyed, the ſlumbers of the inſurgents were ſhort and perturbed. Sleep ſeemed to have recruited their ſtrength without allaying their turbulence. Before the break of day their diſcordant cries and ſanguinary menaces afforded a melancholy preſage of what might be expected from their active fury: the name of the queen was mingled with their imperious demand of bread. At length about ſix in the morning the frantic crowd precipitated themſelves on the hotel of the garde-du-corps; the thin remnant of the houſhold troops were incapable of ſtemming the torrent; the doors were forced; fifteen of that corps were ſeized and dragged forth amidſt the multitude; the reſt effected their eſcape and fled towards the caſtle, and were purſued thither by their enemies whom hunger had now ſharpened up to the thirſt of blood; theſe deluged with their numbers the courts of the royal reſidence; two of the garde-du-corps fell a victim to their fury near the iron railing, a third was ſlaughtered on the the marble ſtaircaſe; the ſcattered ſentinels placed by the marquis de la Fayette were inactive ſpectators of the bloody ſcene; the houſhold troops that had eſcaped the firſt attack, in vain attempted to defend the interior of the palace; their feeble barrier was ſoon pierced by the inſurgents, who now ruſhed forwards to the apartments of the queen.

The door of the royal chamber was defended by monſieur Miomandre, a garde-du-corps, whoſe fidelity and reſolution entitle him to the applauding notice of hiſtory; while he heroically oppoſed himſelf to the hoſt of murderers already ſtained with the blood of his companions, he loudly called to her attendants to ſave the queen. That princeſs was inſtantly awakened by her women, and by a private paſſage was conducted almoſt naked to the apartment of the king; the gallant Miomandre, ſuſtained repeated aſſaults, and ſtemmed their terrible impetuoſity until ſhe had obtained a place of ſecurity; he fell indeed covered with wounds, but his life was preſerved by the goodneſs of his conſtitution and the ſkill of his ſurgeons.

A ſhort moment before the multitude ruſhed towards the apartments of the queen, the king had been rouſed from his ſleep by the accumulating tumult. The duke of Luxembourg had been alſo awakened by the ſame cauſe; he now preſented himſelf in the chamber of his ſovereign, followed by the few gardes-du-corps that he could collect: round the ſtandard of theſe, the ancient French guards ranged themſelves, and joined in repelling the inſurgents; by degrees the crowd was compelled to retire into the lower courts, while regular poſts were eſtabliſhed, and every precaution taken to ſecure the caſtle againſt a ſecond attack.

On the firſt intelligence of theſe diſaſtrous events, the marquis de la Fayette had quitted his bed, and endeavoured to atone by his activity for his former credulity and negligence; his ſplendid promiſes of ſecurity were now converted into reproaches, and ſhame ſucceeded to miſplaced confidence: As he preſſed with haſty ſteps towards the caſtle, he beheld on every ſide the effects of his own imprudence; motly groups of men and women, drunk with fury and liquor, armed with pikes and hatchets, and bearing aloft as trophies the bleeding heads of the victims to their barbarity: The national-guard of Paris rallied at the known voice of their commander; they flew to his ſupport: and their united efforts wreſted from the populace ſeveral of the garde-du-corps, whoſe fate had been deferred to render it more lingering and cruel; a conſiderable body of the national-guard were alſo introduced into the caſtle, and to ſooth the fury of the people, the king and queen, by the advice of the marquis, appeared in an open balcony; while the garde-du-corps were prevailed on to contribute to the general tranquillity, by the humiliating meaſure of ſurrendering their arms and accoutrements.

Yet theſe painful conceſſions were far from ſatisfying the multitude: The Pariſians conceived that plenty could only be ſecured to the capital by the preſence of the monarch; they now demanded, with imperious cries, the removal of the royal family from Verſailles; and the king, after a ſhort deliberation, was compelled to acquieſce in their demand.

Before his majeſty had engaged in this laſt promiſe, he had expreſſed a deſire that the deputies of the national aſſembly ſhould wait upon him at the caſtle, and aſſiſt him with their councils. Though the royal requeſt was ſeconded by the eloquence of the preſident, yet the majority conſidered it as inconſiſtent with the dignity of the aſſembly; they urged, that their deliberations in the preſence of the ſovereign would wear the appearance of conſtraint, and be ſubject to the ſuſpicions of the people. A deputation of thirty-ſix members were, however, alotted to wait on the king; and on the news that his majeſty intended to remove to Paris, that number was ſwelled to an hundred, and was appointed to accompany him to the capital.

It was about one o'clock in the evening, when Lewis the Sixteenth, attended by the royal family, ſet out from Verſailles; and the order of the march preſented to the ſpectator a ſcene of horror that ſurpaſſes deſcription. A crowd of frantic women, ſtill ſtaggering under the debauch of the preceding night, and ſtill ſtained with the blood which they had wantonly ſhed, mounted on the horſes, fantaſtically ornamented with the hats and uniforms, and armed with the weapons of the houſhold troops; theſe were ſurrounded with a hoſt of men, the refuſe of a vaſt and luxurious capital; two of which, with their arms naked and bloody, diſplayed aloft on their pikes the heads of two of the gardes-du-corps, whom they had inhumanly maſſacred. Behind were the ſurvivors of thoſe unhappy gentlemen on foot, bare-headed, without arms, and ſhuddering with horror at the goary viſages of their ill-fated comrades. The royal family themſelves followed, encompaſſed by the dragoons, the regiment of Flanders, and the hundred Swiſs; continually expoſed to the inſults of a licentious rabble, who inceſſantly reproached them as the authors of that ſcarcity which the hand of Providence had inflicted.

In this picture the queen preſented an object as extraordinary as affecting; though youth and beauty naturally excite compaſſion; and though illuſtrious ſufferers generally inſpire pity from the compariſon of their former ſplendour with their fallen ſtate, yet her ſubjects beheld her ſituation with ſavage tranſport; they ſtill attributed to her the deſign of attempting to ſtarve them into ſubjection by a fictitious famine; and ſo lively were the impreſſions of their own diſtreſs, that their indignation precluded that ſympathy which is rarely denied to the unfortunate great. But the conſolation, which the queen was not allowed to derive from the humanity of her people, ſhe in ſome meaſure found in her own magnanimity.

The confuſed and tedious march from Verſailles to Paris continued from one o'clock in the evening till ſeven, when his majeſty and the royal family entered the capital, rather amidſt the reproaches than the acclamations of the inhabitants; and the king, after having preſented himſelf at the Hotel de Ville, where he liſtened to an addreſs from monſieur Bailly, was afterwards with his royal conſort, eſcorted to the Tuilleries.

The character of Lewis has been ſometimes repreſented as weak and adoleſcent, but in the courſe of the trying ſcenes which follow we ſhall find him to poſſeſs not only a quick apprehenſion, but a ſtrength of judgement which appears at variance with the feeble and wavering courſe of his public and private meaſures:—On this occaſion when paſſing up the ſtairs of the Hotel, monſieur de la Fayette ſuggeſted that it might anſwer a ſalutary purpoſe, if he were to aſſure the people himſelf, or authoriſe him to aſſure them, that he meant to fix his future abode in Paris. "I feel no objection," replied he, "to reſide "in Paris, but as I have not yet formed any determination of that kind, I will not make "any promiſe which I am not determined to fulfil."

Thus concluded the ſixth of October, a day which will long remain memorable in the annals of France. Yet while we lament the horrors that diſtinguiſh it, candour muſt admit that it was not the outrage of premeditation:—Devoid of deſign and incapable of ſyſtem, the ſtings of hunger ſeem alone to have rouzed the populace to action; to them the acceptation of the declaration of rights, and the articles of the conſtitution, were matters of indifference; famine was the object of their terrors; and amidſt every attempt to ſooth them, the high price of bread was the ſubject of their clamours; to this were added the irritating follies tranſacted at the entertainment of the garde-du-corps; and the intended flight of the king to Metz, a project which has ſince been confirmed by a letter written by count d'Eſtaign to the queen, conjuring her to relinquiſh the deſign and pointing out its inevitable dangers. In ſhort, much impatience on the part of the populace, and much negligence in thoſe to whom the chief military power had been entruſted, combined to produce thoſe diſaſtrous events.

This fatal inſurrection was however attended with other circumſtances not unworthy of obſervation. The removal of the king to Paris was productive of many happy conſequences; the ſuſpicions of the king's intended flight, which had been rapidly circulated and fully credited, were now as prudently diſbelieved, and the royal party found ſome conſolation in their diſapointment by throwing the odium of raiſing a falſe report on their opponents; the confidence of the Parisians was now much more fixed than heretofore, and that abundance and profusion which usually follows courts had contributed to revive the appearance of plenty and mitigate the sufferings of the poor: and the markets were stocked by the conflux of provisions to the centre of the capital and court.

The aristocratic party however could not conceal their chagrin, it appeared under every effort of dissimulation and proffession of moderation; and in the Assembly their disappointment was particularly manifested in the debates concerning the removal of the legislative body to Paris from Versailles, which they observed would annihilate the freedom of debate; nevertheless it was effected by a letter from the king to the president, and they resumed their sittings in the metropolis accordingly.

We have already remarked the firmness with which the duke of Orleans had early opposed himself to the despotism of the throne. His repeated exiles from court, his adherence to the claims of the commons; the large territorial sacrifices he had v luntarily made; and the liberality with which he had applied his revenue to relieve the distress of the capital, had attached to him the hearts of the people; but at the same time had rendered him equally obnoxious to the champions of arbitrary power, and those ambitious spirits who hoped to rise by the favour of the multitude, and who found themselves eclipsed by his superior rank, influence, and liberality. These insinuated that the name and popularity of the duke might be applied to purposes the most dangerous, by aiming at the crown; and that prince, who had before given no insignificant proof of his forbearance, by declining the proffered honour of president of the national assembly, now established his character for moderation, by yielding to the wishes of his sovereign, and accepting a commission to the court of St. James's, he withdrew himself from the eyes of his partial countrymen.

An address was on this occasion published by the commune of Paris, and circulated through all the provinces and communities of France, explaining the nature of the proceedings of that day, their loyalty and attachment to the king, an inviolable obedience to the national assembly, and love of their country This address, although it might have quieted some, it by no means diminished the fears of a considerable body both in and out of the assembly, and hastened their removal; numberless passports were daily solicited on various pretexts, and the roads to the frontiers displayed in the succession of fugitives, a melancholy indication of the despair of the aristocratic party.

About the same time that the duke of Orleans withdrew to England, monsieur Mounier, comte Lally-Tollendal, and several other members of the national assembly, offended at the little attention that had lately been paid to their representations, and despairing of the safety of the vessel of the state, abandoned the stations that had been assigned them, and sought in Switzerland a shelter from the fury of the tempest; many others pursued a less honourable course, by retiring to countries which were avowedly or covertly hostile to France, where they employed themselves with indefatigable perfidy in exciting all Europe to war against their native country, and thereby aggravating the animosities just then kindling, and which ultimately spread into a flame that consumed the throne, their own hopes, and contributed more firmly to establish the new order of things on a basis that experience has proved invulnerable to the united efforts of the combined power of all the nations of Europe.

The ſucceſſor of Lewis the fourteenth and fifteenth, conducted in abject triumph to his capital by his victorious ſubjects, reduced to follow a frantic crowd, ſtained with the blood and adorned with the ſpoils of his guards; to men entruſted with the power of nations, to thoſe whoſe ambitious deſires are never ſatisfied but in the deſpotic ſubjection of a people, whoſe boſoms are never penetrated by the miſeries inflicted by warand luxurious profuſion, and who never calculate upon the danger and the injuſtice of confirming the great body of a nation in ignorance,—preſents no common leſſon on the inſtability of human grandeur. While the ſituation of his miniſter offers to reflection the fond preſumption of men who attempt to ſteer a middle courſe between the oppreſſors and the oppreſſed, in great national convulſions.

We have already beheld monſieur Necker recalled from exile by the general voice of France; aſcend but a few weeks, we behold him crowned with laurels, and adored as the irreproachable miniſter, the guardian genius of the nation. But he was now doomed with his ſovereign to experience the mutability of favour, and of fortune; as long as the welfare of the ſtate ſeemed to depend ſolely on loans, banks, and pecuniary negociations, he ſtood aloof from his rivals, and appeared to guide the helm of empire with no unſteady hand. But no ſooner was the veſſel launched upon the ocean of opinion, no ſooner had the principles of civil liberty taken poſſeſſion of that place in the national mind which had been before ſolely engroſſed in deviſing expedients to obviate preſent difficulties, than the talents and activity of the miniſter ſhrunk beneath this new combuſtion of the elements. Diſmay and deſpair ſucceeded to hope and confidence; he heard with horror the howlings of the tempeſt; and ſilently abandoned his ſtation to more experienced or more adventurous pilots. The plaudits of the crowd were no more; that laſt and higheſt gratification of vanity was extinguiſhed, and though he continued to ſtand apparently at the head of the finances, his plans were conſidered as calculated rather to temporize with and perpetuate the national grievances than to relieve them, and therefore rarely adopted, andhis repreſentations were heard either with cold indifference or ſuſpicion.

The firſt meaſure of the king, on his arrival at Paris, was to iſſue a proclamation to allay the doubts and fears of the provinces, and to repreſent his departure from Verſailles, rather as his own voluntary choice, than the effect of conſtraint. He ſtatted, that he had with confidence fixed his reſidence in the capital, the inhabitants of which he was aſſured would never join in any attempt to reſtrain the liberty of their ſovereign; and he added, that as ſoon as the national aſſembly ſhall have terminated the grand object of their labours, the re-eſtabliſhment of the public welfare; that then he would execute the plan that he had long conceived, and viſit, without pomp, the different provinces of the kingdom, to prove by his preſence that all his people were equally dear to him.

This proclamation was immediately followed by a ſecond from the national aſſembly, in which it was declared, that though liberty was the ſource of proſperity to empires, yet licence was ſubverſive of their power and grandeur; that although, during the hour of tranquillity, the execution of the laws might be enforced without any extraordinary exertion of the public authority, yet in caſes of particular emergency, particular expedients muſt be reſorted to; that impreſſed with theſe conſiderations, and deſirous of preſerving the tranquillity of France, the national aſſembly had thought proper to form a code of martial law; by this code all municipal officers, in inſtances of civil commotion, were authorized to employ military force, and were to be accountable for not uſing the means that they were thus entruſted with. That the national-guard, the regular troops, and the marechauſſée, were inſtructed to march at the requiſition of the municipal officers, but were ſtill to be accompanied by one of the latter; and that on the crowd not retiring, on being thrice warned by the civil magiſtrate, it was then lawful for him to have recourſe to the military, who were commanded to execute his orders.

From the moment the king had fixed his reſidence at Paris, the national aſſembly, now removed to the capital, ſeemed to have engroſſed all authority, while the power of the ſovereign was reduced to a vain and empty ſhadow. Decree followed decree with a rapidity that aſtoniſhed the members themſelves; but with whatever ſucceſs their regulations to reſtore order might be attended, the ſtate of the finances, and the fatal deficit ſtill preſented difficulties the moſt ſerious and formidable; that deficit had been ſtated in May, 1789, by monſieur Necker, at fifty-ſix millions of livres, and was now ſwelled by the ſuppreſſion of the duty on ſalt, and the deficiencies in the cuſtoms and exciſe, to an enormous amount. The two privileged orders were already ſubjected, in common with their fellow-citizens, to the taxes from which they had been formerly exempted; but this promiſed only a ſcanty and tardy ſupply; the public neceſſities were great and urgent; and the eyes of the aſſembly were turned to the property of the church, as the ſole effectual reſource.

The affluence of the eccleſiaſtical order had been ſeverely wounded by the abolition of tythes; but though their power was conſiderably impaired by that regulation, their poſſeſſions were ſtill an immenſe ſource of wealth and influence; and held out a moſt alluring temptation to the new government, equally anxious to diminiſh the public burdens, and to depreſs an order to whoſe intereſts their very exiſtence was hoſtile, whoſe connexion as a body and whoſe peculiar functions rendered their oppoſition to any ſpecies of reform formidable, and in whoſe profeſſions they could not cordially confide. They were ſtimulated by the powerful motives of humbling their enemies and eſtabliſhing their own authority and the clergy were not blind or indifferent to the danger that menaced them; to avert it, they offered by the archbiſhop of Aix, a contribution of four hundred millions of livres, or near ſeventeen millions ſterling, provided they might be permitted to enjoy their revenues in peace.

This propoſal only ſerved to confirm the aſſembly in the idea they had entertained of the value of the propoſed ſpoil. In the compte rendu of monſieur Necker the poſſeſſions of the church had been ſtated at five millions ſterling of revenue; but as this calculation was drawn from the returns of the poſſeſſors, they were, as had been ſurmiſed, found to immenſely exceed that eſtimation.

Impreſſed with the importance of ſuch an acquiſition, under the encreaſing exigencies of the nation, on the tenth of October, Talleyrand-Perigord, biſhop of Autun, aſcended the tribune, and after expatiating on the ſtate of the finances and the national neceſſities, with a diſintereſtedneſs that charmed and aſtoniſhed the aſſembly, and with a boldneſs that for a moment confounded thoſe who were prediſpoſed to oppoſition, pointed out the magnitude of the reſource in the poſſeſſions of the clergy, which he aſſerted belonged of right to the nation, and were at the diſpoſal of the aſſembly; that all ſinecures ought to be ſuppreſſed, and that the only right the clergy poſſeſſed in the revenues of the church was limitted to a decent ſubſiſtence. He eſtimated the annual revenue of the church at one hundred and fifty million of livres, two-thirds of which he propoſed to appropriate to religious worſhip, and the other fifty millions to the public ſervice. He concluded his propoſition with remarking, that by a vigorous exertion, the ſum to be thus acquired would redeem the heavy and ſlaviſh tax on ſalt, and the odious revenue obtained by the ſale of offices. Such a propoſition, from an eccleſiaſtic, and one whoſe appointments at the time were very conſiderable, and whoſe talents and rank held out to him the moſt brilliant proſpects in the eccleſiaſtical carreer, could not fail of producing admiration and making a conſiderable impreſſion in favour of the meaſure: the ſpeech was ordered to be printed.

Menwhile the ſubject was diſcuſſed by Meſſrs. Thouret, Garat, Mirabeau, Barnave, Gouttes, and Dillon, in ſupport of the biſhop of Autun's propoſition; it was oppoſed by the archbiſhop of Aix, Mirabeau the younger, and the abbés Monteſquiou, d'Aymar, and Mauri. By the latter it was maintained, that the property of the church was abſolute and co-ordinate with ſociety, which if violated would operate to the diſſolution of property, and of ſociety itſelf, and the return of diſorder and a ſtate of nature; that the eſtates were never held by the nation; that the titles of the clergy were as well eſtabliſhed as thoſe of any private citizens, and by the ſame authorities; that a part was obtained by bequeſt and the reſt by the frugality and economy of the clergy; and that the arguments employed againſt them were drawn from dark and abſtract metaphyſical ſubtleties, in oppoſition to common ſenſe, the evidence of hiſtory, and the univerſal practice of nations. By their opponents it was aſſerted, that the title was defective in the clergy, becauſe they could not alienate by gift or ſale; that the church poſſeſſions really conſiſted of three deſcriptions of acquiſition, thoſe beſtowed by the kings, by corporations, and by individuals; that the foundations by the kings could be made only on the part of the nation, and were in fact either a diſmemberment of the ſtate or an appropriation for its ſervice, in either of which caſes the authority over them was clear; thoſe of aggregate bodies were in the ſame predicament; with regard to the donations of individuals, waving the point of utility, they reſted upon the queſtion—What is property in ſociety? It is a right given by the laws to poſſeſs excluſively what in a ſtate of nature would be common property; and on the principle of the ſupreme law, that the good of the whole ſupercedes the unneceſſary or pernicious claims of a few, placed the matter at a ſimple iſſue, by deciding whether the intention of religious inſtruction was not perverted by thoſe worldl inſtitutions, and their enormous poſſeſſions a burden and an evil to ſociety; that benevolent intentions were always reſpectable, but that the intentions of donors ſhould not be ſet up againſt juſtice, nor their ignorance or ſuperſtition operate to bind poſterity in perpetual error; that foundations multiplied by vanity for the nurture of idleneſs, were grievances; but that ſpecies which for ever accumulates were alſo prepoſterous, ſince they would in time abſorb the whole property of the nation; as for inſtance, if every individual were to have a ſepulchre, there would in time ariſe a neceſſity from the very nature of the abuſe, of overthrowing ſome of the monuments to make room for others.

But it was not till the ſecond of November, after a long and ſtrenuous debate, in which the abbé Mauri ſignalized his eloquence in defending the intereſts of his order, that the aſſembly decreed, that all eccleſiaſtical property was at the diſpoſal of the nation; ſubject to the charge of providing, in a proper manner, for the expence of divine worſhip the ſupport of the miniſters of the church, and the relief of the poor, under the inſpection and according to the inſtructions of the different provinces.

That in the future diſpoſition which ſhould be made for the ſupport of the miniſters of religion, not leſs than twelve hundred livres of income ſhould be aſſigned to any curacy, without including the houſe and gardens dependent on it.

This was ſoon followed by a proclamation from the king, ſtating that his majeſty, at the requeſt of the national aſſembly, had thought proper to ſuſpend the nominations to all benefices, with the ſole exception of curacies; and commanded all tribunals, adminiſtrative bodies, and municipalities, to make known this ordinance, and to reſpect it as the eſtabliſhed law of the kingdom.

Though theſe regulations took place towards the cloſe of the year eighty-nine, yet it was not till the enſuing year was far advanced, that the fate of the clergy was finally determined; each motion was productive of a freſh and vigorous debate; and the oppoſition of the abbé Mauri, though uſeleſs to his order, was highly honourable to himſelf.

Perhaps it will not be diſpleaſing to the reader, if, abandoning the chronological order we have hitherto generally purſued, we preſent him at once with a view of different regulations which were adopted on this important object.

A. D. 1790.] In February 1790, all poſſeſſors of benefices, or of penſions on benefices, were enjoined to declare before the muncipality of the city which they inhabited, or were neareſt to, the number, the title, and the ſituation of the benefices that they poſſeſſed, as well as of all penſions which they enjoyed; under the penalty of forfeiting thoſe benefices and penſions which they omitted to ſpecify.

At the ſame time it was declared, till other future reductions more conſiderable could be made, that in every order throughout the different municipalities of the kingdom, one religious houſe, where there exiſted two, ſhould be ſuppreſſed; two in every municipality where there exiſted three; and three where there exiſted four; and on the thirteenth of the ſame month a decree of the national aſſembly prohibited in future all monaſtic vows in either ſex.

On the twenty-ſixth the penſions of the religious who ſhould chuſe to quit their houſes, were regulated by the national aſſembly. In the mendicant orders, thoſe under fifty years of age were aſſigned ſeven hundred livres; thoſe above fifty, and under ſeventy, eight hundred livres; and thoſe above ſeventy one thouſand livres. In the other religious orders, the members under fifty were alotted nine hundred livres; thoſe above fifty and under ſeventy, one thouſand livres; and thoſe above ſeventy, twelve hundred livres; thoſe religious who were formerly known by the celebrated name of Jeſuits, and who ſtill reſided in France, but poſſeſſed not any benefice, or penſion from the ſtate, a ſum equal to that aſſigned to the other religious of the ſame age, were included in this regulation.

The lay brethren, who had entered into ſolemn vows, and thoſe who could prove an engagement formally contracted between themſelves and their monaſtery, were to receive on quitting their houſes, three hundred livres per annum, if they were under fifty years of age: four hundred livres if above fifty, and under ſeventy; and five hundred livres if above ſeventy.

In March following it was decreed, that the religious who ſhould prefer reſiding in thoſe houſes which ſhould be appointed for them, ſhould enjoy penſions proportioned to their age, and in every reſpect conformable to the penſions which had been aſſigned to thoſe who had quitted their houſes.

In expoſing to ſale the maſs of eccleſiaſtical property, not only the maintenance of individuals was to be provided for, but the claims of the private creditors were to be reſpected. The eſtates of the church were burdened with very conſiderable debts. Theſe were ſtated by the committee of finances at one hundred and forty millions, four hundred thouſand livres, or upwards of ſix millions two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. In March the national aſſembly had decreed the alienation of eccleſiaſtical lands to the amount of four hundred millions of livres, or about ſeventeen millions ſterling, to the different municipalities of the kingdom; in the April following, they reſolved that theſe lands ſhould be conſidered free from every mortgage or debt; that the creditors ſhould on no account oppoſe the ſale of them; but at the ſame time they declared the creditors of the clergy the creditors of the ſtate; and pledged the public faith for the punctual payment of the principal and intereſt.

No ſooner had the national aſſembly relieved the fears of the creditors of the church, than they prepared to extinguiſh the hopes of the clergy by alotting thoſe ſtipends which were hereafter to bound their expectations. Theſe were fixed finally in June; and were rather proportioned to the wants of the church in its primeval ſimplicity, than ſuited to the pompous religious eſtabliſhment of the Romiſh church and a magneficent empire. The biſhops and the dignified clergy were reduced in general to leſs than one fourth of their former income. Of the parochial clergy or curates, thoſe of Paris were aſſigned ſix thouſand livres; in towns where the population exceeded fifty thouſand ſouls, four thouſand livres; in thoſe where the numbers extended from ten thouſand to fifty thouſand, three thouſand livres; where under ten thouſand and above three thouſand, the ſalary was limited to two thouſand four hundred livres; in all towns under three thouſand ſouls, two thouſand livres; and in the country from eighteen hundred down to twelve hundred livres, according to the different degrees of population.

The income of vicars was alſo determined from two thouſand four hundred to ſeven hundred livres, according to their rank in the church, and the population of their pariſhes.

Reſolutions which for ever extinguiſhed the ſplendor of the gallican hierarchy and the influence of the church, and reduced to a bare ſubſiſtence an order ſo formidable from its wealth, its numbers, and its power over the prejudices of the great maſs of the poor, could not fail of being canvaſſed with freedom; but the voice of the nation was heard in deep ſolemn reverberations, while the murmurs of the eccleſiaſtical body were ſcarcely heard but in the ſilent receſſes of the cloiſter, in melancholy echoes beneath the vacant arches of Gothic magnifiecence, or in the fierce rage and evanenſcent ſcreams of deſpairing fanaticiſm.

The national aſſembly were not ſo entirely occupied in providing for the neceſſities of the ſtate, by the ſpoils of their irreconcileable enemies, as to neglect the meaſures neceſſary for the future election of national repreſentatives. To facilitate this the aſſembly proceeded to the perfect eſtabliſhment of the conſtitution on a new territorial diviſion of the kingdom; the ancient provinces were already morally defunct; their excluſive privileges and jurisdictions were annihilated, by the operation of preceding decrees; their extent and limit originally settled by chance or caprice, without any regard to convenience or utility, served only to preserve the remains of feudal ideas; each province had possessed beside what were termed peculiar rights, peculiar laws, and formed in itself a petty sovereignty, with its parliament, metropolis, and jurisdiction; a government so multiform was necessarily perplexed, and productive of disorder and abuses in the affairs of revenue as well as of jurisprudence; beside this radical division of the provinces, there were other fantastical and irregular arrangements in the civil, military, and ecclesiastical administration, which contributed to the confusion; it was divided into governments according to the military order; into dioceses according to the ecclesiastical, and in the judicial order into bailiwicks and seneschalities; and all these divisions without regularity, conformity, or design.

The project of the committee appointed to report upon this subject was prefented on the twenty-second of September, 1789; and another plan by M. Thouret on the second of November, and others were offered by Mirabeau, Bengy de Puyvale, and Galland, but that of the abbé Sieyes, equally admired for its ingenuity, accuracy, and the industry with which it was completed, was preferred to all the others, and was adopted by a decree passed the twenty-second of December, and referred to a committee, who finally reported it on the ninth, and it became a law on the fifteenth of January, 1790.

The representation was by this arrangement established upon a combination of three simple elements, territory, population, and public contribution; France was divided into eighty-three departments; each of these into districts, not fewer than three nor more than nine; the districts into cantons of four French leagues square; in each department and in each district there was to be a chief place, or town, where the administrative assembly of the department or district officiate; the electoral assemblies of each department to sit alternately in the chief places of their several districts.

The legislative government proceeds by primary assemblies, electoral assemblies, and a national assembly; the administrative and executive government, by municipalities, assemblies of districts, assemblies of departments, and the king; thus the two great functions of government were kept distinct in their operation, though originating from one common source, the choice of the people.

All voters in a canton, or primary assembly, were to contribute to the public service the value of three days labour; but this was not to exceed twenty sous, or ten pence sterling for one day, or two shillings and six pence altogether; they chuse the members of the electoral assemblies, the judges of the canton, and their bishops and other clergy: —the persons returned in fixed proportions were called electoral assemblies, whose qualification was an annual contribution of ten days labour, and they elect the members of the national assembly, the bishops of departments, and other officers: the number of the representatives to be equal to the number of the departments multiplied by nine, and the qualification of the member to be an annual contribution equal to a mark of silver, or about forty-two shillings sterling, and to possess beside some landed property.*

In the intervals of these momentous discussions, the assembly formally abolished lettres de cachet, arbitrary imprisonment, and appointed a committee to enquire into the state of the prisons, and the offences of persons detained in custody: they abolished distinctions of dress of the different orders in the assembly, and decreed that none of their own members ſhold poſſeſs peculiar immunities; and in particular they diſclaimed the privilege of franking letters. On the third of November the provincial parliaments were ſuſpended from all their functions; and on the fifth the final blow was given to the hoary errors of the feudal ſyſtem, and the factitious diſtinctions of barbarous pride, by the total abrogation of all titles and heraldic emblems.

The diſorders that had prevailed in various places, and the approaching completion of the regeneration of government, induced the king to attend in the aſſembly on the fourth of February, where he entreated them to ſtem the prevailing commotions and to perfect the great objects of their labours, aſſuring them of his hearty concert in promoting the happineſs of the nation: this ſpeech was ordered to be printed and circulated through the departments on the twenty-third of February, the royal party thinking it neceſſary as a companion to the ſecond addreſs of the aſſembly to the nation, which had been decreed on the eleventh of the ſame month. The addreſs may be conſidered as an authentic juſtification of the meaſures hitherto purſued, and their appeal to the public tribunal; as ſuch it deſerves no inconſiderable ſhare of attention.

The addreſs ſtated, at the ſame time that the national aſſembly received ſuch numerous marks of approbation and congratulation from the various provinces and cities of the kingdom, they could not but be ſenſible of the intereſted murmurs which had been excited by meaſures adopted for the ſuppreſſion of abuſes and the extinction of prejudices. That they conſidered it as their duty vigilantly to guard againſt theſe murmurs, leſt the propagation of them ſhould alienate the minds of the people from their repreſentatives; the effects of thoſe labours, and the object of thoſe views, they proceeded to delineate.

They aſſerted that the national aſſembly, in the midſt of tempeſts, had traced with a firm hand the principles of a conſtitution, which ſecured for ever the freedom of the people. That they had eſtabliſhed the rights of men, forgotten and inſulted for ſo many ages. That they had reſtored to the nation the prerogative of taxing themſelves; while they had preſerved the principles of the monarchy in pronouncing the ſovereign inviolable, and the throne hereditary.

That thoſe orders, whoſe antique pretenſions were the objects of ſo much jealouſy, were now loſt in the general name of the citizens; and that an army ſolely compoſed of citizens; aſſembled by patriotiſm, and inſpired by honour, watched over the ſafety, and were active to reſtore the tranquillity of the ſtate.

That the feudal ſyſtem, ſo long obnoxious, was aboliſhed; that the provinces were delivered from a vexatious adminiſtration of juſtice; that all arbitrary diſtinctions were annihilated; and that the national aſſembly, by the new diviſion of France, had effaced the laſt traces of prejudice, and inſtituted, inſtead of a narrow attachment to a particular province, a love for the kingdom in general.

The abolition of a venal magiſtracy, and the reform of the crimnal code, were long and loudly demanded; theſe demands have been complied with; to this may be added, vexatious taxes repealed, immoderate penſions reduced, and an unremitting attention to the finances, which promiſes the moſt effectual relief to their diſtreſs.

"Behold, Frenchmen, our work, or rather your own; for we are only your inſtru"ments; it is you who have enlightened, encouraged, and ſupported us through our "labours; to what an happy epoch are we already arrived; what an honourable inheri" tance may you bequeath to your poſterity; all raiſed to the rank of citizens, ad-

" miſſable to all employments, equal in the eyes of the law, free to act, to ſpeak, " and to write, independent of the will of any man, and only owing obedience to " the common authority: what condition can be more enviable? Is there a ſingle " citizen, worthy of that name, who dares look backwards, who would remove the " ruins, with which we are ſurrounded, to reſtore the ancient edifice?

" But we have deſtroyed every thing! we have acted with too much precipitation!
" exclaim our enemies! It was indeed neceſſary to rebuild every thing; and are thoſe, " who accuſe our precipitation, ignorant, that tardy and indeciſive ſteps have never led " to any effectual reform; and that the abuſe which is permitted to remain, becomes " ſoon the ſupport and reſtorer of thoſe which we flatter ourſelves with having extin-" guiſhed.

" But our aſſemblies are tumultuous! Of what conſequence is this, if our decrees are " prudeut? We are accuſed of aſpiring to chimerical perfection? Ridiculous reproach;
" which it is eaſy to perceive is only a latent wiſh to perpetuate abuſes; but it is impoſſi-
" ble, it has been ſaid, to regenerate a nation old and corrupted! It is neceſſary only to " anſwer, that thoſe only are corrupted who would perpetuate corrupt abuſes; and that " a nation is reſtored from the day that it is reſolute to be born again to freedom?
" Behold the new generation! How already their hearts palpitate with joy and hope!
" How pure, noble, and patriotic, are their ſentiments! With what enthuſiaſm they " each day contend for the honour of being admitted to take the oath of citizen! But " wherefore reply to a reproach ſo deſpicable? Is the national aſſembly reduced to juſtify
" itſelf for not having deſpaired of the people of France?

" We have done nothing for the people; they have dared to aſſert! and yet the cauſe " of the people is every where triumphant. Nothing done for the people! Has not " every abuſe that has been deſtroyed, prepared, or aſſured their relief; or was there a " ſingle abuſe which did not in its conſequence preſs upon them?

" But they complained not! the exceſs of their grief ſtifled their cries. They are now " miſerable! Rather ſay that they are yet miſerable; but they ſhall not remain ſo long.

" We have deſtroyed the executive power! No: call it the miniſterial power; and " it is that power which has often degraded, and would have deſtroyed the executive.
" The executive power we have enlightened by pointing out its rights; and we " have rendered it more noble, by obliging it to reaſcend to the ſource of its au" thority, the authority of the people. But it is without force. Againſt the conſtitu-
" tion and the law, this is true; but in ſupport of them it will be more effectual than " ever it was.

" The people are in arms! Yes, for their defence; and it was neceſſary. But in " various places, a long train of diſorders have been the reſult.—And can they re" proach the national aſſembly with this! Can they impute to them diſaſters at " which they ſtill ſhudder, and which they endeavoured to prevent by repeated " decrees?

" We have exceeded our powers! The anſwer is ſimple. Undoubtedly we were " convened to frame a conſtitution; that was the wiſh, that was the object of all " France. Was it poſſible to create the conſtitution, or form a body imperfect as it is,
" of conſtitutional decrees, without thoſe powers which we have exerciſed? Let us go

" further; without the national aſſembly France was loſt; without that principle " which ſubmits every thing to a majority of free voices, and which has made all our " decrees, it was impoſſible to conceive a national aſſembly; it is impoſſible to con- " ceive, we will not ſay a conſtitution, but even the hope of irrevocably deſtroying the " ſmalleſt abuſe. This principle is an eternal truth; it has been acknowledged through- " out all France; it is to be found in a thouſand ſhapes in thoſe numerous addreſſes of " attachment, which have encountered on all the roads the crowd of libels, in which " we are reproached with having exceeded our powers. Thoſe addreſſes, thoſe con- " gratulations, thoſe homages, thoſe patriotic oaths; what a confirmation do they not " afford of thoſe powers which our accuſers would diſpute.

" Such are the reproaches, Frenchmen, which your repreſentatives are ſubjected to " in thoſe numerous and crimnal publications which affect to proclaim the grief of our " fellow-citizens. But in vain do our enemies flatter themſelves with the hope of diſ- " couraging us; our ardour redoubles, and it will not be long before you will be " ſenſible of the effects of it."

From the language of the vindication the national aſſembly proceed to hold out the future bleſſings of an army compoſed of citizens, a ſeries of taxes which ſhould reſpect agriculture and induſtry, a clergy equally ſtrangers to poverty and riches, a code of criminal laws dictated by reaſon, by juſtice, and humanity, a code of civil law entruſted to judges choſen by the ſuffrages of the people; and a ſyſtem of national education and inſtruction, which ſhould place the conſtitution under the ſafeguard of the riſing generation. " Behold, Frenchmen," continue they, " the proſpect of happineſs and glory which opens to your view! Some ſteps yet remain; and thence the aſperſions of the enemies of the revolution, who there hope to find you vulnerable. Guard againſt that impetuous vivacity ſo natural to you; dread every kind of violence, ſince diſorder may become fatal to liberty. Liberty is dear to you—you are in poſſeſſion of it—ſhew yourſelves worthy of it; attend faithfully to the letter and ſpirit of the decrees of your repreſentatives, accepted or ſanctioned by the king. Bear in mind the three ſacred words which guard theſe decrees, the nation, the law, the king. The nation, that is yourſelves; the law, that is the free emanation of your will; the king, that is the guardian of the law. Whatever falſe reports may be induſtriouſly propagated, confide ſteadily in this union. It was the king they formerly deceived, now it is you, and the ſenſibility of the king is afflicted by their ſucceſs: he wiſhes to preſerve his people from the arts of thoſe deceivers whom he has driven from his throne, and from whom he will guard the cradle of his ſon; for he has declared in the midſt of your repreſentatives, that he will make the heir of the crown the guardian of the conſtitution.

" As for us, purſuing our inceſſant labours, devoted, conſecrated to the completion of the conſtitution, your work as well as ours, we ſhall terminate it, aided by all the light of France, and overcome all obſtacles. Satisfied in our own conſcience, convinced, and already happy in your approaching felicity, we will place in your hands this ſacred depoſit of the conſtitution under the protection of new virtues, the ſeeds of which, inherent in your hearts, have burſt forth and bloomed with the firſt dawn of liberty."

Whatever advantages the national aſſembly might expect to derive from this addreſs, they neglected not to avail themſelves of every favourable occaſion to promote the proſperity of the nation. The ſcanty pay of the army had long been a ſubject of juſt complaint, and the ſoldiery looked up with confidence for relief from a diſtreſs which was rendered doubly intolerable by the exactions of their officers. The national aſſembly were neither inſenſible to their miſery nor indifferent to the opportunity that offered of teſtifying to that fidelity to their country which they had already proved, as well as to ſecure the attachment of ſo formidable a body. In June a decree was paſſed augmenting their pay about one-fourth, and a ſubſequent decree extended it to the marine.

Though the fortitude and vigilance of the national aſſembly ſeem never to have deſerted them, yet both were ſcarce ſufficient to repel or elude the various difficulties which each hour preſented. A diſpute reſpecting the right of fiſhery on the coaſt of America threatened to involve the courts of Madrid and London in open hoſtilities; both urged their warlike preparations with rival diligence; and the king of France, who conſidered himſelf bound by the family-compact to ſupport the pretenſions of the kindred throne of Spain, and amidſt the armaments of his neighbours to protect the commeerce of his ſubjects from inſult, demanded by his miniſters, of the national aſſembly, the ſupplies neceſſary for equipping fourteen ſail of the line.

The meſſage of the ſovereign, although immediately complied with, was productive of conſequences the moſt important to the conſtitution. In the unſettled ſtate of public affairs, the national aſſembly could not be inſenſible to the numerous embaraſſments with which a war muſt have been attended. The expences of it could not but preſs heavy on a people who had been taught to expect the daily diminution of their burdens; the diſcontent of the majority of the nobility was deep and undiſguiſed; their ſituation called them to military command; the ſoldiers, it was true, had hitherto diſplayed the moſt generous ardour in the defence of the new government; but when once aſſembled in a camp, their officers might regain their former aſcendancy: and thoſe arms which had been provided againſt the foreign enemies of France, might be employed to ſubvert her conſtinution. The example of the revolution was an object of terror to every deſpotic power; the king of Spain, it was preſumed, could not behold the depreſſion of the royal prerogative of the Houſe of Bourbon without ſecret indignation; the intrigues of the baron de Breteuil, who had always poſſeſſed the confidence of the queen, were ſuppoſed to have extended to the court of Madrid; and it was well known that the ariſtocratical party regarded an approaching war with hope and exultation.

Theſe united conſiderations ſuggeſted to the national aſſembly the danger of leaving in the hands of the ſovereign the uncontrouled right of peace and war. It was urged indeed that this right could not with any propriety be ſeparated from the executive power; and the count de Mirabeau, who had hitherto appeared the moſt zealous champion of the pretenſions of the people, ſupported with his elequence on this occaſion the prerogative of the crown. It was in vain that he urged, that the executive power conſiſted in the right of employing the public force; "and what," demanded he, "is war, but "the application of that force?" His arguments, generally ſucceſsful, were oppoſed by the fears and jealouſies of the people; it was aſſerted that the ſubjects in almoſt every war had been the victims of the caprice and ambition of the ſovereign and his miniſters; and that the proſperity of the empire had been continually ſacrificed to the luſt of tranſient conqueſts, or the vain acquiſition of barren laurels. France ſtill groaned under the victories of Lewis the Fourteenth; and every triumph ſerved only to augment the debt, and encreaſe the miſery of the nation.

Though the debate was long and vigorouſly continued, the triumph of the popular party was complete; it was decreed that the right of peace and war belonged to the nation, and that war could not be declared but by a decree of the national aſſembly, originating in a meſſage from the king, and ſanctioned by him. That the care to watch over the external ſecurity of the kingdom, and to maintain its rights and poſſeſſions, was delegated to the king by the conſtitution; that to him were entruſted all foreign correſpondence; the conduct of political nogociations; the choice of agents; the preparation of a war eſtabliſhment, proportioned to that of the neighbouring ſtates; the diſtribution of forces both by land and ſea, and the direction of them in caſe of actual hoſtilities.

But at the ſame time it was provided, on the appearance or commencement of war, either in ſupport of an ally, or in defence of the nation, that the king ſhould communicate without delay to the legiſlative body the cauſes and motives of hoſtilities; and if that body ſhould happen not to be ſitting, that his majeſty ſhould immediately aſſemble it.

By the fourth article the aſſembly, deſirous of acquiring the confidence of Europe, and of extinguiſhing all jealouſies that might have ariſen from the armament they had lately decreed, declared, that the French nation would never embark in any war with a view to conqueſt, nor ever employ her forces againſt the liberties of any people.

This was enforced by the article which followed, and which ſpecified, that if on the royal meſſage, the legiſlative body ſhould judge the hoſtilities commenced a culpable aggreſſion of the miniſter, or of any other agent of the executive power, the author of ſuch aggreſſion ſhould be proſecuted as guilty of treaſon to the nation; and if alſo on the meſſage of the king, the legiſlative body ſhould decide that the war ought not to be commenced or continued, that then the executive power was inſtantly to take the neceſſary meaſures for preventing or terminating all hoſtilities.

Such were the articles that transferred from the crown to the national aſſembly a prerogative which the former had peaceably enjoyed for fourteen centuries; and which it might have probably ſtill preſerved, had not the diſcuſſion of it been introduced at a moment, when diſtruſt overwhelmed every other conſideration, and when the ambiguous conduct of Spain furniſhed ſuch ſerious matter of alarm.

The victory of the popular party over the pretenſions of the crown was but preparatory to that deciſive and ſignal triumph over the nobility which we before glanced at. While titles and diſtinctions remained, founded on any other baſes than thoſe of virtue and talents, the conſtitution and its preamble appeared but an unſubſtantial theory, and an attempt to introduce the civic virtues among the people with ſo glaring a departure from their ſpirit, would have been the exceſs of folly or wickedneſs. It was on the nineteenth of June the celebrated motion was brought forward to ſuppreſs titles of nobility. It was oppoſed with that warmth and vigour which might be expected from men, who combatted in defence of that ſupereminence which had been their pride and inheritance for ages, and which though more frequently acquired by no honorable means, was generally eſteemed as the reward of thoſe actions called heroic; theſe diſtinctions too were confirmed by the inveterate habits of education; and it was no more than reaſonable to conclude, that men educated in effeminacy, without the conſciouſneſs of talents, would exert the laſt efforts of vanity and deſpair to ſave themſelves from an oblivious amalgamation with the ignoble multitude.

This momentous propoſition originated with M. Lambel an advocate of Villafranche, who ſeizing a moment when the aſſembly appeared animated by public ſpirit, exclaimed, that he now ſaw the laſt moment of expiring vanity, and propoſed the abolition of titles. Meſſrs. Preſne and la Fayette mounted the tribune at the ſame inſtant, and the former produced and read the outlines of a decree in perfect accord with the motion, which he had prepared a month before. M. Foucault oppoſed the motion, as tending to deſtroy the moſt powerful motives to emulation—"What, he aſked, would you do with the man whoſe brevet recited—that he was created a count for ſaving the ſtate?" M. la Fayette inſtantly replied, "I would omit the words created a count, and inſert only that he had ſaved the ſtate." He was followed by M. de St. Fargeau, who ſaid there was no hardſhip in the meaſure, he was poſſeſſed of ſeveral counties and marquiſates, one title of which he had never uſed, nor did he perceive their utility; the vicomte de Noailles concurred in their inutility, and ſaid that they conferred no diſtinction on thoſe who had no perſonal merit to call forth reſpect; "We do not ſpeak of duke Fox, count Waſhington, or the marquis Franklin, but of Benjamin Franklin, George Waſhington, and Charles Fox. Permit me to add to ſo many excellent motions, one which is to reſcue from diſgrace a large part of our fellow-citizens. Liveries degrade not ſo much thoſe who wear them as thoſe who cauſe them to be worn; poverty and ignorance may in ſome meaſure exonerate the man who wears this odious badge of feudal degradation, but he who cauſes it to be worn is not ſanctioned by the remoteſt degree of utility, he is the pander of his own vanity, and teſtifies by the very act a diſpoſition to enſlave and degrade his fellow-creatures: I move that liveries be aboliſhed." M. Montmorency ſupported the motion, and added another for the ſuppreſſion of armorial bearings; the whole of the motions were formed into a decree by M. Chappelier, in ſubſtance as follows.

The national aſſembly decrees, that hereditary nobility be for ever aboliſhed, and the titles of prince, duke, count, marquis, viſcount, vidame, baron, chevalier, meſſire, eſquire, noble, abbé, and all other ſimilar titles, ſhall neither be aſſumed by nor given to any perſon whatever;—that no French citizen can take any other than the true name of his family;—that he ſhall not wear, nor any more cauſe to be worn, any livery, nor have coat of arms;—that incenſe ſhall not be burnt in the churches but in honour of the divinity, and ſhall be offered to no perſon whatever;—that the titles monſigneur and meſſeigneurs ſhall not be given to any corporate body, nor to any individual, nor the titles of excellency, highneſs, greatneſs, eminency, &c. This decree to take place in Paris on the fourteenth of July, and before three months in the provinces.

Thus in one moment were three hundred thouſand perſons torn from thoſe proud titles inherited or acquired, which had monopolized into their hands all the places of truſt and honor of a great nation, and who were now reduced to a level with the ignoble multitude. Though the voice of prejudice loudly condemned this meaſure, and Europe rung with lamentations over the manes of departed chivalry, impartiality conſiders with aſtoniſhment inſtitutions ſo barbarous in times ſo refined; in the earlieſt traces of government, among the hord s in the woods of Germany, the reſpect paid to illuſtrious deſcent ceaſes to be ſurprizing, when the ſtate of ſociety, and military mode of life are conſidered; though it was by this factitious purity of birth, that the barbarian magiſtrate was raiſed to the adminiſtration of juſtice, look to a period more remote and this nobility is found to ſpring from the ignorance of a ſavage life approximating to a ſtage of civil refinement, and carrying with it, even into that advanced ſtage the neceſſity of uniting in the perſon of the chief, a ſeverity of education and heroic hardihood which would qualify him to lead his vaſſals againſt an invading foe or to ſpread terror and conqueſt around him whenever ambition or other motives might ſtimulate; in ſuch a ſtate of ſociety ſuch diſtinctions were not prepoſterous: in the republic of Rome, and during her moſt proſperous periods, the order of patricians, which likewiſe originated in ignorance and vanity, repaid the reverence and affection with which they were treated, by their corruption and reſtleſs ſpirit of encroachment on the people's privileges; it was their profligacy which ſubverted the virtue and the love of country that firſt eſtabliſhed the grandeur of Rome, and which finally by dividing the nation into factions, annihilated her freedom and her greatneſs. In different forms and degrees theſe vain diſtinctions had been introduced into every modern government in Europe, and thoſe princes and nobles who from ſurrounding nations beheld with cold indifference the plunder of the Gallican church, and the annihilation of the feudal ſyſtem, now, when titles without meaning or function attached to them, without privilege and in numerous caſes without property to ſupport them, titles moſtly without legal claim, and frequently debaſed and degraded by venal purchaſe, often the price of domeſtic proſtitution—when theſe came to be ſuppreſſed, and not till then, the ſtorm of noble and regal indignation loudly burſt forth, and the alarm-bell of reſiſtance was rung from one end of Europe to the other againſt French innovation: but it was too late, and altho a rage ſo mighty in extent, ferocity, and ſanguinary effects, has not ariſen ſince periods of the cruſades and the reformation, the ſtruggle only confirmed what it was intended to overthrow.

While the popular party within doors ſwept before them the accumulated prejudices of ages, oppoſition daily aſſumed new aſpects and multiplied its ſecret meaſures for their reſtitution abroad; foreign and domeſtic intrigues; the agency of the pulpit and the influential name of the king, and of his miniſters, were employed to undermine the new order of things. We ſhall have occaſion to notice at large, ſome tranſactions concerning the extravagance of the government, which preceded in the order of time the events which we have related, and which contributed to deſtroy the hope and irritate the reſentment of thoſe who fattened on the corruptions of the ſtate, and thence to ſtrengthen that anomalous combination of forces, which were about to diſturb that happineſs which now promiſed to reward the virtuous labours of the national aſſembly.

The activity of the diſaffected every day became more manifeſt, and the rumour of the king's intention to retire from France, though contradicted by his plauſible demeanour, was yet a ſubject of ſilent apprehenſion. The marquis de Favras who had been an officer in the Swiſs guards in the ſervice of the king's elder brother, was detected in a conſpiracy to convey the king to Peronne; and the king's brother was ſuſpected of being at the head of the enterprize; he however had addreſs ſufficient to influence a belief of his innocence, but the marquis was more ſtrongly implicated. He was originally a ſoldier of fortune, but had his mind inflated by a marriage with a petty German princeſs; in 1785 he had engaged deeply in the troubles of Holland, and had engaged a M. Tourcaty to furniſh men for a regiment which he had engaged to raiſe for the patriotic party; the interference of Pruſſia blaſted his projects in Holland, and he turned his attention to the convulſions in Brabant; his patriotic connexions in thoſe countries had not ſhaken the ariſtocratical habits and inclinations of his life, and he was concerned in the deſign of carrying of the king to Metz;

he was at the memorable feaſt of the ſecond of October, and one of the firſt to aſſume the white cockade; and on the fifth had ſolicited M. St. Prieſt to furniſh him and a number of volunteers with horſes to diſperſe the populace. Upon the eſtabliſhment of the king and the aſſembly at Paris, he was charged with the conſpiracy in queſtion; he was to raiſe a regiment profeſſedly for the ſervice of Brabant, but who were to enter Paris by different routes, and to murder ſeveral of the moſt popular men of that period; for this purpoſe he had renewed his connexion with Tourcaty to raiſe men, and through him he became acquainted with a M. Morel, in conjunction with theſe he had applied to M. Chomel a monied man in Paris, to negociate a loan in the name of monſieur the king's brother.

Favras upon being brought to trial was confronted by his agents Tourcaty and Morel, who ſtated the facts as above; they were corroborated by a lieutenant Marquié, formerly a ſergeant of the French guards, who had ſignalized himſelf at the taking of the Baſtile, and by ſaving the lives of the garde-du-corps on the ſixth of October, 1789. Favras had ſome interviews with him but had found him not ſuitable to his views. But a witneſs more formidable was the banker Chomel, who did not pretend to have heard any of the former particulars, but had learned from the marquis of a project for aſſembling all the diſaffected in the Netherlands, and forming an army ſufficient to invade France and reſtore the old order of things. He was condemned and ſuffered death. Prior to his execution however he aſked the juſtice who accompanied him to execution whether if he were to make ſome important diſcoveries it would make any alteration in his ſentence? Being told that he could not expect it, he replied, "In that caſe my ſecret ſhall "die with me."

Another plot for the ſame purpoſe of carrying off the king was formed by the mareſchal Maillébois, but as there is a connexion between this and previous events it is fit to notice them in this place.

A committee had been formed in the early part of the year to enquire into the expenditure of public money, penſions and donations; by whom it was diſcovered that a volume called the Red-Book had been kept, in which penſions and gifts were entered in the hand-writing of the comptroller of the finances, and checked by the king. This book was communicated to the committee on the fifteenth of March, accompanied by circumſtances of a moſt ſuſpicious reſerve; the king particularly deſired that the extravagant expences of his grand-father might be kept from the public eye, and a promiſe was given that due reſpect ſhould be paid to the king's feelings:—Nevertheleſs to the great ſurpriſe of Necker, in a few days afterwards the whole book was publiſhed, and upon his demanding in an authoritative ſtyle how they had preſumed to publiſh it without permiſſion of the aſſembly, he was informed "That as to the aſſembly they were confi-"dent of their approbation, but as to the king they were not his repreſentatives."

On this proceeding of the committee there can be no ſecond opinion if their duty was to be the ſtandard of their judgment; the extravagance and iniquity which the book diſplayed could not fail of exciting in the people a love for their repreſentatives and a hatred for the abuſes of the court.

Under the ſhort adminiſtration of Calonne only, it appeared, that independent of their immenſe ordinary revenues, the two brothers of the king had defrauded the public revenue of nearly two millions of pounds ſterling, and of this immenſe ſum the larger part had fallen to the ſhare of the count d'Artois, whoſe debts at the ſame time amounted to near two millions ſterling, for which the ſame profligate miniſter made the public treaſury reſponſible. Among the remarkable charges was one to an individual for important ſervices amounting to ſix hundred pounds ſterling, theſe ſervices were neither more nor leſs than that of maître d'hotel to madame de Polignac. To opera-ſingers who had retired there were penſions to the amount of near two hundred thouſand livres. Eighteen millions of livres were diſtributed among military favourites. The amount of penſions altogether, being the enormous ſum of thirty-four millions of liveres; a ſum which abbé Mauri, the celebrated defender of the clergy, ſaid was by no means exceſſive.

The publication of theſe abuſes ſorely affected the ſenſibility and popularity of the king and confirmed thoſe charges of unbridled extravagance which had been current againſt the queen; it alſo tended to deſtroy totally the declining reputation of Necker, whoſe altercation with Camus the chairman of the committee, was ſoon generally known, and involved Necker in the obloquy of a diſpoſition to hide from the public abuſes ſo fatal to the public and ſo ſtrongly at variance with his oſtenſible economy and moral character. The whole adminiſtration ſhared in the public odium, the archbiſhop of Bordeaux, la Tour du Pin, and eſpecially St. Prieſt, who incurred the heavy ſuſpicion of treaſonable deſigns from the diſcovery of that plot to which we laſt alluded.

Mareſchal Maillebois had engaged M. Bonne Savardin to carry on a negociation with the emigrants, to carry off the king and effect a counter-revolution; Grand-Maiſon, the mareſchal's ſecretary diſcloſed the whole plot to the committee of reſearch, who took their meaſures ſo adroitly as to ſeize the agent with all his papers, among which were found evidence ſufficent to deſtroy all confidence in St. Prieſt. This plot was more extenſive in its branches and more connected in its objects than that of Favras; his negociations embraced the courts of Turin, Madrid, and Vienna; and the ſtandard of revolt againſt the new conſtitution was to be erected at the head of an army compoſed of Italians, Spaniards, and Germans. Maillebois effected his eſcape.

Conſpiracy and diſcontent were not confined to the metropolis: at Lyons and Toulon the agitation was great, and intrigues had been manifeſted at Marſeilles; a colonel of a royal regiment had openly inſulted the national-guard of that city; they bore the inſult with patent magnanimity, and by ſober remonſtrance procured an order for the removal of the obnoxious colonel and his corps; the tardineſs with which he obeyed the order rouſed paſſions more ardent, and a body of young men ſeized by ſtratagem on the fort in which the military were poſted, expelled them, and their colonel, and demoliſhed it together with the two fortreſſes of St. Nicholas and St. John, on the latter of which a latin inſcription long inſulted that venerable city, to this effect "This tower was erected "by Lewis XIV. leſt his faithful people of Marſeilles ſhould become infatuated with the "love of liberty."

Religion whoſe ſacred influence has been ſo conſtantly proſtituted to the paſſions of ambition, intolerance, and revenge, was now dragged forth from her peaceful ſolitudes, to renew on her ancient theatre in the ſouth, in oppoſition to freedom, thoſe ſanguinary ſcenes which ſhe had before performed at the command of deſpotiſm and bigotry; the prieſts from their altars, ſanctified every meaſure of atrocity againſt the new ſyſtem of government and its adherents, and in the black rage of fanaticiſm, the pious were invoked in the name of God to go forth and ſlay, and the ſolemn benediction of the church was given, by which they were abſolved from their future ſins and every act committed in ſo juſt a cauſe.

At Niſmes, the fever of diſcontent was rapid in its progreſs, and fatal in its conſequences; that city was the reſidence of a numerous nobility, proud of their deſcent, and zealouſly attached to the catholic perſuaſion. It had alſo become the ſeat of a conſiderable body of proteſtants. Religious differences were heightened by political animoſity; and while the catholics regarded with mingled horror and averſion every meaſure of the national aſſembly, the proteſtants looked up with gratitude and admiration to thoſe reſolutions, which reſtored them to religious and civil liberty. Their mutual enmity could not long be confined to ineffectual reproaches; arms miniſtered to their fury: for two ſucceſſive days the ſtreets were deluged with blood; and it was not until ſeveral hundred citizens had periſhed, that the victory of the proteſtants eſtabliſhed tranquillity.

The national aſſembly could not but be deeply afflicted with theſe repeated inſtances of tumult and diſaffection; more firmly to bind the people to the new government, and to unite them in one general cauſe, it was reſolved to have recourſe to the ſolemnity of oaths and compacts. In various provincial towns, civic feaſts had been already inſtituted; and aſſociations had taken place; and it was now determined to concentrate theſe patriotic effuſions in one point of view, and by a general confederation at Paris, to aſſert the preeminence of the capital and to combine the zeal of the kingdom.

To this memorable feſtival, every diſtrict throughout France, every municipal body, every corps of regular or national troops, were required to ſend their deputies; nor was the monarch himſelf to be exempted from that oath, which was to conſecrate the mutual ties between the ſovereign and his ſubjects.

The day fixed for this ſacred ceremony was the fourteenth of July, and the place, the champ de Mars, or field of Mars, a ſpacious plain which joins the ſuburbs of the capital; this piece of ground, the preceding year, was the rendezvous of the troops intended to overawe the capital; its diameter is about eight hundred yards, and bounded on each ſide with lofty trees; in the centre the altar was erected for the religious ceremonies of this auguſt day, the ſpace adjacent was occupied by the national guards, &c. to the amount of many thouſands; and round this ſpace was an amphitheatre of turf of a league in circumference, on which were tiers of benches, forty deep, capable of containing four hundred thouſand ſpectators; at the further extremity is the military academy, through which their majeſties entered. The entrance into the champ de confederation (as it is now called) was through triumphal-arches: the king's throne was placed under an elegant pavillion in the middle, and on each ſide were ſeats for the national aſſembly. Although two thouſand workmen were employed upon this immenſe labour the enthuſiaſm of the Pariſians ſeemed to vie with each other who ſhould contribute moſt aid: the military, clergy, and even the women diſplayed their alacrity to compleat this vaſt work, which was effectually executed to the ſurpriſe of the ſpectators.

A proclamation was publiſhed by the king on the thirteenth arranging the whole order of the proceſſion, and appointing the marquis de la Fayette, major-general of the federation, whoſe orders were conſidered as coming immediately from the king. The Sieur de Gouvion was appointed major-general en ſecond.

The king received the deputies from the eighty-three departments on the thirteenth, who preſented to his majeſty an addreſs full of affection and attachment, to which the king gave the following anſwer. " I receive with much ſenſibility the teſtimony of " love and attachment which you give me in the name of the national-guards united from " all parts of France.

" May the ſolemn day in which you are to renew in common your oath to the nation, " paſs over without diſſention, and may it ſerve to ſtrengthen the calm, and eſtabliſh " the reign of the laws and of liberty throughout the realm.

" Defenders of the public peace, of the law, and of liberty! conſider that your " firſt duty is the maintenance of order, and obedience to the laws; that the benefit " of a free conſtitution ought to be equal to all; that the more free we are the more " ſerious become offences againſt the liberty and property of others, the more criminal " become acts of violence and outrage, when they are committed by command.

" Report to your fellow-citizens that I wiſh I could ſpeak to them all as I ſpeak to " you here; tell them that their king is their Father, their Brother, their Friend, " that he cannot be happy but in their welfare; great but in their glory; powerful " but in their liberty; rich but in their proſperity; and that he can only ſuffer in their " afflictions. Above all, make known the words, or rather ſentiments, of my heart, " in the humble cottages, and in the retreats of the unfortunate. Tell them that though " I cannot go along with you into their aſylums, I would wiſh to do ſo; and that both " in my affection, and by the laws which protect the feeble; I will watch over them.— " Say in fine to the different provinces of my kingdom, that if circumſtances will per- " mit me to fulfil the wiſh I have formed of viſiting them with my family, the happier it " will make my heart."

The ſhouts of Vive le Roi from the populace, filled the air on this occaſion; and at the metropolitan church Te Deum was performed, by a ſelect band. The electors, the repreſentatives of the commons of Paris; the deputies of the national departments, twelve members of the national aſſembly, and a vaſt concourſe of people attended. The memorable evening which preceded July the 14th, 1789, was deſcribed with all the truth of expreſſion; a ſong of victory announced the fall of the Baſtile, that baleful caſtle ſo long the dungeon of deſpotiſm; the people were exhorted to give thanks to the great cauſe,—him who gave ſtrength to crumble this dread building to ruins; Populi laudate deum, and a grand chorus of thanks concluded the ſervice.

On Wedneſday morning at ſix o'clock, all the perſons appointed to aſſiſt in the proceſſion aſſembled on the Boulevards, and were formed in the moſt orderly manner, accompanied with banners and military muſic. The proceſſion paſſed along the ſtreets of St. Denis, Feronniere, St. Honoré Royale, to the place of Lewis the Fifteenth, where they halted and the detachment of the Paris national-guards opening to the right and left, received into the centre the members of the national aſſembly; they then moved on through the Cour la Reine along the quay to a bridge of boats, over which they paſſed into the Champ de Mars; the numerous bands of muſic now collected into one immenſe band, the various orders took their ſeveral appointed ſituations. Amongſt the reſt, a battalion of Children formed in the proceſſion with a banner on which was written, " The hopes of the nation" they were placed about an hundred paces from the altar, and facing it.

The king and queen entered through the military-ſchool, and took their places in a ſuperb box near the altar; and ajoining thereto was the box for foreign miniſters. As ſoon as all were ſeated, after a ſolemn invocation to God, the oriflamme, or grand ſtan-dard, and the banners of the eighty-three departments were brought to the platform, and received the benediction, the ſervice being performed by a number of clergy in white robes decorated with the tri-color ribbon, at the head of whom was the biſhop of Autun; high-maſs was then celebrated, and the ſolemnities proceeded.

The major-general firſt advanced to the altar, and laying the point of his ſword on the ſacred ſcriptures, pronounced in the name of the federates, or deputies from the departments, the oath to be faithful to the new conſtitution, after he had concluded, the deputies from the eighty-three departments roſe and ſtretching forth their hands pronounced their aſſent; the preſident of the aſſembly then advanced to the altar and pronounced the oath, to which the members aſſented in the ſame form; the heavy rain prevented the king from leaving his box, where he took the following oath,

"I, Lewis, king of the French, do ſwear to the nation, that I will employ the whole power delegated to me by the conſtitutional law of the ſtate, to maintain the conſtitution and enforce the execution of the law."

The whole multitude, which was ſuppoſed to amount to fifteen hundred thouſand perſons, with uplifted hands pronounced their acceptation; Te Deum was then performed; and never was there an occaſion more impreſſive and ſolemn, never did France ſee ſuch an orcheſtra, or ſo vaſt an audience; the performance was ſublime, and on its concluſion the air reſounded with acclamations of joy. In the ſolemn parts of this grand ceremony the moſt profound ſilence prevailed, order, peace, concord, and pleaſure teſtified the deep intereſt of the ſcene; never did nation exhibit ſo grand a ſpectacle—a king, who but a few ſhort months before was the deſpotic lord over twenty-five millions of men, reſtrained to the duty of chief magiſtrate, while the people from ſlaves were exalted to the condition of freemen.

The ceremony being ended, the proceſſion moved back in the ſame order it came;—the country preſented an uniform ſcene of pleaſure, the fields were covered with tents provided with cold collations, of which the numerous populace partook.

A grand illumination cloſed the triumphs of the day; the only breach of the peace was occaſioned by the folly of ſome perſons who did not chooſe to light up their windows, and the ſo much dreaded maſſacre of this day ended in the maſſacre of ſome thouſand panes of glaſs. And the people in returning to their homes were conſtantly and joyfully exulting that their revolution had been cemented with water inſtead of blood, alluding to the rain that had fallen ſo plenteouſly during the ceremony.

The duke of Orleans returned from England, and ſat in his place as one of the national aſſembly, on this occaſion. He had gained much popularity by an appeal to his country, calling upon them to try him by a fair jury if they had any charge to exhibit againſt him.

This confederation had a very powerful and ſalutary effect on the public mind, to inſpire confidence in the national aſſembly, and enable them to execute the laws; they profited by the calm that confidence inſpired by completing the organization of the judicial department. Judges or juſtices of peace were to be elected in each canton for the determination of petty differences; tribunals for the adjudication of more important cauſes were eſtabliſhed in diſtricts; and a tribunal of caſſation, or court of appeals, was appointed for the whole nation, where, under certain reſtrictions, the proceedings of the other courts were to be reviſed. Courts of criminal juſtice were appointed in each department, and a high national-court for the trial of crimes againſt the ſtate, completed the edifice. Among the reſt, an inſtitution, perhaps peculiar to that new juriſprudence, boards of conciliati n were appointed in every diſtrict, where the parties in a ſuit were to be cited perſonally, and where every means were to be employed to effect an amicable termination, before the cauſe could be brought to a hearing before the ordinary courts of juſtice. Family arbitrators were alſo authoriſed to terminate petty diſputes between near relations, and the forms preſcribed in all theſe caſes were the ſimpleſt that could be invented. We have already remarked that the trial by jury was only adopted in criminal caſes: an ariſtocratic writer ſhrewdly obſerves on this ſubject, "that the trial by jury would alſo have been eſtabliſhed in civil caſes, if there had not been too many lawyers in the conſtituting aſſembly." This is indeed not the only objection to this new juriſprudence of France; however, the code was deſerving of ſome admiration for its ſimplicity and conſiſtency; for the gratuitous adminiſtration of juſtice; for the eaſy acceſs which the pooreſt citizen, when injured, might have to the means of redreſs; for the diſcouragement which it held forth to litigious and vexatious conteſts: and in this part of the conſtitution other nations may find much worthy of imitation, and many inſtitutions for the obvious eaſe and advantage of the people, the promotion of morality and the love of juſtice.

It was alſo decreed, that the legiſlative body ſhould annually determine the amount of the public expenditure and contributions; that under the king an adminiſtration ſhould be eſtabliſhed in each department, with an inferior one in each diſtrict, for the regulation and collection of the revenue. The police of each city or community was committed to magiſtrates choſen by the citizens.

To replace the ſalt tax, and other odious and oppreſſive impoſts, which had been aboliſhed, the aſſembly impoſed an eaſy tax on land and other immovable property, and a poundage upon perſonal property and annuities; a tax upon patents, and a ſtamp-tax upon contracts and other deeds. Theſe taxes were unproductive, and to ſupply the deficiency of revenue, continual emiſſions of aſſignats became neceſſary; and to ſupply the want of current coin, which had become ſcarce in conſequence of the ſums continually carrying off by emigrants, aſſignats were likewiſe iſſued for ſmaller ſums. But a paper medium, principally depends upon the opinon of its being always convertible into money or goods at its fixed value; in times of public diſorder, however reſponſible the banks which iſſue paper may be, the apprehenſion of danger will operate to draw ſpecie from circulation, and ſubject the paper, which is only its repreſentative, to a depreciation; and this evil will be exceſſive in proportion to the actual danger as well as the imaginary; the evil in France was inſenſibly approaching to both extremes.

Several decrees of leſſer moment, but which reflect credit on the liberality and wiſdom of the aſſembly, were paſſed about this period. That in particular which reſtored to the proteſtants thoſe poſſeſſions of which their anceſtors had been deprived by the revocation of the edict of Nantz, and that which aboliſhed for ever all extraordinary taxes on the Jews, deſerve the higheſt praiſe. Theſe were followed by the abolition of the execrable Droit d'Aubaine, which aſſigned to the king the property of foreigners who died in France.

In the fate of Favras the tribunal of the Chatelet had proved themſeves rigid judges, an affair of a more dubious and embarraſſed nature was brought before them; they were charged by the aſſembly to take cognizance of the tranſactions of the fifth and ſixth of October, 1789; on the ſeventh of Auguſt they brought their report ſealed to the bar of the aſſembly, and in a pompous addreſs lamented the ſevere taſk which their duty impoſed on them; they concluded with informing the aſſembly, that two of its members were among the principal criminals. This denunciation was heard with horror and conſternation; the report of the Chatelet was referred to a committee; and the members accuſed appeared to be d'Orleans and Mirabeau, who it was alleged conſpired to murder the queen and raiſe the former to the throne. The proceedings of the Chatelet were printed, but before the committee could report, the evidence was deemed ſo vague and inconcluſive, that though neither of the accuſed were at this time favourites with the populace, the public voice acquitted them, and on the ſecond of October the aſſembly decreed, that on a full examination there was no cauſe of accuſation againſt them. Some others of note were involved in the proceſs, but this iſſue deprived that tribunal of all future confidence, the affair was dropped, although the ſuſpicions of guilt, as ever is the caſe, were never completely removed from the accuſed.

Whatever motives might have governed the Chatelet, it was aſſerted that the boldneſs of their charge appeared inconſiſtent with the ſlender induſtry which they had employed in the inveſtigation of evidence, during a period of ſo many months; but perhaps both might have been the reſult of that ſpirit of party, which had gradually progreſſed to an exceſs of violence at this period. Three parties principally influenced all public meaſures; the fluctuation in their reſpective numbers, which was from a variety of cauſes conſtant, and the occaſional co-operation of one party with either of the others, may be conſidered as among the cauſes of diverſity and inconſiſtency in many important tranſactions of this time. That party deſignated by the name of ariſtocratic, and which comprehended all thoſe who were attached to the perſon or abſolute power of the king, and thoſe who from perſonal intereſt and religious prejudice were decided enemies to the new eſtabliſhment, had for a long time acted on the defenſive; their irritation had now arrived at the extreme, and from apparent paſſiveneſs they became open aſſailants, and left no means untried to plunge the nation into confuſion. It will not have eſcaped the judicious reader, that the forbearance of this party was unreal, and affected only to cover deſigns which were expected to produce their object by the ſecrecy with which they were conducted and the extent and magnitude of the force they ſhould combine; the repeated attempts to carry off the king, and the departure of numbers of the nobles and of the royal houſhold were ſtrong indications of ſome ſecret cauſe of fear, or of an approaching criſis; their openneſs at this time will be more ſatisfactorily accounted for when the tranſactions abroad come to be developed, particularly the machinations of Calonne at the court of Great-Britain, the favour of which he had ſecured by betraying the ſecret affairs of France, which he became acquainted with while he was miniſter; the tranſactions of the chevalier Dufort, at Vienna, and the ſubſequent conſpirations at Pavia and Pilnitz, will illucidate the courſe of the operations of this party, and teſtify that their zeal and activity was as great as their diſſimulation. It muſt be allowed, that the impatient and irritable temper of the French populace was an engine eaſily wrought upon; the military were a favorite object of ariſtocratical anxiety and ſolicitude; and although they had given repeated proofs of an attachment to the new inſtitutions, a jealouſy which exiſted between the regular army and and the national-guards, afforded opportunities too favourable to the wiſhes of every ſpecies of malcontents, which none appeared ſo active in fomenting as this party, nor with ſuch unhappy effects. Diſturbances had been excited in Flanders, Alſace, and Lorrain, and at Tholouſe the defection of the army from the conſtitution was wrought to an alarming extent; but the tranſactions at Nancy, as they mark the temper of the ſyſtem purſued with particular clearneſs, deſerve detail.

From the firſt eſtabliſhment of the revolution, the French army had been in a ſtate little favourable to ſubordination. The majority of their officers were of the ancient nobleſſe, and a mutual jealouſy exiſted between them and the private ſoldiers. Every inducement had been employed to ſeduce the ſoldiers from their duty; and when promiſes and blandiſhments, did not prevail, the moſt ſevere meaſures were put in execution. The ſoldiers were frequently ill paid, and yet the moſt culpable profuſion had been exerciſed with the money voted for the ſupport of the army. Such, by the evidence of a party of the national-guard of Nancy at the bar of the aſſembly, was the ſtate of the garriſon in that city. The officers in general were inimical to the new conſtitution, and had made uſe of every temptation to deſtroy the attachment of the ſoldiers to the new arrangements. Theſe means proving unſucceſsful, they withheld the pay of the ſoldiers, and even condemned them to run the gauntlet for demanding neceſſaries. They had endeavoured to perſuade the men, that all theſe acts were in conformity with the orders of the national aſſembly, which refuſed any longer to furniſh them with the uſual allowance of bread, and which was upon the point even of depriving them of the augmentation of pay which had been eſtabliſhed at the revolution.

In the ſame ſpirit the utmoſt pains were employed to produce diſtruſt and mutual abhorrence between the citizens and the ſoldiers. Men were dreſſed in the uniform of the king's reigment then in garriſon there, and employed to wound and inſult the citizens. One of thoſe perſons were taken, and baniſhed from the city at the requeſt of the reigment; at the ſame time, ſome young officers were encouraged by their ſuperiors to behave in the moſt indecent manner to ſeveral of the peaceable inhabitants; and even hired ruffians were engaged for the ſame purpoſe. Several of theſe were arreſted, and a court-martial appointed, at the requeſt of the regiment, for their trial: but M. Bouille, who commanded in the province, had ſet himſelf in appoſition to this meaſure. One of the grenadiers who had been active in theſe proſecutions, was menaced in the moſt inſulting manner by an officer, who ſoon after deſerted to the Auſtrians.

Wearied with theſe repeated indignities, and acts of oppreſſion, the reigment at length revolted, aſſerted loudly that they were wronged of their pay and their allowances, and demanded the regimental accounts. M. Denou threatened with the gauntlet all who preſumed to call for the accounts. The regiment therefore immediately ſeized the military cheſt, and diſpatched a deputation to Paris, to repreſent the facts to the national-aſſembly.

The officers had anticipated the repreſentation of the ſoldiers; too intimately connected with the miniſters and ſome members of the aſſembly, to permit the complaints of the privates to be heard, the deputation from the reigment was arreſted at Paris. M. de-la Tour du Pin, the miniſter of war, made a formidable repreſentation of the rebellious conduct of the regiment. The miſeries reſulting from a want of ſubordination, and the neceſſity of an example, were echoed through the aſſembly by the counter-revolutioniſts. On the 16th of Auguſt, a decree was paſſed, which authoriſed the commander in chief of the province to reduce the inſurgents by force.

In the mean time the other regiments in garriſon, the Swiſs regiment of Chateauvieux, and the regiment of cavalry called Meſtre de camp, irritated by ſimilar oppreſſions, and much diſorganized by ſimilar circumſtances, had concurred in the rebellion, had ſeized ſome of their officers, and were joined by great numbers of the pupulace.

The decree of the ſixteenth was no ſooner made public than, from knowing the character of the commander in chief, the moſt ſerious conſequences were apprehended by all good citizens. The national-guard of Nancy aſſembled, and offered to the regiments to undertake the part of mediators, and to ſend the terms of their ſubmiſſion by a deputation from their own body to the national aſſembly.—On their repreſentation, the decree of the ſixteenth was repealed, and commiſſioners were appointed for the purpoſe of enquiring minutely into the circumſtances of the caſe, and to puniſh the guilty, and reward the deſerving.

Such an arrangement however did not ſuit the views of the perfidious and ſanguinary Bouille. Without waiting the reſult of the deputation from Nancy, he haſtened with a fatal raſhneſs (as was confeſſed even by his advocates) to enforce the decree of the ſixteenth. He collected all the troops from every part of the ſurrounding country, and ſuch of the national-guards as preferred a patriotic ſubordination to the immediate dictates of their feelings and their reſentments. In ſpite of their offers of ſubmiſſion, he fell upon the regiments of Chateuvieux and Meſtre de Camp; and after putting an immenſe number to the ſword, he completely routed them, and took four-hundred priſoners.

The king's regiment had been detained in their barracks by the exertions of ſome patriotic perſons who urged them to ſubmiſſion. Even when Bouille arrived, they were prevented from acting by the intrepidity and virtue of a young officer of the name of Desſilles. This intrepid young man, after urging his fellow ſoldiers by every motive to ſubmit, aſſuring them that ſooner or later they ſhould experience the juſtice of the legiſlature, placed himſelf before the mouth of a cannon, which they were going to fire. He was forcibly dragged from this dangerous ſituation, but in the ſtruggle received three or four wounds, of which he afterwards died.

The news of this event was received at Paris with horror. As M. Bouille had not exceeded the authority which the national aſſembly had unfortunately conceded to him by the raſh decree of the ſixteenth, they could not legally inflict either puniſhment or cenſure upon him. The populace, however, who were not reduced to any ſuch dilemma, gave a full vent to their feelings; they openly accuſed M. Bouille of treachery, and a deſire to effect a counter-revolution, and even threatened the lives of the miniſters. In a word, the reſentment of the people ſeemed to menace the moſt dangerous exceſſes, which were only prevented by unuſual circumſpection and care. It is only neceſſary to add with reſpect to this tranſaction, that in the month of December following the aſſembly reverſed all its decrees againſt the inſurgents of Nancy, liberated all the priſoners, and recompenſed them as men who had unjuſtly ſuffered: at the ſame time they decreed public honours to the memory of the brave Desſilles, and placed his family under the protection of the ſtate.

After the maſſacre, Bouille had cauſed forty-two of the regiment of Chateuvieux to be ſent to the gallies, twenty-two ſoldiers to be hanged, and one to be broke on the rack, the latter died with heroic fortitude, his laſt words were "Ere long Bouille will prove himſelf a traitor—Vive la nation."—The prophecy was ſoon fulfilled; thoſe who were ſent to the gallies, except two who died fixed to the benches, were delivered by the national aſſembly, and being invited to Paris were honoured with a triumph and a fete by the Pariſians.

M. Necker's popularity was already ſunk. He had not raiſed himſelf in the eſtimation of the people by a pamphlet which he publiſhed on the abolition of nobility, or at leaſt of titles, wherein he ſupported with much ingenuity the ariſtocratical order; but previous to this he muſt have felt the loſs of the public eſteem, and poſſibly had for ſome time meditated a retreat from office. The meaſure was however probably accelerated by the popular clamours on the affair af Nancy, which involved him with the reſt of the miniſters in that tranſaction, though in his particular caſe without any appearance of juſtice. On the fourth of September he ſent a letter of reſignation to the aſſembly, and pleaded his ill ſtate of health, which required his retiring to the baths in Switzerland; though he dropped ſome diſtant intimation of the uneaſineſs he had experienced in his ſituation. The national aſſembly took no publiic notice of this letter.

Necker has appeared ſo conſpicuous a character in France, that his hiſtory becomes intimately connected with that of the revolution; in the courſe of this work the meaſures in which he was concerned alone have appeared; we have before obſerved that human events are greatly influenced by the actions of individuals; Calonne* has aſſumed to himſelf in one of his works, under a feigned cenſure, the merit of the French revolution; while the French nobility have imputed it to Necker; the truth perhaps is that the profligacy of the former tended to accelerate the criſis; an examination of the character of Necker may perhaps ſhew how far his particular conduct may have contributed to the ſame effect, though of a diſpoſition oppoſite to the former.

Without attempting the circumſtantiality of biography, the character of the miniſter may be traced; the reader will determine upon his meaſures: Originally a citizen of Geneva, and bred to the banking buſineſs, in which he had acquired a conſiderable fortune, his leiſure was devoted to literature for which education had prepared him; his profeſſional habits familiarized him with financial affairs and the arcana of commerce; fortune which enabled him to ſupport ſplendor and hoſpitality ſerved to ſecond in him the ſpirit of ambition, and his houſe became the reſort of men of rank and letters; circumſtances ſo favourable could not but foſter his deſires, and favor that notoriety after which his heart panted.

The immediate means of his entrance into political life are differently ſtated: the noble author of a work which we have before noticed,† attributes his introduction to the French miniſtry to the agency of the marquis de Puſay, an adventurer, who through the intrigues of his ſiſter miſtreſs to mareſchal Maillebois, contrived to become the correſpondent of Lewis XVI. and the counſellor of Maurepas and Sartine. But by others his elevation has been aſcribed to the capacity and equity which he diſplayed in the adjuſtment of certain matters of finance and accounts of the Eaſt-India company which had been ſubmitted to him.

* In his "State of France preſent and future," publiſhed in London, is the following expreſsion:—"Dont peut-etre je ſerai repute la cauſe premiere."

† "Du gouvernment des moeurs."

The firſt appointment of Necker to the direction of the revenue of France was a phenomenon in the political world. To be either a foreigner, a republican, or an heretic, would appear alone ſufficient to preclude all hopes of arriving at ſuch a ſituation and in ſuch a court; but as a perſon uniting all theſe objectionable traits in his character, it was a prodigy: the ingenuity of the Pariſians, however, found out that the merit of the man muſt be tranſcendant who could arrive at that ſtation under ſuch a combination of difficulties, thence what might have appeared likely to injure him became the means of his popularity.

Necker's appointment to the place of director, did not accompliſh the meaſure of his hopes; he had no direct communication with the king, that duty being attached to the place of comptroller held by M. Taboureau; he was however releaſed from this obſtruction, by the reſignation of that gentleman, and his own appointment to the place of director-general, a new title with plenary powers, which gave him the entire management of his favourite province; he commenced his carreer with the abolition of the privileges of intendants held by the members of the royal council, whoſe interference he deemed ſuperfluous and inconſiſtent with his immediate duty: perhaps alſo he conſidered them as in the way of his admiſſion to a ſeat at the council, where notwithſtanding the importance of his official ſtation he had no ſeat.

His religion appeared to form an inſuperable bar to this object of his ambition, for an oath hoſtile to his creed was a neceſſary preliminary to his obtaining a ſeat. It has been inſinuated that he had adopted Sully for his model, it is certain that however worthy the object of imitation, that he had at leaſt omitted to make any, or made a falſe eſtimate, of an eſſential character in the political drama; he addreſſed a letter to the king, wherein he pointed out the inconveniencies attending his abſence when queſtions were under diſcuſſion immediately belonging to his department, founded upon principles and calculations the details of which were confined to or could be explained by himſelf alone.

But the king was not an Henry IV. nor had their connexion originated under circumſtances likely to produce either a ſtrong ſympathy or a partial cordiality; Maurepas was the miniſter of that day, and as he had been the inſtrument of Necker's exaltation, to gratify his enmity againſt Turgot, ſo he was now the means of his depreſſion, through motives not more worthy; whatever may have been Necker's true motive, vanity or the the inconveniencies deſcribed in his letter, the miniſter pronounced him arrogant, and he was abruptly diſmiſſed.

This ſudden change in his political proſpects neither diminiſhed his ardour nor his hopes: the knowlege he had acquired of the financial affairs of France, and the materials which he had collected, furniſhed him with new means whereupon to found the triple hope of future popularity, literary fame, and his re-eſtabliſhment in power: he was not diſappointed in either of his views, for three years had ſcarce elapſed from the publication of his works on the finances, when he was recalled to his former ſtation and inveſted with additional powers.

We have already deſcribed the critical ſtate of affairs which gave riſe to his recall at this time, and the ſhare he had in the convocation of the notables and ſtates-general; this period appears to have been the criſis of his reputation; for although his popularity and his power were at the higheſt when ſubſequently diſmiſſed through the intrigues of Bouille, he was now at the ordeal by which his talents were to be immutably eſtimated. No man was ever placed in a ſtation more arduous and difficult, and if he did not ſucceed in extricating France from her misfortunes, the failure cannot be in juſtice wholly attributed to him, when the magnitude and variety of the evils which ſuddenly burſt upon her are conſidered.

His work on the finances had pointed him out as the perſon beſt qualified in the opinion of the nation to reſtore its credit and preſerve it from that bankruptcy which the deteſtable extravagance of the court and Calonne had rendered apparently inevitable. A ſcarcity from the failure of the harveſt of 1788, aggravated the public diſtreſſes; in the midſt of theſe calamities the people had acquired the knowledge of their rights, and Necker had to undertake the great work of reſtoring plenty and order, preſerving the public credit, and ſatisfying the court and clergy, the nobles and the people.

There is a kind of ability which on analyſis proves to be no more than reputation; capable of producing all the effects which men attribute to great talents only—ſuch were the talents of Chatham in another country and Necker in France; a reputation founded on ſlender or accidental circumſtances, which grow into importance by ſingularity or the period at which they ariſe; they overawe cenſure, inſpire confidence, and by leading men to expect favourable events ſometimes contribute to their accompliſhment.

Although acquainted with men of diſtinction, he was deſtitute of the graces which characteriſe the Frenchman; he knew no road to applauſe but through oſtentation and pecuniary diſintereſtedneſs; and it was readily ſeen that though he was not to be corrupted by the views of the court and his aſſociates, that he became flexible to the voice of adulation; with exterior ſternneſs he was exquiſitely ſenſitive and tender; but not that tenderneſs which is founded on reaſon, and that would not extort a tear without a perſuaſion of its ſalutary conſequences; but that tenderneſs which ſupercedes reaſon, narrows the intellect, and limits the judgement to a conſideration of temporary calamity alone. Vanity was his greateſt error, it led him to a perſuaſion that nothing was too difficult for his genius to accompliſh, and an egotiſm that never permitted him to ſuſpect the wiſdom or rectitude of his projects.

It is not then ſurpriſing that he was a prey to prejudice, miſtake, and diſappointment; that in a period abounding with men of ſuperior genius his weakneſſes ſhould be diſcovered, and the ſuperficial foundation of his fame gradually crumbled from beneath him; that he ſhould be found pertinacious of his errors and never willing to believe himſelf capable of a wrong ſtep or an abuſe in policy; that he ſhould be found the oſtentatious patron of philoſophy, and yet the advocate of all the errors that ignorance in the leaſt auſpicious periods had engendered, and that while he profeſſed an adoration of liberty, he bowed with implicit homage to the empty ſymbols of feudal grandeur, and the vain pretenſions of birth and rank.

His advice for allowing to the commons a repreſentation equal in number to the other two orders, and in oppoſition to the deliberate opinion of the notables whom he had purpoſely convoked to conſult upon that expreſs ſubject, has been conſidered variouſly as an evidence of his love of liberty, of his ſelf-opinion, of his averſion to the higher orders, of his inconſiſtency, and as the immediate cauſe of the revolution; without deciding upon his preciſe motives, it certainly procured him the incurable hatred of the nobles. His addreſs to the king on that occaſion has been productive of the like difference of opinion, by his admirers it has been produced as an evidence of philoſophical love of liberty—" the pleaſures of unlimited power, ſire," ſaid he, " are imaginary; but ſur-

" rounded by the repreſentatives of the people, your majeſty will be releaſed from the " cares and anxieties, and many of thoſe painful regrets, which render unhappy a prince
" of ſenſibility, ſolicitous for the good of the ſtate and fond of his people." Certain it is that this addreſs completely fixed the enmity of the queen and the whole phalanx of courtiers; nor could his ſubſequent defence of titles and diſtinctions, publiſhed at a period the moſt unfavourable to its object, replace him in the loſt confidence of the nobility, while it ſecured to him the immovable averſion of the republicans, and eſtabliſhed an opinion of his inconſiſtency which if it did not cauſe him to be deſpiſed, rendered him ſuſpected by all parties; one meaſure only was wanting to precipitate him from that elevation which he had ſo fortuitouſly attained, his integrity had remained untainted; his work on the finances, from which he had derived ſo much temporary reputation, was found not to contain a ſingle notice of the expences of the celebrated Red-Book, and on its diſcovery by the committee of finance, his anxiety to conceal it and his inſolent demeanour to Camus on its publication, accompliſhed the ruin of his reputation; it was conſidered by the people as ſo outrageous a contrradiction of his aſſerted probity and virtue that confidence at once forſook him in every rank and ſituation.

Intrigue and faction which had proceeded ſo far in the army, were now extended to the marine; in this important department the new order of things was particularly felt by the nobility; that principle in the naval ſervice of a rival nation, which conferred command on thoſe whoſe long practical knowlege and tried experience alone elevated them to command, made no part of the ſyſtem of the old French government; nobility alone was deemed ſuitable to fill thoſe ſituations in an effeminate age, which required the united qualifications of ſcience, practical ſkill in nautical detail, an acquaintance with the peculiar tactics of fleets, and minds unemaſculated by the habits of modern luxury; hence it was not a ſubject of ſurprize to Frenchmen themſelves that, although equal in courage and mental capacity to any other nation, they ſhould be ſo frequently vanquiſhed by the diſcipline and ſkill of their rivals. The national aſſembly had decreed the adherence of the nation to all exiſting treaties, in which the family compact was neceſſarily included. England had been ſome time arming a fleet in conſequence of her diſpute with Spain; a fleet of thirty ſail was ordered to be equipped at Breſt, as it became uncertain how far France might be involved in the expected hoſtilities; and on this critical occaſion it was the progreſs of intrigue became evident from the nature of diſorders which took place among the ſeamen at that port. On the thirteenth of September, while the ſquadron was fitting out with all poſſible expedition, the Leopard frigate arrived from St. Domingo, having on board a part of the refractory aſſembly, who, being diſſolved by the king's governor, hand embarked on that ſhip, at once for their immediate preſervation, to anticipate accuſations, and ſecure friends in the mother country. The admiral who commanded this veſſel had cauſed a ſeaman to be confined for intoxication, and the crew had ſhewn a ſpirit of diſcontent on that account; ſimilar proceedings had occurred upon very ſlight and unuſual pretexts in other ſhips, and the diſquietude became general; the commanders affected to trace the mutiny to the Leopard, the crew of which they alleged had been depraved by their communication with the fugitive paſſengers; othere attributed it with greater plauſibility to the general ſuſpicion which mutually prevailed between the noble commanders and their plebeian inferiors, in conſequence of their recent civil equalization; a report from the military and marine committee, presented by Menou to the assembly on the twenty first of October, so far fixed blame on the minister of marine, de la Luzerne, that he resigned on the twenty-seventh, and was succeeded by Fleurieu; the archbishop of Bourdeaux also resigned about the same time; and Duport Dutetre was appointed minister of justice; on the sixteenth of November Latour du Pin was superceded by du Portail; the admiral Albert de Rioms resigned about the same time, and a number of other naval officers; and Bougainville, the celebrated circumnavigator, was appointed to the command of the fleet. Tranquillity soon reappeared in the navy, but fortunately for France she was delivered from the necessity of engaging in a naval war at that time, by a convention soon after signed between Spain and England.

It was in the course of the discussions on the affairs of the marine, on the thirty-first of October, that a decree was passed, by which the national flag of France, which hitherto was white, was changed to the tricolor, or flag composed of a blue, red, and white stripe, placed vertically.

The metropolis, which had for some time enjoyed tranquillity, notwithstanding the troubles in the provinces, and the threatening manœuvres on the frontiers, was on the thirteenth of November disturbed by a duel between Castries and Charles Lameth, in which the latter was dangerously wounded; a report was current that he was actually dead, and the people given to suspicion from being witnesses of successive plots, were easily led to conceive the formidable fear of a conspiracy to assassinate successively all the patriotic members of the assembly; an immense crowd was presently assembled at the hotel de Castries, which they proceeded to destroy; la Fayette, with his characteristic vigilance repaired directly to the spot, with his wonted fortitude, addressed the populace, and represented to them the rashness and illegality of their conduct: it is equally to the credit of each party, that they desisted, and on coming out of the house every individual was searched, to evince that plunder was not their object.

We have already stated the reform in the affairs of the national clergy; their discontent gave rise to a series of decrees which were passed in the latter end of the year 1790; in the month of July, among the other ecclesiastical regulations, it was enacted, that every beneficed clergyman should solemnly take an oath, "to watch carefully over the faithful in the parish or diocese which was entrusted to his care; to be faithful to the nation, the law, and the king; and to maintain, to the utmost of his power, the new constitution of France, and particularly the decrees relative to the civil constitution of the clergy." Many of the clergy, on the first publishing of this decree, spontaneously offered to take the oath; but in many places the revolution continued a mere dead letter, till the 27th of November, when a more severe decree was enacted, declaring that all such clergy as should neglect to take the oath, should be considered as virtually ejected from their benefices; and condemning to severe pains and penalties all such as should prove refractory. If the reform in the government was salutary and just, so was the policy of this measure, as it certainly went to place the government of the church in the hands of men who were well affected to the new constitution, and to disengage the nation from a number of disaffected persons, who might be dangerous if possessed of power. The consequence was, that many conscientious persons, who had not been well affected to the constitution, resigned their benefices; and indeed the situation of honest men with strict notions of church authority, was rendered extremely perplexing by a public declaration of the pope, who had the inſolence to interfere in the concerns of a foreign nation by teſtifying in marked terms his diſapprobation of the oath. It is but juſtice to add, that the ſeverity of this decree was in ſome degree mitigated by a ſubſequent law, which aſſigned to the non-juring clergy a penſion of five hundred livres per annum. The king heſitated ſome time before he would ſanction this decree, however, he at length agreed to it.

The year 1790 cloſed with ſome acceſſion of popularity to the national-aſſembly. A ſtatue was decreed to be erected to the memory of Rouſſeau, and his widow was allowed a penſion. Some other popular acts were paſſed; but what conferred upon them the moſt ſolid applauſe was the report of the committee of finances, from which it appeared, that the national receipts exceeded the expenditure by three millions, and that there was upwards of 500,000l. ſterling in ſpecie in the public treaſury. To the immortal honour of the aſſembly, the pernicious and diſgraceful tax of lotteries was totally aboliſhed and prohibited. About the cloſe of the year M. de St. Prieſt, miniſter of the interior department, reſigned.

A. D. 1791. The firſt act of the new year was not leſs honourable to the conſtituent legiſlature. Inſtead of indicating (as its enemies inſinuated) an inclination to prolong its ſeſſion, like the long parliament of England, a liſt of articles was introduced, which were neceſſary to be diſcuſſed, previous to the final eſtabliſhment of the conſtitution; after the determination of which, the aſſembly declared its intention of diſſolving itſelf, and reſigning its authority.

The jealouſy of the neighbouring potentates who had looked with mixed emotions of jealouſy, hatred, and rapacity, on the progreſs of the French revolution, now began to teſtify a ſenſe of alarm and apprehenſion at its dangerous effects; and a league was formed againſt the riſing liberties of France, among the moſt powerful nations of the continent. Cordons of troops were advancing from Germany on the north, from Spain on the ſouth, and from Italy and Savoy on the weſt; and France might be ſaid litterally to be beſieged with hoſtile armies. The ſtate of affairs and particularly of Lewis retarded for a while the execution of this plan: but the deſigns of the deſpotic courts never altered; their action was occaſionly interrupted by circumſtances; but their tenor was direct, and their conduct conſiſtent.

The only plea which the conduct of France afforded theſe powers for interfering in her domeſtic concerns, was the claims of the German princes who had eſtates in Alſace and Lorraine. On the ſubverſion of the feudal inſtitutions, the claims of vaſſalage, and mortmain, which theſe princes conſidered as their right, were neceſſarily aboliſhed. It was in vain that the national-aſſembly repeatedly decreed them the ampleſt compenſation. The views of the German courts were different. Alſace and Lorraine afforded the excuſe; but the object of the projected war was clearly not the ſeignorial rights of a few petty princes. The cautious politics of the emperor Leopold, however, led him to purſue the moſt courtly meaſures in treating with France. On the 22d of January the king communicated to the aſſembly a letter from the emperor of Germany, in which that monarch made the moſt unqualified proteſtations of his amicable intentions towards France; but intimated at the ſame time, that, "it was neceſſary that all the innovations that had taken place in conſequence of the decrees of the 4th of Auguſt ſhould be done away, and matters put on the ancient footing."—The king, when he communicated the letter, treated it merely as an official measure of the emperor, a head of the German empire; and observed, that he received at the same time the most pácific assurances from the court of Vienna. The assembly, however, were not to be imposed upon by the finesse of Leopold; they immediately decreed a considerable augmentation of the national force, and that every defensive measure should be expeditiously adopted. And the popular party now found it necessary to fix private agents at foreign courts.

The hopes of those who were adverse to the new constitution were elated by the prospect of a counter-revoulution, and the movements of the hostile powers; and the resentments of the refractory and ejected priests operated every where upon the fanaticism of the populace. At Aix a club or society, calling itself "Friends of the king and the clergy," was instituted; the members of which, on the 12th of December, indulged themselves in the imprudent measure of wearing the white cokade. In the evening of that day, some of the party met with a number of persons who belonged to a club of opposite principles; some pistols were discharged, and a riot immediately ensued. The mob hastened immediately to the prison, were Paschalis, an advocate, had for some time been confined for seditious writings and practices; and, in defiance of the municipality and the national-guard, tore him from his place of confinement, and hanged him with two others of the aristocratic party, Messrs. Roquette and Dorimont, on the neighbouring trees.

At Lyons, on the other hand, a desparate but ill-concerted conspiracy was discovered, which had for its object, to corrupt the populace of that city, by distributing money among them; to bring back thither the ex-princes; to make that city the retreat of the king, if he could be detached from the national assembly; and, if not, the assembly was forcibly to be conveyed thither along with him.

In the neighbourhood of Vannes in Brittany the fanatic clergy openly preached against the constitution: and in one country parish, the priest, after having celebrated mass, desired his congregation to kiss the crucifix, and gave them absolution.—"Go now," said he, "and plunge your daggers into the hearts of those impious persons who have "degraded your holy religion: you are saved!" The infatuated multitude, instigated by this incendiary exhortation, marched in a body to Vannes. At this place however, they found the Irish regiment of Walsh and the national guard of l'Orient prepared for their reception, and they were easily repulsed and dispersed.

The public attention was now occupied with a transaction which would have been of little consequence in any other circumstances of the state. On the the 20th of February, the president of the national assembly received a letter from the king, stating that his aunts, the daughters of Lewis XV. had left Paris that morning at six o'clock, and that, as he was persuaded that they could not legally be deprived of the liberty which the constitution gave to every citizen to travel wherever their inclinations led, he had not attempted to prevent their departure. This report was no sooner made than Camus proposed that the civil-list should be diminished in proportion to the provision which the nation alotted them: this was again opposed by Martineau; but the assembly, considering the circumstance as unworthy of their notice, passed to the order of the day. On the following day, however, the subject was renewed by Barnave, who, as the constitution committee were then occupied in providing a series of regulations for the government of the royal family, propoſed that they ſhould be inſtructed to preſent to the aſſembly the plan of a decree to aſcertain the right which perſons allied to the throne ſhould have to travel out of the kingdom. The propoſal produced another from Martineau, Goupil, and others, that the law againſt emigrants ſhould extend not only to the royal family, but to all other individuals: and that a reaſonable abſentee-tax ſhould be impoſed, in order to diſcourage emigration in general.

In the mean time the ladies continued their journey, and with a train of carriages preſented themſelves before Moret, and produced to the magiſtrates a paſſport from the king, counterſigned Montmorin, and a declaration from the municipality of Paris, ſtating that they arrogated to themſelves no right to ſtop any perſons travelling through the kingdom. As, however, the municipality of Moret was informed that the matter was then under the conſideration of the conſtitutional committee, they determined to arreſt them. They had no ſooner taken this determination, than a party of a hundred or more of the chaſſeurs de Lorraine, with a number of domeſtics of Montmorin mayor of Fontainebleau, appeared before the gates, forced them open, and made a clear paſſage for the travellers. At Arnay-le-Duc, the municipality was more ſucceſsful: there they effectually ſtopped the progreſs of the royal emigrants, and diſpatched an account of their proceedings to the national aſſembly. On mature conſideration, however, the legiſlature decreed, that "as there was no poſitive law exiſting which ſanctioned the arreſt of meſdames, aunts to the king, it ſhould be referred to the executive power;" and in conſequence of this decree, after ſome delay, they were left to purſue their journey to Rome.

Thus the country was entirely deſerted by all the different branches of the royal family, except monſieur. The people, whoſe juſt fears and ſuſpicions foreſaw innumerable evils in theſe emigrations, aſſembled in a tumultuous manner at the Thuilleries; and a report being ſpread, that the only remaining brother of the king was about to depart alſo, the mob immediately directed their courſe to his palace. and inſiſted on a promiſe not to leave the kingdom. The prince conceded to the wiſhes of the populace, and they diſperſed with every appearance of ſatisfaction and joy.

On the 28th of February an event of a more extraordinary and ſuſpicious nature occured, and unfortunately contributed to encreaſe the jealouſy and diſſatisfaction of the public. On the morning of that day, at the uſual hour of divine ſervice at the royal chapel, a gentleman after walking ſome time in the gallery requeſted of the attendants on the dauphin to be permitted to ſee the prince. As he paſſed into the apartment a poniard of a peculiar conſtruction was diſcovered under his coat; he was arreſted and examined before the mayor of Paris, and committed to cuſtody.

While the mayor was occupied with this affair, intelligence was received of a riot in another quarter. The caſtle of Vincennes had been directed to undergo ſome repair; and as that edifice had formerly been uſed as a ſtate-priſon, the jealouſy of the populace immediately took fire, and their imaginations repreſented to them the horrible ſpectre of a baſtile ſtill more formidable than that which had been demoliſhed. The ſuburb of St. Antoine was preſently in motion, and the object of popular ſuſpicion was powerfully aſſailed. M. la Fayette was no ſooner informed of this commotion, than he proceeded thither, accompanied by a ſtrong party of the national-guard. The populace were eaſily undeceived and perſuaded to diſperſe; but what was the ſurpriſe of the magiſtrates and the national-guard, on their return to the Thuilleries, to find the gates barred againſt them; and as ſoon as the gates were forced open, the apartments were diſcovered to be filled with a number of men armed with ſword-canes, piſtols, and poniards, who had entered by a back gate which was opened to them by one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber. On enquiry being made by the king, "whence it happened that more than four hundred perſons armed in a ſecret manner had introduced themſelves without leave into his apartments?" he was anſwered, that his nobility, alarmed by the affair of Vincennes, had aſſembled for his defence. The king rebuked their indecent zeal, and aſſured them that he conceived himſelf perfectly ſafe under the protection of the national-guard. The conſtruction put upon this tranſaction by the popular party was, that a conſpiracy had been concerted by the chiefs of the ariſtocracy to take advantage of the firſt commotion, which would neceſſarily draw off the national-guard, to put in effect their long-projected plan of carrying off the king. Whatever might be the motive of the perſons who aſſembled on this occaſion, it gave too much countenance to the ſuſpicions of the people, and cheriſhed that ſpirit of party which it was ſo much the intereſt of the nation to counteract and ſubdue. From thenceforward all of the nobleſſe and others who viſited the court were called knights of the poniard.

The beginning of March was dedicated by the aſſembly chiefly for the organization of the army. On the fourth it was decreed, that there ſhould in future be only ſix mareſchals of France, whoſe functions ſhould be entirely military, and whoſe pay was fixed at the rate of thirty-thouſand livres per annum. With regard to the mareſchals of France then exiſting, it was determined, that ſuch of them as ſhould not be retained in actual ſervice of the ſtate, ſhould receive penſions adequate to their actual merits. On the ſucceeding day Victor Broglio addreſſed the aſſembly in favour of his father mareſchal Broglio. He obſerved, "that the decree which had juſt been paſſed ſeemed to menace his reſpectable father, after a long and glorious carreer, with the deprivation of an honor which he had obtained, not from favour, but by merit. His father, he ſaid, always a ſtranger to intrigue, and repulſed from court even for his virtues, had lived among the ſoldiers from the age of fourteen. He was their friend, their patron, their father. On the late unhappy occaſion, he ſtated, that mareſchal Broglio had been drawn from his retreat in the country by the poſitive order of the king—That he was not privy to the aſſembling of the troops near the capital; and ſo little conſcious of the deſign, that on his arrival at court, his firſt addreſs to the king was—'Here are the troops! but where is the enemy?' That he was made acquainted with none of the meaſures of the court, and heard of the diſmiſſion of Necker only through the medium of public report—That when he arrived at Metz, ſo ſenſible had he been of the diſhonorable cauſe in which he had been unconſciouſly engaged, that his ſpirits were ſunk, and his health had been viſibly on the decline—That he was now in ſo dangerous a ſtate, that he was unable to return to his country, but had moſt obſtinately reſiſted every attempt to ſeduce him from his allegiance to it."

In conſequence of this repreſentation, the aſſembly reſolved, that for the preſent nothing deciſive ſhould be decreed with reſpect to the rank of mareſchal of France, ſo far as concerned Broglio; but that he ſhould be ſtill conſidered as preſerving his rank and title in the army. He however ſoon after reſigned and declared for the emigrants; it is not improbable therefore that Victor Broglio was either deceived, or entertained a hope that by obtaining this liberal deciſion he might overcome his father's ſcruples, and induce him to adhere to his country.

Towards the concluſion of the month ſeveral decrees were paſſed relative to the caſe of a regency; women were excluded from that truſt, as well as from the ſucceſſion to the crown; the regency was declared to belong of right to the next male heir to the crown, during the minority of the king; the perſon of the minor king was not confided to the regent; and he was pronounced to be of age at eighteen. Nearly about the ſame period it was decreed, that every public functionary ought to reſide in whatever place his ſpecial duties were to be performed; and that the king as the firſt public functionary, ſhould be always reſident, during the ſeſſion, within twenty leagues of the legiſlative body; and that if he, or the heir apparent, went out of the kingdom without a decree of the legiſlature, they ſhould be conſidered as having forfeited their title to the crown.

This diſcuſſion was ſucceeded by one of ſtill greater importance to the welfare of the community: This regarded the ſucceſſion to property and the right of determining the diſpoſition of poſſeſſions after death. In the outſet of the debate, a very judicious diſtinction was eſtabliſhed; and it was determined—Firſt, to decide what was proper to be decreed with reſpect to the effects of perſons dying inteſtate; Second, whether any reſtriction ought to be laid on teſtamentary alienation. In this inveſtigation the evils of the then exiſting law of inheritance were ſtrongly depicted; the barbarous and abſurd feudal inſtitution of primogeniture was ſucceſsfully attacked; it was demonſtrated, that no ſuch inſtitution exiſted among the enlightened nations of antiquity, and was unknown in every part of the world but Europe now; that it originated among the moſt ſavage tribes, and in the moſt uncivilized periods; that, in the preſent circumſtances of ſociety, it was warranted by no juſt motive, no inference of reaſon, no excuſe; that its baſis was injuſtice, its conſequences profligacy and crimes; that the heir to a large fortune was generally corrupted by the poſſeſſion of it, and the younger branches devoted to beggary and proſtitution; that its effects in a public view were ſtill more deplorable; and that it was the principal cauſe of that inequality among citizens which produced moſt of the vice and all the miſery that exiſts in ſociety. In fine, the opinion, that an equal diviſion of property ſhould take place among the children or relations of perſons dying inteſtate, ſeemed to meet unanimous approbation, and was ſome time after the diſcuſſion decreed.

On the other topic there was a greater diverſity of ſentiment: In defence of the unlimited power of teſtators, recourſe was had to the ſacred light in which property ought always to be regarded; to the diſcouragement which would be held forth to induſtry, if men were not permitted to diſpoſe of their juſt acquiſitions agreeable to their inclinations. The power of Parents over their children was another forcible argument: to make children independent of their parents, it was ſaid, would annihilate good morals; youth is the torrid zone of human life, and muſt fall the unreſiſting prey of temptation, of debauchery, of uſury, of every exiſting corruption and depravity, if poſſeſſed of a premature and uncontrouled patrimony. The character of a father was repreſented as the moſt ſacred of titles, it is that which the deity himſelf aſſumes. The equal partition of eſtates, was adduced as a proof in favour of that arrangment which left the diſpoſal of his property to the will of the teſtator. In the encreaſe of population, it was ſaid, the landed property of individuals would be ſubdivided into atoms, or the portions would be ſo extremely ſmall as even to baffle the diligence of the collectors of the land-tax.

The arguments on the other ſide were not leſs ingenious: It was ſaid that the queſtion was ſimply, whether the deliberate will of the law or the caprice or paſſions of individuals ſhould be the rule of civil rights? If the law had determined that the equal diviſion of property was for the good of the ſtate, the will of an individual ought not to interfere with the public welfare. Parents were often arbitrary, and this diſpoſition went to obſtruct the public proſperity by creating enmities in the boſom of families, and perpetuating the inequality of fortune among citizens, upon principles which ſuperceded real merit and virtue. It was not however contended that this reſtriction ſhould be ſo abſolute that a parent ſhould not have it in his power to teſtify his affection for a deſerving child, nor to withhold from a child leſs worthy; the object was, to leave a part of the inheritance at the diſpoſal of the teſtator, and to diſtribute a part in ſuch proportions as ſhould ſeem moſt likely to promote the proſperity of the commonwealth.

Of the latter opinion was Mirabeau: but he ſpake no longer from the tribune, which had ſo often reſounded with the thunders of his eloquence, but from the dark and ſilent regions of the dead. While the law of ſucceſſions continued in agitation, he was ſeized with an internal diſeaſe, the ſeat of which was ſaid to be in the pericardium; and at the early age of forty-two was cut off in meridian of earthly glory. During the moſt ſevere part of his illneſs, and even while ſtruggling in the arms of death, he retained his mental vigor and all the ardor of the politician. A few hours before his deceaſe he ſent for Talleyrand-Perigord, and obſerving to him that the law of inheritance was the order of the day in the aſſembly, requeſted him to take down his ſentiments on the ſubject.

They were read to the national aſſembly. His death was ſoon after announced; and it is difficult to ſay whether the affliction with which they heard the news of his death, or the reſpect which they ſeemed to pay to his laſt ſentiments, was more honorable and conſpicuous. Suſpicions were entertained that he died by poiſon; but on opening his body, no proofs were found to ſupport the conjecture; the exceſſes of his youth had undermined a conſtitution naturally vigorous, and deprived France at a critical period of one of her moſt extraordinary characters. His talents were brilliant and the times and his ſituation favorable to diſplay them. Born of a noble but not opulent family, his early education had initiated him in all the engaging and ornamental accompliſhments; his love of pleaſure which is ſo often connected with genius, led him into all the varieties of the ſocial condition, and made him minutely acquainted with the human character; perſecution and diſtreſs had encountered him in early life; it had taught him that danger appears more formidable in the approach than the conflict, and while it induced a commiſſeration for others, it made him firm; a tedious confinement in the Baſtile, had weaned him from the flightineſs of conſcious genius and confirmed him in ſtudious habits; and above all had filled him with an unconquerable averſion for tyranny. With a mind vigorous, and comprehenſive, intuitive and acute, thus ſeverely tried in adverſity, intimate with the intrigues and follies of courts; his deep penetration, his promptitude, his fluent eloquence, his powerful voice, were all adapted to command attention; he united a talent for repartee with the powers of profound reaſoning, ſo that he was always ready to diſconcert or confute; few ſtateſmen poſſeſſed more extenſive views, few orators have been capable of bolder flights, of a more paſſionate addreſs, or a more energetic expreſſion.

But the ſplendor of thoſe talents, which nature and habit appeared to have formed to to govern and direct a popular aſſembly, were clouded by the reputation of his private life; for although his features were harſh and his perſon clumſy, he poſſeſſed the art of rendering himſelf a favourite of the ſex in a debauched court, and to be more ſucceſsful in his triumphs than thoſe numbers who in the ſame circles with diſpoſitions equally profligate poſſeſſed perſons better formed for ſeduction; hence among the really virtuous he was an object of ſuſpicion and diſlike, by the faſtidious and hypocritical he was abuſed, and treated with reſerve by all whoſe rank did not place them above the vulgar ſeverity of moral cenſure.

His politics though generally clothed with profeſſions of the utmoſt reverence for the public voice and of regard for the people's liberty and happineſs, with laviſh praiſes of their virtues and ſuperiority, were ſtill too viſibly governed by perſonal ambition alone: with paſſions ſtrong and vehement, the conſciouſneſs of his talents buoyed him up with a perfect confidence that he ſhould overcome the conſtant reſiſtance of an evil reputation; thence it is that his politics preſented a perpetual ſtruggle between his love of power and his anxiety to ſecure the public ſentiment, ſo much eſtranged from him by his character; thus it is that the inconſiſtencies which even his great talents could not hide, may be accounted for, and that his ſupport of the abſolute veto ceaſes to be ſurprizing; that while the tribune reſounded and his hearers were inflamed with the name and attributes of liberty, ſober reflection taught, 'that the goddeſs of his adoration was not ſhe who ſpreads equal light and juſticeover all, but that meretricious impoſtor who aſſumes her name, and diſpenſes favours to a ſect or a caſt, or as the reward of proſtitution. That he received the money of the court in the carreer of his higheſt popularity has been aſſerted, and his previous need compared with his ſubſequent profuſion ſupports the poſition; that he had bargained for a ſituation in the adminiſtration was placed above doubt, which accounts for the ardency of his efforts to obtain ſeats for the miniſtry in the aſſembly, notwithſtanding his knowlege of the pernicious example of England; his conduct on this occaſion toward Lanjuinais, who had carried the motion againſt their admiſſion, diſplayed the exceſs of mortification and diſappointment; thenceforward his jealouſy of thoſe who appeared to rival him became conſpicuous, and continued to his laſt illneſs, in which he openly expreſſed an apprehenſion that the democratic party would gain an aſcendancy which would reduce the power of the crown: but he was conſcious that he could never aſpire to be a king, and a monarchy alone could afford hope for talents united with vices, ſince in republics virtue is a neceſſary qualification for public truſt and a conſequence of equality.

Yet as an orator, the faireſt teſtimony to his memory is the amazing power which he poſſeſſed in a numerous and turbulent aſſembly, and his confeſſedly excelling all the efforts of ſo many illuſtrious rivals and contemporaries. The faculty on which he is ſaid to have moſt valued himſelf, was that of improving on the ideas of others, and perpetually drawing even from his adverſaries a copious fund of matter; but as a writer he has been charged with carrying this indulgence to an unworthy extent, he has ſought the aſſiſtance of men who in various branches of ſcience infinitely ſurpaſſed him, and having profited by their liberality, has worn their laurels as his own; a plan of public inſtruction which he had prepared and communicated to many of his friends, and which death prevented him from preſentiug to the aſſembly, was borrowed from a written diſcourſe of Chamfort, a member of the French academy, who afterwards preferred death to a coexiſtence with Roberſpierre, but whoſe modeſty would not permit him to affix the degree of merit to his work which Mirabeau thought worth aſſuming to himſelf.

As a writer he was unequal and ſometimes obſcure; his letters from Berlin exhibit a deep ſagacity and extraordinary diſcrimination, and it has been juſtly remarked that the characters he ſketched there have continued to retain their reſemblance through every ſubſequent ſtage of events; in other inſtances he has not evinced a ſimilar truth, he has been acrimoniouſly ſevere, malignantly ſarcaſtic, and groſsly uncandid; in the gallery of portraits, which conſiſted of characters of his principal contemporaries, he has made ſacrifices to jealouſy and envy that reflect a ſickly ſhade over his talents; he endeavored to make ſome feint reparation by denying that work.

But his title to eloquence cannot be invalidated by the frailties of his paſſions; in the debate upon the title which the aſſembly ſhould aſſume, Mirabeau propoſed that of Repreſentatives of the People; but this being objected to upon the ground that the word peuple had been always uſed to imply the very loweſt order in France, he replied—"I care not what "ſignification words aſſume in the language of prejudice, here I ſpeak the language of "liberty, and I am ſupported by the old example of the Engliſh and the modern wiſdom "of the Americans: when Chatham compreſſed the charter of nations in a ſingle ex-"preſſion, the majeſty of the people—when the Americans declared the rights of the people "in oppoſition to all the traſh that was ſaid and publiſhed againſt them, they ſhewed that "they underſtood the true ſignification and energy of expreſſion which common ſenſe "deſignates, and upon which freedom only ſtamps the value that intrinſically belongs to "it. I perſiſt in my motion therefore—Yes! and in that expreſſion alone which is found "fault with—I mean the French people—becauſe it is a name not ſufficiently reſpected in "France—becauſe it is obſcured and covered with the ruſt of prejudices—becauſe it con-"veys an idea which wounds egotiſm, and pride, and mortifies vanity—bacauſe it is "mentioned with diſdain in the houſes of ariſtocrats—it is for theſe very reaſons I adopt "it, and that we ought to eſtabliſh it, and render it reſpectable in the eyes of miniſters "and courts."

On an occaſion when ſent by the aſſembly at the head of a deputation to the king, the perſons in waiting inſtead of notifying the attendance of the deputies, ſuffered them to ſtand unnoticed in an antichamber; Mirabeau burning with indignation addreſſed the principal officer in waiting, who had been a duke,—"Sir! I order you to go and tell the king "that the repreſentatives of the French people are here." He was implicitly obeyed.

But theſe tranſactions were prior to the queſtion of the veto, when the ſunſhine of the court would not waſte a ſingle ray upon him, and the ſmiles of Maria Antonietta were yet too precious to be laviſhed upon popular men. But his ſeduction by the court, nor the more public errors of his life, did not deprive him of that reſpect which was due to his talents, when their luſtre was ſtill bright but could offend no more: during his illneſs his door was beſieged by enquiring citizens, whoſe countenances beſpoke their ſorrow. The magiſtracy of Paris and the national aſſembly decreed a mourning of eight days: by a reſolution of the legiſlature alſo, a public funeral was ordered, and was attended by the national aſſembly, the miniſters, magiſtrates, judges, the national guard of Paris, the ſociety of friends to the conſtitution, or Jacobins, and an immenſe body of ſpectators. The magnificent new church of St. Genevive was conſecrated for the reception of great men, and Mirabeau was the firſt to whom that honor was decreed. As the new church however was not completed, the body was for the preſent depoſited in an ancient church adjoining, by the ſide of the coffin containing the aſhes of Deſcartes.

The next diſcuſſion which occupied the aſſembly, was the organization of the miniſtry, the members of which were declared reſponſible; and it was alſo decreed that no member of the national aſſembly ſhould take any part in the adminiſtration till four years after the concluſion of that legiſlature of which he was a member. The appointment of miniſters was veſted in the king; but their number was to be regulated by the legiſlature. The miniſters then appointed were, 1ſt, A miniſter of juſtice, who was to keep the great ſeal, to execute all laws relative to the ſanctioning of decrees, to preſerve correſpondence with all the inferior departments of juſtice, to ſubmit to the legiſlature all queſtions of juriſprudence; 2d, A miniſter of war, to ſuperintend the regulation of all the troops of the line, to order the movements of the armies againſt the enemy; 3d, A miniſter of foreign affairs, to ſuperintend and conduct all correſpondence with foreign courts, to enforce the execution of treaties, and to have a general care of the political and commercial intereſts of the kingdom; 4th, A miniſter of marine and for the colonies. The miniſter of foreign affairs to have a ſalary of 150,000 livres (about 7,400l.) and the reſt 100,000 livres (about 5,000l.) per annum. The king and the miniſters to compoſe a great council of ſtate, for the due exerciſe of the executive power.

The nobleſſe aſſembled on the borders of Alſace, began now to create ſome alarm in the people. The emigrant army had been reviewed by the prince de Condé: their uniform was black, faced with yellow, with a death's-head ſurrounded with a laurel wreath on one cuff, and a ſword on the other, with the motto, "Conquer or die." The emigrants alſo, it was added, were well received by moſt of the German princes, and every thing appeared hoſtile on the frontiers. As the cardinal de Rohan had taken an active part in ſeducing the people from their duties, an act of impeachment was decreed againſt him and ſome other of the principal emigrants.

With this circumſtance ſeveral others occurred to keep awake the ever-watchful eye of popular ſuſpicion. The king had been always of a turn of mind deeply imbued with the ſuperſtitious terrors which the Romiſh religion is ſo well calculated to impreſs on its devotees; the eccleſiaſtics were not ignorant of this diſpoſition, and as thoſe who were adverſe to the change ſtood in moſt need of protection, and were from ſympathy attached to the monarch, whether he entertained them through prejudice and predelection, or through mere compaſſion, he was ſurrounded with non-juring prieſts, and other perſons of this character; they were ſaid to be received with peculiar cordiality; theſe were new cauſes of alarm, and the people had not forgot the ſingular tranſaction of the Thuilleries on the 28th of February, which in all probability was frequently exaggerated by them. We cannot, therefore, be ſurpriſed at a tumult which took place on the 18th of April, while the royal family was preparing to ſet out for St. Cloud, where they intended to paſs the Eaſter-holidays. The populace, who conſidered this as only foreboding the flight of the king, and a counter-revolution, clamorouſly ſurrounded the carriage, and inſiſted on their majeſties return. It was in vain that Bailly and de la Fayette oppoſed this phrenſy; in vain they exerted themſelves to procure a free paſſage for the carriage. A ſet of orators better adapted to the ears of the common people, exclaimed, "If the king eſcapes, there will be a civil war, and the ſtreets of Paris will "be deluged with the blood of its citizens." The national-guard refuſed to act—"We "know," ſaid the grenadiers, "that we are violating the law; but the ſafety of the "country is the firſt of laws." One of the national guards approaching the king told him, he acted unwisely in countenancing the unconstitutional priests.—"Who made you "the arbiter of my conscience fellow!" replied Lewis.

The royal family, however, was obliged to return, and the king on the following day repaired to the assembly, where, in a discourse of some length he complained of the insult, and concluded, "I did not choose to repel that resistance by force, which might have "proved fatal to a multitude, who, being misled, imagine they are acting in support of "the law when they are infringing it; but it is of importance to the nation to prove that "I am a free agent. Nothing can be more essential to give authority to the sanctions which "I have granted to your decrees. On that account, therefore, I persist in my intention of "going to St. Cloud, and the assembly must be convinced of the propriety of my re-"solution."

He was answered in a cordial speech by the president; and on his retiring, no further notice was taken of the circumstance. But the king not proceeding as he had resolved, the people remained convinced, that the interruption alone prevented his going to Compeigne, and it was openly asserted without contradiction, that post-horses were laid on that road, sufficient for the conveyance of him, and all his family. The populace were therefore impressed with the most humiliating ideas of the king's hypocrisy, and one of the street orators repeated to several groupes on the nineteenth and twentieth, that, "a "king was clearly a very useless personage—a monster, who devours thirty millions of "livres annually!"

The writers of all parties have done justice to the spirit and propriety which distinguished the conduct of de la Fayette on the 18th. On this occasion he, with the other staff-officers, sent in their resignation, observing, that since the national-guards would no longer obey, he must cease to retain a command which was merely nominal. This event was no sooner known than all Paris was seized with a general consternation; nor could all the jealousy of La Fayette's enemies prevent their soliciting in a body, and under circumstances the most respectful to him, that he would re-assume the command. After some hesitation on his part, and the strongest assurances given on theirs of entire obedience, he agreed on the 24th to comply with their wishes.

Robespierre, who became so conspicuous afterwards, was at this time an obscure individual of the assembly. Danton was not a member, but then the most influential person of the Cordeliers, a club that was considered as the most patriotic, and entirely republican. Marat was also a member of that club, but of no great influence, only among the most illiterate of the populace whose garb, manners, and passions he studied, and in a journal which he published, addressed himself in ordinary language with an extraordinary effect, to their plain understandings.

At this period, the department of Paris prayed the king, to notify to the powers of Europe, his full approbation of the constitution; which he complied with; and at their instance, he dismissed from about his person those obnoxious people who had been a principal cause of the suspicion. The bishop of Senlis, cardinal Montmorency, Villequier and Duras of the bed-chamber were dismissed, and all the priests of his chapel. New assurances of fidelity to the constitution, and of loyalty to the king, passed between the sovereign and the national assembly, and all was quiet.

The measure of an address to the powers of Europe, was a severe trial of the character of Lewis; it was certainly calculated to ensure the peace of France, and as a test of his own diſpoſition, to enſure the ſecurity of the conſtitution, by defeating the deſigns of thoſe who either doubted his own principles or were inimical by principal to the regal government. Montmorin was at this time miniſter for foreign affairs, and in his official character he read to the aſſembly the circular letter tranſmitted to the French miniſters at foreign courts, as the ſincere ſentiments of the king reſpecting the ſtate of France and the conſtitution, ſtating that the miniſters were required to make it known generally that no doubts might remain. In this letter the following account of the revolution is given—"That which is called the revolution is in fact the mere annihilation of various abuſes "which had inſenſibly accumulated in the courſe of ages, through the indifference of "the people or the abuſes of miniſterial power, but never were part of the power of "the kings.

"Thoſe abuſes were not leſs detrimental to the nation than to the monarch. Under "the happieſt reigns they were attacked by authority, but without being removed. "They exiſt no longer. The ſovereign nation conſiſts of citizens equal in their rights. "There is no power ſuperior to the law—no organ by which the law can ſpeak but "thoſe functionaries ſpecially appointed by the nation to that duty—and the king is the "firſt of thoſe functionaries. Such is the revolution."

To a meſſage ſo well calculated to preſerve peace and reſtore harmony, the aſſembly replied by a numerous deputation, at the head of which was their preſident, and thanked him in terms of the warmeſt praiſe and attachment; but we ſhall have occaſion preſently to lament that a declaration founded ſo apparently in the pureſt virtue and diſintereſtedneſs, was but the prelude to actions the moſt oppoſite and fatally hoſtile to this declaration, to the happy calm which it was likely to produce, and to the peace of the nation and the throne, and to his perſonal ſafety; we ſhall find that at the period when this declaration was made to the aſſembly and to all Europe, that the king was perfectly acquainted with ſchemes for his flight from that country, and the violation of that conſtitution, upon which he had paſſed that eulogy, and which he had ſworn to ſupport; we ſhall find him realizing the ſuſpicions entertained, concerning his journey to St. Cloud, and only divided between the choice of two conſpiracies formed by Calonne and Choiſeuil in conjunction with the combined deſpots of Europe; we ſhall find him acquainted with theſe, and with thoſe ſtupenduous deſigns, which were then forming or formed at Mantua, at Pavia, and at Pilnitz.

Before we enter upon tranſactions ſo momentous, the affairs of the colonies before and at this period demand ſome notice.

Theſe commotions, which agitated the mother country, were trifling when compared with the fatal animoſities which prevailed there. The decree of March 1790 was ſo far from quieting the jealouſies and diſturbances exiſting, that its immediate effect ſeemed to be to kindle the whole of the French Weſt-India iſlands into a flame. Before the arrival of the commiſſioners who were to enforce the decree, a mulatto of the name of Ogé, attempted to excite a rebellion in St. Domingo: his party was, however, defeated: he took refuge among the Spaniards; they ſurrendered him, and he expired upon the wheel. The very troops which had been ſent from France to reſtore tranquillity, became infected with the ſame ſpirit of inſubordination. A regiment of native troops too, which was named the regiment of Port-au-Prince, aſſaſſinated their colonel. The rebellious regiment was embarked and ſent to Europe; but the king's commiſſaries ſtill exerciſed a feeble and dubious authority.

But the very decree of the aſſembly, the ſubſtance of which has been already intimiated, proved the moſt deplorable ſource of diſcord. In that decree, parochial aſſemblies were directed to be held previous to the forming of a colonial conſtitution; but no definition was given of the perſons who were to form theſe meetings. The people of colour, not being excepted, concluded naturally that they were virtually compriſed in the law. The moſt violent conteſts enſued, and a deputation was ſent over to the national aſſembly, to demand an explanation.

In May 1791, the matter was warmly agitated in the aſſembly. The advocates in favour of the people of colour urged the declaration of rights, which the aſſembly itſelf had agreed on as the baſis of their new conſtitution, and even appealed to a higher authority, the great fundamental principles of reaſon and juſtice. The colonial deputies, and their abettors, confeſſed that the prejudice againſt the people of colour was abſurd and unjuſt; but they alleged that it was a prejudice which could not be annihilated by a ſingle decree, or be obliterated in a ſhort ſpace of time. That a law which ſhould at once elevate theſe perſons to the ſame rank with the white coloniſts, would expoſe the iſland to the ſevereſt calamities. The aſſembly found itſelf in a moſt difficult predicament. The free people of colour on the one hand, and their dependents, were numerous and wealthy; and, on the other, the whites in the French iſlands were maſters of nearly 200,000 negroes, were poſſeſſed of all the actual power, and had exhibited the moſt alarming ſymptoms of independence. They had already opened their ports to foreign nations, and had threatened to transfer their allegiance to the Engliſh government. The troops which had been ſent had been debauched from their duty, and corrupted in their principles, and little reliance could be placed upon new debarkations. In this dilemma, the legiſlature proceeded gradually, and with extreme caution.

On the 13th of May, a decree was paſſed to quiet the apprehenſions of the coloniſts with reſpect to the liberation of the negroes; and it was eſtabliſhed as a conſtiutional article, "that the legiſlature of the mother country ſhould decide nothing with reſpect to the liberation of the ſlaves, but upon the actual and formal demand of the colonial aſſemblies." This was followed, on the 15th, by another decree equally cautious, and in effect partial to the white coloniſts; which was, that people of colour born of free parents on both ſides, ſhould be admitted into all the colonial aſſemblies; and as to thoſe whoſe parents on one ſide only were free, the legiſlature would not determine any thing till they heard the ſentiments of the colonial aſſemblies.

Thus, by a repetition of the ſame timid policy which had produced the diſturbances, the aſſembly ſtill continued to widen the breach. Neither party was ſatisfied with the decree. The majority of the people of colour were not born of parents who were both free, ſince it happened that a conſiderable number was the off-pring of ſlaves who had been in a ſtate of concubinage with their maſters; and the white coloniſts, on the other hand, found their darling prejudice invaded even by this trifling innovation. The moſt fatal diſcord manifeſted itſelf immediately. The aſſembly ſent over no troops to enforce its own decree. The coloniſts complained, that the decree in itſelf was impracticable. Such a ſcrutiny as it required into the pedigree and extraction of individuals, could not be conducted without offence, without difficulty, and litigation. The white coloniſts repreſented in the ſtrongeſt terms, that this laſt decree was a total violation of the preamble to the former; though the aſſembly had ſanctioned the continuance of ſlavery, they ſtill feared the abolition of the ſlave-trade, and determined to relax nothing in their ſeverity and oppreſſion of the people of colour.

In the mean time, the enemies of the revolution were not inactive in inflaming the minds of both parties. The ſlaves, whether inſtigated by incendiaries, or whether finding the civil authority which held them in obedience almoſt annihilated, ſoon began to take a part in the diſputes; and diſcord, violence, and bloodſhed pervaded every part of the colonies. In Martinico, and the ſmaller iſlands, after much conteſt, order was partly reſtored; but St. Domingo remained a long time a melancholy ſcene of deſolation and civil-war.

Every day encreaſed the agitation prevailing inthe mother country; diſquietude was ſeen to invade the habitual hilarity of the French; the counter-revolutioniſts appeared more audacious as they gained in numbers, and the friends of a limited monarchy were now placed in that ſitution which rendered it neceſſary to decide between the reſtoration of the aboliſhed abuſes, and more enlarged or democratical principles; unfortunately their diſnunion among themſelves, a paſſiveneſs which they called moderation, was little calculated to operate to the conviction or the conqueſt of their external anemies, or of thoſe at home whoſe hopes and pretenſions were founded on the baſis of prejudice and arbitrary government; the malcontents on the frontiers, under the prince of Condé and d'Artois, had gained a conſiderable ſtrength by emigration, and with a view to intimidate their adverſaries and encourage thoſe who yet remained attached to the old order of things, reports were induſtriouſly circulated, that the German powers were preparing to join the emigrants, and with a mighty force to reſtore the nobility and clergy. Theſe rumours, though apparently exaggerated, were not altogether to be diſregarded; the aſſembly therefore decreed, that notice ſhould be given to Condé, that his reſidence on the frontiers, ſurrounded by ſuſpected perſons, indicated criminal deſigns, and that if within fifteen days he did not return to France, or depart from the frontiers, with a ſolemn declaration that he ſhould attempt nothing againſt the new conſtitution, he ſhould be proclaimed a rebel, deprived of all right of ſucceſſion to the crown, and incur the penalties of attaint and forfeiture. Theſe ſteps of the aſſembly, though they produced no effect on the external enemies of the revolution, cauſed ſome reſerve in thoſe who ſurrounded the court; experience had taught them the folly of their raſhneſs, but their deſparation or their hopes did not ſuffer them to profit by it; on this occaſion, the court once more aſſumed the appearance of the moſt diſintereſted attachment to the conſtitution, while its ſecret intrigues were carried on with redoubled ardour and activity.

The celebrated Calonne had obtained the confidence of the Britiſh cabinet, by means which if then known to the leading men in France, could not have left the diſpoſition of that court in the leaſt equivocal; we ſhall have occaſion in treating of the French concerns in Aſia, to ſhew that ſo early as the year 1790 the Britiſh government had manifeſted the part which ſhe was determined to take in the French rovolution: At this period, through the agency of an emiſſary in the ſuite of the Britiſh miniſter at Paris, Calonne maintained a correſpondence with the queen and her partiſans; he had in conjunction with Bouille formed a conſpiracy, the primary feature of which was the flight of the king and royal family; the barbarities at Nancy ſprung from this ſyſtem ſo deeply contrived; but another plot had been formed as early as the month of March, without any connexion with or even any knowledge on either ſide of the deſigns of the other, though by a very ſingular concurrence the ſame ends were propoſed to be obtained by nearly the ſame means; the author of this plot was the celebrated Choiſeuil, who had been at every court in Europe ſoliciting aid, and repreſenting it as the common cauſe of kings; it was natural to expect that ſuch a project could not fail of being acceptable to the queen's brother; it was laid before the emperor Leopold, then at Mantua, who was eaſily prevailed upon to adopt and ſupport it with zeal. After arranging the various meaſures for it execution, it was deemed expedient to communicate the particulars to Lewis, and obtain his concurrence and co-operation. Count Alphonſo Dufort, an emigrant of tried fidelity and talents, was entruſted with this dangerous and confidential ſervice; he had various interviews with the emperor, agreed to ſet out for Paris and to return with the king's aſſent.

The detail of Calonne's plot has never been developed, but the particulars of this have been diſcloſed; and when the period at which it was put in motion is conſidered, becomes a ſubject of the firſt curioſity and importance:—It conſiſted of twenty-one articles, which were delivered to Dufort in writing: but he was enjoined to commit them to memory, leſt any intelligence he might receive, or any any accident ſhould render it neceſſary to deſtroy the paper. The firſt article expreſſes the general deſign of reſtoring Lewis to his former authority.

The ſecond that the ſcheme was combined and ſupported by the emperor, the kings of Spain and Sardinia, the Swiſs Cantons, and the circles of the empire; and that there were aſſurances from other powers of Europe that they would not oppoſe.

The third, that the emperor would order 35,000 men to march to the frontiers of Flanders and Hainault; at the ſame time the troops of the circles, to the number of 14,000 at leaſt, ſhould march to Alſace. The ſame number of Swiſs to march towards the Lionnois and Franche Comté. The king of Sardinia will enter Dauphiné with 15,000 men. Spain had already 12,000 in Catalonia, and will augment to 20,000 the army which will threaten the ſouthern provinces of France. Theſe different corps amount in all to 100,000; which being divided into five columns, will preſs on the different frontiers of France, next to the countries to which the columns belong. Thoſe armies will be joined by ſuch of the French regiments as had remained faithful, by ſome armed volunteers who may be depended upon, as well as all thoſe in the provinces who are diſcontented with the preſent government, who will declare for the king as ſoon as the armies approach.

The fourth—that the emperor is aſſured of the king of Pruſſia's good intentions, and has taken upon himſelf the direct correſpondence with the court of Berlin.

The fifth—that care ſhould be taken to keep this coalition ſecret till the moment of exploſion, for which purpoſe partial inſurrections in the interior parts of the kingdom ſhould be prevented.

The ſixth—that as a peace between Ruſſia and Turkey will in all probability take place in July, nothing is to be feared from the diſorders which a continuation of that war might have occaſioned.

In the ſeventh the reaſons are mentioned at length for believing that one hundred thouſand men will be more than ſufficient: the principal is, that theſe armies are to be conſidered only as auxiliaries to the nobility, the troops and the natives of France who will declare for the ſame cauſe as ſoon as the combined armies ſhall appear on the frontiers.

The eighth—that every thing ſhould be ready by the end of Auguſt: a proteſtation by all the branches of the Bourbon family, ſigned by the kings of Spain and Naples, and the prince of Parma, to be publiſhed, and a manifeſto of the emperor to appear ſoon after.

The ninth—that the emperor, though being the ſoul and chief of the enterpriſe, it might be dangeroas for the queen that he ſhould appear to be the firſt mover of it; for whatever is moſt odious in the eyes of the people, or what the aſſembly can make appear ſo, will be imputed to the houſe of Auſtria. For this reaſon, with the emperor's conſent, the proteſtation in the name of the houſe of Bourbon will appear in the firſt place, and his imperial majeſty's manifeſto in favour of the injured princes, and in defence of all crowned heads, will appear with greater efficacy.

The tenth and eleventh entirely regard the proteſtation intended to be publiſhed in the name of the Bourbon family. The king and queen of Naples have ſeen it, and only wait until it ſhall be ſigned by the king of Spain before they ſign it.

The twelfth ſtates, that the king of Sardinia is in the beſt diſpoſition, his troops are ready, and he only waits the ſignal from the emperor.

The thirteenth and fourteenth ſtate, that the diet of Ratiſbon had not yet taken a final reſolution; and that other courts were expected either to co-operate or remain neutral.

The fifteenth entreats the king and queen not to allow this plan to be diſturbed by any new ideas, and that they will be very careful to whom they communicate any part of the ſcheme.

The ſixteenth warns the king to place no confidence in la Fayette, and alſo not entirely to truſt M. de Montmorin. Mention is made of the king's declaration to foreign courts by his ambaſſadors, that it had ſhocked many, but had not impoſed on any perſon of diſcernment with regard to the king's real ſentiments.

The ſeventeenth relates to particular manœuvres intended to miſlead the people's conjectures as to the real deſign.

The eighteenth declares, that a correſpondence has been always kept up with various members of the French parliaments diſperſed in different parts of Europe, who are to unite in the firſt conſiderable town of France that ſhould be in the power of the coalition; and there to compoſe a parliament, to eſtabliſh forms, to pronounce the nullity of the decrees of the national aſſembly, to judge and condemn criminals, and to give all poſſible eclat to that court.

The nineteenth, conſiſts of the warmeſt injunctions and encouragement to their majeſties, it repreſents their ſituation as very different from what it was before the eighteenth of April, before the king was obliged to go to the national aſſembly, before he had ſent the letter to the ambaſſadors; and although it were to be wiſhed that their majeſties had before obtained their liberty, yet in the preſent juncture they are entreated not to liſten to any other propoſals for that purpoſe; that their preſent object ſhould be to leave no means untried to bring the aſſembly into diſgrace, and to raiſe their own popularity; from ſuch meaſures the utmoſt advantage would be derived, when the people, terrified at the entrance of foreign troops into France, ſhould ſee no ſafety but in ſubmitting. It adds, this is the emperor's opinion, and he reſts all his hopes of ſucceſs on a rigid adherence to this plan; nay entreats earneſtly that every other idea may be given up; the dreadful conſequences that would follow an unſucceſsful attempt to eſcape are anticipated with horror; and the emperor thinks their beſt ſecurity is an army of 130,000 men preceded by threatening manifeſtoes.

The twentieth relates to the duke de Polignac and a perſon in the emperor's confidence who were to manage the correſpondence. And the laſt article is the letter of credence, recommending full confidence in count Dufort.

A plan ſo extenſive, at a period when Bouille was at the head of the army on that frontier which muſt of neceſſity become the principal ſcene of action, and whoſe treachery was unknown to all thoſe whom it moſt endangered, appeared to promiſe indubitable ſucceſs: but, her evil genius, Calonne poſſeſſed an influence in the counſels of the queen which, when exerciſed to ſerve her, once more only helped to deſtroy her; the influence of Bouille over the king operated in the ſame way; and the royal family were for a long time undecided between the two plans. Notwithſtanding the ſecrecy with which Dufort's miſſion had been conducted, Calonne had actually contrived to obtain a perfect knowlege of the project and a copy of the articles above enumerated; his former ſituation, the zeal he had manifeſted, and the confidence of the queen, he thought gave him a juſt claim to be made acquainted with every meaſure taken for the reſtoration of the king's power; and perhaps his jealouſy dictated the remonſtrance to her majeſty which led her to prevail on the king to finally reject the plan communicated by Dufort, who had already returned to Germany with the king's aſſent.

On the eleventh of June, the king and queen, without any attendant, went to the apartments of madam de Rochereuil, a lady in the queen's ſervice; this ſuit of rooms communicated by a corridore with the apartments of the queen, and were ordered to be prepared for another perſon.

On the ſeventeenth Dumouſtier, Maldent, and Valory, who had belonged to the garde-du-corps, were provided with yellow jackets in the ſtyle of couriers; the former for the firſt time had a private conference with the king, but received his orders from a perſon whom he did not know; Valory was diſpatched to Bondy on the twentieth to provide horſes, and the ſame evening Dumouſtier was ſtationed with a coach and four at fort St. Martin; while Maldent entered the palace, where he remained in a private apartment till near twelve; a coach with two horſes having been poſted at eleven in the cour des princes.

Orders were given by the queen about midnight to dreſs the prince and princeſs-royal, and they were conveyed to the apartment which was the rendezvous, where the king and queen with the princeſs Elizabeth were in waiting; there were beſides two ſtrangers, one of whom conducted the two female attendants of the prince and princeſs to the Quais de Voltaire, where having placed them in a carriage, he withdrew, and the ladies were driven to Claye. The other ſtranger conducted the prince, princeſs-royal, and madam de Tourzel to the carriage in the cour des princes, whence they were conveyed to the Carouſel, where the queen and princeſs Elizabeth ſoon after arrived without any attendant, and were handed into the coach by the coachman. The king arrived laſt, attended by Maldent, who mounted behind the coach, which drove immediately to port St. Martin, where a carriage with four horſes waited for them all under charge of Dumouſtier; they drove directly to Bondy, where Valory waited with freſh horſes. The female attendants joined them on the road; and they paſſed unſuſpected near an hundred and ſeventy miles from Paris, although the king had entered into familiar converſation with different people at ſeveral poſt-houſes where they had occaſion to ſtop.

About eight o'clock on the morning of the twenty-firſt, the flight of the king and royal family was known; the firſt ſenſation was an emotion of conſternation ſurpriſe and indignation, the news ſpread rapidly; the people hurried from all points to the gardens of the Thuilleries and the Luxembourg; all the ſigns bearing portraits of the king, or queen, or emblems of royalty were torn down, and trampled under foot; the ſection of Luxembourg tore to pieces a banner that had been preſented to them by monſieur; even a man whoſe name was Louis, was obliged to eraſe it from his door; and the officer of the guard at the Thuilleries narrowly eſcaped the popular rage. If a teſt had been wanting of the ſpirit and patriotiſm of the nation, none could have been deviſed ſo deciſive or ſatisfactory. The aſſembly received the news with a calmneſs and dignity, ſufficient almoſt to diſcountenance oppoſition. Their firſt care was the public ſafety and tranquillity. They committed to the miniſters the execution of the laws, and the other political functions of the king. A new oath of fidelity to the nation was preſcribed to the military, which was taken by Rochambeau, la Fayette, d'Affry, and all the other officers and the armed force. Couriers were diſpatched to all the different parts of the kingdom, with orders to ſtop the fugitives, and to recommend the preſervation of peace and good order. After theſe precautions the aſſembly, with magnanimous calmneſs reſumed their ordinary labours, and proceeded to the diſcuſſion of the penal code.

Recovered from their firſt ſurprize, the people remarked, that for ſome weeks previous to this event, the emigrations had encreaſed in an unuſual degree, notwithſtanding the recent appearances of a good diſpoſition in the court; that the circulating ſpecie had diſappeared as if by a miracle; that the nonjuring prieſts had been more than ordinarily active though apparently more content; and it appeared that at the ſame period of time attempts had been made to detach the privates of every regiment in France from their confidence in the aſſembly, by a miſrepreſentation of its decrees, and by offers of money; promotion had been offered to non-commiſſioned officers of regiments on the frontiers, and every hour brought forth ſome new evidence of the extent and long preparation of the plot.

The perfidious Bouillé, by a variety of fictions and excuſes, had evaded for a long time the civic oath; but at length he had taken it with ſuch ſpontaneous tokens of zeal as left no room to doubt of his fidelity. He was entruſted with the protection of the frontiers: a truſt which he exerciſed more conſiſtently with his own character and views than with the principles of duty and honour. He either permitted the fortifications of all the frontier towns to run to decay, or aſſiſted in their dilapidation. The garriſons were left without proviſions or ammunition. The national ſoldiery were replaced wherever it was poſſible with foreigners, and the utmoſt pains were taken to ſpread diſunion and diſcontent among the national troops. The place nominally appointed for the retreat of the king, was Montmedy, a fortified town of Luxembourg; but it was generally ſuppoſed that his actual reſidence was to be within the emperor's dominions. Here the emigrants from all quarters were to be aſſembled, and were to act in concert with the powerful ſuccors which were to be furniſhed by Pruſſia and Auſtria, while other diverſions were to be made on the ſide of Spain and Savoy, by the reſpective monarchs of thoſe countries.

Such is the account which is moſt generally believed of the motives and plans of this ill-concerted and unfortunate journey; unfortunate for the country, becauſe it deſtroyed public confidence and doubly unfortunate for the monarch, becauſe it for ever loſt him the love of a people, who, in the moſt diſtreſsful and tumultuous circumſtances of the revolution, were never before known to waver or abate in the perſonal regard which they retained for their ſovereign. The king's intention was not kept ſuch a profound ſecret, but that it was known to Gouvion, one of the officers of the national guard, who communicated it to the mayor and la Fayette: the guard was in conſequence doubled, and ſuch precautions were taken as appeared likely to prevent every poſſibility of effecting the intention. However, the king, the queen, madame Elizabeth, ſiſter to the king, and the whole of the royal family ſuddenly diſappeared. Monſieur and madame who were compriſed in his plan; took the road to Mons; and the king's party that of Montmedy.

Though the majority of the nation, unequivocally evinced their attachment to the conſtitution, the flight of the king was viewed in very different lights, according as the different parties felt their particular prejudices effected by the event. But all concurred, in condemning the temerity of the miniſters who adviſed the king to fly, ſince it involved him in the guilt of an act of perjury. At the firſt dawn of the revolution, two parties only divided the maſs of the people; the friends of previleges and ariſtocracy, and the friends of liberty: but the latter had ſince divided into two, and out of theſe one more dangerous to the ariſtocracy aroſe; the republican party; to whom the departure of the king was a matter of triumph: their hopes were now likely to meet at leaſt a preſent gratification: they enlarged upon the abſurdity of a government which enabled an individual to throw the whole ſtate into confuſion: they repreſented the king as a perjured monſter, whoſe patriotiſm and love for his people would preſently be evinced by his entering France at the head of the hoſtile armies, to ravage the country, and to drench it in blood. The loſs of authority, they ſtated, muſt be ever, to him who once poſſeſſed it, a ſubject of regret; and they exhorted the lovers of liberty, even if the king's flight ſhould be prevented, to make uſe of the opportunity to relieve the nation from a natural enemy. Others who profeſſed to be more moderate preferred a limited monarchy, as at leaſt the moſt expedient form of government, and conſidered it as abſurd in a nation enjoying perfect liberty, to diſpute about the mode or form in which it ſhould be adminiſtered. They conſidered, that even if the republican form was preferable, cuſtom had inured the French to monarchy, and their ſtrongeſt prejudices inclined them to ſupport it: that the nation was not in a ſtate to ſtand the ſhock of a ſecond revolution; they therefore contemplated it as the happieſt event that could occur, ſhould the king by any fortunate chance be reſtored; and foreſaw a train of the moſt formidable evils threatening the kingdom and the people, ſhould he fall into the hands of their enemies. The royaliſts were either ſilent or not to be ſeen.

The hopes of the republicans were damped for the moment by the vigilance of two obſcure individuals. To favor their eſcape, the royal family had provided a paſſport through the regular offices, in the name of the baroneſs de Kroff, for herſelf and ſuite, as travelling to Frankfort. At ſome diſtance from the capital detachments of dragoons had been placed by Bouille, under pretence of guarding ſome treaſure for the pay of the ſoldiers. At St. Menehould, a few leagues from the frontiers, the poſt-maſter, Drouet who had formerly been a dragoon in the regiment of Condé, recogniſed the queen; the eſcort of dragoons was relieved by a detachment of huſſars, which confirmed the firſt impreſſion of ſuſpicion: he inſtantly determined to ſtop them, but being alone, he was prudent enough not to expoſe himſelf. The carriage having paſſed, and the cavalry preparing to follow at ſome diſtance, he gave the alarm and a crowd collecting expoſtulated with the ſoldiers who became paſſive; meanwhile Drouet, with one Guilliame, ſet off on horſeback for Clermont, where they learned that the travellers inſtead of going to Metz, had taken the road to Varennes; thither they proceeded by croſs-roads with ſuch ſpeed as to reach the inn of Bras d'Or, a few minutes before the fugitives; he had ſpread the alarm as he had rode along, and inſtantly informed Leblanc the inn-keeper, that two carriages were on the point of arriving with the king and royal family, who were ſecretly deſerting the nation. The inn-keeper directly ran to a magiſtrate, who ſummoned the municipal officers and the national-guards. Meanwhile the travellers had arrived, and meaſures were taken to enſure their detention; while the magiſtrates proceeded to the inn Drouet and Guillaume ſeized on a waggon laden with furniture, which they threw down at the foot of a bridge over which the travellers muſt neceſſarily paſs to get out of the town. When the carriages had arrived, which was about midnight, the civil officers with the commandant and a few others, ſurrounded the principal coach, and aſked the names of the travellers. The couriers behind anſwered that they were all good patriots, and the queen produciug the paſſport, ſigned by Louis and Montmorin, ſaid with petulance that they were in haſte; the number of perſons collected was now more conſiderable, and ſeveral appeared ſatisfied with the paſſport; but the magiſtrate had reſolved that they ſhould not proceed before morning, and obſerved as a pretext that the paſſport was not ſigned by the preſident of the national aſſembly; he ſignified that the roads were too difficult to travel by night, and urged them to take apartments in his houſe, which they reluctantly aceepted; ſeveral noticed the reſemblance of the king to the portrait on the fifty livre aſſignat, others remarked that the children correſponded in number and age with thoſe of the royal family, and all agreed that it was very extraordinary that a Ruſſian baroneſs ſhould be ſo ſtrongly eſcorted by French troops. A party of huſſars under the command of an aid-de-camp of Bouille arrived, and drew up before the door, and were ordered to perform ſome evolutions; the officer commanding the national-guard ſuſpected their intention was to ſeize on two pieces of cannon which had been a few moments before brought in, he ordered them to be planted at the extremeties of the ſtreet, ſo as to place the huſſars between two fires, and addreſſing the huſſars, ſaid he hoped they were too good citizens to aid the flight of the king or in the injury of their brethren. The officer of the huſſars offered to move his corps, but the national-guard who were now drawn up refuſed to let them paſs; the huſſar officer ſtruck at the officer of the national-guard with his ſabre, the latter evaded the ſtroke, and drawing a piſtol wounded the other. The huſſars looked on at the rencontre with perfect complacency, and when their officer was removed for ſurgical aid, they demanded an officer of the national-guard to command them.

Meanwhile DeLon, a judge of the diſtrict, who had frequently ſeen the king, was ſent for, and on his entering the apartment, ſignified by an expreſſive look to the magiſtrates that it was unqueſtionably he. The unhappy prince ſaw that further diſſimulation would be vain, and addreſſed himſelf with great emotion to the magiſtrates—"Yes, I am your

" king—I have fled from Paris, where I was ſurrounded with poniards and bayonets—
" I have come to my faithful ſubjects of this province in ſearch of liberty and ſafety—
" I mean to proceed no farther than Montmedi—I entreat you not to impede me."

The queen alſo addreſſed them, and conjured all around to ſave her and her children: but the magiſtrate was immovable; he produced a copy of the decree which rendered it unlawful for the king to go to a greater diſtance than twenty leagues from the national-aſſembly, that he had ſworn fidelity to the nation and the law, and that their return to Paris was indiſpenſable, and they were obliged to ſet out.

The news of theſe tranſactions were brought to Paris by Margin a ſurgeon, who had been with ſeveral others active in collecting the national-guards. The ſatisfaction which this evidence of the attachment of the people produced in the aſſembly and capital is not to be deſcribed; the uncommon tranquillity that had ſucceeded the firſt conſternation, was not even now diſturbed; the aſſembly with a moderation that was truly humane and dignified, decreed that meaſures ſhould be immediately taken for the protection of the king, the heir to the throne, and the reſt of the royal family, and Petion, Latour-Maubourg, and Barnave, members, were inveſted with full powers, and ordered to proceed to meet them; Bouille was ſuſpended from his functions, and ordered to be arreſted, but he had fled; two commiſſioners were appointed to examine the inferior agents in the flight, and Tronchet, d'Andre, and Duport, to receive the declaration of the king and queen.

The royal family was eſcorted to Paris by a conſiderable body of the national-guard, who encreaſed in numbers as they approached the metropolis, and public tranquillity was ſo well preſerved, that they entered the Thuilleries on the 25th without any diſturbance, and with no apparent inconvenience but the fatigue of the journey. On the 27th the commiſſioners waited on the king and queen to receive their declarations.

The king aſſigned as his principal motives " the inſults he and his family had received, and the danger he conceived them to be in from thoſe inſults not having been puniſhed. That his deſign was not to have quitted the kingdom, but only to repair to Montmedi, where he would have been better ſituated than in the capital, for oppoſing the attempts of foreign powers, and from whence he could have with eaſe repaired to any other part of the frontiers where his preſence might have been requiſite. That another object he had in view was to aſcertain, what the real diſpoſition of the nation was reſpecting the conſtitution, which had been variouſly repreſented to him, but which he now knew to be decidedly in its favour. That he wiſhed to prove to France and all Europe that he was at liberty; and not a priſoner as was believed by many. That as he had it not in his power to quit Paris publicly, he had left it ſecretly; but without any concert with foreign powers, with his own relations, or any French emigrant. That he had ordered the three perſons who had accompanied him as couriers to provide themſelves with travelling jackets, becauſe they were to be ſent with diſpatches, and that he had not communicated any thing more to them until the day of their departure. That the paſſport was obtained for a foreign country, becauſe there are none given for travelling within the kingdom. That if he had intended to go out of the kingdom, he would not have ordered his memorial addreſſed to the French nation to be made public the day after leaving the Thuilleries, but would have delayed until he had at leaſt paſſed the frontiers."

Monſieur and madam, who had taken a different road, were more ſucceſsful in effecting their eſcape, and arrived ſafe at Bruſſels on the 23d.

The neceſſity of completing the fabric of the conſtitution became now more than ever apparent, and the aſſembly laboured inceſſantly on the municipal code and the organization of the army. In the mean time every precaution was taken to preſerve the peace of the kingdom; and a decree was paſſed, the ſubſtance of which was, that ſuch of the emigrants as did not return within two months ſhould be ſubject to triple taxes for the year 1791.

The flight of the king ſeemed indeed the ſignal for the emigrants to commence their hoſtile proceedings. M. Gazales and ſome others of the ariſtocratic party ſent in their reſignations to the national aſſembly; troops were levied on the frontiers in the king's name, and many of the former officers of the royal regiments had for ſome time exerted themſelves to ſeduce the ſoldiers from their allegiance by promiſes of advancement and high rewards: their attempts, however, were in general without ſucceſs; a circumſtance which has not been adverted to by thoſe who ſuppoſe the attachment of the French ſoldiery to the revolution to have been entirely venal. As theſe levies were made in the name of the king, he thought it proper formally to diſavow them, which he did in a letter to the national aſſembly dated the ſeventh of July.

The return of the king appeared to make very little alteration in the deſigns of the ſovereigns who were confederated againſt France. Spain, indeed, whoſe political intereſts were more diametrically oppoſite to a rupture with France, renewed on the occaſion its profeſſions of amity. The other courts ſtill kept at a diſtance, and the German frontier was crowded with troops, and every where engaged in military preparations. He muſt indeed know little of public affairs, who can ſuppoſe that ſuch a circumſtance could make any alteration in the intentions of the combined courts. The politics of deſpots are always ſelfiſh; increaſe of territory is ſtill their favourite purſuit. It would be weak to ſuppoſe that compaſſion for the emigrants, ſympathy for the king, or even zeal for the maintainance of royal authority, would be motives of themſelves ſtrong enough to engage them in the expences and difficulties of war. A ſtronger incitement muſt be ſuppoſed; and that could be no other than the diſmemberment of France, and the annihilation of her power. Auſtria, victorious and enriched with the ſpoils of France, might gratify the rapacity of Pruſſia with ſome of the petty ſtates of the empire; and that power, which hitherto ſecretly ſtimulated the combination, would at once be left in poſſeſſion of the uncontrouled dominion of the ocean and the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies.

France, however, ſtill continued in too united a ſtate to warrant any immediate enterpriſe againſt her. Addreſſes breathing the ſtrongeſt profeſſions of loyalty and attachment to the conſtitution poured in from every quarter. Foreigners reſiding in France ſeemed ſolicitous of the honour of being claſſed among her citizens. The conduct of the aſſembly was not unworthy of the confidence which the nation ſeemed to place in its virtue and patrotiſm. Calmneſs, dignity, and moderation characterized its proceedings. Their conduct was the moſt powerful rebuke on the hypocriſy of Lewis. In oppoſition to the republicans, they tenaciouſly adhered to its conſtitutional decree concerning the inviolability of the king's perſon. Even the emigrants were treated with a degree of indulgence: the prince de Condé himſelf, though profeſſedly in a ſtate of war with his country, did not experience either haſte or ſeverity from the assembly. Duveyrier was sent as envoy to him and the other princes, to solicit their return to the enjoyment of happiness and security in the bosom of their country; but to their enternal infamy, this ambassador of peace was imprisoned, and insulted in the most barbarous manner.

The unanimity which prevailed throughout France, from the time of the king's return till his acceptance of the constitution, was however interrupted by a short but disgraceful riot at Paris Several efforts had been made by ill-disposed persons, in the pay of the emigrants, and the hostile princes, to disturb the public tranquillity, by circulating lists of members of the assembly who were reported to be bribed to betray their trust, and other insidious manœuvres. These efforts however all proved abortive till the morning of the 17th of July, when the magistrates were alarmed by the report that a large body of seditious persons were about to assemble in the Champ de Mars, the professed object of whom was to petition against the re-establishment of the king, a measure which the Jacobin club had debated warmly. Two of the magistrates were sent to the suburb of St. Antoine, where they had the satisfaction to find that the alarm was a false one and that every thing was quiet. At eleven o'clock, however, two unfortunate persons, who had secreted themselves under the altar of confederation, were murdered by the mob, on a suspicion that they had intended to blow it up with gunpowder. Three municipal officers were therefore dispatched, at the head of a battalion of national-guards to seize the murderers and disperse the insurgents. The mob attacked the national-guard, and one man had the audacity to fire on La Fayette himself. The man was seized; but La Fayette, with great generosity permitted him to escape. The red flag was now displayed, and martial-law proclaimed. The national-guard was at length obliged to fire upon the people, who did not disperse till about twelve were killed, and fifty or sixty wounded. It was asserted, with what truth it is difficult to say, that foreign emissaries were discovered among the populace distributing money, and exciting them to rebellion.

Before we pass the æra marked by the dissolution of the constituent assembly, and take up the transactions of the second, or legislative assembly, it may be useful to notice some events of French affairs in Asia, which, though not known in Europe at the close of the year 1791, properly belong to this period of history, and which may serve to illustrate subsequent events of greater magnitude and importance.

In the West-Indies, the numerous and populous colonies of France felt the shock of the revolution, with the most unhappy effects; her colonies in Asia had long before this period fallen into inconsequence from the more successful enterprises and policy of her great rival; reduced however, as the French power and trade was after the treaty of Mangalore, in 1784, the natives of France who remained in Asia were very numerous; more considerable in numbers than any other nation beside the British. Long before the revolution, Pondicherry had been dismantled by the feeble or corrupt counsels of Lewis the Sixteenth; and the African island of Mauritius to the southward of the line was by this preposterous policy made the emporium of the French oriental commerce. Pondicherry from being the most beautiful, healthy, and happy city in Asia, became through this unacountable and fatal desertion, a solitary and unproductive settlement; although situated more advantageously than Madras the English capital on the same coast, it no longer rivalled it. France possessed on the Malabar coast the small settlement of Mahé, and in Bengal, the handſome and healthy town of Chandernagore; a few ſmaller, but inſignificant villages on the ſea coaſts, and a petty factory on the Ganges, conſtituted all the power ſhe had left, who had at no remote period poſſeſſed the aſcendancy over all the European powers in Hinduſtan.

It has been aſſerted that France diſmantled Pondicherry, in the ſame ſpirit that ſhe negociated the commercial treaty of 1786, to conciliate by conceſſion and preſerve peace by removing jealouſies; whether ſuch was her motive, or the ignorance or corruption of her miniſters produced it, at the commencement of the revolution ſhe had not a ſingle offenſive gun mounted, nor two hundred European ſoldiers in all Aſia, and the ſepahis diſtributed on the coaſts of Malabar and Coromandel, and in Bengal amounting to about the ſame number, were maintained merely for purpoſes of parade, as the guards of the the mimic majeſty of the governors, whoſe duties were rather of a conſular than political nature; perhaps the gaudy and ſuperfluous pomp aſſumed by the French governors, tho' ariſing from their own vanity, was conſtrued by their jealous rivals as an indication of latent deſigns to regain the influence and power which they had once poſſeſſed; the manners of the French, their cheerfulneſs and urbanity, and the unconſtrained civility and deference which they ſhewed for the perſons and prejudices of the natives, had rendered them peculiarly favoured in all parts of Aſia; the ſupercilious reſerve, diſtance, and arrogance of the Engliſh, and the characteriſtic oppreſſion of their government, contributed to render the prepoſſeſſion in favour of their rivals more ſtrong; the period was now arrived to remove ſuch a ſource of conſtant apprehenſion.

The French had ſuffered their alliances in Aſia to decline; they no longer ſupported agents at the durbars of Poonah, Hyderabad, and Myſore, and the ſovereign of the latter alarmed at this apparent defection of the only power to whom he could look for protection againſt the ambition and hatred of the Engliſh, had ſent ambaſſadors to Paris, with a view to renew the alliance; the financial diſtreſſes of France muſt be ſuppoſed to have prevailed on the adminiſtration to reject the temptations held forth on this occaſion, of large extent of dominion on the Malabar coaſt. Notwithſtanding, the aſſurances of a good underſtanding were given, and a treaty of friendſhip without any military ſtipulations was ratified, and they returned home with a number of able artificers in various branches.

This tranſaction was a ſtrong cauſe of diſquietude to the Engliſh, and Tippoo Sultaun by ſtudiouſly concealing his want of ſucceſs involved his intentions in perplexing myſtery: in the month of June 1789, he marched a body of troops againſt the fortreſs of Cranganore over which he claimed a ſpecies of feudal ſovereignty; this place had been ſome time a ſubject of diſpute between the Dutch, to whom it formerly belonged, the ſovereign of Myſore, in whoſe territory it ſtood, and the rajah of Travancore, an ally of the Engliſh, who had been prompted by the latter to purchaſe the Dutch claim and take upon himſelf the ſovereignty: this ſtroke of policy was calculated to expulſe the Dutch from that coaſt, to defeat the deſigns of the ſultaun, who had long turned his mind to a naval eſtabliſhment, and ultimately to ſecure the monopoly of the whole Malabar trade. Tippoo did not attack the place till the twenty-ninth of December, when he commenced a heavy fire on the principal work, but Mr. Powney an agent of the Engliſh had arrived from Madras, and now ſignified to the ſultaun that the rajah was their ally; he immediately ceaſed hoſtility, and offered to ſubmit his claims to ſuch amicable arbitration as the Engliſh might think proper; but the overland diſpatches from Europe in January 1790, had ſuperceded any diſpoſition which they might have entertained to an equitable adjuſtment.

Tippoo had inceſſantly employed himſelf in urging the Engliſh government to prevail on the rajah to relinquiſh Cranganore, and offered to indemnify him for expences incurred on that account; he ſtill lay encamped in his former ſtation, when on the firſt of March his camp was ſuddenly ſtormed by the rajah; the reſiſtance under all the circumſtances was brave but deſparate; the rajah however poſſeſſed the ſuperiority in an artillery admirably ſerved by Europeans who had been ſecretly detached from Madras.

While Tippoo lay in falſe ſecurity within his lines from December to March, a treaty had been concluded between the Paiſhwah of the Mahrattahs, the Nizam, and the Engliſh, the principle and object of which was the partition of his dominions between the allies; and the public motives aſſigned for commencing the war were —firſt, the attack upon the rajah of Travancore, whoſe cauſe was repreſented as ſacred, he being deſcended from the ancient Zamorins; ſecondly, that Hyder Ali having uſurped the throne of Myſore, and placed the legitimate ſovereigns in confinement, where they were ſtill retained by Tippoo, the allies felt themſelves called upon to expel the uſurper, to reſtore the two hereditary princes, and to reconquer ſuch territories as the uſurpers had annexed to the original dominion of Myſore from the ſpoliation of its neighbours.

It belongs not to the hiſtory of France to detail the operations of this war, which commenced with declarations ſo humane and regardful of the ancient hereditary ſovereigns of India, and which ended in a treaty wherein thoſe ſacred and venerable objects were not ſo much as mentioned; but as the diſaſtrous circumſtances of France preſented a juncture favorable to the allied powers, and the want of a very ſlender ſupport from France rendered the ſubjugation of the ſultaun eaſy, which otherwiſe could not have been accompliſhed; the circumſtances link it with the general effects of the revolution.

Party ſpirit, which has manifeſted itſelf ſo unhappily in Europe, appeared among the French in the firſt moment of the intelligence that a revolution had taken place; the French governors bred up in military habits, and many others ſwayed by prejudices and intereſt, took a deciſive part on the ſide of the ancient government; but the greater number appeared rather to anticipate a republican government that the middle path of limited monarchy, and openly and proudly exulted in the freedom of their counrry. Through this diviſion it was that in the armies of Tippoo Sultaun the French engineers and officers no longer gave his operations that conſequence which they had formerly ſuſtained. The advocates of the ancient French government were openly and avowedly ſupported by the Engliſh governors, and did not therefore join the Sultaun; the friends of French freedom diſdained the ſervice in the warmth of their enthuſiaſm; and a few adventurers of no principle and without capacity were Tippoo's only auxiliaries againſt the moſt powerful alliance Aſia had ever known.

Engroſſed by her concerns at home, the French government appeared to have relinquiſhed all concerns for Aſia; they had ſent general Conway, an officer who had ſerved with the French troops in the American revolution, to Mauritius as governor-general of their oriental affairs, a colonel Dupleſſis commanded at Pondicherry, and the chevalier Montigny at Chandernagore; who were all adverſe to the popular party. The coloniſts however adopted the example of the mother country, and formed municipal councils in the different colonies; they inſiſted on repreſentative adminiſtration, but left the execution of the laws and the command of their few military to the governors.

Some reſiſtance was made at Mauritius to this ſpirit of innovation by governor Conway; Macnamara, a captain of a French ſhip of the line, in conſequence of ſome ſeverity which he had employed againſt the popular party, was maſſacred in the ſtreets of the capital of that iſland, and Conway ſoon after eſcaped.

At Pondicherry, though party ſpirit prevailed, no diſaſters took place until the ſiege and capture after the declaration of war.

But Chandernagore, though inferior in extent and opulence, preſented ſome events, though not productive of bloodſhed, which deſerve particular notice. Montigny who was a colonel in the army, had before the coloniſts took upon them to accomodate the laws to freedom, maintained a ſyſtem in his government much better calculated to enrich himſelf than to render happineſs to the coloniſts; the ſcrutiny which the municipality had made into his adminiſtration had produced unpleaſant diſcoveries, which gave him offence, and having the ſoldiers under his command, he determined to employ force to maintain his authority; the colony is about twenty-ſix miles above Calcutta, upon the river Hoogly, and Montigny, who had maintained a good underſtanding with Cornwallis, applied on this occaſion for cannon and ammunition; Montigny in the mean time had removed to Ghyretty, a ſumptuous palace appropriated for their governors, two miles from Chandernagore, and had carried with him the records, and the military conſiſting of about forty Europeans and eighty Sepahis, under the command of major Fremont, an old and experienced officer; at this place he was ſupplied with two ſix-pounders and powder and ball from Fort-William, and an augmentation of his Sepahis.

Theſe tranſactions took place before the cloſe of the year 1790; about the beginning of the following year the coloniſts had in conſequence of the removal of the military found it neceſſary to form themſelves into militia, or national-guards, Montigny having intimated an intention to ſeize upon ſome members of the municipality; the Engliſh government had been already inſtructed from Europe upon the mode of its deportment towards the French in Aſia, and this military array of the coloniſts was ſeized upon to manifeſt the diſpoſition of earl Cornwallis towards the friends of the revolution. Upon a preſumption that the article of a treaty which prohibited the conſtruction of a foſſe, or ditch, round that colony, forbad by implication the maintenance of any military equipment beyond the number kept for the governor's guard, he notified the colonial municipality, that if they did not ceaſe from their military proceedings he ſhould march a body of troops to compel them. The coloniſts immediately deputed three of their repreſentatives to Calcutta, but their remonſtrance would not be heard unleſs through the medium of Montigny, whoſe functions it was known the coloniſts had ſuſpended upon a charge of treaſon. It is not an unimportant circumſtance in theſe tranſactions to notice, that although the colony might before the revolution have contained about fifteen thouſand, of which nearly a thouſand of both ſexes were Europeans or their deſcendants, that at this period the whole number who had aſſumed the military duties did not amount to two hundred perſons of every colour. Two battalions of Engliſh ſepahis, of twelve hundred men each, ſuddenly paſſed the river Hoogly, from their cantontments at Barrakpore, and appeared before the French colony; feeble in number and taken by ſurprize, the coloniſts loſt no time in diſembarking a few iron guns from two French trading veſſels that lay off the town, theſe were planted in commanding poſitions in the ſtreets, on breaſtworks and traverſes rapidly thrown up, while Cabareux, the preſident for the month, proceeded with a flag of truce to learn the cauſe and deſign of this hoſtile appearance. The Engliſh officer ſignified that his orders were to ſuppreſs the military parade that was carrying on in the colony contrary to treaty, to reſtrain their licentious proceedings which held forth ſo bad an example to the neighbouring colonies and the natives in general, and to reſtore the king's repreſentative to his legal authority. The coloniſts however peremptorily refuſed to concede in any reſpect; they remonſtrated on the impropriety of the interference of a nation at peace with France, in her internal affairs, and concluded with a wiſh to preſerve an honorable harmony with the Engliſh people, of whoſe regards they would prove themſelves worthy ſhould their new-born liberties be attacked. The Engliſh remained in that poſition for two days, but finding their threats unavailing, decamped and recroſſed the river in the night.

The town once more aſſumed an aſpect of peace; the hoſtile appearance of the Engliſh determined the coloniſts to adopts meaſures of more vigour; they had for ſome time been in poſſeſſion of deciſive evidence of a ſecret correſpondence between Montigny and the Engliſh governor-general; they had diſcovered that the former had received important diſpatches from Europe and Mauritius which had been communicated to Cornwallis, and that ſeveral conſiderable ſums of money had been paid to Montigny from the private agents of earl Cornwallis, Meſſrs. Burgh and Barber of Calcutta, to Viaſars a French merchant in that city, the agent of Montigny, and for his uſe.

Though the coloniſts were few in number, and the moſt opulent had removed to the neighboring ſettlements, they were not deprived of men of talents and intrepidity: the moſt diſtinguiſhed of theſe was Richemont, procureur-du-roy, who continued to perform the functions of that office under the municipality; he had been bred up under Turgot, and in his various relations private and public proved himſelf a diſciple worthy of ſuch a man; long before the revolution his love of liberty and literary talents had rendered him beloved by the Engliſh in Bengal, he was not leſs admired by his own countrymen, who now recogniſed in his conduct the realization of his long-eſtabliſhed opinions; to him was committed the execution of an enterprize, calculated to relieve the colony from the intrigues of their depoſed governor and to bring him before the tribunal of juſtice in France.

A corvette was expeditiouſly equipped to convey diſpatches, oſtenſibly for Pondicherry and Mauritius, but really for Europe, while the chevalier Montigny and others of the ex-coloniſts were confidently entrenched with their Engliſh artillery at Ghyretty. A ſelect party of thirty perſons, was divided into three, under the guidance of Richemont, Micheli a phyſician, and Maurevert a ſerjeant of the old artillery; one of theſe ſubdiviſions was to fall down the river with the tide, ſo as to reach the front of the palace at the appointed hour; a ſecond was to ſcale the garden walls in the rear, and the main diviſion to approach by the avenue in front, where the cannon were planted. At eleven o'clock at night a rocket from each party certified their punctual arrival at their ſtations; they directly marched forward; the cannon were ſeized without a ſhot fired, and pointed toward the court yard, the ſepahis diſarmed, and every one being provided with torches, they were ſuddenly lighted, which ſerved to inform the parties who had taken poſſeſſion of the ammunition near the water-ſide, the other who had ſeized upon the chevalier and the reſt, of their common ſucceſs; among the captives were major Fremont, and Bretel celebrated for his enormous peculations in the hoſpital of invalids at Paris, theſe and the governor were directly marched priſoners with the cannon to Chandernagore, the ladies eight in number were left to their own diſcretion, and the other gentlemen were detained on parole till morning. But the moſt important conſequence of this enterprize was the ſeizure of all Montigny's papers, among which were ſeveral in the hand-writing of Cornwallis, completely ſubſtantiating the moſt abandoned delinquency of their captive, and developing the diſpoſitions of the Engliſh government towards the French revolution.

After the delay neceſſary to tranſcribe this treaſonable correſpondence, Montigny was embarked on the corvette, to be ſent to Europe; and had proceeded as far as the mouth of the Ganges, when the corvette was brought to by two Engliſh armed veſſels, on board of which was a conſiderable detachment of European troops under the command of captain Apſley the aid-de-camp of the Engliſh governor-general, who demanded the liberation of Montigny; the French captain refuſed, and the Engliſh veſſels fired into her; whereupon the French officer fired a ſhot and ſtruck his colours, and the veſſel was brought up to Calcutta. Montigny was provided with a paſſage to England by the Engliſh government.

Cornwallis ſoon after proceeded to the command of the army in Myſore, and when on the declaration of war in 1792, all the French ſettlement swere ſeized upon, the coloniſts of Chandernagore, who had poſſeſſed themſelves of the original letters of Cornwallis were treated with a ſeverity that exhibited a very extraordinary contraſt with his acknowlegements of the kindneſs which he had experienced from the French when he was himſelf a priſoner at York-town.

Thus ended the French power in Aſia, a power which though ſlender at the commencement of the revolution, is not likely to be reſtored even to that inſignificant conſequence, unleſs ſome great and unforeſeen change ſhould annihilate that aſtoniſhing dominion of its rival, which is now ſuſtained by the breath of opinion only.

The period now approached, when the conſtituent aſſembly were to terminate their labours. A committee had been for ſome time employed in compiling and digeſting into a code the conſtitutional decrees, and on the 4th of Auguſt it was read to the aſſembly by Thouret, and debated article by article on the following days. On the 3d of September it was preſented to the king. He ſignified his acceptance of it in writing on the 13th; and the following day he appeared at the aſſembly, introduced by a deputation of ſixty members, and ſolemnly conſecrated the aſſent which he had already given, and concluded with an oath "to be faithful to the nation and to the law, and to employ the powers veſted in him for the maintenance of the conſtitution, and the due execution of the law."

While the conſtitutional act was in agitation, an additional decree was paſſed, importing that no branch of the royal family ſhould be competent to exerciſe any employment in the gift of the people; and on the thirtieth of September, 1791, having firſt taken the meaſures for the introduction of their ſucceſſors, the conſtituent national aſſembly terminated an uninterrupted ſeſſion of two years and four months, and ſpontaneouſly diſſolved itſelf.

The celebrity of this aſſembly will be as durable as the hiſtory of the French nation: compoſed of a variety of characters, men educated under the moſt ſeducing and impoſing prejudices, and others elevated above the ordinary imperfections and propenſities of vitiated humanity, by the ſuperior influence of philoſophy in a reaſoning age; mixed with men of habits formed under and minds rooted in deſpotiſm, and others of talents the moſt ſplendid with morals the moſt relaxed; called together under circumſtances which could not have been foreſeen, and to rectify evils which no preceding example could afford principles to proceed by; exhibiting an intelligence ſo general, a diſintereſtneſs ſo predominant; public ſpirit governed by the broadeſt maxims of humanity; moderation in power, and forbearance under injury and provocation,—form ſuch a rare combination of objects deſerving admiration, as no preceding hiſtory can afford; that there appeared ſome blemiſhes in their proceedings is not ſo extraordinary as that they were ſo few, when it is conſidered that the power of an intriguing court, a corrupt nobility, and an opulent and bigotted clergy, were oppoſed to them—that party obſtructed and ſometimes diſtracted their deliberations; and under all theſe difficultes, ſo greatly ſuperior was the good they performed, that the evil into which they were ſometimes betrayed, is obliterated in the beneficence and grandeur of the former.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

WITH the conſtituent aſſembly the power and dignity of the monarchy diſappeared. The new aſſembly conſiſted chiefly of country gentlemen, whoſe experience in political affairs rendered them incompetent to act for themſelves, and made them the paſſive inſtruments of a party, which though not numerous, compenſated for this defect by its talents, activity, and boldneſs: It conſiſted of men of letters, many of whom but not all of the higheſt rank in literature. Many editors of newſpapers, and publiſhers of periodical journals were, elevated to the rank of ſenators; it would be uncandid in the extreme, to conſider all the members of this deſcription, or equally unfit for their new ſtation. The great majority of them were decided republicans; but ſome were mere enthuſiaſts in this ſyſtem, while the object of a few others was undoubtedly to gratify their private ambition, or to ſatiate their private revenge. In this point, however, they were all agreed, that no government but a pure democracy was adapted to the condition of free men, and that France would never be happy and flouriſhing till every veſtige of monarchy was finally obliterated. This point they determined to enforce, and the event of the times put into their hands the means by which it was to be accompliſhed.

Such was the general outline of the firſt legiſlative aſſembly, as it was called, though we muſt except from cenſure ſome reſpectable and independent characters, who fall properly under neither claſſes which we have deſcribed. The aſſembly met on the firſt of October, and the following day proceeded to the verification of their powers. On the third Paſtoret was elected preſident, and Francois, Garron de Coulon, Cerutti, Lacepede, and Guyton-Morveau, were proclaimed ſecretaries. On the fourth all the members of the aſſembly took the conſtitutional oath in the following terms:

"I ſwear to maintain to the utmoſt of my power, the conſtitution of the kingdom, decreed by the conſtituent national aſſembly in the years 1789, 1790, 1791; and neither to propoſe nor conſent to any thing, during the continuance of this legiſlature, which may be injurious or contrary to it; and to be in every thing faithful to the nation, the law, and the king."

A deputation of the members was at the ſame time appointed to wait on the king, to acquaint his majeſty that the aſſembly was finally conſtituted.

The ſpirit with which the future deliberations of this aſſembly were to be conducted, ſoon began to manifeſt itſelf. On the return of the deputation to the aſſembly on the fifth, the reporter having ſtated that the king had informed them by the miniſter of juſtice, that he would receive the deputation at nine o'clock, one of the republican members adverted to a decree in the month of July 1789, which enacted that the aſſembly and its deputations ſhould correſpond directly with the king, and not through the medium of the miniſters: that decree was therefore re-enacted, and enforced with peculiar rigour.

The king having announced that he would repair to the aſſembly on Friday the twelfth, it was next debated in what manner he ſhould be received. In the decree that followed this debate, a trifling ſpirit was evinced. The moment the king entered the aſſembly, the members were to riſe uncovered; but as ſoon as he arrived at the bar, they were to ſit down and cover themſelves. The king was to be ſeated on the left of the preſident, not on an elevated throne, but on a ſimilar ſeat to that of the preſident. Theſe petty formalities were as impolitic as they were inconſiſtent with magnanimity, and utterly unbecoming.

Previous to the arrival of the king on the ſeventh, ſeveral deputations appeared at the bar, among the reſt, one from the commons of Paris, which renewed their proteſtations to maintain the conſtitution inviolate; the king alſo ſent a written notice, that he had appointed Bertrand to be the naval miniſter in the room of Thevenard.

Notwithſtanding the jealouſy which had been manifeſted by the aſſembly on the fifth, and the deſire which they had ſince ſhewn of degrading the regal dignity, yet the firſt meeting between the king and the legiſlature was cordial. The accommodating temper of Lewis did not permit him to ſhew reſentment, and the courteſy and affability with which he entered the hall, rendered the moſt determined republicans reſpectful. The king addreſſed the aſſembly in a judicious and patriotic oration. He pointed out briefly to them the nature of the duties they had undertaken to perform, and recommended ſome objects as requiring inſtant attention. The ſtate of the finances, he obſerved, was ſuch as required ſtrong and ſpeedy exertions to eſtabliſh an enquilibrium between the receipt and the expenditure; to accelerate the aſſeſſment and collection of taxes, and to introduce an invariable order into all the departments of this immenſe adminiſtration. The reviſion of the civil code was alſo an object which he recommended to their care; and the ſimplifying the mode of proceeding, ſo as to render the attainment of juſtice more eaſy and more prompt.

He proceeded to enlarge on the neceſſity of a ſyſtem of national education; on the organization of the army, aud the propriety of reſtoring order and diſcipline. He ſtated his hopes that the nation would not be troubled by any attack from abroad; reccommended, in a ſtile of paternal regard, unanimity and unalterable confidence between the two great branches of government, the legiſlative and executive powers, as he pointedly remarked that the enemies to the proſperity of the country were continually labouring to diſunite them.

The ſpeech of the king was received with unbounded applauſes, and the preſident replied in terms of confidence and reſpect. He complimented the king on his appearance among the repreſentatives of the nation, which he termed a new engagement with the country. He obſerved that the conſtitution, ſo far from diminiſhing the real power of the king, had only placed it on the firmeſt foundation; it had converted thoſe into friends, who had formerly been termed ſubjects; and had made him the firſt monarch in the world. He concluded with expreſſing the wiſh of the aſſembly to co-operate with the benevolent views of the king, to purify the buſineſs of legiſlation, to re-animate public credit, to repreſs anarchy. "Such, ſire," ſaid he, "is our duty, ſuch are our earneſt wiſhes, ſuch are yours; ſuch are our hopes, the gratitude and bleſſings of the people will be our reward."

It would have been a circumſtance truly fortunate for France if theſe ſentiments had been fulfilled, or if this ſpecious harmony had continued unbroken; but it was not the republican ardour of the new legiſlators, which revived the jealouſy between the executive and legiſlative powers; a ſtill more potent cauſe exiſted externally, which we have already noticed at large. The hoſtile preparations of the emperor and the continental powers did not end with the rejection of his plan; the veil of ſecrecy, which they caſt over their proceedings, the vague and obſcure terms in which they expreſſed themſelves, compared with the open boaſts and the imprudent and intemperate declarations of the emigrant princes and nobility, contributed to excite in the minds of the people a variety of ſuſpicions, in which all the perſons connected with the court were occaſionally involved.

To unravel more explicitly the cauſe of theſe fatal jealouſies, and in reality of all the unfortunate circumſtances which afterwards afflicted this unhappy and diſtracted country, it will be neceſſary to have a retroſpect once more to a tranſaction which occured ſome months previous to the period of which we are now treating, but which was then faintly known by the vague inſinuation of rumour, or by the unconnected intimations of ſome whoſe information appears to have been founded upon the moſt competent evidence.

The meeting of great and powerful princes, a writer on the revolution quaintly obſerves, like certain conjunctions of the heavenly bodies, have always been ominous to the peace and happineſs of the world. Towards the cloſe of the ſummer of this year, an extraordinary convention of this kind was held at Pilnitz in Saxony, between the emperor Leopold and the king of Pruſſia, as avowed principals, by whom a treaty was formed, in which other powers were comprehended and afterwards avowed. The profeſſed object of this treaty was ſufficiently profligate and atrocious. It was the hoſtile invaſion of France, and the overthrow of its newly eſtabliſhed form of government. An obſervation here forces itſelf upon the mind on this occaſion, that this conſpiration which was thus early formed not alone againſt the legiſlative rights of nations, but to ſubjugate and partition thoſe nations of Europe which manifeſted the moſt ardent devotion for freedom, preceded that republican enthuſiaſm which at a ſubſequent period was ſeized upon by the conſpiring kings as a juſtification of this flagrant combination of deſpotiſm, rapacity, and injuſtice. Perhaps the diſcovery of this ſtupenduous ſcheme of ambitious turpitude may be conſidered as a powerful ſtimulus to the republicans to raiſe a counter-project of revolutionary affiliation throughout Europe, in order to counteract and oppoſe the more imminent danger by which they were menaced. Neither can it eſcape attention, that at the period of this convention, the Poliſh conſtitution had been already converted from an elective into an hereditary monarchy, and the period of the flight of the French king compared with that of this convention, would place it beyond queſtion, if there were not other evidence, that the ſafety or ſecurity of Lewis had no ſhare in their motives.

But that the united objects of regal aggrandizement, the obſtruction of free government, and a particular vengeance againſt France, actuated the conſpirators is not a matter of ſimple deduction from concurring appearances; for although the ſpecific articles of the treaty of Pilnitz have not been publiſhed hitherto, diplomatic induſtry has been ſo ſucceſsful as to diſcover the principal actors and the principal facts, and to develope another treaty concluded at Pavia the ſixth of July, 1791, only ſixteen days after the flight of Lewis and twelve after his return to Paris. This treaty, which appears to have been the baſis of that of Pilnitz, was firſt diſcovered by the interception of a circular letter from the emperor to the ſeveral powers of Europe, dated at Pavia in July, wherein he invites them to co-operate in a vigorous reſiſtance to principles ſo obnoxious to the ſacred ſovereignty of kings which had pervaded France, and threatened to extend over the whole face of Europe. A peruſal of the treaty itſelf, which was not publicly known till a later period, will diſcover the means by which theſe formidable terrors were to be encountered, and with what magnanimous regards for the ſovereignty of France.

This treaty declaredly againſt the novel innovations of France, conſiſts of fourteen articles, of which the following is a tranſcript:—

"His majeſty the emperor will retake all that Lewis XIV. conquered in the Auſtrian "Netherlands; and uniting theſe provinces to the ſaid Netherlands, will give them to his "ſerene highneſs the elector-palatine, ſo that theſe new poſſeſſions, added to the palatin-"ate, may hereafter have the name of Auſtraſia.

"His majeſty the emperor will preſerve, for ever, the property and poſſeſſion of "Bavaria, to make in future an individual maſs with the domains and hereditary poſ-"ſeſſions of the houſe of Auſtria.

"Her ſerene highneſs the archduchеſs Maria-Chriſtina ſhall be, conjointly with his "ſerene highneſs her nephew, the archduke Charles, put into poſſeſſion of the duchy of "Lorraine, which ſhall be hereditary.

"Alſace ſhall be reſtored to the empire; and the biſhop and chapter of Straſburg ſhall "be reſtored to their ancient privileges, as well as the other eccleſiaſtical ſovereigns of "Germany.

"If the Swiſs Cantons accede and agree to this coalition, it may be propoſed to them "to annex to the Helvetic league the biſhopric of Porentrui, the defiles of Franche-"comté, and even thoſe of Tyrol, with the neighbouring bailiwicks, as well as the "territory of Verſoy which interſects the country of Vaud.

" Should his majeſty the king of Sardinia ſubſcribe to the coalition, Breſſe, Pugey, " and the territory of Gex, uſurped by France from Savoy, ſhall be reſtored to him.
" In caſe his Sardinian majeſty can make a grand diverſion, he ſhall be ſuffered to take " Dauphiné, and to become his for ever, as the neareſt deſcendant of the ancient dauphins.
" His majeſty the king of Spain ſhall have Rouſſilon and Bearn, with the iſland of " Corſica, and the French part of St. Domingo.
" Her majeſty the empreſs of all the Ruſſias ſhall take upon herſelf the invaſion of " Poland, and at the ſame time retain Kaminieck, with that part of Podolia which bor" ders on Moldavia.
" His majeſty the emperor ſhall oblige the Porte to give up Choczim, as well as the " ſmall forts of Servia, and thoſe on the river Lurna.
" His majeſty the king of Pruſſia by means of the above invaſion of Poland, ſhall ob" tain Dantzic and Thorn, and there unite the palatinate on the eaſt to the confines of " Sileſia. He ſhall beſide acquire Luſace, and his ſerene highneſs the elector of Saxony
" ſhall in exchange receive the reſt of Poland, and occupy the throne as hereditary " ſovereign. The preſent king of Poland ſhall retire on a penſion.
" The elector of Saxony ſhall give his daughter in marriage to the youngeſt ſon of " the grand-duke of all the Ruſſias, who will be the father of the hereditary kings of " Poland and Lithuania.

Signed—" Leopold, Prince Naſſau, count Florida Blanca, Biſchoffswerder."*

Though this treaty is ſufficiently atrocious, we find that in proportion with their acceſſion of power their projects were amplified and extended; the league of Pilnitz, which was concluded the next month, (it was ſigned the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, 1791,) comprehended projects ſtill more offenſive if poſſible to the dictates of juſtice, and to the peace of Europe. The empreſs of Ruſſia had become a principal; Poland and France inſtead of being ſubdued for hereditary kings, were to be partitioned among the conquerors, and the Germanic circles modelled anew. Myſterious and dark as theſe combinations were, their proceedings and plans were penetrated; a man of letters, animated by the ſpirit of liberty and trembling for the deſtiny of France, communicated an outline of the deſign to ſeveral of the literary men of Europe, through whom it ſpeedily reached Paris.

France at the moment when this royal banditti were plotting againſt her peace, might be ſaid literaliy to be in a ſtate of internal tranquillity. There exiſted parties, it is true, as muſt exiſt in every country newly reſcued from the dominion of prejudices and abuſes; a large portion of her citizens were deſirous of a republican government, but a ſtill larger portion were decidedly attached to their king, and the intereſts of the great body of the people were a powerful pledge for his ſecurity and their moderation. Had the conſpiring powers been truly ſolicitous for the good of Lewis, they would not have overlooked the danger to which they expoſed him by their public declarations that his cauſe was theirs, and the ſuſpicious ſecrecy of their proceedings; they would have conſidered that plots are calculated to ſucceed in times of confuſion alone; that bad citizens only have need of war, of internal diſtreſs to foſter their purpoſes of profit, power, or revenge; that where a nation is divided into two parties, to threaten the nation is to unite the whole for common defence; and in the ſpirit of their own Machiavelian policy, they ought to have known, that it is in times of peace and tranquillity, when the people feel themſelves happy, proſperous, and unſuſpicious, that the monarchical authority obtains full ſway, and imperceptibly accumulates power; and that under every ſuppoſed diſadvantage there remained to Lewis an immenſe civil-liſt, and a patronage in all the departments of the ſtate, which afforded to the monarch an extenſive influence.

* The king of England openly acceded to this treaty in March 1792; and the Stadtholder ſoon after, with a condition that the arrangements of their limits ſhould be made with the emperor, according to the deſire of their high-mightineſſes, before the partition. Spain renounced it before her treaty with France.

But if we conſider the conduct of thoſe princes towards Poland, we no longer doubt of their motives, or of their indifference for the ſafety of Lewis or the happineſs of France; in a word their practice was in manifeſt contradiction with their profeſſions—the means employed were the worſt calculated for the ends oſtenſibly propoſed. But we cannot better deſcribe the conduct of the coaleſced powers than in the words of a writer whoſe authority on the ſide of the royal party cannot be queſtioned—the celebrated Calonne, who was himſelf one of the moſt active agents in promoting the conſpiracy and whoſe ſpirit appears to pervade every ſubſequent treachery againſt the freedom of France: —"We ſhall not heſitate to diſcloſe," ſays Calonne, "what no pains have been taken "to conceal: a throne was to be eſtabliſhed, and its fall has diffuſed apparent ſatisfaction; "an oſtentatious deſire was ſhewn of retrieving, but ſoon was evinced the manifeſt pur- "poſe of diſmembering the empire; thoſe who announced themſelves as auxiliaries, ſoon "behaved as invaders; oppreſſion was to be oppoſed, and unbluſhing examples of it "were given; the world was ſcandalized by a ferocious rapacity, when it was of ſo much "importance that it ſhould be edified by ſingular acts of juſtice; and a war which ought "to be a war of general intereſt, honour, and generoſity, is become a war of aggran- "diſement, ſelfiſhneſs, and illiberal views."*

The convention of Pilnitz was not a ſecret in France, though the full extent of the terms and conditions of the treaty were but imperfectly underſtood. It was impoſſible then in the nature of things that it could be known, that a concert of princes was formed for the expreſs purpoſe of invading the country, of overturning the conſtitution, of re-eſtabliſhing deſpotic authority, and that the minds of the people ſhould not be agitated with fears and with ſuſpicions. It was next to impoſſible that a part of theſe ſuſpicions ſhould not fall upon the court. The queen in particular had never been popular, and ever ſince the revolution, candor obliges us to confeſs, her conduct was not guarded with that ſtrictneſs of prudence and reſerve which the circumſtances of the times required. The fatal flight of the king could not be eradicated from the minds of the people, and an imprudent proclamation of Bouille, equal in acrimony to that of one Arnold on a ſimilar occaſion, could not be recollected without reſentment and apprehenſion. The republican party eagerly took advantage of theſe circumſtances; the atrocity of the monarchical combination required not to be magnified, but the whole was laid to the charge of the court and of Lewis.

The ſtate of the public mind and the grand conſpiration abroad were ſeized upon with avidity and alarm by the Jacobin ſociety who at this period had obtained the plenitude of influence and power. The hiſtory of this club becomes intimately blended with that of the revolutioon. We ſhall therefore trace its origin and anticipate its character. Originally it conſiſted of a ſelect aſſociation of literary men, not exceeding forty, who met in private, long before the aſſembly of the ſtates-general, for the purpoſe of diſſeminating political knowledge among the maſs of the people. There was formed about the ſame period a club of a more enlarged nature, called the Breton club, with which this was incorporated during the firſt ſeſſion of the national aſſembly at Verſailles; upon the eſtabliſhment of the firſt conſtitution, it publicly aſſumed the title of "The friends of the conſtitution," and was removed to Paris with the public authorities; its members having augmented, at once from its novelty and the celebrity of the characters who compoſed it; upon the diſſolution of the monaſtic orders, the hall of the Jacobin friars became their place of meeting, and from thence derived the title by which they have been ſince deſignated. While it aſſembled at Verſailles, as well as after its removal to Paris, public topics were ſyſtematically diſcuſſed, particularly ſuch as were to become ſubjects of diſcuſſion in the aſſembly. Their debates were open to the hearing of numerous companies, and the plaudits of the galleries were incitements to general emulation. They had a preſident, ſecretaries, and minutes of proceedings, and appeared in every reſpect as an epitome of the national aſſembly, of whoſe members it was likewiſe principally compoſed.

At this period and after the cloſe of the national aſſembly, its members uniformly conſiſted of the avowed enemies of the ancient deſpotiſm, for the friends of liberty had yet deemed it improper to endanger freedom itſelf by dividing on the modifications under which it ought to be enjoyed; truth therefore was ſpontaneouſly elicited in their diſcuſſions, talents were diſplayed, the public mind was enlightened, and the ſociety was eſteemed as the cradle of the revolution. After the meeting of the legiſlative aſſembly, and the eſtabliſhment of the conſtitution, ſeveral members whoſe wiſhes were accompliſhed with what was done, conceiving their meetings no longer neceſſary, retired, and left the ſociety to thoſe who did not think freedom yet ſecurely eſtabliſhed.

The moſt able and diſtinguiſhed of theſe however were republicans, and conſiſted of thoſe who at ſubſequent periods were denominated Girondiſts, Briſſotines, Politiques, the Mountain, and Dantoniſts; theſe in general might be conſidered as the decided enemies monarchy and hereditary diſtinctions, and who ſubſequently fell the victims of men who latterly joined them, and at length converted that which was the nurſery of thoſe principles which finally triumphed in the conſtitution of 1795, the temporary engine of the moſt tremenduous tyranny and proſcription.

It is a common error in calculating upon human affairs, to generaliſe the principles of aſſociations of men like properties of inanimate bodies, but without allowing for the diſſimilar fluctuations and viciſſitudes, the variatious to which the numbers, opinions, and motives of ſocieties and individuals are liable: thus it is that this ſociety has become the byeword of reproach, aud that the good which it performed in the early period of its inſtitution has been blended with the evil of which it was made the inſtrument, when under the ſanction of its liberal fame villains not only violated all its principles but uſurped that deſpotiſm which it was conſtituted to deſtroy: thus it is that hypocrites and the advocates of exorbitant power, under the pretence of humanity, by confounding the virtuous actions of one ſet of men with the crimes of another, under the name of Jacobiniſm, inſidiouſly attempt to wound civil liberty itſelf: thus it is that the enemies of freedom and traitors to virtue attempt to veil their perfidy under a baſe deluſion.

The perturbed ſtate of the public mind was manifeſted in the aſſembly even ſo early as in the evening ſeſſion of the 8th of October, when the miniſters were introduced into the assembly to render an account of their proceedings. On Montmorin being questioned with respect to the correspondence maintained with foreign powers, he replied, that the intercourse with other nations had ceased during the suspension of the royal authority, and had only recommenced from the king's acceptance of the constitution. "I move," said Lacroix with that impetuosity which distinguishes the nation, "that the "minister for foreign affairs be obliged to answer more pointedly. However the royal "functions may have been suspended, have we ceased to maintain ambassadors at these "courts? These ambassadors must have been acquainted with whatever occurs at their "respective courts, and they ought to have informed the minister."—"It is this corres-"pondence," added he, "which I wish to be laid open." After some altercation, a series of interrogatories was put to Montmorin, and the substance of his replies went to establish his former proposition, that the intercourse with foreign courts having ceased for a time, he had nothing official or satisfactory to produce on that subject; that the correspondence alluded to contained nothing but vague and unsupported rumours, which it would be even dangerous to reveal; and that when any thing of certainty occurred, he would not fail to communicate it.

The subject was renewed on the succeeding day, and a decree was passed, ordering that the ministers should be obliged to inform the assembly on these several points, the state and arms of the national-guards destined for the frontiers; the motives for retarding the national Gendarmerie; the neglect in replacing those officers in the troops of the line, who had deserted their corps; the delay in sending arms to the departments of the Haute-Loire, the Haute Vienne, the Haute-Rhin, &c.; concerning the slowness of the recruiting service, the want of provisions in the frontier places, and the neglect in providing arms, &c. On the 11th, the minister at war read a long memoire on the actual state of his department, and he appeared to clear up the doubtful points so much to the satisfaction of the assembly that his report was ordered to be printed.

The emigrants still continued to assemble in considerable bodies upon the frontiers, and the brothers of the king to issue hostile proclamations. It became necessary therefore to pursue more rigorous measures, and to take some immediate steps to repel the approaching danger. The first measure which the assembly thought proper to employ on this occasion respected the right of Monsieur to the regency, in case of the death of the king; and, after some deliberation, the assembly passed a decree nearly in the following terms:

"The national assembly, considering that Louis Stanislaus Xavier, French prince, being next in succession to the regency, is absent from the kingdom—In virtue of an article in the second section of the French constitution, decrees that the said Louis Stanislaus Xavier, French prince, is required to return to the kingdom within the space of two months from the day in which the proclamation of the legislative body shall have been published in Paris.

"In case the said L. S. Xavier, French prince, shall fail to return to the kingdom within the period above signified, he shall then be deemed to have forfeited his right to the regency, in virtue of the second article of the constitutional act. The assembly further decrees, that conformably to the decree of the thirtieth of this month (October) a proclamation to this effect shall be printed, affixed, and published, within three days in the city of Paris, and that the executive power shall notify the same to the assembly within the three following days."

On the day on which this decree was paſſed, the public mind was greatly relieved by the report of M. Montmorin, the miniſter of foreign affairs.—It ſtated, at large, the reaſons which induced him to hope for a continuance of the general tranquillity, and contained the anſwers of the ſeveral courts to the general notification from the king, of his acceptance of the new conſtitution. The replies from even the moſt hoſtile of the combined powers were in flattering terms; the emperor and the king of Pruſſia in particular gave the moſt laviſh aſſurances of their amicable intentions towards the king; and the elector of Mentz alone had the honeſty to avow his diſapprobation of the ſtate of affairs in France.

The miniſter next ſtated the meaſures taken by the king with reſpect to the countenance given to the emigrants by foreign powers. The Auſtrian Netherlands principally attracted attention; and, on application to the emperor, the moſt peremptory orders he ſaid had been given, to prevent them from collecting in too great numbers in any one place, from appearing in military array, or being ſupplied with any of the implements of war.

Such were the profeſſions of kings and courtiers, while ſome of them, at the very moment, were purſuing the moſt hoſtile meaſures, and actually ſtudying to find excuſes for commencing a war; while the league of Pilnitz exiſted in its full vigour; and while the diſaffected Frenchmen were privately encouraged by the emperor, the king of Pruſſia, and their adherents, to aſſemble in formidable bodies on the frontiers, and to form the moſt fatal arrangements; and with the knowlege of the French miniſters.

Notwithſtanding this was the actual ſtate of affairs, the crafty Leopold, impreſſed perhaps with ſome degree of apprehenſion, from the ſpirit and enthuſiaſm manifeſted by the French nation, or conſidering the plot as not yet matured for execution, ſtill continued to temporiſe. Agreeably to the intimation of the miniſter, he iſſued a proclamation, forbidding the emigrants to aſſemble in warlike array in the Auſtrian Netherlands; to prohibit their appearing in military uniforms, their engaging recruits, and ſtill more their encouraging deſerters from the French troops. How far this proclamation was complied with, in the ſpirit as well as in the letter, the ſucceeding events ſufficiently teſtified.

While the emperor was thus clandeſtinely making preparations againſt the French nation, the northern powers were more open and decided in their meaſures. Pruſſia, Sweden, and Ruſſia, entered into ſtrict engagements for the reſtoration of the old deſpotiſm of France. The king of Sweden refuſed to receive the diſpatch informing him of the king's acceptance of the conſtitution, alledging as his motive, "his own will and pleaſure not to recieve any miſſion from France." As ſoon as Lewis was informed of this anſwer, he ordered his ambaſſador to renew his application to his Swediſh majeſty; and if Guſtavus ſhould ſtill perſiſt in his refuſal, to quit Stockholm without taking leave. Denmark was ſtrongly ſolicited to enter into the alliance: but, with a degree of prudence which has long characteriſed the preſent adminiſtration of that country, the propoſal was declined. The emperor did not openly and avowedly enter into this new confederacy; his inclination, which ſeemed to have been pacific, really indiſpoſed him to precipitate meaſures, and that duplicity with which his character was ſo remarkably ſhaded, induced him to proceed by the ſame cautious plan that governed his project at Mantua; but, by the convention of Stockholm, it was determined that he ſhould be appearently forced into the war, by the empreſs inſiſting on his fulfilling the terms of the alliance which exiſted between the imperial crowns.

Thus menaced on every ſide, and unable to conjecture from what quarter the firſt fatal blow was to proceed, ſome allowance may be made for thoſe unhappy jealouſies which the nation entertained, and for thoſe ſevere meaſures towards the emigrants which they were about to adopt. Tremblingly alive on every topic that effected their newly recovered liberties, not knowing whom to ſuſpect, or whom to conſider as their friend, this unfortunate people naturally became the dupes of thoſe who made the moſt laviſh profeſſions in favour of popular liberty, and directed their reſentments, againſt thoſe whoſe intereſt they conceived to be moſt concerned in their oppreſſion—the king and his miniſters.

The conſtituent aſſembly had treated with unexampled lenity the hoſtile proceedings of the emigrants, but at this criſis meaſures more vigorous and more ſevere were required. On the nineteenth of November, therefore, a decree was paſſed, ſtating,—"That the French who were aſſembled in a hoſtile manner beyond the frontiers, were ſuſpected of a conſpiracy againſt their country—That, if after the firſt of January they ſhould be found in that ſituation, they ſhould be declared actually guilty of a conſpiracy, and puniſhable with death—That all the French princes and public functionaries, who ſhould not return before the firſt of January, ſhould be adjudged guilty of the ſame crime—That the high national court ſhould immediataly after that period be called to pronounce judgment on ſuch offenders—That ſuch as ſhould be convicted during their abſence, ſhould forfeit their eſtates and property during their own lives, but not to the prejudice of their children—That all ſuch perſons holding offices or places of truſt, ſhould be adjudged to have forfeited the ſame; and all ſuch being officers in an army or navy ſhould be conſidered as deſerters—All Frenchmen who enliſted men to attack the frontiers were to be judged guilty of high treaſon—No arms or military ſtores were to be tranſported out of the kingdom.

This decree was immediately followed by another, ordering the vacancies in the army to be filled up without further loſs of time. Supplies were voted for putting the kingdom in a reſpectable poſture of defence; and ſome regulations were adopted concerning the military ſchools, amd the organization of the army.

The party diſaffected to the new conſtitution were furniſhed with freſh matter for murmur and complaint by the refuſal of the king to ſanction the decree of the ninth of November againſt the emigrants. His advocates exulted in this teſtimony of conſtitutional freedom exhibited by the monarch, and conſidered it as a proof that he intended to govern ſtrictly agreeable to the principles of the conſtitution. A king, they obſerved, who was not ſincere in his attachment to the new order of things, would have borne the maſk of diſſimulation through the whole of his conduct; ſuch a one would not have hazarded an unpopular ſtep, but would have oſtenſibly joined in the moſt violent meaſures, in the hope that they could not long endure, and that the machinations of the enemies of freedom would ſoon reſtore the ancient depravity and abuſes.

While ſuch were the ſentiments of the courtiers and many moderate and reaſonable perſons, the republicans eagerly embraced the opportunity to declaim againſt the new conſtitution, and monarchical government. It was a conſtitution, they aſſerted, incongruous in itſelf, an hereditary monarchy, and a democratic aſſembly. This very prerogative of a veto, which the conſtitution had conferred upon the king, would be the means, it was urged, of defeating every patriotic meaſure of the legiſlature, while the immenſe civil-liſt enabled him either to bribe its members, or to cheriſh and aſſiſt the enemies of the nation aſſembled in foreign countries.

The exerciſe of the royal veto on this occaſion was certainly an imprudent ſtep, though there is no reaſon to attribute it to any perfidious motive, or to account for it on any other principle than the tenderneſs of the monarch. To deprive at one blow, and by his own agency, his neareſt connections of their hereditary rights, of their revenues, their ſubſiſtence, and to ſubject them to the penalties of death for their miſtaken zeal, while they profeſſed that all their efforts were directed to his ſervice, doubtleſs appeared to him a harſh and ungrateful meaſure; while judging probably of their diſpoſitions, better than they merited, he flattered himſelf with the hopes of perſuading them to abandon their project, and no longer contumaciouſly oppoſe themſelves to what appeared almoſt the unanimous ſentiment of the whole nation. In contemplating the hiſtory of this unfortunate prince and his ſubſequent fate, it is a melancholy reflection that he was leſs the victim of the credulity of his enemies, than of the imprudence and folly of his profeſſed friends. If, inſtead of deſerting their country and their king, the miſguided nobility of France had only for the time conformed to circumſtances, contented themſelves for the moment with that ſtate of dignity and authority which they could ſave out of the general wreck of privileges, and rallied round the throne to ſupport their king in the exerciſe of his conſtitutional rights—could they have conceded with grace, and defended themſelves with candour and moderation—had they only aſſumed the appearance of acting more for the public, and leſs for themſelves, France would never have been the victim to anarchy, the nobility would ſtill have preſerved, if not their titles, at leaſt their fortunes and conſequence; and their monarch would never have fallen a ſacrifice to the ſafety and irritated vengeance of the nation.

Above all things, it is ever impolitic to call in foreign aid to extinguiſh the internal troubles of a nation. It is rarely ſucceſsful; and when ſucceſsful, the end is generally, that both parties are equally the prey of the invader. Had the confederated powers been ſucceſsful in their efforts againſt France, there is little doubt that the very perſons who invited them to the conteſt, would have been the firſt to complain of their tyranny and injuſtice.

In this trying period Lewis addreſſed an affectionate letter to each of the princes his brothers, exhorting them to ſpare him the pain of giving his aſſent to meaſures of ſeverity, by their immediately yielding to the wiſhes of France and their king, and return under the protection held forth to them and in obedience to the laws; but they refuſed "to truſt themſelves in the hands of the invaders of their rights."

Thus at the cloſe of the year 1791, the counſels of the nation were divided, the minds of the people diſtracted by an alarming complication of afflictions already felt and dangers daily more menacing; the public treaſury was exhauſted, and the revenue already inadequate to the inevitable expenditure daily diminiſhing; the public creditors clamorous; the aſſignats circulating with the utmoſt difficulty, but under an encreaſing depreciation; trade ſtagnated, and unprincipled opulence aggravating the public diſtreſs by a monopoly of all the neceſſaries of life; agriculture at a ſtand, and a famine impending; and poverty pervading every part of the country. Diſtreſſing as was this ſtate of affairs in the mother country, that of the colonies was ſtill worſe. The iſland of St. Domingo was convulſed by the injuſtice of the white inhabitants, who refuſed to admit the people of colour to a participation of rights. The black people took advantage of the diſpute to break their chains; in the northern diſtrict alone one hundred thouſand natives and deſcendants of Africa revolted, and wherever they were oppoſed carried deſolation and death into fields of their oppreſſors; the united paſſions of revenge and fear of further bondange, added fury to their reſiſtance, more than two hundred noble plantations were burnt, and the ſhips afforded the only aſylum from inevitable maſſacre.

Among the calamities that at this time agitated France, perhaps the diſſentions ſtirred up by the clergy was not the leaſt important and grievous, they were increaſed by the preſumptuous interference of the court of Rome; the pope had daringly prohibited them under the moſt terrific anathemas, from conforming to the decrees of the French legiſlature, and from taking the civic oath. In conſequence of which, a decree was paſſed which expelled from their benefices all who paying obedience to a foreign authority ſhould be ſo diſregardful of their duty to their country as to oppoſe its laws. Thus there remained in the heart of France an immenſe body of diſaffected perſons, united among themſelves, obedient to a foreign hierarchy, looking confidently to the king, and poſſeſſing an influence over the minds of the people capable of being turned to the deſolation of the country, and difficult to be ſuppreſſed. We cannot ſuppoſe that ſuch an accumulation of power would be ſuffered to remain unemployed by men impreſſed with a ſenſe of civil and religious wrong, and infatuated by bigotry; in ſome places the prieſts openly declaimed againſt the conſtitution; in others ſecret conſpiracies were formed, foreign correſpondence was eſtabliſhed, and no means left untried to inflame the minds of the populace; every engine of ſuperſtition was employed, every art of eloquence eſſayed, to ſprit them up to revolt; nocturnal meetings were held, nocturnal proceſſions were conducted by the infuriated clergy; the ſhrines of the virgin and the ſaints were dreſſed in mourning, and the ignorant multitude taught to dread the torments of hell if they obeyed the laws, and that the hand of God would protect and the felicity of heaven reward their reſiſtance, the remote parts of the nation blazed with the torch of religious fury, and ſcenes that rivalled the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew were exhibited in various parts of France.

No meaſure of the legiſlative aſſembly has drawn upon them a greater degree of enmity and cenſure at home and of reproach abroad, than the decreee which baniſhed for ever from their country on pain of death the nonjuring clergy. But harſh as this meaſure was, much as humanity muſt deplore the ſufferings of that body, innocent and reſpectable as ſome of them were, the impartial dictates of juſtice muſt declare, and every principle which ſanctifices the authority of law, the ſecurity of ſociety, and the wellbeing of nations, rendered that meaſure neceſſary. And hiſtory at a period remote from the angry paſſions of the day, will diſcover in the clamours of other nations, only the alarmed apprehenſions of a body, whoſe influence had been diverted from the ſerious concerns of a future ſtate, by ſordid views and worldly ambition; who trembling for their dominion over the mind of man, ſhaken to the foundations by ſuch an example, forgot in their common danger the hatreds of ſects and the warring of doctrines, and with a common accord united once more in the cauſe of ſuperſtition and Rome, to ſanction and to ſhade the outrage done to religion by raiſing its prieſts above the laws, and ſanctifying not alone their prejudices but their blaſphemies and crimes.

The firſt ſtep of the legiſlative aſſembly againſt the refractory prieſts, was however leſs violent in appearence, though in reality it was fraught with ſeverity. On the eighteenth of November a ſeries of reſolutions were paſſed, by which it was enacted, that the penſions of the ejected clergy, which had been allowed by the conſtituent aſſembly, ſhould be withdrawn from all ſuch as ſtill refuſed the civic oath. That wherever any troubles were found to exiſt, of which religion was the cauſe or the pretext, the municipal officers ſhould have liberty to remove from the neighbourhood ſuch of the nonjuring clergy as might be ſuſpected of fomenting or favouring ſuch ſeditions, that in caſe of diſobedience to the directory of the department, they might be proſecuted before the tribunals, and impriſoned; and that thoſe who ſhould be convicted of actual ſedition ſhould be liable to two years impriſonment. To theſe decrees, after ſome delay, the king, apparently from conſcientious motives, oppoſed his veto, and thus unfortunately increaſed the clamour which was already excited againſt him in every part of the kingdom.

If the general tenor of the replies from the foreign courts to the king's notice of having accepted the conſtitution, be attentively conſidered, it will be impoſſible not to obſerve that remarkable ſtrain of artifice and duplicity which prevaded the majority of them, and particularly thoſe from the moſt powerful ſtates, and thoſe neareſt in alliance with the reigning family. They contained indeed expreſſions of perſonal reſpect and ſympathy for the king, but nothing which could be conſtrued into an approbation of the new order which had been eſtabliſhed in France by the prevalence of popular councils. However, therefore, the court and miniſtry might appear ſatisfied with theſe empty profeſſions, it is certain they were far from gratifying to the people at large. Inſtead of diminiſhing, the inſolence of the emigrants appeared to increaſe. The enrolments in the circles of the Upper and Lower Rhine were carried on with increaſed vigour and alacrity; they were even encouraged to commit acts of violence on the bordering territories of the biſhopric of Straſburg; and an attempt was alſo made by an agent of the princes to corrupt general Wipfen,* who commanded in the department of the Upper Rhine, and to engage him to deliver by treachery the fortreſs of New Briſac into their hands, by which the hoſtile troops might have obtained an eaſy entrance into the territories of France. Impelled by theſe circumſtances the aſſembly decreed on the 29th of November that a deputation of twenty-four of its members ſhould wait on the king to communicate to him, on the part of the aſſembly, its ſolicitude concerning the dangers which menaced the country from the perfidious combinations of armed emigrants, aſſembled without the kingdom, and the fatal conſpiracies which they apprehended internally threatened its domeſtic peace; to entreat him to require the electors of Treves, of Mayence, and the other princes of the empire, to iſſue a prohibition of thoſe hoſtile preparations and enrolments which were openly carried on by the emigrants on the frontiers, and to requeſt that he would embody a force ſufficient to compel them, in caſe of a refuſal.

On the fourteenth of December the king repaired to the national aſſembly; he acquainted them, that he had taken their meſſage into deep conſideration, and that on ſo important an occaſion he had thought it his duty to be himſelf the bearer of the anſwer; that he had done every thing to recall the emigrants to the boſom of their country, and to perſuade them to ſubmit to the new laws; had employed both amicable intimations and formal requſitions to divert the neighbouring princes from giving them a ſupport calculated to flatter their hopes and encourage them in their raſh deſigns.

He obſerved, that the emperor had done all that could be expected from a faithful ally; by forbidding and diſperſing all aſſemblages within his ſtates. His meaſures at other courts, he ſaid, had not been equally ſucceſsful, and unacommodating anſwers had been given to his juſt requiſitions. Theſe unjuſt refuſals, he obſerved, called for reſolutions of another kind. As the repreſentative of the people, he felt for their injuries. In conſequence, he had cauſed a declaration to be made to the elector of Treves, that if before the fifteenth of January he did not put a ſtop within his ſtates to all hoſtile diſpoſitions on the part of the emigrants, he ſhould be obliged to conſider him as the enemy of France. The king added, that he ſhould order ſimilar declarations to be made to all who favoured aſſemblages which might menace the peace of the kingdom.

To enable the nation, however, to prepare for that war in which they might find it neceſſary after all theſe precautions reluctantly to engage, the king adviſed an attention to the finances of the country, and the ſtrict obſervance of peace and unanimity. He modeſtly alluded to the violence of thoſe who endeavoured to ſurround with diſguſts the exerciſe of that authority which was intruſted to him—pledged himſelf faithfully to preſerve the conſtitution, and to ſhew to all mankind that he felt how truly glorious it was to be the king of a free people.

But however ſincere the king might be in his declarations, he was not fortunate enough to obtain full credit. The republican party in particular did not fail to take every advantage which the fears and ſuſpicions of the people afforded to excite their deteſtation of the court, and of the little remains of the ariſtocratic faction which exiſted in the kingdom. The negative which the king had unfortunately affixed to the decree againſt the emigrants, and his tardineſs in ſanctioning that reſpecting the nonjuring clergy, the firſt threatning the nation with terror and deſolation from abroad, and the others fomenting the diſtractions into fanataciſm and madneſs at home, afforded them too eaſy a pretext to awaken all the paſſions of the multitude. Addreſſes crowded in from every part of the kingdom, abounding in commendations of the aſſembly, and indicating their diſſatisfaction as to the conduct of the king and his miniſters. Moſt of theſe addreſſes were entered on the journals of the aſſembly, and were ſeconded by inflammatory ſpeeches from the more violent members. Montmorin, unable to withſtand the ſtorm of popular violence, reſigned; Deleſſart was nominated to the department of foreign affairs, and Cahier de Gerville to that of the interior. In the beginning of December, alſo, Duportail was diſmiſſed from his office as miniſter of war, and Narbonne appointed in his room.

Before the concluſion of the month of November, a circumſtance occured which ſerved to put in motion the two remaining parties which were ſhortly to divide the kingdom, the conſtitutionaliſts and the republicans; and its iſſue might have ſhewn in whoſe favour the balance was likely to preponderate. The mayoralty of the judicious and patriotic Bailly terminated in the month of November—The once popular La Fayette appeared as a candidate to ſucceed him, and it was generally underſtood that he was ſupported by the court—He was however oppoſed by a declared republican, Petion, a member of the jacobin club. It is almoſt unneceſſary to add that Petion was elected mayor of Paris by a great majority.

As conſtant experience had evinced the increaſing credit and power of the Jacobins, it was evident that, by gaining an aſcendancy over the minds of the populace, they were enabled to controul even the aſſembly itſelf; as the only means of averting the dreadful conſequences with which the court was threatened by the principles avowed by the leaders of that club, the friends of the conſtitution and of the monarch endeavoured to counteract its influence, by a new inſtitution of a ſimilar kind, but profeſſing principles more moderate, and conſequently more calculated to preſerve the exiſting conſtitution.

At this period it was that the new Society called the Feuillans, from the convent in which it met, was firſt inſtituted. It was compoſed of ſeceders from the Jacobins, and ex-members of the conſtituent aſſembly; ſuch as Barnave and the Lameths, Duport, Rabaud, Sieyes, Thouret, Chappelier, Taleyrand, Labord, Monteſquieu, Beaumetz, and others. To theſe may be added two hundred and ſixty-ſix members of the exiſting aſſembly, and about eight hundred and eighty other reſpectable citizens.

The republican party and the Jacobins could not behold this new aſſociation without ſecret diſquiet. It was evidently formed to oppoſe them; the ſubject was debated in the Club on the evening of the twenty-firſt of December, and the people in the galleries being irritated by harangues, iſſued forth in a large body and forced their way into the hall of the Feuillans; they commenced with direct threats to ſeveral of the members, with interrupting all diſcuſſion, and at length openly acknowledged that they came thither to effect the diſſolution of the ſociety.

A riot of a ſtill more ſerious nature was threatened on the twenty-third, and Charon the preſident of the Feuillans wrote to the mayor to requeſt that a commiſſaire de police might be ordered to attend the meeting, for the purpoſe of preſerving the peace; but Petion, who was a member of the Jacobin club, could not be ſuppoſed to be extremely ardent in favour of its rival. He excuſed himſelf, by ſaying that he could not command the attendance of a commiſſaire, but that he would take every precaution in his power. At the inſtance of the commander of the national-guard, however, Petion wrote to the commiſſaire de police, and requeſted his attendance. As the members of the ſociety came armed as well as the rioters, a tumult of a very ſanguinary nature was expected: but happily, by the interpoſition of the municipal officer, no violence took place. The rioters imperiouſly inſiſted on the diſſolution of the club, and this by the other party was contemptuouſly refuſed. On the exhortation of the peace officer, however, to ſeparate and depart from the ſcene of altercation, the ſociety afforded the firſt example of moderation, by quitting its hall, and leaving their property to the diſcretion of their opponents.

The majority of the aſſembly had, from theſe circumſtances, an immediate opportunity of manifeſting its diſpoſition towards the new inſtitution. The vicinity of their place of meeting to that of the legiſlative body, and the various committees, afforded Merlin, who had been imprudently attacked by one of the guards, and others of the Jacobin faction, a ready excuſe for inſiſting on their removal; and a motion being made to that effect, it was unanimouſly decreed. Thus was victory at once declared in favour of the Jacobins, and ſucceſs ſerved to encourage them to more violent proceedings.

J.^ME PETION.

The conſtitutional party indeed were too late in their adoption of active meaſures. Their more diligent adverſaries had already obtained poſſeſſion of the public mind, and they entered the field only when the conteſt was virtually decided.

Theſe tranſactions afford a tolerably accurate picture of the ſtate of parties in France at the concluſion of the year, 1791. Its ſiuatiton, with reſpect to foreign powers, became more and more critical. The conduct of Leopold was a ſingular tiſſue of inconſiſtency and deception. He pretended formally to revoke the circular of Pavia, in conſequence of the king's acceptance of the conſtitution, and yet exhorted the powers of Europe not to deſiſt from the meaſures concerted between them, but to continue vigilant, and to declare that their coalition had ſtill an exiſtence; but this declaration was directly followed by a letter to the king of France, reviving the claims of the Imperial vaſſals in Alſace and Lorraine; inſiſting that no compenſation could be accepted, but that matters ſhould be reſtored in every reſpect to their ancient ſituation; and acquainting the king that the emperor conceived himſelf not only bound to interpoſe by ſolemn proteſtation, "but alſo to give to the injured all the aid which the dignity of the imperial court, and the maintenance of the preſent conſtitution required."

While ſuch were the pretences of Leopold, it appeared that the German princes, in general, were more than ſatisfied with the mode of compenſation propoſed by the French. The prince of Loweſtein readily accepted of an indemnification, and the prince of Hohenloe, and the prince of Salm-Salm, declared themſelves equally ready to treat upon the ſame terms. The dukes of Wirtemberg, and Deux-Ponts, as well as prince Maximilian, freely negotiated, and only required, what in itſelf it was no more than perfectly reaſonable, the reimburſement of the revenues on the feudal rights in queſtion, from the fourth of Auguſt 1789.

The deſigns of Leopold gradually unfolded. The declaration to the European powers, the ſubſtance of which is given above, was dated the tenth of November, the letter to the king the third of December; and on the 21ſt of the ſame month an official notice was delivered to the French miniſter at Vienna, in anſwer to the French king's notification to the elector of Treves, which more directly manifeſted the hoſtile intentions of the imperial court. It ſtated, that the elector had given notice to the court of Vienna, that he had adopted, with reſpect to the French refugees and emigrants, the ſame principles and regulations as had been put in force in the Auſtrian Low Countries; that notwithſtanding this, the elector was ſtill apprehenſive that the tranquillity of his frontiers and ſtates would be diſturbed by France; and that in conſequence of this notification, the emperor had been conſtrained to order mareſchal Bender to march to the ſtates of his electoral highneſs ſpeedy and effectual ſuccours, in caſe he ſhould be attacked, or even imminently menaced with hoſtile incurſions.

As it was a well known fact that the emigrants to the amount of twenty-three thouſand, were already embodied for offenſive operations in the electorate, and the emperor avowed his reſolution to ſupport the elector, their hoſtile intentions could be no longer miſtaken or palliated. Lewis therefore found it neceſſary to addreſs a letter to the aſſembly, encloſing the notification of the court of Vienna, wherein he expreſſed his regret and aſtoniſhment at the conduct of the emperor, upon whoſe good intentions he ſaid he thought he ought to reckon, and affected to believe his good diſpoſition was perverted by the miſrepreſentations of the elector of Treves. He addreſſed an anſwer to the emperor, reminding that monarch.

that nothing was demanded of him, but what France had afforded an example of, and that the refugees from Brabant had been prevented from aſſembling with hoſtile views on the Auſtrian frontier; at the ſame time he confirmed his former declaration, that if after the period already fixed, the elector of Treves ſhould not have really and effectually diſperſed the hoſtile aſſemblages exiſting in his ſtates, nothing would prevent the king from propoſing to the nation to reſtrain it by force of arms.

Preparations for war were now carried on with redoubled vigour. Rochambeau and Luckner were promoted to the rank of mareſchals, and Lafayette had already proceeded to aſſume the important command on the frontiers. Narbonne, the war miniſter, made the circuit of the fortreſſes to inſpect the works and the ſtate of the army there; new levies were ordered and the whole country aſſumed the garb of war.

Though the ſpirit of the nation was not depreſſed by the proſpect of impending hoſtilities, the ſtate of the finances could not be contemplated without the moſt ſerious apprehenſions. The extraordinary reſources had all hitherto proved inadequate to the public demands. On the twenty-ninth of December, twenty millions were voted, which the miniſter at war informed the aſſembly next day ſhould be all appropriated to make good the deficit of 1791.

On the ſame day Lafond preſented a general eſtimate, being the united reſults of the particular eſtimates of the ſeveral miniſters, of the expences for 1792, amounting to ſix hundred and ſixty-three millions ſix hundred and ſeventy-one thouſand livres;* and an eſtimate of the ordinary reſources, conſiſting of the land-tax, tax on perſonal property, patents, and ſome leſſer impoſts, taken at five hundred and thirty millions. The difference between the two eſtimates, amounting to one hundred and thirty-three millions ſix hundred and ſeventy-one thouſand livres, was to be provided for from the fund of extraordinaries.

A. D. 1792.] Notwithſtanding previous appearances, the year 1792 opened with fair but deluſive omens to the peace of Europe and the liberties of France. Leopold again wavered or prevaricated. Unprepared for the attack from the wants of his treaſury, and the tardineſs of his ſecret allies in advancing funds, he appeared vainly confident that his ſiniſter policy would be ſucceſsful in amuſing the aſſembly; thus, while a cordon of troops was gradually forming on the frontier of the Netherlands, the ſolemn proteſtations of the emperor aſſerted them to be intended merely for the purpoſe of precaution and defence. St. Croix was appointed envoy at the court of the elector of Treves, and was received with cordiality and reſpect. The emigrants were prohibited from continuing their military exerciſes, and the elector pledged himſelf, that within eight days the hoſtile aſſemblages in his dominions ſhould be entirely diſperſed. All military ſtores, and even horſes for the emigrants were prohibited; and he declared, that in every reſpect it was his moſt ardent wiſh to maintain perpetual amity with France. The people, always more ſincere than their governors, willingly ſeconded this diſpoſition; in many towns the emigrants were ignominiouſly expelled by the populace, and the prince of Condé was compelled by the magiſtrates of Worms to leave that city for fear of inſurrection. While their enemies thus appeared to be cruſhed or removed, the apprehenſions of the French for their own frontier were completely diſpelled by the report of the war miniſter on his return from his tour. The fortreſſes he repreſented as being placed in a moſt reſpectable ſtate, and the patriotiſm of the ſoldiery exceeded every expectation that the moſt ſanguine friend of his country could form. The credit of the paper currency experienced an immediate riſe from theſe favourable appearances, and manufactures and agriculture began once more to flouriſh.

The accounts from the colonies were leſs encouraging. The dreadful revolt of the negroes at Cape Francois had indeed produced a temporary ceſſation of the diſſentions which exiſted between the white inhabitants of St. Domingo and the people of colour; and an actual concordat, or agreement, had been entered into by the two parties. The ſucceſſes of the free inhabitants thus united againſt the revolted negroes were brilliant; but every new inſtance of ſucceſs only added to the calamity of individuals, as it was a deſtruction of property. It affords matter for aſtoniſhment, that the moſt ſevere calamities are frequently inſufficient to deſtroy the force of prejudice. That rancorous ſpirit which prevailed in the white coloniſts, that contempt in which they continued to hold the people of colour, was repreſſed, but not extinguiſhed, by the concordat.

While the ratification of this contract was ſtill in agitation, a private quarrel ſerved once more to rekindle the flames of civil war. On the 16th of November, the ſections of Port au Prince were aſſembled for the purpoſe of deliberating on the execution of the concordat, and forming the new provincial aſſembly to which the people of colour ſhould have equal admiſſion with the white inhabitants. At the very moment in which this important queſtion was in agitation, a free negro quarrelled with a white cannonier. The ſoldier drew his ſword; but the ſuperior force of the negro wreſted it from him, and broke it in pieces. For this offence the negro was apprehended; he was immediately tried, condemned, and hanged, in oppoſition to the moſt urgent and humble entreaties of the people of colour, who only requeſted that the execution of the ſentence might at leaſt be ſuſpended.

The conſequence of this cruel and imprudent act was, that the people of colour fired on the cannoniers; the white coloniſts flew inſtantly to arms, and the conteſt was renewed with all its former fury. The ſucceeding day the town of Port au Prince was ſet on fire by ſome unknown incendiaries, and twenty-eight iſlots, making two-fifths of the whole were totally conſumed. The ſubſequent hiſtory of this diſtracted colony is nothing but a repetition of crimes and diſaſters. The iſland, divided into three parties, continued a prey to its inteſtine diviſions. The revolted negroes ſtill maintained their ground. The people of colour either remained undecided and inactive, or took the part of the inſurgents. Even the troops which were ſent over to reſtore tranquillity, were in ſome meaſure corrupted, while the white inhabitants diſplayed unequivocal marks of counter-revolutionary principles, and immenſe numbers fled to the United States of America.

As but little hope appeared of the emigrants returning to their country, and as the veto of the king had cauſed much diſcontent in the nation, the aſſembly proceeded to ſtronger meaſures, and a decree of accuſation of high treaſon was paſſed againſt the brothers of the king, the prince of Condé, M. Calonne, and Mirabeau the younger; and as, notwithſtanding the profeſſions of the emperor, reports had gone forth that the congreſs was formed by Auſtria aud Pruſſia for the purpoſe of ſubverting, or modifying at leaſt, the French conſtitution, a decree was paſſed by the legiſlature, and immediately ſanctioned by the king, which pronounced every Frenchman infamous, and guilty of high treaſon, who ſhould directly or indirectly take any part in ſuch meaſures, or who ſhould, in any reſpect, unite with thoſe whoſe object was a modification of the exiſting conſtitution.

At this juncture Deleſſart was accuſed, and Bertrand declared by a vote of the aſſembly unworthy of truſt; the king however, who with an inconſtancy that has been attributed to his weakneſs by ſome, and by others to deſign, had continually changed his miniſters as he found them indiſpoſed to his views, now contrary to his uſual practice perſiſted in retaining Bertrand. This ſtep contributed not a little to excite diſcontent, and was made uſe of by the republican party, who had gradually obtained a conſpicuous aſendancy in the aſſembly; the diſaffection of the king was very generally believed and openly aſſerted, and the diſquietude became ſo great, that on the ſeventeenth of February the king deemed it neceſſary to deny, expreſsly in a letter to the mayor and municipality, all the imputations circulated againſt him.

But the external preſſure was too powerful and the meaſures of the king too much at variance, to produce an alteration of the public opinion by the denial of a conduct which it would be fatal to confeſs: the republicans too, who poſſeſſed the greateſt talents, had uniformly evinced a degree of ſagacity, which rivetted to them the public confidence; the people ſaw that though they did not poſſeſs the channels of foreign communication, they had either better information or more honeſty than their opponents; they had penetrated more ſucceſsfully into the deſigns of Leopald, and ſaw that the falſe ſerenity which prevailed at the commencement of the year only preceded a ſtorm; and that it was a mere deluſion created by that crafty prince to lull the ſpirit of France into a fatal tranquillity. Not uninformed of the actual grounds of the treaty of Pilnitz, they ſaw that an alliance of ſuch exent was not likely to vaniſh in vapour; the reaſons ſtill exiſted in which it originated; with this opinion the preparations of Auſtria and Pruſſia entirely correſponded; and while no motive of ſufficient weight had occurred to induce the combination to lay aſide their project, there was an obvious reaſon for the concealment of it, and that was, that it was evidently not yet ripe for execution; at their inſtance it was therefore, that military preparations were unremittedly carried on, that a deciſive anſwer was demanded from Leopold, and a period fixed after which his ſilence was to be conſtrued into a declaration of war.

The court in this extremity amidſt its profeſſions of loyalty manifeſted an unuſual degree of alarm; and mareſchals Rochambeau and Luckner and Lafayette, were called to Paris, to concert with the executive the arrangements proper for the defence of the country; a conſiderable promotion of officers took place, and a marine equipment was ordered, in the expectation that a great naval power would immediately declare for the confederacy.

On the ſecond of March, what had been repreſented only as the factious ravings of the the Jacobins or the viſionary alarms and predictions of theoriſts and republicans, aſſumed the ſerious aſpect of reality: the correſpondence with the emperor was laid before the aſſembly, and contained a note from prince Kaunitz, dated the fifth of January preceding, ſtating, that although the elector of Treves had ſeriouſly reſolved to enforce the regulations adopted by the emperor againſt the emigrants, ſtill the French king had aſſembled three armies, and that violent declamations had been permitted in the French clubs againſt all the ſovereigns in Europe. The reading of this paper was followed by an extract from the inſtructions given to Noailles the French ambaſſador at Vienna, dated the twenty-firſt of January, in which an explanation was required of the orders given to general Bender, and of the meaning of the expreſſion employed by the emperor—" the ſovereigns united " for the ſafety and honour of crowns."

The moſt important paper, however, was a diſpatch from prince Kaunitz to the imperial chargé des affaires at Paris, dated the ſeventeenth of February; it was dictated in terms of ſtudied ambiguity—the emperor made many proteſtations of his deſire to preſerve peace, but ſtill avowe d the engagements which he had formed with other powers for preſerving inviolate the monarchy of France; while he profeſſed his apprehenſions for the ſafety of the king, the diſpatch was charged with expreſſions ſtudiouſly inſulting to the people, calculated to irritate them and precipate the ruin of him for whom ſecurity was profeſſedly ſought; it enveighed in the moſt unqualified terms againſt the republican ſpirit, and jacobin ſocieties; and inſtead of ſoothing and conciliating the people to the love and care of the king, appeared as if it had been framed to urge them to ſome act deſparation.

Theſe papers were accompanied by a letter from the Pruſſian envoy at Paris, avowing the intimate union and connexion which ſubſiſted between the two courts, and the entire acquieſcence of his maſter in the Auſtrian memorials. By another communication from the miniſter, it was underſtood, that the imperial troops in the Netherlands amounted to fifty-five thouſand, in January, and that as ſoon as they ſhould be joined by the ſeveral bodies which were ordered to march, they would amount to upwards of ninety thouſand. The miniſter concluded by ſaying, that the king had inſtructed his ambaſſador at Vienna to repreſent, that it became neither the dignity nor the independence of France to enter into any diſcuſſion concerning her internal affairs; that the meaſures of Auſtria and Pruſſia, having no explicit object, could only ſerve to create jealouſy and diſtruſt; and that if the emperor was ſincere in his profeſſions, he would ſhew it by reducing his troops in the Netherlands to the peace eſtabliſhment of 1791, and the French would immediately follow the example.

The fallacious calm which had pervaded the nation and thoſe who called themſelves moderates in the aſſembly, was on the publication of theſe diſpatches, changed into a tempeſt of rage and reſentment. The people ſaw the open declarations of the republicans in the aſſembly and the clubs, for ſeveral months paſt verified; the delay of miniſters in communicating the firſt hoſtile information was recollected, and Deleſſart was charged with having betrayed the nation; former pacific communications from foreign powers were treated as forgeries, and the miniſter for foreign affairs as a party in the fraud; to many however war appeared leſs formidable than the treacherous ſtate of alarm and diſquietude and the enormous expences under which the nation laboured.

At this period the meaſures of the court again aſſumed a ſuſpicious aſpect; a degree of public reſerve and private revelry were noticed by many. And while the indignation of the popular party in the aſſembly was directed againſt Bertrand, miniſter of the marine and Deleſſart, miniſter for foreign affairs, the court, under the influence, as was confidently aſſerted of the houſe of Auſtria, determined on the diſmiſſion of Narbonne from the war department; and of Cahier de Gerville from that of the interior. De Grave was appointed as ſucceſſor to Narbonne, whoſe diſmiſſion was both reſented and reſiſted by the leading members of the aſſembly. Sage moved, "that Narbonne carried, with him the regret of the national aſſembly; and on a motion of cenſure, by Cambon, on the miniſters who adviſed the king to retain Bertrand in his ſervice, after he had loſt the public confidence, Cahier de Gerville was expreſsly excepted. Nothing indeed could be more impolitic in the court than both theſe meaſures. It was as abſurd as it was uſeleſs to endeavour to ſupport the miniſter of marine, however innocent, againſt the voice and feelings of a majority of the legiſlature; and conſidering the temper of the aſſembly and the ſtate of public affairs, the king ought to have rejoiced that any of his ſervants enjoyed a portion of their confidence, and ought certainly not to have ſet them the example himſelf of diſſolving the adminiſtration.

Theſe meaſures were followed, in the ſame ſitting, by the impeachment of Deleſſart. He was accuſed by Briſſot of omitting to give information to the aſſembly of the concert formed among foreign powers againſt the liberty and independence of France; of not preſſing the meaſures proper for the ſafety and defence of the nation; of having given prince Kaunitz details on the ſituation of the kingdom, calculated to convey an improper idea; of having meanly ſued for peace; of having refuſed to obey the decrees of the national aſſembly. In conſequence of a decree paſſed againſt him, Deleſſart was apprehended, and conducted to Orleans to be tried by the high national court. A variety of unfavourable circumſtances ran hard againſt him, and he may indeed be conſidered as having fallen a ſacrifice to the crooked and deceitful conduct of Leopald, and the temporiſing politics of Lewis.

The impeachment of Deleſſart ſo completely terrified the marine miniſter, Bertrand, that he gave in his reſignation, and retired precipitately to England. Thus the miniſtry was at once completely diſſolved, and France was threatened with new cauſes of diſtraction, when the politics of Europe appeared to vibrate once more in favour of peace, by the ſudden death of the emperor of Germany. This event took place on the firſt of March, and from the ſuddenneſs of the attack, and the appearances of the complaint, ſuſpicions were at firſt entertained that he had been poiſoned. The complaint entirely affected the ſtomach and inteſtines, his body ſwelled enormouſly, and his bowels burſt. Malice inſtantly attached his death to the agency of the French, but the examinations of the phyſicians ſoon diſpelled the calumny; a narrative of his diſeaſe publiſhed by authority aſcribed his death to a rheumatic fever; but thoſe who aſſumed to poſſeſs a true ſtate of the facts, aſcribed his death to the exceſſive uſe of cantharides and other ſtimulant medicines which he had been accuſtomed to employ.

As a man, Leopald was of a debauched and ſenſual character; as a prince, he was poſſeſſed of ability; his principles were deſpotic, but in general he made uſe of his power for the good of his ſubjects—His political career, while grand duke of Tuſcany, was for the moſt part marked by wiſdom and moderation. He ſimplified the laws, he remitted the moſt grievous of the public burdens, and his regard to the adminiſtration of juſtice was ſuch, that he allowed, and even encouraged appeals to himſelf, wherever any party conceived himſelf injured in the courſe of a proceſs in the ordinary courts of law. He had the merit of reſtoring peace to the empire, as well as to Auſtria and the Netherlands, notwithſtanding the diſtreſs and confuſion in which he found them all involved, by the imprudent adminiſtration of his predeceſſor. His political wiſdom and general ſagacity were certainly above the ordinary ſtandard of hereditary monarchs. It has been ſaid, he loved peace, his conduct in uniting with the confederacy of princes againſt the liberties of France may be fairly cited in contradiction to this aſſertion. Leopold might be influenced by family conſiderations, he might be deceived with falſe repreſentations as to the actual ſtate of France; he might be prompted by the money and intrigues of another power, who did not openly appear, but whoſe inſidious policy Europe will long have occaſion to regret. With all his talents, his notorious duplicity rendered him at once an object of univerſal abhorrence and contempt; and it was even aſſerted by an eminent ſpeaker in the Britiſh ſenate, intimately connected with the adminiſtration, that "no man would take his word for a ſingle day," and from this ſentiment from ſuch an authority we may perhaps account for the delays which marked his meaſures.

The aſcendancy which the Jacobin club had obtained by their victory over the Feuillans, and ſtill more by the impeachment of Deleſſart, rendered their authority abſolute in every thing that concerned the politics of France. The court ſeemed at this moment to relinquiſh every thought of reſiſtance, and to ſail with the tide. This was ſoon evinced in the appointment of miniſters; Dumourier and Lacoſte, two of the leading Jacobins, being nominated to two of the vacant departments, of foreign affairs and the marine.

Dumourier, from the firſt dawn of the revolution, ſtudied to ingratiate himſelf with the people; and as the Jacobin club was the great theatre of talents and ambition, he ſoon became a diſtinguiſhed member, and by their influence and his intrigues eſtabliſhed himſelf in the important, and, at this period, very reſponſible ſituation of miniſter for foreign affairs.

The French king diſmiſſed the Swiſs guards on the ſeventeenth of March; and on that day the guard appointed by the conſtitution entered upon duty.

The death of the emperor, inſtead of protracting, appears to have accelerated hoſtilities between Auſtria and France. The young king of Hungary was ſcarcely ſeated on the throne, when he deſired a conference with the Pruſſian miniſter, Biſchoffswerder, and directed him to inform his maſter, that he was determined ſtrictly and literally to adhere to the convention of Pilnitz. The preparations on the part of the French, in the mean time, were carried on with alacrity; and the new miniſter, Dumourier, declared in the Jacobin club, that he would, in his negociations with Auſtria, direct them to the point of obtaining, without delay, a ſolid peace or a deciſive war.

On the 22d of March a decree of ſequeſtration was paſſed againſt the property of the emigrants, ſaving however the right of creditors to be reimburſed their demands; and ſuch as returned within the ſpace of one month were to be re-eſtabliſhed in poſſeſſion of their eſtates, ſubjected, however, to a proportionate tax to defray the expences of the armament, which their emigration had occaſioned. By an additional decree, they were deprived of the rights of active citizens for two years after their return to France; and ſuch of them as ſhould not return within a month, were deprived of thoſe privileges for ten years.

The ſucceeding day, the king announced the appointment of three more of the popular party to the miniſtry, Garnier, miniſter of juſtice, in the room of Duport du Tetre; Roland, miniſter of the interior, inſtead of Cahier de Gerville; and Claviere, miniſter of finance, in the room of Tarbe. The two firſt miniſters were members of the Jacobin club, which at this period ſeems to have poſſeſſed the ableſt men and the entire confidence of the nation. The vigorous meaſures purſued by the aſſembly had alſo the happieſt effects both upon public credit and upon the minds of the emigrants, upwards of four hundred having paſſed through Liſle, on their return, in one day.

About this time a circumſtance occured of no ſmall importance to France, and particularly in her preſent ſtate; this was the death of the king of Sweden, who had been a very active enemy to the formation of the conſtitution. He was ſhot at a maſquerade by Ankerſtrom, who had been a captain in the guards; but a number of others, among whom was the king's private ſecretary, and many of the moſt diſtinguiſhed nobility were engaged in the plot. This murder was attributed to various cauſes.—Perſonal inveteracy, as the regecide had recently been diſcharged from the ſervice. The king had lately overthrown the liberties of the nation, and rendered himſelf arbitrary; ſome ſuſpected the nobles had taken this meaſure to revenge themſelves.—Others laid his death to French influence; but Ankerſtrom at his execution declared he killed him as a tyrant. Its immediate effect was the withdrawing a powerful ally from the confederacy. The ſucceſſor to Guſtavus was a minor, and a regency was appointed, at the head of whom was the duke of Sudermania the late king's brother; who exhibited a rare character for a prince, a man devoted to peace and civil liberty.

This period is alſo remarkable for the introduction of the Guillotine, which was invented by a ſurgeon of that name.

The anſwer to the requiſition made at the court of Vienna, was ſubmitted to the aſſembly on the twenty-ninth of March by the new miniſter Dumourier, and amounted almoſt to a declaration of war. Prince Kaunitz, in a memorial dated the eighteenth of March, in the name of the king of Hungary, ſtates that he had adopted fully the political ſyſtem of the late emperor, and would explain himſelf with the frankneſs becoming a great power. He recriminated on the French the charge of aſſembling troops upon the frontiers, and ſignified that other princes beſide the king of Hungary might perhaps think it neceſſary to aſſemble ſtill greater numbers to maintain their internal peace againſt the example of France and the criminal machinations of the Jacobins. The reſt of the paper was in a ſimilar ſtyle of haughtineſs and outrage, aud concluded with obſerving that the ſound and principal part of the nation, in other words the ariſtocracy, would conſider as a conſoling proſpect the exiſtence of a concert, the views of which were worthy of their confidence. Notwithſtanding the indignation which ſo inſolent an addreſs muſt neceſſarily have produced, Dumourier, with great temper, entreated the aſſembly to wait in tranquillity for the categorical anſwer of the court of Vienna, which he expected in the courſe of a few days: and this recommendation of the miniſter was unanimouſly aſſented to.

The vigorous and ſpirited conduct of Dumourier extracted from the king of Sardinia a more moderate and favourable reply. He aſſured the miniſter in general terms, that his troops were actually below the peace eſtabliſhment, and that he permitted no hoſtile aſſemblages of the emigrants within his dominions.

On the ſixth of April, the committee of public inſtruction moved the ſuppreſſion of the monaſtic orders; one of the popular eccleſiaſtics, moved an additional decree to aboliſh all diſtinction of dreſs both eccleſiaſtical and monkiſh. And it was ſolemnly decreed, that all eccleſiaſtical marks of diſtinction, except in the celebration of divine worſhip, ſhould be aboliſhed.

The aſſembly on the nineteenth afforded another example of enlightened and liberal policy. In the evening ſitting a letter was read from Meſſrs. Baur, merchants of Marſeilles, which announced that Marchand commander of the Solide, had diſcovered four new iſlands in the Indian ſeas, of which he had taken poſſeſſion in the name of the French nation, and of Lewis the Sixteenth. The iſlands were full of people, and abounded in animal and vegetable productions. The ſpeech of Lueſnay, on this occaſion, is worthy of being recorded.

"It is a great problem," ſaid he, "whether the diſcovery of America has been uſeful to Europe; but certainly America has greatly ſuffered by the diſcovery—The iſlands diſcovered by Marchand are peopled—if there was but one man there, he is maſter of the iſle which he inhabits. With what right can people, who renounce all conqueſt, take poſſeſſion of an iſland which does not belong to them by any poſſible title? Citizens, the moment to prove our attachment to the principles of our conſtitution is come—Let others, if they pleaſe, carry to theſe ſavage iſlands, as they have been hitherto denominated, the arts, the riches, and the vices of Europe! Let us remain faithful to the declaration of the rights of men, and let us take care not to make an attack on the natural liberty, which we have recogniſed, and which we have been the firſt to proclaim."

This opinion was crowned by general plaudits, ſeveral times reiterated, and the aſſembly cloſed the diſcuſſion.

The period now approached when the intereſted and barbarous politics of a combination of deſpots was to deluge Europe with blood, to bring on a great and populous nation the moſt dreadful outrages, and to involve in a general ruin an unhappy and pious prince, whoſe greateſt crime, poſſibly was being the dupe of their criminal intrigues.

What the caution of Leopold would at leaſt have deferred, was precipitated by the ardour and violence of a young king: Yet even he (if we may credit the repreſentation of Noailles, the French ambaſſador at Vienna) was urged to a premature declaration of his intentions by the other powers.

The diſpatch of Dumourier to the king of Hungary was accompanied by an affectionate letter in the king's own hand-writing to his nephew, entreating him by every motive to ſtop the effuſion of blood, and aſſuring him that the conflict could only prove ultimately fatal to him, the king of France. With ſo little ſucceſs however was this application attended, that the reply of the imperial miniſter ſeemed only to breathe an increaſed ſpirit of inſolence and pride. The miniſter avowed openly the concert of princes againſt the conſtitution of France, and inſiſted on certain terms, upon which alone the courts of Berlin and Vienna could with-hold from hoſtilities. Theſe terms were—firſt, to guarantee the feudal rights of the German princes in Alſace and Lorraine; ſecondly to reſtore Avignon to the pope; and the third condition was the moſt ſingular of all, ſince, as it was indefinite, it muſt be modified according to that conſtruction which the demandants might prefer, and was incapable of any other definition. The terms of the condition were, "That the neighbouring powers ſhall have no reaſon for the apprehenſions which ariſe from the preſent weakneſs of the internal government of France." For the reſt, Noailles was referred to the official note of the eighteenth of March, which has been already noticed.

As the intentions of the combined courts could be no longer doubted, it was reſolved in council to declare war againſt the king of Hungary. Perhaps, notwithſtanding the provocation which had been given to the French nation, it would ſtill have been moſt politic to have been leſs precipitate, and to have compelled Auſtria to appear in every view in the character of the aggreſſor. Such at leaſt we are aſſured was the opinion of La Fayette. But in one point the ariſtocratical and republican parties perfectly agreed, that a war alone could eſtabliſh or terminate their hopes; and the hopes of the king and his miniſter appear to have been governed by the ſame ſentiment, for the reſolution in the council for war was propoſed by Dumourier and warmly ſupported by the king. The propoſal for declaring war was made, by the French king, to the aſſembly on the twentieth of April, when war was decreed againſt the king of Hungary and Bohemia, amidſt the applauſes of the whole legiſlative body, and of a numerous croud of ſpectators.

The motives alleged by the French nation, in their declaration for commencing hoſtilities, were—

That the court of Vienna, in contradiction to repeated remonſtrances, continued to grant open protection to the rebel ſubjects of France, who were preparing to carry fire and ſword into the boſom of their country.

That it excited and formed a concert of princes againſt the independence and liberty of France.

That the king of Hungary and Bohemia, in his official notes of the eighteenth of March and ſeventh of April, openly avowed, and refuſed to renounce this concert.

That notwithſtanding the propoſal made to him on the eleventh of March, to reduce on both ſides the troops on the frontiers to a peace eſtabliſhment, he continued and increaſed his hoſtile preparations.

That he inſulted the ſovereignty of the French nation, by preſenting to it conditions as the only terms by which peace was to be obtained, among which was the confirmation of the feudal rights of the German princes, having poſſeſſions in France, though the French nation had always continued to hold out indemnifications to them.

Beſides theſe inſtances, the French declaration mentions the contempt with which the ultimate requſition of the king was received, in not condeſcending to anſwer it, &c. The aſſembly declares ſolemnly its intentions of adhering to the principles of the conſtitution, in not undertaking any war of conqueſt, and hopes that, under the preſent provocations, the nations of Europe will not conſider the war which they are now obliged to commence in defence of their liberties as an infringement of that principle.

The politicians of France upon the commencement of hoſtilities, received aſſurances of powerful ſupport from the Belgic provinces, which had ſo lately been in a ſtate of revolt, and were, at this period, generally irreconciled to the dominion of Auſtria. The operations of the campaign were precipitated alſo upon this account, and their meaſures haſty and ill concerted were attended with the ſucceſs that might reaſonably be expected.

The ſpecific mode in which the Auſtrians were to be attacked, appears not to have been much better concerted than the general plan—their untrained ſoldiers were parceled out in ſmall diviſions, under commanders with whoſe merits they were little acquainted, and ſome of whom were actually diſaffected to the popular cauſe. This plan, was to divide the enemy's forces, and on the twenty-eighth of April three parties of French entered the Auſtrian Netherlands in different parts. A body conſiſting of ten ſquadrons of cavalry, under the command of Theobald Dillon, an able and experienced officer, and a field mareſchal, was directed to march from Liſle for Tournay. Another of ten thouſand men, under lieutenant general Biron (formerly the duc de Biron), was to preſent itſelf before Mons, in order to prove the diſpoſitions of the Auſtrian ſoldiers, and ſtill more of the inhabitants of the country, from whom conſiderable aid was expected; and a third detachment of twelve hundred, under the command of general Carl, was to proceed to Furnes. Valenciennes was the place of general rendezvous for the troops which mareſchal Rochambeau was to draw from the garriſons, to ſupport the body under Biron.

The French appear to have had bad intelligence, and to have been deceived both as to the numbers and the diſpoſition of the enemy. At Tournay Dillon found a ſtrong body under general count d'Happencourt ready to receive him, and ſtrongly poſted. The national troops, not yet accuſtomed to ſuſtain the fire of regular ſoldiers, were thrown into diſorder almoſt on the firſt attack. The general made every exertion to rally them, and was obſerved in the front of the line, exhorting them to keep their ranks. Unfortunately in the midſt of the confuſion, ſome perſon actuated either by cowardice or treachery, exclaimed,—"Sauve qui peut!" and the voice appeared to proceed from the ſpot where Dillon ſtood; a general cry of "Treaſon, treaſon, we are betrayed!" ſpread from rank to rank; the panic became univerſal, and the whole party fled before the purſuers in the utmoſt diſorder, even to the gates of Liſle. The unfortunate commander, Dillon, was murdered almoſt as ſoon as he entered the city, and his dead body torn to pieces by the ſoldiers and the mob. Their ſavage fury had ſcarcely ſatiated itſelf upon this victim of popular deluſion, before a party of the Royal Cravate, (a regiment of cavalry) ruſhing precipitately towards Liſle, overtook Berthois, an officer of engineers, beyond the Porte de Five. They no ſooner ſaw him, than ſome of them exclaimed, "There goes another of theſe traitors! and inſtantly fell upon the unhappy gentleman, who, after receiving ſeveral ſhots, fell from his horſe; and the body being ſuſpended from a lamp-iron, every ſoldier of the party diſcharged his piece at it as he paſſed. It was alſo ſaid, that Chaumont, aid-de-camp to general Dillon, a prieſt under the ſuſpicion of being a ſpy, and four Tyroleſe priſoners, were alſo killed. It however afterwards appeared that Chaumont had only been miſſing, having been left for dead upon the field of battle, and that one or two perſons only, beſides the general and Berthois, loſt their lives in the affray.

The diviſion under Biron took poſſeſſion of Quievrain on the twentieth, without oppoſition, and marched towards Mons in three columns. The general reached Boſſu without meeting any perſon except ſome travellers, who informed him of a grand movement of the Auſtrians. At the end of the village of Boſſu, he was oppoſed by ſome hulans whom he diſperſed by a few diſcharges of cannon. As ſoon as he came within ſight of Mons, he could diſcover that the heights before the city were occupied by a very conſiderable body of troops, advantageouſly poſted, which it appeared afterwards, were commanded by the baron de Beaulieu. The Auſtrians, it was evident, were more numerous than the French, and the general could diſcover ſome manœuvres which announced an intention to turn his right. Thus ſituated, Biron determined to wait the news of the attack towards Tournay. About five in the evening, however the enemy attacked a part of his right wing at the village of Vannes—The French conducted themſelves with great ſkill and firmneſs, and the Auſtrians were repulſed with ſome loſs.

At length Biron received information from mareſchal Rochambeau of the defeat of general Dillon, and determined to retreat in the morning. Towards ten o'clock at night he ſaw the fifteenth and ſixteenth regiments of dragoons mounted on horſeback without orders, and proceeding to the left of the camp, where they formed a column. He purſued them alone and unarmed, but was carried away with the column, which was in a quick trot, and crying out, they were betrayed. In this manner the general was carried for more than a league, before he could prevail on his flying troops to obey him; He ſucceeded at length, and brought them all, except thirty or forty, back to the camp: but the deſerters proceeded on to Valenciennes, reporting, that they were betrayed by Biron, who had deſerted to Mons. On the thirteenth at day-break Biron began his retreat, and arrived without moleſtation at Quievrain. Here he left Fleury with a part of his troops, and went to conduct the army to the camp they had occupied before Quievrain. He ſcarcely, however was arrived at this place, before the battalion of national-guards, who covered Quievrain, were diſpoſſeſſed by the hulans; Biron now conceived that the only means of ſaving the camp was to attack Quievrain, which he did with the forty-ninth regiment, and carried it; but to keep it, ſome ſupport was neceſſary; and the reſt of the army, and the infantry in particular, were ſo exhauſted with fatigue, that they were utterly unfit for ſervice. The general therefore found himſelf under the neceſſity of abandoning his camp and train to the enemy, and of making a precipitate retreat to Valenciennes. Mareſchal Rochambeau poſted himſelf with ſome ſquadrons on the heights of St. Sauve to favour the retreat, which was accompliſhed; the French ſuſtained a conſiderable loſs in this expedition, but more by hunger and fatigue than by the ſword of the enemy.

The only one of the three parties, which ſucceeded, was that under general Carl, and which conſiſted of only four thouſand infantry and two hundred and forty cavalry. This ſmall party preſented themſelves on the twenty-ninth of April before Furnes, and the commander deſired a conference with the magiſtrates; in the courſe of which, he informed them, that the French were not come to make war on the Flemings, but to treat them as friends and brothers. The magiſtrates offered to deliver up the keys of the gates, but this was declined. The failure of the general plan obliged Carl to retreat to Ghywilde, and ſoon after to Dunkirk, with no other fruit from his expedition.

So ill concerted had the meaſures of the French miniſtry been, that Rochambeau complained that "the plan of Biron's expedition was publiſhed in all the journals before he knew it officially;" and ſays, in his letter to the king, that "the miniſters, and particularly the miniſter of war, wiſhed to play the whole game, and make him only a piece to be moved about at will." On this account, and becauſe he diſapproved of offenſive war, he deſired permiſſion to reſign; and after ſome delay, mareſchal Luckner was appointed to the command of the northern army in his ſtead.

Notwithſtanding the repulſe of the French, on their attempt to penetrate the Auſtrian frontiers, it was ſome time before the enemy was in a condition to retailate. On the ſeventeenth of May a body of Auſtrians, to the amount of three thouſand, attacked Bavai, and took the garriſon, amounting to eighty men, priſoners; but intelligence was no ſooner brought of the attack, than Noailles with a van-guard of cavalry was ſent to the relief of the town. Mareſchal Luckner in perſon accompanied this advanced guard; and mareſchal Rochambeau followed to ſupport him with a body of infantry. The expedition of the Auſtrians was, however, only a predatory excurſion, and they had retreated two hours before the arrival of Luckner, and took with them a quantity of forage, which, in effect, appeared to be their principal object.

If was a part of the plan concerted in the French cabinet, that all the French troops could be in motion about the ſame time, and form if poſſible a general rendezvous in the centre of the Auſtrian Netherlands. Agreeably with this plan Lafayette was to be at Givet by the thirtieth of the month; the orders had reached him only on the twenty-fourth, and though in moſt reſpects ill appointed, by extraordinary exertions he provided ſeventy-eight pieces of artillery by the twenty-ſixth, and on the ſame day diſpatched Narbonne, who with a heavy train of artillery performed a march of fifty-ſix leagues over ground generally bad, in five days, and arrived in time at Givet. The reſt of the troops were equally punctual, and after driving in the enemy's patroles, arrived on the appointed day. Gouvion took poſt at Bouvines, half-way to Namur, on the firſt of March; and every thing appear to promiſe the greateſt ſucceſs. The failure of Biron and the cruel fate of Dillon reached the army at this place, and excited the livelieſt indignation, as it did at Paris likewiſe; the objects of this diviſion were thus fruſtrated, but they continued to advance gradually on the enemy. On the twenty-third Gouvion was attacked at Humphine near Florennes, by a ſuperior body of the enemy, his force amounting only to four thouſand men. The Auſtrian advance-guard was twice repulſed; but Gouvion perceiving their ſuperiority of numbers, diſpatched his baggage to Philipville, where it arrived with only the loſs of twenty tents, for which he had no means of carriage, and effected his retreat in perfect order. In the action the French loſt three cannon, had twenty-four men killed and ſixty-three wounded.

On the eleventh of June the Auſtrians attacked the advance-guard of Lafayette, at Griſelle near Maubege; Gouvion who commanded penetrated their deſign, and diſpatched his equipage to Maubege, and commenced a retreating fight, in which his infantry being covered by hedges, annoyed the enemy, while the artillery cut up their columns. A hurricane prevented the main body from hearing the ſignals, but as ſoon as intelligence was received in camp, Narbonne marched a reinforcement with which he took the enemy in flank, while Lafayette advanced with the main army The Auſtrians were driven from the field, leaving behind their killed and wounded; they were purſued more than a league beyond the poſition of their advance-guard, and the French reoccupied their former poſt. In the courſe of the action the lieutenant-colonels of the regiment of Cote d'Or were were killed, and Gouvion, enraged that an ammunition-cheſt did not come up in time, went to expedite it with a huſſar, towards a houſe not in ſight of the enemy, and there was killed by a rolling bullet.

The hopes of the emigrants had been much elevated by the tranſactions in the northern army; to their emiſſaries the falſe alarm in Dillon's army has been attributed; the fourth regiment of huſſars, and ſome other ſoldiers, deſerted from Straſburg, and ſerved further to raiſe the expectations of a counter-revolutionary ſpirit in the people; in this inſtance however they were deceived, for the ſoldiers finding themſelves betrayed by their officers, returned in a body to their duty.

The concerns of the war, and the conteſts of party, occupied the national aſſembly ſo completely, that little was effected in the buſineſs of legiſlation from the commencement of the year. They however paſſed a decree which ordered the burning of the parchments, writings, and pictures, relative to the pedigrees of the nobility. A decree paſſed about the ſame period for educating at the expence of the nation thoſe children who had been ſent from St. Domingo to France, but whoſe parents or relations had been diſabled by the troubles from remitting money for their ſupport, was truly laudable. Some laws were alſo made reſpecting the crime of deſertion. The decree, however, for the ſuppreſſion of privateering was calculated in every view to reflect honour on a civilized nation. War is a ſtate ſo naturally pregnant with evil, as to induce the benevolent mind to wiſh for every mitigation of its calamities; and the plunder of individuals, uſeful to the world and hoſtile to none, is a ſhameful practice, calculated entirely to pervert the morals of a people, and to render them in every inſtance baſe, ſanguinary, and ferocious.

But we approach a period, in the events of which theſe inferior meaſures are loſt. When treating of the flight of the king, we intimated that the nation was not in a ſtate to bear a ſecond revolution. It was impoſſible in the claſh of parties at home, the combinations abroad, the corruption and intrigues ſupported by both, and the diſtraction conſequent to ſuch a ſtate of things, that there ſhould not be a ſubverſion of order and of property. It was impoſſible that a new government, in many inſtances oppoſite to all former principles, ſhould be eſtabliſhed without the moſt violent convulſion of the whole ſtate. The firſt conſtitution was a ſufficient deviation from the habits and prejudices of the French; and many men friends to the broadeſt principles of repreſentative government were of opinion that to attempt to carry further the democratic ſcheme, was to endanger the liberty they had already achieved.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed of the republican party thought differently, and they did not foreſee that they themſelves muſt ſhortly loſe the power which they were about to aſſume, and that men of daring views and diſpoſitions, devoid of principle, and ſuſceptible of the baſeſt corruptions as well as the blackeſt crimes, would be enabled to take the lead, and forcibly exclude them from the authority which they occupied.

The events of this period are minutely intereſting, and aſtoniſhing collectively; and the intereſt increaſes as events progreſs: there is a conſiderable degree of difficulty in the attempt to abſtract from the multitude of facts, the volumes of contradictory opinions and accounts promulged concerning thoſe facts, one uniform and conſiſtent chain of narration; perhaps the very nature of the tranſactions involve them in confuſion; the events themſelves from this period, are perplexed by their frequent contradiction, iſſuing with rapidity and executed with impetuous celerity, at times accompliſhing their objects by the boldneſs of the deſign, at others palſied by intrigue or meaſures equally bold ſuddenly and more promptly executed; perhaps it is in the ſources of the events and the characters of the actors we ſhall be beſt able to comprehend the tranſactions themſelves.

The influence of the jacobin ſociety has been already noticed, and the high and encreaſing credit of the republicans; their numbers in the firſt national aſſembly we before obſerved were few, and they had expreſſed a diſquietude, which ſoon grew into jealouſy, at ſome changes which had taken place in the conſtitution itſelf and the ſurprizing alteration in the temper of ſome of thoſe who had been the moſt ardent in the cauſe of liberty—Barnave, the Lameths, and others, had become at once objects of regard at court, and from being its moſt zealous opponents its moſt ſtrenuous advocates in the aſſembly.

Theſe united conſiderations only ſtimulated the republicans to ſeek every means of producing alterations ſuitable to their ideas in the conſtitution; thoſe who were content with the conſtitution had generally retired, and the legiſlative aſſembly contained a conſiderable majority impreſſed with thoſe ſentiments concerning the imperfections of the conſtitution. By one of thoſe fortuitous occurrences which frequently ariſe in momentous periods, the court was as hoſtile to the conſtitution on account of the reſtraints it impoſed, as the republicans for the looſeneſs and inſufficiency of theſe reſtraints; each party was diſſatisfied, but from the moſt oppoſite motives, and their efforts directed inceſſantly to the ſame point at length produced the deſtruction which they ſought, but without accompliſhing the object which was to replace the ruin.

To depict the progreſs of this extraordinary combination would require volumes, the leading features may mark the character of the whole: notwithſtanding their popularity for talents and integrity, the political principles of the republicans had not gained a majority in the nation, nor even in Paris; but there happened to be in the capital a number of the moſt determined republicans, many of whom had openly declared for a republic upon the flight of Lewis, but whoſe voices at that time were drowned in the murmurings of compaſſion and the dignified ſentiments of humanity. Danton is ſaid to have been the firſt to conceive and form the bold project of the republic, his character we ſhall touch upon at a ſubſequent period. But there were others, whoſe lives having been devoted to political ſtudies, had without any concert with Danton and others, long turned their attention to the ſame object; Condorcet, Briſſot, and Thomas Paine, had eſtabliſhed a gazette entitled Le Republicain, in the very firſt number of which they openly unfolded their principles; they held out the flight of the king as a dereliction of the crown and a proof of the inutility of the office; they appealed to the memory and feelings of thoſe who witneſſed the diſtraction and diſtreſs which prevailed before his flight and after his reſtoration, and the delicious and tranſporting tranquillity which prevailed while he was abſent; they were no leſs explicit on the perſonal conduct of the king, who had violated the law that reſtricted him to twenty leagues from the legiſlature, —that which declared deſertion an abdication, —the oath which he had taken to ſupport theſe laws and the whole conſtitution, and they contraſted his declaration upon his flight with his ſubſequent declarations and meaſures. The reiteration of theſe ſelf-evident truths, the promulgation of of ſimilar principles in gazettes of unequal merit which multiplied daily, the ſpirit of enquiry that had ſucceeded the ſpirit of doubt, and above all the irritation of the public mind from the external preſſure of war, had produced a fluctuation in the public opinion which finally ſettled with thoſe whoſe talents had excited admiration, and whoſe conduct and principles diſplayed a ſublime magnanimity, and a humanity ſo diffuſive as to embrace the good and warm the ſelf-love of every individual.

The court was not inſenſible to the ſeverity of the diſcuſſions to which it was expoſed, but was blind to the change of the public ſentiment; ſurrounded by characters which ſoothed its vanity and flattered its hopes, it thought that by filling the public offices with ſervile or intriguing men, and keeping within the letter of the conſtitution, the law would be ſufficient to render its authority ſecure. With this perſuaſion the court making the extreme uſe of the powers veſted in it the more effectually to carry into execution its treaſonable deſigns, had blinded the public by the diſmiſſion of one ſet of miniſters, and the choice of others, always profeſſing to comply with the wiſhes of the people: but theſe changes became ſo frequent as to preclude deception, and it was openly made known to the court, that the king, to prove his attachment to the people, ſhould chuſe his miniſters from among thoſe whoſe private virtues were known, and whoſe patriotiſm was not equivocal.

Dumourier, like Mirabeau, whoſe vices were too great to attach the confidence of the diſcerning to his talents, ſaw that meaſures muſt be adopted to ſooth the popular feeling, adviſed the admiſſion of ſome popular men to the adminiſtration; accordingly Roland, a man of auſtere morals and the ſimpleſt manners, was called to the home department; Servan, author of a popular work written before the revolution, called The citizen ſoldier, was appointed miniſter of war; and Claviere a Geneveſe to the management of the finances; the laſt of theſe only belonged to a popular club, but their deciſive preference for republican government was as well known as the moderation of their temper and the purity of their lives; in thus driving before the ſtorm the king acted with prudence, and had his diſpoſition to profit by the advice of thoſe men been ſincere, no meaſure was more likely to reſcue him from his embarraſſments; but it was only the expedient of deſparation ſupported by the intrigue of Dumourier, who placing a fond reliance on his own ability, thought to manage the government by the principles of military tactics.

The proceedings of the adminiſtration were however looked up to with that confidence which the probity of the principal members was calculated to inſpire; but this confidence was not durable: how proſpects ſo fair ſhould diſappear, will no longer appear extraordinary when the mode of proceeding at a period ſo critical comes to be conſidered, and we are furniſhed with the facts from an authority as illuſtrious as unfortunate,* who was a principal though inviſible actor in the politics of this era.

Lewis the Sixteenth, behaved to this miniſtry with the greateſt good-humour—He was not preciſely ſuch a perſonage as he has been induſtriouſly repreſented by thoſe who were intereſted in degrading him. He was neither that ſtupid ſot which he has been held out to be for the purpoſe of exciting contempt, nor that polite, good and affectionate character for which his friends have extolled him. Nature had formed him in a common kind of mould: he would have acted well in an obſcure ſituation; but he was depraved by a royal education, and loſt his moderation at a critical period, in which his ſafety could have been affected only by the aſſiſtance of genius or virtue. A common mind, educated at a court, and taught from the cradle the art of diſſembling, acquires many advantages in its commerce with mankind. The art of diſcovering to each no more than he would wiſh him to know, is only a habit, to which conſtant exerciſe gives the appearance of addreſs; and a man muſt be born an ideot, in order to appear a fool in a ſimilar ſituation. Lewis the Sixteenth had beſides a good memory, and a great ſhare of activity; he never was a moment unemployed, and read a good deal. He had the moſt perfect and minute knowledge of the treaties made by France with the neighbouring powers; he was well acquainted with its hiſtory, and was the beſt geographer in the kingdom. Knowledge of names; the juſt application of them to the phyſiognomies of the perſons of the court to whom they belonged; acquaintance with all their private anecdotes, had been extended by him to every individual, who had at all diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the revolution; and no one of any quality or deſcription could be mentioned to him, of whom he could not give ſome kind of information founded on their private hiſtory. But he was without ſtrength of character, confined in his views, twiſted as it were his feelings by ſuperſtitious prejudices and jeſuitical principles, and was literally afraid of hell, the horns and hoofs of the devil, and excommunication; with all this it was impoſſible he ſhould be any thing but a poor creature of a king. If he had been born two hundred years earlier, and had had a reaſonable wife, he would have made no more noiſe in the world than other princes of his line, who have paſſed acroſs the ſtage without doing either much good or evil: but aſcending the throne amidſt the diſſoluteneſs of the court of Lewis the Fifteenth, and the diſordered ſtate of the treaſury, and ſurrounded by corrupted men, he was drawn on by a giddy woman, who joined to Auſtrian inſolence the forwardneſs of youth, and to the arrogance of grandeur the intoxication of the ſenſes, and the carleſſneſs of levity; and who was herſelf ſeduced by all the vices of an Aſiatic court.

Lewis the Sixteenth too weak to hold the reins of government, which was now falling headlong into ruin, and crumbling to deſolation, haſtened his own by faults without number, continually floating between the fear of irritating his ſubjects, and his wiſh to keep them within bounds, and unable to govern them, convened the ſtates-general, inſtead of reforming the expences, and regulating his court. After having himſelf unveiled the ſpring, and ſhewed the way to innovation, he hoped to ſtop its progreſs, by affecting a power againſt which he had furniſhed arms, and againſt whom he had himſelf given inſtructions for reſiſtance.

No other means were left him, than to ſacrifice with a good grace a part of his authority, in order, by means of the other, to ſeize the whole, on a proper occaſion, which he was not however likely to do; ſince he gave himſelf up to the moſt deſparate intrigues, the only ſort familiar to thoſe whom he choſe for his adviſers, under the protection and patronage of his wife. He had taken ſome pains to impreſs the popular miniſters whom he now choſe with the idea that he placed confidence in them; and he was ſo ſucceſsful, that for three weeks after their appointment Roland and Claviere delighted with the apparent good diſpoſitions of the king, thought only of the happineſs with which the nation was about to be bleſſed and the completion of the revolution. When a doubt of the king's diſpoſition was ſuggeſted, Roland replied, "If he is not an honeſt man, he "is the moſt arrant cheat in the kingdom; diſſimulation can hardly go ſo far."

At this period the ſittings of the councils might be called decent in compariſon with what they became afterwards; but they were at that time puerile, conſidering the great intereſts which were at ſtake. Each of the miniſters who had papers to ſign went to the king on the council day to arrange this particular buſineſs before the council began. They all went afterwards into the council hall, where, after the decrees had been ſigned, which the miniſter of juſtice preſented, debates took place reſpecting the operations of government, internal order, relations with foreign powers, peace or war. The king suffered his ministers to talk; in the mean time he read the Gazette, the English newspapers in their own language, or wrote letters. The sanction of the decrees, however, fixed his attention; he did not give his sanction readily, but never refused. When a decree was presented for the first time, he put off sanctioning it till the following council, when he came with his mind made up.

With respect to objects of great political concern, he often eluded examining them, by turning the conversation on different subjects, or on matters peculiar to each of the ministers. If the business turned on war affairs, he talked about travels; if it was a diplomatic discussion, he began a history of the manners of the country in question, or made enquiries about its situation and produce; if the examination of the state affairs led him into details of agriculture and rural economy, he questioned Roland about his works, talked to Dumourier about his anecdotes, and so with the rest. The council in short was little else than a coffee-house, where every one learned the news of the day, and amused himself with trifles; there was no register kept of the deliberations, no secretary to minute them. After three or four hours conversation the council broke up, without having done any thing except putting some signatures, and this took place three times a week.

Such was the mode of proceeding while the combined enemies of France were forming their immense plans of partition, when an army of one hundred thousand Austrians, Hessians, and emigrants were advancing into the French territory, and Lafayette with only eighteen thousand men in his camp to oppose them; and the other generals either shut up in fortresses, or with small bodies of ill provided and wretchedly equipped troops detached over the conntry. The question of war had been warmly discussed; but it was unavoidable; the decrees for the camp and respecting the clergy renewed the heat and blew it up to animosity; the court saw in these measures the frustration of its machinations; but the king was too much fortified in his resolution to declare his refusal directly; under various pretexts he deferred it from day to day for fifteen days. The urgency of the measure at length became so evident as to overcome in all appearance the politic scruples of Dumourier, for the six ministers were at length unanimous. During these discussions Dumourier preserved his usual intimacy with the king, as his morals were more in unison with the court, his visits were constant to the private parties of the queen. The delay of the sanction was now understood as a positive refusal.

The republican party in the mean time were indefatigable in their declamation on the existence of what they termed an Austrian committee, or a combination of courtiers under the protection of the queen, to betray the republic to the house of Austria, and as the ex-ministers Montmorin and Bertrand were charged with being at the head of this combination, they determined on the prosecution of their calumniators. An unfortunate step which was taken by La Riviere, a judge of the peace, in citing Chabot, Bazire, and Merlin, three deputies of the assembly, and among the most clamorous of the accusers of Montmorin, to appear before him, rather injured the cause it was meant to serve. A decree of accusation was passed against La Rivere, and Gensonne and Brissot undertook to prove the existence of the Austrian committee.

As the character of the king was implicated in the charge of this traitorous combination, he wrote himself to the assembly, requesting that the truth of the report might be fully inveſtigated, and if deſtitute of foundation, that the inventors of it might be brought to puniſhment—But this interference of the king was cenſured as unconſtitutional, and the application was heard only with a murmur of diſapprobation.

The Engliſh cabinet beheld the proceedings at Paris with ſilent ſatisfaction; but from the diſpoſition of the people they dared not yet openly declare for the confederacy, the exultation expreſſed by the friends of liberty in England, the writings deſſeminated to explain the power of the people, excited miniſterial fears for the ſafety of the Engliſh govsrnment; a great portion of the nation appeared much intereſted in the prevalence of republican power in France, and temporiſing meaſures alone ſuited the ſtate of affairs. In conſequence a proclamation was iſſued prohibiting "dangerous doctrines." This was ſoon after followed by another proclamation to prevent any Britiſh ſubject aſſiſting either party in the preſent war. The laſt order was given in conſequence of a repreſentation made by Chauvelin, the French miniſter at that court, of the motives which had induced the meaſures undertaken by France, at the ſame time hoping that the Engliſh, having no intereſt in the internal government of any foreign power, would remain neuter; mean time the confederated kings were uſing every poſſible means to increaſe their numbers.

On the twenty-ſecond of May, Genſonne and Briſſot brought forward their accuſation againſt Montmorin and Bertrand: but the only fact on which they could reſt was a paſſage in a letter from Montmorin to the French miniſter at Vienna, in Auguſt 1791, in which he ſays, "The beſt men in the national aſſembly. ſuch as Barnave, Lameth, Duport, and thoſe who have the greateſt influence, are now acting in concert with the true ſervants of the king, to reſtore to his majeſty the authority neceſſary to carry on his government." On the firſt and ſecond of June, the ex-miniſters ſubmitted their defences in writing to the national aſſembly who referred them to a committee.

A report was now circulated, that on the twenty-third of May the king intended ſecretly to abſcond from Paris; and Petion, the mayor, wrote to the commandant-general of the national-guard, communicating his ſuſpicions, and entreated him to employ every meaſure of obſervation and prudence. The letter of Petion produced an immediate reply from the king, directed to the municipality of Paris—His majeſty treats the report as a new and horrible calumny, intended only to excite the people to inſurrection, and to force him to quit the capital—He however aſſures them, the efforts of theſe traitors ſhall be in vain, "While France," ſays he, "has enemies to encounter at home and abroad, it is in the capital my poſt is to be eſtabliſhed. I commit myſelf," he adds, "without reſerve, to the citizens of Paris and the national guard—Surrounded by them, and ſtrong in the purity of my intentions, I ſhall wrap myſelf up in tranquility, fearleſs of all events."

Petion anſwered the letter of the king. He mentioned having received information from different quarters reſpecting the king's intended flight, but he omitted to ſpecify the evidence on which he grounded his ſuſpicion. That the king, harraſſed as he was by the diſſatisfaction of the metropolis, might indeed meditate a ſecond flight, is by no means improbable; that even ſuppoſing the ſuſpicion not well founded, Petion might receive information to that effect, either from ill-intentioned or credulous perſons, is equally to be believed; but in either caſe, the evidence on which the fact reſted ſhould have been brought forward.

Notwithſtanding this defect of evidence, the king's intention to withdraw himſelf appears to have obtained ſome degree of credit; and as the body-guard, which had been alotted to the king, by the conſtitution, was particularly ſuſpected of inciviſm, it was diſbanded by a decree of the aſſembly on the thirtieth of May, and the province of defending the perſon of the king was committed to the national-guard of Paris. A decree of accuſation was alſo paſſed againſt the commandant Briſſac. At the ſame ſitting two of the deputies attached to the court, Frondiere and Calve, were committed priſoners to the Abbaye, on a charge of inſolent conduct towards the aſſembly.

The refuſal of the king to ſanction the decree againſt the refractory clergy, only ſerved to provoke a meaſure of ſtill greater ſeverity againſt theſe unhappy perſons. On the twenty-ſixth of May a decree was paſſed, authoriſing the baniſhment of any nonjuring prieſt, on a petition preſented to the directory of the diſtrict by twenty citizens. The eccleſiaſtic was, in ſuch caſe, to declare to what foreign country he meant to retire, when he was to be furniſhed with a paſſport and quit the diſtrict in twenty-four hours. To this decree alſo the king, after ſome deliberation, affixed his veto.

The national-guard of Paris did not eſcape the ſuſpicions of the republican party. They ſtill feared or affected to fear the Auſtrian committee. To protect the capital from its external enemies, it was propoſed on the ſixth of June by the military committee—"That a camp of twenty thouſand men ſhould be formed under the walls of Paris—that to complete this levy, every canton in the kingdom ſhould be obliged to contribute five men, one of whom was to be a horſeman; and that they were to aſſemble at Paris before the fourteenth of July, the day of the celebration of the general confederation, at which, to augment their patriotiſm, they were to aſſiſt." This propoſal, which was firſt ſuggeſted by the miniſter of war Servan, was received with infinite diſſatisfaction by the national-guard and volunteers of Paris; and the king refuſed to ſanction the decree.

Nearly about the ſame period, a propoſal was made to the national aſſembly, by the ſection of Croix Rouge, that, as the neceſſity was urgent for arming the whole nation, in the preſent critical moment, and as the ſcarcity of fire-arms, and their immenſe price, rendered it impoſſible for many patriotic citizens to obtain a ſupply, the deputation requeſted the aſſembly to order an immediate fabrication of pikes over the whole ſurface of the empire. It was however, ſome weeks before Paris was formally armed in this manner, by a decree of the aſſembly.

Whether driven to deſparation, or encouraged by the ſupport which he experienced from ſome of the moſt ambitious characters, and particularly from La Fayette, is uncertain; but the king ſeemed now ſpiritedly to vindicate his authority againſt his opponents. The event proved that this reſolution was untimely taken. He ſhould have permitted his moſt violent adverſaries more completely to expoſe themſelves; he might even perhaps have made a ſelection from thoſe who were not the moſt favourably diſpoſed to the court, and, by friendly and ingenious conduct, might have convinced them of the ſincerity of his intentions, and might have made the beſt uſe of their influence with the people. The miniſter Roland was perhaps of this deſcription; and as he carried with him to retirement the regret of many unimpeachable characters, we can only believe that the king was himſelf deceived with reſpect to his intentions, or that the monarch did not, at leaſt, act that ſteadily upright part which the exigences of the times required; but the king unſheathed the ſword on the twelfth of June, when he announced to the aſſembly the diſmiſſion of Servan, Claviere, and Roland; this ſtep was taken at the deſire of Dumourier, whoſe application of a conſiderable ſum of the public money to the uſe of madame de Beauvert his kept miſtreſs, had excited the remonſtrance of the moral Roland; Dumourier aſſumed the war department, Mourges and Naillac ſucceeded Roland and Claviere.

This change however was accelerated by a letter which Roland had addreſſed to king, ſome days before; this letter in a variety of reſpects is an important document, the prophetic admonitions which it diſplays concerning the conduct of the court, the vigour and frankneſs of the ſentiments, and what renders it curious as well as important is that it was the production of the miniſter's wife: it was as follows.

Sire,—The preſent ſtate of affairs in France cannot be of long duration. It is a criſis at its higheſt degree of violence, and muſt terminate in a ſhock that intereſts your majeſty as much as it does the whole empire. Honoured with your confidence, and placed in a ſituation in which it behoves me to ſpeak the truth to you, I venture to do it without diſguiſe: it is an obligation under which your majeſty's ſelf has laid me. The French have formed a conſtitution, and it has produced malecontents and rebels. The majority of the nation approve it, and have ſworn to maintain it at the expence of their lives. They have conſidered the war with ſatisfaction, as the grand teſt for eſtabliſhing the conſtitution; yet, buoyed up by hopes, the minority have exerted their united efforts againſt it. Hence ariſes that inteſtine conflict with the laws, that anarchy which all good citizens lament, and of which ill-diſpoſed people have not failed to take the advantage, in order to countenance their aſperſions againſt the new government. Hence thoſe opinions which are every where ſpread abroad, and every where fomented; for in no part is indifference of opinion to be found. Either the triumph or the change of the conſtitution is the cry of all; they labour either to maintain or new-model it. I ſhall only touch upon what the preſent circumſtances of things require, and, with the utmoſt impartiality ſhall ſuggeſt an idea of what turn affairs may be expected to take, and what meaſures would be prudent to adopt.

You enjoyed, ſire, great prerogatives, and which, indeed, your majeſty conceived to be inherent in royalty. Bred up under the idea of preſerving theſe prerogatives, you could not ſee yourſelf deprived of them with ſatisfaction. Theſe ſentiments, which are natural to the human heart, have had their full influence on the minds of the anti-revolutioniſts.

They have, therefore, depended upon being ſecretly favoured by your majeſty, until circumſtances permitted an open declaration in their behalf. This poſture of things could not but be evident to the whole nation; and it was ſufficient to put men upon their guard. Your majeſty has then been ever under the neceſſity of either yielding to the force of habit, and to particular inclination, or to make ſacrifices dictated by philoſophy, and called for by neceſſity.

Every thing has its term of duration, and that of uncertainty has at length arrived. Can your majeſty openly ally yourſelf with the pretended reformers of the conſtitution? or is it incumbent upon you generouſly to devote yourſelf entirely to promote its triumph? Such is the true ſtatement of a queſtion, the ſolution of which the preſent ſtate of things renders of inevitable neceſſity.

As to the metaphyſical queſtion, "Whether the French are ripe for liberty?" it is foreign from the ſubject before us; for it is not our buſineſs to conſider what we ſhould become in a century hence, but to ſee what the preſent generations are capable of.

In the midſt of the fermentations of the four laſt years, what has taken place? Privileges burdenſome to the lower order of the community have been aboliſhed; the ideas of juſtice and equality have been univerſally ſpread. The acknowledgement of the rights of the people, which has been ſolemnly allowed, is become a ſacred doctrine in politics. The hatred againſt the nobles has been long ſince inſpired by the nature of the feudal ſyſtem: it is now encreaſed by their manifeſt oppoſition to the conſtitution. The people conſidered theſe nobles in an odious light, on account of the oppreſſive privileges they enjoyed; but they would have forgot their hatred on the abolition of theſe privileges, if the conduct of the nobility, ſince that period, had not given every reaſon for men to conſider their rank with diſtruſt, and to oppoſe it as an irreconcileable enemy to their welfare.

The public attachment to the conſtitution increaſed in like proportion. The people not only derived eſſential advantages from it, but were perſuaded that ſtill greater benefits were preparing for them, ſince thoſe who were accuſtomed to oppreſs them were endeavouring with ſuch earneſtneſs to deſtroy or to modify it. The declaration of rights is become a political goſpel, and the French conſtitution a religion; in the defence of which, the people are ready to periſh. Thus their zeal went ſo far as to ſupply the place of law; and when its influence was not ſufficient to reſtrain the diſturbers of the public peace, the citizens took upon themſelves the taſk of puniſhing them. Hence the poſſeſſions of the emigrants have been expoſed to the ravages incited by vengeance. Hence ſo many departments were under the neceſſity of ſeverely treating the clergy whom the public opinion had proſcribed, and of whom ſome would have been victims to its reſentment. In the colliſion of intereſts, every ſentiment aſſumed the tone of paſſion. Our country is not a mere word, created by warmth of imagination; it is a being to which we offer ſacrifices, to which we are the more attached by the very ſolicitude it brings upon us, und which we love on account of the benefits we hope to derive from it; thus every injury offered to our country proves the means of encreaſing our enthuſiaſm.

To what a height did this enthuſiaſm riſe, when the machinations of foreign enemies were added to thoſe of the domeſtic foe, in order to perpetrate all that could be conceived wicked and fatal? The fermentation is extreme in the various parts of the empire; it will burſt upon us with a dreadful exploſion, unleſs it be calmed by a well-founded confidence in your majeſty's intentions. But this confidence will not be eſtabliſhed by mere promiſes and proteſtations; it can reſt upon facts only. The French nation know their conſtitution can ſuſtain itſelf; that government will have all neceſſary aid, whenever your majeſty, wiſhing well to the conſtitution, ſhall ſupport the legiſlative body, by cauſing their decrees to be executed, and remove every pretext for popular diſſatisfaction, and every hope of the malcontents.

For inſtance, two important decrees have been iſſued; both eſſentially concern public tranquillity and the welfare of the empire; their not being ſanctioned gives birth to miſtruſt; if it be poſtponed, it will create malcontents; and it is my duty to ſay, that in the preſent effervescence of the people's minds, diſcontent may lead to any thing. It is no longer time to recede—it is no longer time to temporize. The revolution is eſtabliſhed in the public mind; it will be completed by the effuſion of blood, if wiſdom do no guard againſt evils which can yet be prevented.

If force were recurred to in order to reſtrain the national aſſembly; if terror were ſpread through Paris, diſunion and conſternation in its vicinity, all France would riſe with indignation; and, diſtracted by the horrors of a civil war, ſhe would diſplay that gloomy energy, the parent of virtues and crimes, ever fatal to thoſe who provoke it: Public ſafety and your majeſty's individual happineſs, are cloſely linked; no power can divide them: diſtreſſes and certain misfortune will gather round your throne, if it do not reſt, through yourſelf, on the baſis of the conſtitution, and be eſtabliſhed on peace, which the maintenance of that conſtitution would at leaſt produce in our favour. Thus the ſtate of the public mind, the circumſtances, political reaſons, your majeſty's own intereſt, render it indiſpenſable for you to join the legiſlative body, and to concur in the nation's will. The nation conſiders as a neceſſity what principles point out as a duty; but the natural ſenſibility of this affectionate people holds out another motive. You were cruelly deceived, ſire, when wicked men endeavoured to excite uneaſineſs and miſtruſt in your breaſt, injurious to this kind people, this people ſo eaſily affected.

By being perpetually taught not to confide in the nation, your own conduct alarmed them. Let the people ſee that you are willing the conſtitution ſhould take its courſe, the conſtitution to which they have united their happineſs, and you will ſoon become the object of thanks.

The conduct of the clergy in many parts of the kingdom, the pretexts they furniſh for commotions, occaſioned a wiſe law to be enacted againſt thoſe diſturbers of the peace. Let your majeſty's ſanction be given to it. The public tranquillity and the ſafety of the clergy ſolicit it. If this law be not put in force, the departments will be obliged to ſubſtitute ſevere meaſures, as they have univerſally done, and the people will ſupply its place by violence.

The attempts of our enemies, the fermentations in the capital, the extreme diſquietude ariſing from the conduct of your guard, and which the teſtimonies of ſatisfaction given to that body contained in your proclamation (a meaſure truly impolitic under ſuch circumſtances) ſtill keep up; the ſituation of Paris, its proximity to the frontiers, all contribute to ſhew the neceſſity of a camp in its neighbourhood. This meaſure, the wiſdom and urgency of which are allowed by thinking men, waits only for the ſanction of your majeſty. Why ſhould delay create an appearance of regret on the part of your majeſty, when diſpatch would deſerve gratitude on ours? Already have the machinations of the ſtaff of the Pariſian national-guards againſt this meaſure cauſed men to ſuſpect that they act under ſuperior influence; already the clamours of certain outrageous demagogues raiſe ſuſpicion; already the public opinion expoſes the intention of your majeſty.

A little more delay, and the afflicted people will imagine they perceive in their king the friend and the accomplice of conſpirators.—Good heaven! are the powers of the earth ſtricken with blindneſs, and will they never attend to any councils but ſuch as lead them on to ruin? I am aware that the language of truth is ſeldom well received in courts: I am likewiſe ſenſible, that, as her voice is hardly ever heard there, revolutions become neceſſary. Above all, I am bound to ſpeak the truth to your majeſty, not only as a citizen ſubject to the laws, but as a miniſter honoured with your confidence, or inveſted with functions that imply it; nor do I know what can prevent me from fulfilling a duty which I feel to be incumbent on me! With the ſame intentions, I ſhall repeat my obſervations to your majeſty on the utility and neceſſity of executing the law, which preſcribes that there ſhould be a ſecretary of council. The law ſpeaks ſo powerfully, that the execution of it ſhould immediately follow.

It is neceſſary, for the ſake of reſponſible miniſters, to uſe means to eſtabliſh ſedateneſs, wiſdom, and caution, in the deliberations of council. Signed,—ROLAND.

Slander, the common weapon of violent parties, had always followed the diſmiſſion of miniſters, and Roland who belonged to no party, thought it his duty to ſupercede the induſtrious miſrepreſentations of the court emiſſaries, by laying a copy of the letter before the aſſembly, by whom it was received with the livelieſt praiſe, and ordered to be printed. The diſmiſſion of the miniſter, which was the only alternative to the confirmation of the decrees, proved to be a meaſure highly injurious to the court; admiration centered on the grave and ſagacious miniſter, and odium on the court. Addreſſes were now daily ſent into the aſſembly, and of a very intemperate character; on the ninth of June the inhabitants of the ſuburb of St. Antoine, amounting to upward of twenty thouſand, armed with pikes, and headed by Santerre a brewer, preſented an addreſs on the ſubject of the camp, and filed off through the aſſembly.

At this period, with good intentions but little wiſdom, Lafayette addreſſed a long letter to the aſſembly from his camp at Maubege, dated the ſixteenth of June, in which he draws a formidable picture of the dangerous ſtate of the nation, from the conduct of internal and the efforts of external enemies; he accuſed the Jacobins of criminal deſigns, and attributes to them a conſiderable portion of the public calamities; at the ſame time he addreſſed a letter to the king, expreſſive of ſimilar ſentiments.

The ſituations of the miniſters now became too dangerous to be any longer deſirable. The politic Dumourier wiſhed to retrieve a portion of his loſt popularity, and again attempted to court the favour of the Jacobins. He made a poſitive demand of the king, either to ſanction the decree for the camp near Paris, or to accept his reſignation. The king, however, remained ſtedfaſt to his purpoſe, and the miniſter reſigned; he was followed by the reſt, and on the eighteenth of June, general Chambon was appointed miniſter for foreign affairs, Lajard miniſter of war, Montceil of the interior, and the finances was kept vacant. Dumourier, in a letter to the aſſembly requeſted leave to repair to the army, and concluded by wiſhing that the fate of Gouvion might ſpeedily demonſtrate his attachment to his country.

The agitation produced by the letter of Lafayette, and the determination of the populace of St. Antoine to preſent an addreſs to the king, demanding the ſanction of the decrees; the threats thrown out in ſome of the prints, that they would plant as the tree of liberty an aſpin in the garden of the Thuilleries, prepared the minds of the people for ſome extraordinary occurrence. The meetings of the Jacobins and Cordeliers were ſcenes of unuſual turbulence; on the eighteenth of June the former declared their ſittings permament, in order to watch with vigilance plots which they alleged were in train to overturn their liberties; they propoſed that Lafayette ſhould be ſent to Orleans as a traitor, and others wiſhed him to be declared an enemy to France. Without doors the ſame ſpirit of diſorder hourly encreaſed; and on the morning of the twentieth, Rœderer procureur-ſyndic, appeared at the bar of the aſſembly and informed them, that contrary to the laws there exiſted in the city and ſuburbs a moſt formidable aſſociation of armed men, who threatened to proceed to the Thuilleries to preſent petitions to the king and the aſſembly.

While the aſſembly was debating whether they ſhould receive this deputation or not, an immenſe multitude, led by St. Heruge and Santerre, preſented themſelves before the hall; by their own report they amounted to eight thouſand, but probably much exceeded that number. After a tumultuous debate they were admitted. Their orator indulged in a long and violent declamation againſt the king and the whole conduct of the court, and when he had concluded the whole filed through the hall, the proceſſion not being ended in leſs than two hours.

In the mean time an immenſe crowd had collected round the palace and garden of the Thuilleries. There was however a ſtrong military guard in the palace, but the king would not permit force to be employed to repel them. At four o'clock the populace were computed at forty thouſand, and the gates of the Thuilleries were thrown open to them. At the moment of their entrance the royal family were at dinner, and on their attempting to force the door the king roſe to prevent the guards from uſing violence againſt them, and ſaid calmly, "I will go to them, I will prevent them from breaking the door." On the inſtant that it opened, a pike which had been thruſt againſt it to force it open, would have killed the king, but a chaſſeur turned the weapon aſide with his hand. One of the mob now advanced, and inſiſted upon the king's wearing the red cap, which was the enſign of the Jacobins; and another preſented him a bottle, and deſired him to drink the health of the nation. Some of the attendants offered to bring a glaſs; but he refuſed the offer, and immediately drank out of the bottle.

The mayor of Paris at length arrived; he exhorted the mob to preſerve moderation, and aſſured the king that he had nothing to fear—"The man," replied the monarch, "who has a clear conſcience, fears nothing;" and, taking the hand of a grenadier who ſtood by him, he applied it to his breaſt, and ſaid, "There, friend, feel my heart whether it beats quicker than uſual."

To the inceſſant demands of the populace, the king replied, that it was his firm intention to preſerve the conſtitution; and to the torrents of abuſe, and the repeated threats againſt his life, he anſwered in a pathetic tone—"Alas! if my life would ſecure the good of my country, how willingly would I offer it as a ſacrifice."

The approach of night delivered the king from this dreadful perſecution; the mayor embraced the opportunity to perſuade the people to diſperſe, and between eight and nine o'clock the palace was cleared of theſe unwelcome intruders.

During the whole of the tumult, the princeſs Elizabeth continued cloſe by the ſide of her brother, as if ſhe was born to be the victim of her generous affection, and to partake in all his misfortunes. On the firſt breaking in of the rabble, the queen fainted, and with her children, was accidently ſeparated and conveyed to the apartments of the king's phyſician. As ſoon as ſhe recovered, in her deſtraction ſhe attempted to penetrate to the king; but was ſtopped in her way thither, by the mob breaking into the council-chamber. Fortunately Lajard, the miniſter at war, and general Wittinghoff had retired to the ſame ſpot; Lajard formed a kind of a rampart of the great council table, which he placed againſt the door, with a double row of national-guards before it. Behind the table ſtood the queen with her children, the princeſs de Lamballe, and ſome other ladies. In this ſituation ſhe remained the whole time, comdemned to hear the moſt indecent reproaches, and the fouleſt imprecations, from the meaneſt and moſt depraved of her ſex.

On the first entrance of the mob into the palace, a deputation was sent from the national assembly, with orders to exert themselves for the preservation of peace; and during the course of the tumult, this deputation was renewed three times.

The events of the twentieth of June were a plain prelude to the downfall of monarchy, and men of reflection foresaw many of those evils which have since happened to this devoted country. From this moment all respect to authority, all order and subordination ceased; a momentary shame indeed appeared at first in the Parisians, and the directory of the departments, which was composed of some of the most respectable persons in the kingdom, at the head of which was Rochefoucault and Talleyrand, who determined to take every step for preventing the repetition of simular outrages. The conduct of Petion on this occasion could not be viewed without suspicion. One of the first steps of the department therefore was to publish a declaration, "That the events of the twentieth could not have taken place, if the laws in being, and particularly those relating to the public force, had been better known to the citizens, and better observed by the magistrates charged with the execution of them." To this declaration Petion published a very voluminous answer, calling upon them to commence a prosecution, and protesting him innocent in general terms. The department next published an advertisement to the people of Paris, exhorting them to peace and subordination, and intimating that there existed a secret connexion between the external and the internal foes of the public tranquillity. At the same time a petition to the national assembly, complaining in very strong terms of the outrages of the twentieth, was signed by the most respectable of the inhabitants; and several addresses were received from different departments, to the same effect.

The violence of the Jacobins has risen to the greatest height since the twentieth, and Lafayette had been a constant object of denunciation; that general therefore conceived it expedient to present himself at the bar of the assembly. When he arrived at his hotel several battalions of the national-guards waited upon him, a tree of liberty ornamented with ensigns and cockades was planted before his door, and every appearance bespoke the public attachment to a long esteemed friend. He appeared at the bar, and assigned as his reason for coming to Paris, the shame and indignation of the army at the recent outrages, which he said must have encreased to an alarming degree had he not thought it his duty to moderate their resentment against the factions, by assuring them that he would appear alone before the representatives of the nation, and demand in their name, that order, obedience, and respect for the laws should be restored: he avowed his letter of the sixteenth, entreated the assembly to save the country from ruin, by dissolving the factious clubs, and inflicting exemplary punishment on the promoters of the late disgraceful riots. The ardour and intrepidity which the whole public life of Lafayette has displayed in the cause of civil liberty has rendered even the errors of his judgment in some degree entitled to a tender regret, in the present instance his conduct appears not to have been governed either by wisdom or prudence, and though it may be called gallant it must be acknowleged that his enemies were too well justified in comparing his conduct to that of Monk, though he did not profit so much by experience as those whom he denounced. His want of knowlege in the dispositions of his countrymen is more remarkable than his mistaking the human character; the unshaken adherence of his army to their country reflected the highest credit on their virtue and left him much reason to regret his rashness.

Indignation filled the Jacobins on his arrival, his hatred of them only invigorated their reſentments; the appellation of Cromwell and Monk were re-echoed againſt him from a thouſand preſſes, and the popular diſlike proceeded ſo far as to burn him in effigy. In the aſſembly he was violently attacked by Iſnard, Gaudet, and others; and was defended by Ramond. Finding however that no good was to be effected in Paris, and learning that a deſign was formed to put him in arreſt, he left that city on the thirtieth and proceeded directly to the army.

That the officers of both armies felt a degree of reſentment at the indignities offered the king is evident, from a letter of mareſchal Luckner to the king, which was communicated to the aſſembly on the twenty-ninth by the miniſter of war. In that letter the mareſchal declares his approbation of the conduct of Lafayette, and ſays, "The indig-"nation of the ſoldiers, ſire, was terrible and ſudden, and the army admire the courage "of their king."

That a plan had been formed for the removal of the king from Paris appears beyond doubt, and the deſign of the meaſure was ſaid to have originated with Lafayette and his friends, which conſiſted of many of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of the moderate party, of the ſeveral aſſemblies, and of thoſe who formerly compoſed the club of the Feuillans, or friends of the conſtitution, among whom was the venerable Rochefoucault, whoſe opinions were deciſively in favour of the republican form of government, but who deemed the French nation not ſufficiently enlightened to render that form of government then ſuitable for them; that the opinions and intentions of this party were well known needs no other evidence than the letter of Roland, which emphatically warns againſt the danger of encouraging it. The intention of this party was to eſtabliſh a chamber of nobles; but the members of the aboliſhed nobility were not to be permitted to become members of it; the new nobility was to be compoſed of men ſelected for their virtues and talents from the body of the nation. The court is ſaid to have adopted this plan only with a view to divide the nation. It tended only to divide thoſe of the republicans who were moderate, and the nobles who were violent from the court; and to ſtrengthen and concentrate the force of the republicans. It procured for Lafayette the incurable hatred of the whole ancient nobility, without exciting the gratitude of the court; and it accelerated the miſfortunes into which he was now daily more deeply ſinking.

The Jacobins, although they retained their violence and a conſiderable degree of authority with the unthinking, felt a ſenſible decreaſe of reſpectable opinion; and they were equally adverſe with the court to the propoſed encampment, which in the hands of the late republican miniſters, whoſe attachments and principles united them without concert to Briſſot and a band of philoſophical politicians; narrowed their authority and would have overawed the populace of the ſuburbs; they therefore rejoiced in the diſmiſſion of the authors and the obſtinacy of the court.

On the ſame day, the miniſter of juſtice communicated a plan which the king propoſed as a ſubſtitute for the two decrees which he had refuſed to ſanction—With reſpect to the protection of the capital, it was the propoſal of the king to levy forty-two new battalions, to be ſtationed not at Paris, but between that city and the enemy, ſo as to form a ſecond line behind the army then on the frontiers, and as to the danger apprehended from the refractory prieſts, the miniſter aſſured the aſſembly, that it was the ſtrict intention of the king to enforce the execution of the laws againſt all diſturbers of the public peace.

The aſſembly perſiſted however in their decree, and the federates, for that is the name which was beſtowed on theſe new levies, were invited by the Jacobins to repair to Paris without any lawful authority. On the firſt of July, on the motion of Jean de Brie, it was declared by the aſſembly, "that the country was in danger." Several other reſolutions were paſſed, ordering all citizens, having been national-guards, ſhould be on permanent duty, and every officer at his poſt.

While theſe affairs were tranſacting in the metropolis, the armies of France had made ſome progreſs in the Auſtrian Netherlands. On the eighteenth of June Courtray ſurrendered after a ſhort reſiſtance to the arms of mareſchal Luckner; and about the ſame period, Carle took poſſeſſion of Ypres and the country adjacent. La Fayette's army had alſo advanced and gained poſſeſſion of St. Ghiſlain and the key of Mons. Mareſchal Luckner ſoon afterwards entered Menin.

The triumph of the French, however, was not of long duration. On the ſixth of July, the king announced to the aſſembly, that one enemy more was added to the confederation againſt French liberty—That the inſidious conduct of the king of Pruſſia had long indicated hoſtile intentions, and that he was now in the act of marching fifty-two thouſand men to co-operate with the king of Hungary. About the ſame period, the aſſembly received advices from mareſchal Luckner, ſignifying, that the numbers of the enemy were ſuch, that it was impoſſible for him to proceed farther into the territories of Auſtria, without the riſk of being cut off from a communication with the army of Lafayette; that the Pruſſians and Auſtrians were proceeding againſt him in two columns; that in conſequence of theſe circumſtances he had ordered his camp to be raiſed, and was himſelf retiring towards Valenciennes, and Lafayette towards Givet. A ſubſequent diſpatch announced the actual retreat of the armies; and that in breaking up the camp of Courtray, ſome of the enemy having got poſſeſſion of the ſuburbs, they had fired upon field mareſchal Jarry, who, to prevent the repitition of ſimilar outrages, had ſet fire to the ſuburbs and conſumed ſeveral houſes. The conduct of Jarry was conſidered as diſgraceful and injurious to the cauſe of France, and he was, in conſequence of it, diſmiſſed from his command.

The motives which induced the victorious generals to abandon thus haſtily the Netherlands, have been ſince publicly explained. Soon after the appointment of mareſchal Luckner to the northern army, it was generally underſtood that the plan and operations of the campaign were entirely left to the generals themſelves: and yet it has ſince appeared, and was confirmed by Luckner himſelf, that they retreated only by the expreſs orders of the court; and thus it forms an article of charge againſt the unfortunate monarch, not to be extenuated, as it almoſt proves the exiſtence of a conſpiracy in the court, moſt fatal to the liberties of the nation.

On the fifth of July, the king informed the aſſembly of his intention to celebrate the approaching anniverſary of the confederation. He expreſſed his hopes that this feſtival would more ſtrongly cement all good patriots in their country's cauſe, and diſappoint the attempts of the factious. On the following day the directory of the department of Paris, after a long ſitting, pronounced the ſuſpenſion of Petion from the office of mayor, and of Manuel, the procureur of the commune. The federates about this period arrived at Paris in conſiderable numbers, while every circumſtance announced the agitation of the public mind.

The extreme points on which the two parties differed, were that of pure democracy on the one part, and the inſtitution of an upper chamber, ſimilar to the Britiſh houſe of peers, on the other. Such an inſtitution, as a remnant of ariſtocracy, was regarded by the French with almoſt as much abhorrence as abſolute monarchy itſelf; while the eſtabliſhment of it was conſidered as the great object with the court, as a preliminary ſtep to the annihilation of liberty. The middle party was ſtill numerous; and it was judged that there were many who might ſecretly incline either to the court or the republicans, who yet would be well diſpoſed to ſacrifice ſomething of their prejudices to the preſervation of peace and order. On the ſeventh of July, at the moment when Briſſot aſcended the tribune, to pronounce a diſcourſe on the means of ſecuring the ſtate againſt all its enemies, Lamourette the patriotic biſhop of Lyons, requeſted to be heard for a few minutes. After expatiating on the neceſſity of union, and moſt particularly among the members of the national aſſembly, he ſaid, "let us make a ſacrifice of our "paſſions and prejudices in the moſt ſolemn manner, on the altar of our country; let "us give a great example to Europe, and inſpire our enemies with terror; there is nothing "incompatible but vice and virtue: I move that the preſident put a queſtion in theſe "terms—Let all who hold in equal deteſtation a republic and two chambers, and who "wiſh to maintain the conſtitution as it is, riſe!"

The words were ſcarcely pronounced, when the whole aſſembly, by an inſtantaneous impulſe roſe from their ſeats; the two parties advanced and embraced each other, and declared their purpoſe of adhering to the conſtitution. A deputation, with the biſhop of Lyons at their head was immediately appointed to convey the joyful intelligence to the king, and the adminiſtrative bodies were charged to communicate it without loſs of time to the citizens. The biſhop on returning to the aſſembly, informed them of the ſatisfaction which the king had teſtified on being informed of what had paſſed. He had however ſcarcely finiſhed, when the approach of the king was announced; he was received with loud applauſes; he was accompanied by his miniſters, and placed himſelf without ceremony by the ſide of the preſident, and addreſſed the aſſembly:—

"Gentlemen,—No ſpectacle can be more affecting to me than that general re-union of opinion and ſentiment which has now taken place. This re-union I have long deſired —at laſt my wiſh is fulfilled; the nation and the king form only one. The conſtitution will now become that point of union, around which all Frenchmen will aſſemble, in order to protect it, and the king will always ſet them the example."

To this the preſident replied:—"Sire,—this memorable epoch muſt inſpire with the greateſt pleaſure all the friends of liberty. It is a dreadful epoch for its enemies—henceforth the nation is invincible. In vain tyrants conſpire againſt liberty."

Both theſe ſpeeches were received with the loudeſt applauſe. The king made ſome efforts to anſwer, but was ſo much affected that he could only ſay, in a tone which indicated the utmoſt emotion, "The pleaſure that I fell is delicious." He then retired, accompanied by a deputation, and the aſſembly roſe, amidſt the exclamations of Vive la nation! Vive la liberté!

Thus ended this memorable motion; this well-meant but fruitleſs effort to reſtore harmony and tranquillity. It is aſſerted to have been the ſpontaneous act of the biſhop of Lyons, without any previous concert with any party whatever. The triumph of the conſtitutionaliſts was complete, and by moſt of the ardent ſpirits of both parties it was approved of earneſtly for the moment; and it was calculated in every event to have a temporary good effect; it afforded an opportunity to all who were fond of peace to diſengage themſelves from the trammels of party, and to this we may in a conſiderable degree attribute the delighful tranquillity and harmony of the feſtival of the confederation.

Had the court acted with conſiſtent candor, had it even acted with common prudence, and the combined powers been governed by honeſty, juſtice, or even a reſpect for the ordinary forms and maxims of civilized war, the diſſentions which had ſo unhappily diſtracted France might have terminated here. But unfortunately for the peace of the nation, and the monarch, the authority of his private counſels and the diſpoſition of his profeſſed friends in arms, were too firmly fixed, to be ſwayed by collateral conſiderations.

The reconciliation of the ſeventh of July was conſidered by many as in ſome meaſure intended as a compromiſe of the parties, relative to the affair of Petion and Manuel; and indeed the king, the very ſame evening, wrote to the aſſembly, intimating, that though to decide on their fate was a part of his conſtitutional prerogative, yet as the matter perſonally concerned him, he choſe rather to refer it to the determination of the aſſembly. By his own party he was much blamed for this ſacrifice of his prerogative, but the action correſponded well with his love of peace; and he was doubtleſs wrought upon by the ſcene in which he had been ſo lately called upon to act; the ſame evening the king announced that he had appointed De Joly to the home department.

Notwithſtanding the favourable appearances of the ſeventh, new events aroſe to create ſuſpicions and it was ſoon found that the executive power, had once more entirely loſt the confidence of the king; and the clamour was ſo great in the aſſembly, that all the miniſters ſo lately appointed, except De Joly, reſigned on the tenth.

Addreſſes from different parts of the kingdom crowded into the aſſembly in favour of the mayor and Manuel; and the aſſembly, after ſome debate, pronounced them guiltleſs. —Deliau conjured the legiſlative body to act with more dignity and deliberation. He painted in ſtrong colours the diſgraceful outrages which were acted in the Thuilleries on the twentieth of June. He accuſed Petion of encouraging ſedition, and of a want of reſpect for the hereditary repreſentative of the nation.

During the firſt weeks of July, the federates arrived in Paris in ſmall companies. They were courted by both parties, but moſt aſſiduouſly by the Jacobins. The number of the federates preſent, however, on the fourteenth of July, is ſaid not to have exceeded fifteen hundred. That day, as we have previouſly intimated, paſſed in tranquillity, and the confederation was celebrated, with the uſual magnificence. The concourſe of people aſſembled has been ſtated at four hundred thouſand. The national aſſembly met at nine o'clock, and proceeded to lay the firſt ſtone of the column of liberty, to be erected on the ruins of the Baſtile. Before this ceremony was concluded, the king arrived, preceded by a numerous detachment of horſe, a party of the troops of the line, five hundred national volunteers, and the Swiſs guards. He was accompanied by the queen, madame Elizabeth, the prince and princeſs royal. The ſix miniſters walked by the ſide of the king's coach.

A palm tree overſhadowed the altar of liberty, and near it a pyramidal monument was erected to the memory of thoſe who had expired on the frontiers, in the defence of their country. Between the altar and the Seine a poplar was planted, hung with escutheons, and other remnants of heraldic folly, which was set on fire by the priest who performed mass at the grand altar, in allusion to the destruction of the feudal system.

Though the king was in general well received, the day did not pass without some degree of mortification to him. Several of the populace, armed with pikes, repeatedly shouted, Vive Petion! Vivent les Jacobins, a bas le department, a bas le veto. At about six o'clock the king and the national assembly renewed their oath to be faithful to the constitution, and the royal family immediately afterwards returned to the Thuilleries. The federates on this occasion behaved with much order and loyalty; they appeared to join cordially in the shouts of Vive le roi! and some are even said to have testified by their acclamations their disapprobation of the factions.

One of the most serious evils which the government at this crisis experienced, was the frequent change of ministers; and it is a fact, almost unparalleled in the annals of any other nation, that France had witnessed no fewer than twenty-six ministers move across the stage of public affairs in rapid succession, in the short space of six months. A few days after the confederation, a new administration was announced, which consisted of De Joly as minister of justice, St. Croix for foreign affairs, Duboucage for the navy, d'Abancourt minister of war, Champion for the home department, and Leroulx de la Ville for that of finance.

This change appeared calculated to increase the difficulties, rather than to heal them; the ministers were all of at least a doubtful disposition toward the freedom of their country, and some were known to be adverse to the most prevailing politics; and it was not the least singular of all the appointments at a period so critical, when the enemy were advancing in all points on the country, that Abancourt, the nephew and pupil of Calonne, should be placed at the head of the war department.

In consequence of the decree of the national assembly, that the country was in danger, the king, on the twentieth of July, published a proclamation, in which he says, "Remember, that this is no longer the period for discussions and discourses; it is that for brilliant actions. All Europe is leagued to combat you; re-unite yourselves to oppose the compact—It is at the barriers of the empire you must oppose steel to steel;—You, in superiority to them, have your own great interest to defend, and the passion of liberty, which raises man above himself, and changes him into the hero. Fly to your camps—when the state is in danger every citizen is a soldier. All France will no doubt be covered with battallions.

"Administrations, magistrates, warriors, citizens, here is the period to extinguish in one fraternal sentiment, the hatreds which weaken and divide us. Here is the epoch to confirm our liberty for ever, by confirming the empire of our laws, without which there can be only disorder, and a tyrannous anarchy, a thousand times worse than cruel despotism.

"It is the king who calls you; a king proud to command a brave people, who conjures you in the name of the liberty which he loves, and the equality, which he like you, is resolved to maintain, to rally under the colours of the country; to assist him in giving force to the law against rebels within and without; to swear with him to conquer or die for the rights of the nation, and bury yourselves in the ruins of the empire, rather than ſuffer that it ſhall be outraged;—than foreigners or rebels ſhall give laws to France; and rather than to wound by a diſgraceful capitulation the honour of the French name."

Whatever effects this proclamation might have had to excite the people to oppoſe the invaders of their country, it did not lull them into ſecurity and confidence reſpecting what was deemed the machinations of the cabinet of the Thuilleries, which, they inſiſted, was acting in concert with thoſe of Coblentz and Vienna; theſe ſuſpicions were expreſſed by the Mountain in the aſſembly. An addreſs was reported by Gaudet from the commiſſion of twelve, expreſſive of theſe jealouſies, on account of various inſtances in which the king ſhewed his reſpect for the emigrants; in his chooſing ſuſpected miniſters; and while the people ſeemed divided, he did nothing to re-unite them. This was to be preſented to the king; but Briſſot thought meaſures preparatory would be better, obſerving that precipitation would alienate a great part of the nation, eſpecially charges not ſufficiently proved to carry conviction. He therefore moved that the extraordinary commiſſion collect all the proofs of the king's having incurred the penalty of forfeiture. This motion was adopted in preference to the other and the commiſſion inſtructed to report.

On the twenty-ſecond of July, agreeable to a decree of the national aſſembly, the proclamation was made in all the ſections of Paris, "that the country was in danger." Three guns were fired from Pont Neuf every hour, from ſix in the morning till night. Picturesque ſcaffolds, repreſenting fortifications, were erected in different parts of the city; on each of them a tent was erected decorated with the national colours, in which ſat the officers appointed to regiſter the new levies for the frontiers, and the camp to be eſtabliſhed at Soiſſons. The proclamation was made in a ſolemn manner by the municipal officers on horeſeback; and the whole ceremony had ſuch an effect on the minds of the populace, that in a few days ſeveral thouſands had enrolled themſelves.

In the mean time the federates arrived from all parts in conſiderable bodies; thoſe from the ſouthern provinces were the moſt fierce, both in conduct and appearance; and from the circumſtance of the majority of them coming from the neighbourhood of Marſeilles, the appellation of Marſeillois had been indiſcrimininately applied to this deſcription of volunteers. From the firſt moment of their arrival they manifeſted a turbulent diſpoſition; and D'Eſpremenil, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the parliament of Paris as the advocate of the people, and in the conſtituent aſſembly as the champion of the throne, fell under their anger on the terrace of the Feuillans, but was reſcued from death by the intervention of a member of the aſſembly and ſome grenadiers of the national-guards, after he had received ſeveral wounds.

The Jacobins had occupied much debate on the treaſon of Lafayette, and innumerable inflammatory addreſſes were preſented to the aſſembly againſt him; a principal object of complaint was his having quitted the army without leave; and it was moved that the miniſter of war ſhould be interrogated, whether Lafayette had received an order authoriſing his journey to Paris on the twenty-eighth of June, but the motion was rejected. On the twenty-firſt of July, Laſource pledged himſelf to the aſſembly, that Lafayette had propoſed to Luckner by means of Bureaux de Puſy, to lead his army againſt the capital; and Briſſot, Gaudet, Genſonne, Lamarque, and Herault were appealed to, and demand made that Luckner and Puſy ſhould be ſummoned. Dumolard defended the general. But the above members and Delmas laid a certificate of the charge on the table, in which they alledged, that on the ſeventeenth of July, at the houſe of the archbiſhop of Paris, the mareſchal Luckner being queſtioned on the ſubject, he anſwered, " I do not deny it; " it was Bureaux de Puſy who propoſed it to me; he who has been I think three times " preſident of the national aſſembly: I replied to him, I ſhall never lead the army I " command but againſt our external enemies; Lafayette is at liberty to do what he plea- " ſes, but if he marches to Paris, I will march after and drub him. Puſy then ſaid, but " the king is in danger! Thus much he ſaid to me, and they made me other propoſals " more horrible."

Expreſſions ſo pointed, atteſted by members of acknowleged probity, could not but be deemed ſerious; on the twenty-ninth of July, Bureaux de Puſy produced at the bar copies of the letters carried to Luckner, with the anſwers; from theſe it appeared that Lafayette had intimated his intention of proceeding alone to Paris.

On the following day a letter was received from Lafayette dated at Longwi, July twenty-ſixth, fourth year of liberty, in which he ſays.

" The miniſter for the home department has ſignified to me an act of the legiſlative " body of July twenty-firſt, and the information which ſix of its members have " ſigned.

" If I were queſtioned reſpecting my principles, I ſhould ſay, that a conſtant pro- " claimer and defender of the rights of man, and the ſovereignty of the people, " I have every where and always reſiſted authorities which liberty diſavowed, and which " the national will had not delegated; and that I have every where and always " obeyed thoſe of which a free conſtitution had determined the forms and the limits.

" But I am queſtioned reſpecting a fact—Did I propoſe to mareſchal Luckner to " march to Paris with our armies? To which I anſwer in four words—It is not true.

" LAFAYETTE."

The letter of mareſchal Luckner himſelf was no leſs deciſive againſt the teſtimony of the ſix members of the aſſembly. He denied in ſtrong terms that ever any propoſal was made to him for marching to Paris, and lamented that any ſuch conſtruction ſhould be put upon a converſation, which it was evident theſe gentlemen muſt have miſunderſtood. The deciſion upon the charges, therefore, was deferred to the eighth of Auguſt, when a long and tumultuous debate took place; Jean de Brie made the report, which concluded with propoſing a decree of accuſation; which was oppoſed by Vaublanc, and upon a diviſion the propoſition of accuſation was rejected, by four hundred and ſix voices againſt two hundred and twenty-four.

This deciſion proved, and ſeveral others, that however influential the ſpirit of party in the metropolis, the aſſembly was not deſtitute of moderation in its proceedings. The effect of this deciſion, however, was a greater degree of reſentment againſt Lafayette out of doors; and the reſtoration of Petion, was a counter-triumph to the popular party, and the ſignal for the reſignation of the Paris directory.

The diſtraction and alarm in Paris became every day more extreme; numbers of ſtrangers appeared in all public places, and the condnct of thoſe who were attached to the court in the arrangement of their perſonal concerns, beſpoke either their apprehenſions or their deſigns; theſe circumſtances did not eſcape the obſervation of the clubs, nor of thoſe who were ſo entirely detached from all political attachments, as to be indifferent to the prevalence of either, provided their own property and perſons were ſecure; this deſcription of perſons is very numerous in all countries, and are in times of peril the moſt dangerous, ſince their paſſions exclude every conſideration but that of ſelf-love, and render them the obſequious tools of the moſt powerful; the banks, the houſes of trade, and all the haunts of diſſipation, gambling, and idleneſs, appeared particularly affected by the ſtate of alarm which ſpread through all ranks and conditions, without any common agreement on the cauſe. No diſpoſition of the mind is more contagious than fear, and excluſive of the diſtreſſes which agitated the people of Paris, from the ſtagnation of buſineſs and the re-action of ſuſpicion on the people from the court, the long menacing appearance of the hoſtile powers had now grown into the moſt formidable object of immediate terror.

An inſulting and ſanguinary manifeſto, iſſued at Coblentz on the twenty-fifth of July, by the duke of Brunſwick, reached Paris; the emperor and the king of Pruſſia in their joint proclamation had aſſerted, that "the king was not ſincere in accepting the conſtitution;" this manifeſto inſinuated the ſame thing; unfortunately the public meaſures and the private deportment of the king and court rendered it neceſſary to be very partial to the king to queſtion the aſſertion.

The unfortunate Lewis was placed in circumſtances the moſt difficult by this conduct of the general of the combined armies, and in preſenting a copy of it to the aſſembly, inſtead of repelling the imputation of perjury, queſtioned the authenticity of the manifeſto itſelf. The king's letter abounded with patriotic profeſſions, but the diſingenuity of this affected doubt produced ſuch an effect on the aſſembly, that a motion made for printing it was rejected by a large majority, and Iſnard declared the notoriety of the matter to be ſuch, that "the king could not but know that what he aſſerted was not true."

This fatal manifeſto accompliſhed the total overthrow of the French monarchy; on the firſt of Auguſt it was read by the preſident, and excited a glow of general indignation; it merits the record of hiſtory, becauſe it affords the moſt lively warning to the friends of the human race and of civil liberty, becauſe it exhibits the black implacability of deſpotiſm, while it conſigns its authors and ſupporters to perpetual execration.

"Declaration of the reigning duke of Brunſwick Lunenburgh, commander of the combined armies of the emperor and the king of Pruſſia, to the inhabitants of France.

"Their majeſties the emperor and the king of Pruſſia, having entruſted me with the command of the combined armies, aſſembled on the frontiers of France, I think it my duty to inform the inhabitants of that kingdom of the motives which have influenced the conduct of the two ſovereigns, and of the principles by which they are guided.

"After arbitrarily ſuppreſſing the rights, and invading the poſſeſſions of the German princes in Alſace and Lorrain; after having diſturbed and overthrown in the interior part of the kingdom all order and lawful government; after having been guilty of the moſt daring attacks, and having had recourſe to the moſt violent meaſures, which are ſtill daily renewed againſt the ſacred perſon of the king, and againſt his auguſt family; and thoſe who have ſeized on the reins of government have at length filled the meaſure of their guilt by declaring an unjuſt war againſt his majeſty the emperor, and by invading his provinces of the Low Countries. Some of the poſſeſſions belonging to the German empire have been equally expoſed to the ſame oppreſſion, and many others have only avoided the danger by yielding to the imperious threats of the domineering party and of their emiſſaries.

" His majeſty, the king of Pruſſia, united with his imperial majeſty in the bands of the ſtricteſt defenſive alliance, and as a predominant member himſelf of the Germanic body, could not refuſe marching to the aſſiſtance of his ally and of his co-eſtates. It is in theſe double relations, that he undertakes the defence of that monarch and of Germany. To theſe high intereſts another important object is added, which both the ſovereigns have moſt cordially in view; which is, to put an end to that anarchy which prevails in the interior parts of France, to put a ſtop to the attacks made on the throne and the altar, to reſtore the king to his legitimate power, to liberty, and to ſafety, of which he is now deprived; and to place him in ſuch a ſituation, that he may exerciſe that legitimate authority to which he is entitled.

" Convinced that the ſober part of the nation deteſt the exceſſes of a faction which has enſlaved them, and that the majority of the inhabitants wait with impatience the moment when ſuccours ſhall arrive, to declare themſelves openly againſt the odious enterprizes of their oppreſſors; his majeſty the emperor and his majeſty the king of Pruſſia, earneſtly invite them to return without delay into the paths of reaſon and of juſtice, of order and of peace. It is with this view that I the underwritten, general commandant in chief of the two armies, do declare:—

" 1ſt, That, drawn into the preſent war by irreſiſtible circumſtances, the two allied courts have no other object in view than the welfare of France, without any pretence to enrich themſelves by making conqueſts.

" 2dly, That they do not mean to meddle with the internal government of France, but that they ſimply intend to deliver the king, the queen, and the royal family from their captivity; and to enſure to his moſt chriſtian majeſty that ſafety which is neceſſary for his making, without danger and without obſtacles, ſuch convocations as he ſhall judge proper, and for endeavoring to enſure the welfare of his ſubjects, according to his promiſes, and to the utmoſt of his power.

" 3dly, That the combined armies ſhall protect the towns, burgs, and villages, as well as the perſons and property of all thoſe who ſhall ſubmit to the king; and that they will concur in the immediate reſtoration of order and police throughout all France.

" 4thly, That the national-guards are called upon to preſerve, proviſionally, tranquillity in towns and in the country; to provide for the perſonal ſafety and property of all Frenchmen until the arrival of the troops belonging to their imperial and royal majeſties, or until orders be given to the contrary, on pain of being perſonally reſponſible: that on the contrary, ſuch national-guards as ſhall fight againſt the troops of the two allied courts, and who ſhall be taken up with arms in their hands, ſhall be treated as enemies, and puniſhed as rebels to their king, and as diſturbers of the public peace.

" 5thly, That the general officers, the ſubalterns, and ſoldiers of the regular French troops, are equally called upon to return to their former allegiance, and to ſubmit immediately to the king, their legitimate ſovereign.

" 6thly, That the members of departments, diſtricts, and municipalities, ſhall be equally reſponſible on pain of loſing their heads and eſtates, for all the conflagrations, for all the murders, and for all the pillage which they ſhall ſuffer to take place, and which they ſhall not have, in a public manner, attempted to prevent within their reſpective territories; that they ſhall alſo be obliged to continue their functions, until his moſt chriſtian majeſty, when ſet at full liberty, ſhall make farthe r arrangements, or until further orders be given in his name.

" 7thly, That the inhabitants of towns, burgs, and villages, who ſhall dare to defend themſelves againſt the troops of their imperial and royal majeſties, and to fire upon them, even in the open country, or through half open doors or windows of their houſes, ſhall be puniſhed inſtantly, according to the rigorous rules of war, or their houſes ſhall be demoliſhed or burned. On the contrary, all the inhabitants of the ſaid towns, burgs, and villages, who ſhall readily ſubmit to their king, by opening their gates to the troops belonging to their majeſties, ſhall be immediately under their ſafeguard and protection; and their eſtates, their property, and their perſons, ſhall be ſecured by the laws, and each and all of them ſhall be in full ſafety.

" 8thly, The city of Paris and all its inhabitants, without diſtinction, ſhall be called upon to ſubmit inſtantly and without delay to the king, to ſet that prince at full liberty, and to enſure to his and to all royal perſons that inviolability and reſpect which are due, by the laws of nature and of nations, to ſovereigns; their imperial and royal majeſties, making perſonally reſponſible for all events, on pain of loſing their heads, purſuant to military trials, without hopes of pardon, all the members of the national aſſembly, of the department, of the diſtrict, of the municipality, and of the national guards of Paris, juſtices of the peace, and others whom it may concern: and their imperial and royal majeſties farther declare, on their faith and word of emperor and king, that if the palace of the Thuilleries be forced or inſulted, if the leaſt violence be offered, the leaſt outrage done to their majeſties, the king, queen, and the royal family, if they be not immediately placed in ſafety and ſet at liberty, they will inflict on thoſe who ſhall deſerve it, the moſt exemplary and ever-memorable avenging puniſhments, by giving up the city of Paris to military execution, and expoſing it to total deſtruction; and the rebels who ſhall be guilty of illegal reſiſtance, ſhall ſuffer the puniſhments which they ſhall have deſerved. Their imperial and royal majeſties promiſe, on the contrary, to all the inhabitants of the city of Paris, to employ their good offices with his moſt chriſtian majeſty, to obtain for them a pardon for their inſults and errors, and to adopt the moſt vigorous meaſures for the ſecurity of their perſons and property, provided they ſpeedily and ſtrictly conform to the above injunctions.

" Finally, their majeſties not being at liberty to acknowlege any other laws in France except thoſe which ſhall be derived from the king, proteſt beforehand againſt the authenticity of all kinds of declarations which may be iſſued in the name of the king, ſo long as his ſacred perſon, and that of the queen, the princes, and of the whole royal family, ſhall not be in full ſafety; and with this view their imperial and royal majeſties invite and entreat his moſt chriſtian majeſty to name a town in his kingdom, neareſt to the frontiers, to which he would wiſh to remove, together with the queen and the royal family, under a ſtrong and ſafe eſcort, which ſhall be ſent for that purpoſe; ſo that his moſt chriſtian majeſty may in perfect ſafety ſend for ſuch miniſters and counſellors as he ſhall be pleaſed to name, order ſuch convocations as he ſhall think proper, and provide for the reſtoration of order and the regular adminiſtration of his kingdom.

" In fine, I declare and promiſe in my own individual name, and in my above quality, to cauſe to be obſerved, every where, by the troops under my command, good and ſtrict diſcipline, promiſing to treat with mildneſs and moderation, thoſe well diſpoſed ſubjects who ſhall ſubmit peaceably and quietly, and to employ force againſt thoſe only who ſhall be guilty of reſiſtance or of manifeſt evil intentions.

" I therefore call upon and expect all the inhabitants of the kingdom, in the moſt earneſt and forcible manner, not to make any oppoſition to the troops under my command, but rather to ſuffer them every where to enter the kingdom freely, and to afford them all the aſſiſtance, and ſhew them all the benevolence which circumſtances may require. Given at general quarters at Coblentz, the twenty-fifth July, 1792.

Signed—" Charles Guillaume Ferdinand, duc de Brunſwick Lunenburgh."

It is impoſſible to combine with ſuch an expoſition of ſanguinary and atrocious deſigns one idea of a generous or juſt intention, either towards France or its deluded monarch: that Lewis was not ignorant of the combination, a recurrence to the principles of the plot of Breteuil, communicated to him by count Dufort, will place beyond doubt; the principles and plans therein laid down are clearly developed in this manifeſto; that the deluded monarch might not himſelf be diſpoſed to ſuch ſanguinary threats, benevolence will believe; that he was perſuaded that the threatened cruelties and deſolation would not be realized, charity will conceive; but while ſuch threats of mighty violence hovered over the alarmed nation, we no longer wonder that the preſence of affliction and the approach of greater ruin, ſhould rouſe the people and drive them to deſpair, and that the apparent and declared cauſe of their danger ſhould become the firſt object of their reſentment.

The republican party thus acquired new acceſſions of vigour and of authority; and on the third of Auguſt the fatal die was caſt, when Petion, at the head of the ſections of Paris, appeared at the bar of the aſſembly to demand the depoſition of the king. The propoſal was reſiſted for ſome time, but it was followed by others of the ſame nature on the ſixth and ſeventh. A petition lay on the altar of the Champ de Mars, and was preſented by a countleſs multitude on the ſixth, who were preceded by a pike crowned with the red cap, with an inſcription upon it, " the depoſition of the king."

In compliance with theſe repeated requiſitions, the aſſembly at length determined to come to a deciſion on this difficult and dangerous ſubject, and the fatal tenth of Auguſt was appointed for the diſcuſſion. A number of the aſſembly, however, had exhibited ſome proofs of caution and temperance which did not coincide with the impetuoſity of the Jacobins, and the urgency of their cauſe. The recruiting for the armies was carrying on; the federates had been detained on various pretences in the metropolis; the paſſions of the people were much inflamed.

No alternative now appeared but flight or to repel force by force; preparations were made for both; the Thuilleries was put in a ſtate of defence. The dreadful Rubicon was now paſſed, and no hope of the return of harmony or peace remained. A ſolemn gloom overſpread the palace. Loyalty and friendſhip were now put to the ſevereſt teſt; the approach of the duke of Brunſwick was looked upon with terror by the people and with hope by the court; and the queſtion was not, who will conquer, but who will die in the defence of the king or the liberties of his country. Amidſt his accumulated misfortunes, a ſmall and firm band retained their attachment to the king, and upon different motives devoted themſelves to his defence. Among theſe might be counted ſome of the remnants of the ancient ariſtocracy, who made this laſt ſacrifice to their principles, and whoſe errors, when united with ſuch diſin-tereſted virtue, became reſpectable. Some had been among the moſt forward of thoſe who united in the firſt efforts to meliorate the condition of their countrymen, but equally remote from anarchy and deſpotiſm, now dreaded the evils which impended on a total alteration of government; ſome were the perſonal friends of the fallen majeſty of France; ſome from gratitude, ſome from prejudice; ſome pregnant perhaps with improbable hopes, and ſome in the phrenzy of deſpair, crowded round the tottering ſtandard of royalty; by this phalanx the king was obliged to ſtand if he could not ſecure a retreat with his family.

Among theſe were the Swiſs guards, thoſe unhappy men ignorant but brave, whom the baſe and mercenary policy of a country, reputed free, ſuffers to be tranformed into the inſtruments of deſpotiſm and the ſervile ſupporters of regal wickedneſs and pomp; by repeated decrees of the aſſembly, this body of troops had been conſiderably reduced, and even on the ſeventh of Auguſt the king had been obliged to diſmiſs three hundred of them. The departure of the whole had been decreed, but the king with that inconſiſtent and fatal duplicity which appeared at times to breathe the pureſt attachment to the laws and yet betrayed by his reluctant compliance with them the pain they gave him, had upon various pleas, and among others that the arrangement of the aſſembly was contrary to the treaty with the Helvetic body, left the decree unexecuted. The number of the Swiſs that remained previous to the tenth of Auguſt, was about ſeven hundred; on theſe the court placed the ſtrongeſt reliance.

A number of gentlemen, aſſembled from different parts of the country amounting to upwards of a thouſand had been formed into a corps, upon whoſe gallantry great dependance was placed; but as all theſe were not deemed adequate, Mandat commander of the national-guard joined thereto ſelect detachments amounting to about three thouſand men, and to theſe were added the horſe gendarmerie amounting to about a thouſand more; the whole including artillery amounting to upwards of ſeven thouſand men. Mandat, conceiving himſelf performing an agreeable and uſeful ſervice to the monarch, had waited on the mayor, and repreſenting the apprehenſions of the court ſignified alſo the unuſual force collected in the palace, and obtained from him a written order to repel any attack. No appearance in Paris on the morning of the ninth indicated more than the ordinary declamatory hoſtility againſt the court, but the military preparation carrying on there, the buſtle and the number of cannon ſpread a lively ſentiment of alarm through the capital; the application to the mayor had alſo been noiſed abroad, and at length reached the clubs and the aſſembly, where the moſt tumultuous debates took place.

The aſſembly had manifeſted a deſire to proceed with ſolemn deliberation in the diſcuſſion deſigned for the tenth, and the moderation which it had diſplayed on the charges againſt Lafayette was a very ſafe criterion to govern the moderation of the royal party; but they ſaw no objects beſide thoſe of danger, and the very precautions for ſecurity accelerated their deſtruction. The people were no leſs anxious on the ſubject to be diſcuſſed, and their impatience became violent when they were informed of the hoſtile appearances at the Thuilleries; numbers crowded thither and ſatisfied themſelves of the truth; the avenues leading to the aſſembly were thronged, and Vaublanc and ſome other members attached to royalty, complained that they had been ill-treated and menaced on their way to the hall. The mayor was called to the bar, and after ſtating the various cauſes of the public apprehenſion, aſſured the aſſembly that ſuch was the diſorder, he could not with the means he poſſeſſed inſure the public tranquillity; that the people alarmed at the force aſſembled in the Thuilleries, threatened to ring the alarm bell, attack the palace, and to avenge themſelves on the authors of their diſtreſſes.

The factious, thoſe wretches of which every country produces ſome, and in France where deſpotiſm and grinding taxes had rendered them numerous, were now active to ſtir up that diſorder in which the baſer paſſions moſt frequently triumph; the popular voice re-ſounded with the danger threatened by the military at the palace, and rumour aided by fear and credulity, had magnified their number and imputed their deſign to maſſacre the people and deſtroy the city of Paris. At the Thuilleries all became conſternation and diſmay, but ſome ſhew of order was preſerved. About eleven o'clock at night the mayor was ſent for, and he repaired to the palace, where he remaind till ſome hours after mid-night. At twelve o'clock the awful alarm-bell was heard, and was anſwered from the ſeveral ſections; the drums ſoon after beat to arms, and the ſtillneſs of the night and the dumb haſte of the people flying from different quarters preſented a ſcene of portentous horror. In this moment of confuſion the mayor was not to be found, the municipality were abſent, and no means appeared to ſtem the diſorder; a few perſons from each of the ſections accidentally and promiſcuouſly aſſembled choſe from the perſons preſent a new municipality, to the excluſion of thoſe who were abſent, Danton, Manuel, and Petion only excepted. One of their firſt meaſures was to ſend for the commander of the national-guard; Mandat was at that time occupied in aſſigning to the troops their ſeveral ſtations, and heſitated ſome time before he obeyed the order; a new meſſage more preſſing arrived, and Rœderer procureur-ſyndic with two other municipal officers prevailed on him to obey the conſtituted authorities; he left the palace about four o'clock, and proceeded to the town-houſe attended by a ſingle aid-de-camp.

The aſſembly, which ſat all night, about two o'clock in the morning had received information that Petion was detained againſt his will in the palace; the preſident thought proper to diſpatch a meſſenger for him thither, and he ſoon after appeared. He arrived at the municipality before Mandat, who on his entrance expreſſed ſome ſurpriſe at finding the municipality compoſed of different perſons from thoſe he expected. He was interrogated upon the deſign of the armament, and ordered priſoner to the Abbaye; but as he deſcended the ſtairs, one of the populace drew a piſtol and ſhot him through the head. Santerre was appointed to the command a few days after.

The king had not cloſed his eyes the whole of this eventful night; indeed the children were the only part of the royal family who retired to reſt. At ſix o'clock on the morning of the tenth it was thought expedient that the king ſhould review the troops. He accordingly proceeded through the yards of the palace, and was received with loud acclamations by the Swiſs, which was echoed by the greater part of the national-guards. The artillery however, and the battalion of the ſection of Croix Rouge, ſhouted vive la nation! others vive Petion! The king has been ſaid to have much diſguſted the national-guards on this occaſion, by the marked attention which he paid the Swiſs; and the artillery, who had from the firſt evinced an extraordinary zeal for freedom, are ſaid to have warned the Swiſs againſt any violence to the people.

As the national-guards were deprived of their commander, and conſequently at that moment were governed by no effective authority, the example of the artillery ſoon became contagious, and their conduct evinced how little dependence was to be placed upon their attachment to the king.

As ſoon as the king returned from reviewing the troops, the gentlemen who were in the palace formed themſelves into regular companies of life-guards; and as the moſt of them were trained to arms, they formed in an admirable manner for the protection of the interior of the palace, and, animated by enthuſiaſm and deſpair, would undoubtedly have made a moſt gallant defence, had the king remained at their head. The national-guards within the palace were addreſſed in ſtrong and pathetic terms by the king and queen. And every man appeared to profeſs his intention to die for the monarchy.

At eight o'clock Rœderer entered the council chamber where their majeſties were, at the head of the department; and his firſt words were "No perſon ſhall interpoſe between the king and the department." He requeſted to ſpeak with the king and queen in private; he proceeded to repreſent the imminent danger which at this moment impended over their majeſties and all that were attached to them; he aſſured them that very few of the national-guard were to be depended upon, and that the majority were totally adverſe to them. That inſtead of defending the palace, they would inſtantly join the aſſailants; that the number of the inſurgents was ſuch that it was inſanity to oppoſe; and entreated that they would repair, as to the only aſylum which was open to them, to the national aſſembly. The queen whoſe force of mind was generally more diſpoſed to reſiſtance than ſubmiſſion, oppoſed with vehemence Rœderer's propoſal, and exclaimed—"that ſooner than remove ſhe would be nailed to the walls of the palace." But the habitual gentleneſs of the king's character induced him to comply. They ſtrictly forbade their ariſtocratic friends to accompany them; but it was with grief and reluctance that they ſubmitted to the command of their beloved maſter, to ſeparate themſelves from his perſon in the hour of calamity and danger.

The king met with no interruption in croſſing the Thuilleries to the ſtaircaſe leading to the terrace of the Feuillans; but there he was detained near a quarter of an hour by the populace, who mingled with the groſſeſt abuſe the moſt alarming threats againſt his perſon. The directory of the department at length prevailed on the multitude to give way, and one of the moſt forward of the inſurgents ſnatched the prince-royal out of the queen's arms and carried him to the aſſembly.

The legiſlative body, at the moment their majeſties entered, were engaged in a tumultuous debate, on the motion for ſending a deputation to conduct the king and the royal family to the hall. As ſoon as he entered, the king ſeated himſelf by the ſide of the preſident, and addreſſed the aſſembly in theſe words: "I am come hither to prevent a great crime—Among you, gentlemen, I believe myſelf in ſafety." The king and queen were accompanied by their ſon and daughter, and the princeſs Elizabeth—A voluntary deputation of the members had proceeded to the door of the hall to introduce them.

A ſingular debate took place almoſt immediately on the entrance of the royal family. It was obſerved by a member, that according to the conſtitution, the deliberative functions of the aſſembly were ſuſpended by the preſence of the king. It became therefore a matter of ſome embarraſſment to know where to diſpoſe of the unfortunate monarch; ſome were for placing him at the bar, others in the galleries. The king with his family then retired to the benches deſtined for the miniſtry; but this was ſtill objected to; at length it was obſerved, that they might be accommodated in a ſmall box, about ten feet ſquare, on the right hand of the preſident, which had been appropriated to the editors of a newſpaper, at that time well known under the title of the Logographe.

It was an unfortunate circumſtance for the king's friends, that they had not received orders to capitulate, when the purpoſe of their military array was defeated by the king's removal to the aſſemby; beſide the prevention of ſo much bloodſhed, there is much reaſon to believe, that the event would have proved more favourable to the king. This omiſſion has been imputed to his duplicity, from a wiſh in the king to ſecure two chances —the reſtoration to his former power, ſhould the party within the palace obtain all the aid that had been promiſed by the municipality and that was expected from the national-guards, and prove finally victorious; and at the worſt that by taking ſhelter in the aſſembly, he ſhould eſcape with life. This account of his motives, though ſpecious, is moſt probably no more than one of thoſe uncharitable inſinuations which the malignity of party ſo frequently deſcends to; the conduct of the king is more naturally to be aſcribed to the confuſion and anxiety which at ſuch a criſis would deprive the firmeſt minds of their functions. Removed from the preſſure of danger men may reaſon upon the motives of actions, but experience turns diſguſted from the futility of ſuch cold ſpeculations. To complete the calamity, time was not allowed to remedy the omiſſion; the aſſembly had diſpatched a deputation to the palace, but the king and his family had ſcarcely taken their ſeats in the box aſſigned to them, when a dreadful cannonading ſhook the aſſembly; ſome members roſe from their ſeats, and appeared diſpoſed to ſeek ſafety in flight, but the preſident calling them to order, reminded them that every man ſhould now be at his poſt. The king took occaſion to aſſure the preſident that he had left ſtrict orders with the Swiſs not to fire upon the people; but a member obſerved that if the decrees of the aſſembly had been executed ſuch orders would not have been neceſſary.

While the opponents of the monarch ſpared no meaſure to expoſe his weakneſs and bloat them into crimes, his advocates have not ſpared imputations on their adverſaries, evidently the brood of hatred and malevolence, while the armed preparations at the Thuilleries is either paſſed over in ſilence or aſcribed to accident; the attack on the palace has been aſcribed to a deſign on the life of the monarch, whom nevertheleſs we find paſſing unmoleſted though unguarded, through the midſt of the populace to the aſſembly; in like manner much pains have been taken to exonerate the Swiſs from the charge of having commenced the maſſacre by firing on the populace; but truth has riſen ſuperior to the efforts of this blind deception, and by fixing on them the fatal aggreſſion, left no room to juſtify them, and without approving their puniſhment, in a degree vindicates the vengeance that they provoked. A moment prior to the tremendous fire which ſhook the aſſembly, the gate of the palace had been thrown open to admit the deputation, the populace were crying out to the Swiſs to forbear from hoſtility and with outſtretched arms ſoliciting them to embrace as brothers; in this fatal moment the approach of the deputation had cauſed a preſſure of the croud to make way for them, and great numbers were irreſiſtibly protruded within the area of the palace, and the Swiſs received the fatal order to fire! The deſtruction was horrible, and the populace enraged to deſparation tumultuouſly ruſhed forward over the bodies that had fallen, the greater part of the national-guards and the artillery joined the people, and turned their arms on the Swiſs and the corps of courtiers;

the latter had already formed as well as they could, part with and part without arms, in military array; though they had it no longer in charge to defend the perſon of the king, with great imprudence they preſerved thoſe diſtinctions which were become ſo odious to the people, and marked them out for vengance. The moſt loyal among the national-guards were diſpirited by the loſs of their commander, and diſguiſted by the flight of the king. Murmurs circulated among them; the purport of which was that they were inevitably betrayed, and that with ariſtocrats on the one hand, and with the Swiſs on the other, they were between two fires. Even the Swiſs themſelves were completely diſcouraged. Their commander in chief Affry, was abſent, having proteſted againſt violent meaſures; Bachman, ſecond in command, and his adjutant, had accompanied the king to the national aſſembly; the captains of the companies were either not at their poſts, or doubtful of the courſe they ſhould purſue, ſo that the regularity and compactneſs of military evolutions was loſt in tumult and promiſcuous efforts of offence and reſiſtance.

The number of the inſurgents has been ſtated at about twenty thouſand effective men. The crowd of idle ſpectators who followed them, for curioſity, is not to be eſtimated. The moſt active conſiſted chiefly of the inhabitants of the ſuburbs, with ſome hundreds of the Marſeillois, and other fede rates, who were certainly the moſt daring, and contributed moſt to the ſucceſs of the enterpriſe. They were promptly marſhalled in tolerable order by a Pruſſian, a ſoldier of fortune, of the name of Wieſtermann, and were armed ſome with ſpears, ſome with muſkets, and had with them in the centre not leſs than thirty pieces of cannon.

The conteſt chiefly lay between the Marſeillois and the Swiſs. Either way a ſemblance of duty appeared to diſarm the national-guard, and withhold ſome of them from active meaſures. The gendarmerie were in the ſame ſituation, and a party of them who had their ſtation near the coach-houſes, were at one time raked by two fires from the Swiſs and the popular party, and out of one hundred men, loſt twenty-five in this humane inactivity. After a moſt gallant reſiſtance of more than an hour, in which the Swiſs were frequently victorious in different parts, they were overpowered by numbers, were obliged to give way. The enraged populace, purſued the fugitives with the rancor of revenge, and the victory was converted into a maſſacre. The number and the fury of the national-guards encreaſed every inſtant, and the ſight of the dead bodies and the enthuſiaſtic exclamations of their wounded fellow-citizens, inſpired them with an inſatiable rage againſt the Swiſs, every one of whom within the palace was put to death; a ſmall party of ſeventeen had taken refuge in a veſtry-room, upon being diſcovered ſhouted out vive la nation! but unavailingly, they met the ſame fate. Another party attempted to eſcape through Marſan-court; about eighty were killed, the remainder ſecreted themſelves in hay-lofts, and in other lurking places; ſome lent them clothes to diſguiſe themſelves, and theſe generally eſcaped, but ſeveral died of hunger and fatigue.

The gentlemen who remained in the palace ſaw no alternative at this formidable criſis, but to proceed as well as they could to the national aſſembly. The only poſſible road was through the queen's gate; they rallied all the Swiſs whom they found diſperſed in their way, and as many of the national-guard as ſtill remained attached to them. The number of the fugitives might amount to five hundred; but as only one perſon could paſs-through the gate at a time, they were expoſed to a continual fire from ſeveral battalions ſtationed at about thirty yards diſtance; and as the red uniform of the Swiſs attracted particular notice, they were ſtill the greateſt ſufferers.

Of the remainder ſome eſcaped by the gardens, and others in ſmall parties made good their progreſs to different parts of the city, where, upon diſperſing, they were ſecreted and ſaved by the humanity of individuals. Of this fine body of Swiſs, the whole number that ſurvived the vengeance of the people did not amount to two hundred. Theſe, by a decree of the aſſembly, were put under the protection of the ſtate.

The defenceleſs victims, who were found in the palace, were all involved in one promiſcuous maſſacre. The gentlemen-uſhers and pages, without diſcrimination. Streams of blood defiled the edifice of the Thuilleries from the roof to the foundations. The maſſacre was followed by a general pillage of the palace. Some cheſts containing ſecret papers and aſſignats, and even ſome of the royal plate, were taken and brought into the hall of the national aſſembly.

The reſentment which the reſiſtance of the Swiſs had excited was directed even to the porters at the coffee-houſes and hotels, who go under the general appellation of Swiſs, and ſeveral of them were murdered. Carl, lieutenant-colonel of the foot gendarmerie, was killed in the afternoon on coming out of the Logographic lodge where the royal family were, and d'Hermigny, a colonel of the gendarmerie, met his fate in the ſquare before the Hotel de Ville.

Of all the victims of popular phrenſy on this memorable day, none was more lamented than Clermont Tonnerre; no man had rendered more eminent ſervices to the cauſe of liberty in the commencement of the revolution than this unfortunate gentleman; but, he was one of thoſe, who attached themſelves to the court after the completion of the conſtitution. His attachment to limited monarchy had rendered him odious to the populace. On the morning of the tenth he found his houſe ſurrounded by a mob, under the pretence that arms were ſecreted there: at the ſame time he received an order to appear before the committee of his ſection, on a charge of being concerned in a plot to ſecure the flight of the king by force; and he was likewiſe accuſed, though without any appearance of juſtice, of concurring with, and favouring the deſigns of the court. While he remained there, his houſe was ſearched and his innocence acknowledged. Conſcious of the rectitude of his own intentions, he had the imprudence to venture to return through the midſt of the mob, whoſe violence he reſtrained for a conſiderable time by the charms of his eloquence and addreſs. A ſervant whom he had diſmiſſed for ſome offence is ſaid to have embraced this opportunity to gratify his revenge, by continuing to exaſperate the fury of the multitude. It is to be lamented that his efforts were but too ſucceſsful.

During theſe ſcenes of deep calamity, the aſſembly continued their deliberations unremittingly; the events that ſpoke ſo ſtrongly to the heart, the retroſpect of thoſe unavailing meaſures of forbearance and perſuaſion, of warning and rigor, which had been unavailingly employed to promote the harmonious co-operation of the court; the rapid ſucceſſion of plots, and derangements of miniſtry, and above all the external dangers, which loudly called for vigour, declared the neceſſity of placing the force of the nation in hands ſubject to effectual control and reſponſibility, and who by an unequivocal diſpoſition to reſiſt invaſion and ſecure the national liberty, would command the confidence of the people and the legiſlature.

A ſeries of decrees were drawn up upon theſe important circumſtances and paſſed, and the authority veſted by the conſtitution in the king was revoked and ſuſpended. It next became neceſſary to make known to the nation the cauſes of the events that had taken place, and the ſituation and motives of the aſſembly; for this purpoſe Condorcet drew up a very eloquent memorial entitled "an expoſition of the motives of the aſſembly," which was circulated through the departments and the armies; it recapitulated the various ſteps that had characteriſed the latter periods of the revolution—the intrigues of the court, the encouragement of the emigrants—the correſpondence with external enemies, and the maintenance of agents hoſtile to the new order of things in the departments and armies—the open countenance given to fanatic prieſts; thus encouraging foreign and domeſtic, civil and religious war—the refuſal to ſanction decrees deſigned to ſupport or repreſs theſe dangers and diſorders—the concealment of foreign combinations, and endeavors to leſſen their importannce and to perſuade to a diſbelief of their reality—that the repetition of theſe meaſures at length demanded an enquiry, in which the criminality of the court was proved, but the miniſter only could be puniſhed—the means of defence rendered nugatory in the moment of a delaration of war—the public money ſecretly laviſhed in ſupport of perſons armed againſt the country abroad and to ſow diſcord in the armies at home—the generals made to diſtruſt each other—the treachery of thoſe counſels which could, after the ſecurity that the king had found and the ſatisfaction he had expreſſed at the attachment of the populace on the twentieth of June, promulge a proclamation the next day expreſſing a contrary ſenſe of intended violence—circular letters from the executive calculated to ſow diſtruſt on the eve of the federation, when delegates from all the departments were about to teſtify to the enemy the unanimity of the people—a dark procedure in the court of the Thuilleries purpoſed to infringe the inviolability of the repreſentatives and to render the judiciary ſubſervient to a ſecret authority—miniſters rapidly changed—a declaration of the enemy dooming to death the repreſentatives, the magiſtrates, and the public functionaries, affected to be conſidered as a forgery, while the families of the conſpirators at Coblentz whence it originated, formed the habitual ſociety of the court—writers paid out of the national treaſure to defame liberty and the legiſlature—the national-guards attempted to be alienated, and foreign guards retained in open diſregard of repeated decrees, and at length turned to the deſtruction of the people: truſt could no longer be repoſed in hands which had ſo much abuſed it, and no means appeared ſo proper to repair the evil as a recurrence to the ſupreme will, as directed by the conſtitution; the people were therefore invited to meet in primary aſſemblies, and to form a national convention. By a ſubſequent decree the convention was appointed to meet on the twentieth of September.

On the following day the miniſters appointed by the king were declared to have forfeited the confidence of the nation, and a new executive council was appointed, and conſiſted of Roland for the home department, Servan for that of war, and Claviere of the finance. Le Brun was nominated miniſter for foreign affairs, Danton miniſter of juſtice, and Monge of the marine.

A decree of accuſation was afterwards paſſed againſt D'Abancourt, the late miniſter of war, for not having diſmiſſed the Swiſs guards and other crimes, and this was ſoon after followed by another againſt La Porte, the late intendant of the civil-liſt.

Thus in one ſingle day was deſtroyed an edifice which had employed the firſt abilities of France for three ſucceſſive years in its erection.

After much deliberation, the hotel of the miniſter of juſtice was choſen as the habitation of the fallen monarch and his unfortunate family; but on the repreſentation of Manuel, who ſtated, that in that ſituation the municipality could not charge themſelves with being reſponſible for the perſon of the king, the place of confinement was changed to the temple.

Theſe great events mark a diſtinguiſhed epoch in the hiſtory of the revolution, but they afford only that external light which is thrown upon public events by the caſual or partial obſerver; time, which will yet further develope the ſecret ſprings of the French afflictions, has already diſcloſed the deſigns of the court and the cauſe of the fatal ſcenes of the tenth of Auguſt. We have before noticed the ſtate of the army under Lafayette at the beginning of Auguſt, which amounted only to eighteen thouſand raw troops, to oppoſe to one hundred thouſand, compoſed of Pruſſian veterans, Auſtrians, barbarous Heſſians, and deſparately brave emigrēs; between Maubege and Maulde, the force under Dillon was as inconſiderable; Cuſtine was ſhut up at Landau, Kellerman at Wiſſemburg; while the enemy appeared at all points, and no means ſufficient to oppoſe them; the Heſſians and emigrants were to paſs the Rhine, the Auſtrians to penetrate to the department of the north, the Piedmonteſe to invade the ſouth, the ariſtocracy to unite round the court and in their ſeveral departments, while the duke of Brunſwick was to proceed by Chalons to Paris; that theſe deſigns were perfectly underſtood by the court would need no better evidence than facts already noticed and which have been given at large in the expoſition of the motives of the aſſembly drawn up by Condorcet; but even that paper does not wholly and clearly diſcloſe the meaſures of the court, whoſe purpoſe was to eſcape, and the preparations for which we have before in ſome degree noticed as exciting the apprehenſions of the Pariſians.

This plan was formed by a perſon who had held a high office under the conſtitution, and was ſupported by the municipality of Paris after the diſmiſſion of Petion; and Lafayette is ſaid to have promiſed it the moſt effectual ſupport; the king and royal family were to proceed ſecretly to Gaillon, the villa of the archbiſhop of Rouen, twenty leagues from Paris, the preciſe diſtance allowed by the conſtitution. They were to paſs from the Thuilleries through the houſe of La Porte, intendant of the civil-liſt, which was ſeparated only by a wooden partition and communicated on the oppoſite front with the old Louvre, in a court of which coaches were commonly ſeen about midnight, belonging to parties that ſupped with La Porte. On the night propoſed for the eſcape none were to be invited, but two coaches were to be ready for the royal fugitives, who were to have no attendant whatever beſide one female and two confidential male friends dreſſed as domeſtics, one of the latter behind each carriage. They were to leave Paris at the uſual hour that perſons who ſup in the city repair to the country. The three thouſand Swiſs, whom the king had been obliged to ſend out of the capital, were diſtributed at certain ſtations from Pontoiſe to Paris. The king's guards, who had alſo been lately reduced but who ſtill reſided in the capital, were all under the command of count de Hervilly, to whom they were attached; he conſtantly remained near the royal family; their horſes were in the ſtables at Verſailles, and were to be taken thence on the night appointed, and to meet the royal family within a league of Paris and eſcort them to Pontoiſe, where two regiments of Swiſs were ſtationed to meet them, theſe with the other Swiſs and the guards were deemed ſufficient to cover the flight.

At Gaillon the king was to have wrote to the aſſembly, and inform them of the motives for his removal; if hoſtile meaſures ſhould be taken againſt him, he was to remove directly to Fecamp on the ſea coaſt, where the commiſſary of marine had been ordered to provide a veſſel completely equipped and provided to tranſport the royal family whereſoever they ſhould deſire. M. la Fort, an intelligent general officer, left Paris in July for Normandy, on purpoſe to ſurvey Gaillon, its environs, and the coaſt, and to ſound the diſpoſition of the inhabitants; he had returned to Paris on the fifth of Auguſt with a report wholly favourable to the enterprize, and the night of the ſeventh was fixed for the execution of the enterprize; the moſt profound ſecrecy was preſerved as to the particulars; and the deſign was in no reſpect betrayed but by the meaſures that were neceſſarily taken for its performance; and the buſtle and diſquietude viſible in the conduct and countenances of the principal perſons about the palace. This plan which in all human probability would have been completely executed, was interrupted by the apprehenſions of the queen, who would not repoſe any confidence in the commandant of the troops in Normandy, he being a deputy. On the evening of the ſixth there had been a conſiderable diſquietude in Paris occaſioned by ſome vague ſuſpicions ſuggeſted by perſons who uſually ſupplied the court with various articles, and had not received their uſual orders; the queen prevailed on the king to ſend a meſſage to the chief perſon concerned in the enterprize to ſuſpend the meaſure to the laſt extremity; this circumſtance drew all thoſe engaged in the plot, who were at a diſtance, directly to the capital; and the apprehenſions of the court encreaſed with the approach of that day upon which the queſtion of ſuſpenſion was to be diſcuſſed. The appearance of ſo many ſtrangers at ſuch a period alarmed the ſubordinate agents of the police, who communicated their fears to the magiſtrates and the clubs; and accounts for the confuſion in the capital on the ninth of Auguſt.

The clubs had not been indifferent to theſe events; they took meaſures to alarm the people; and declared that a civil war was to be apprehended from the moment that the king ſhould be ſeparated from the legiſlature; their ſurmiſes and ſuſpicions made up for their deficiency of information, and they declared although they did not know the manner, the place, or time of flight, that ſuch was the intention of the royal family; and the federates, between whom and the national-guards a jealouſy had prevailed, were by this alarm completely united.

There is no poſitive certainty of the king's intention to renew the project of flight on the night of the ninth, although there is reaſon to ſuſpect it; for all the members of the diſmiſſed body guard were equipped on that evening, and the count de Hervilly their commander was one of thoſe, that attended the royal family all that night, and to the aſſembly the next day; the events of that morning diſſipated for ever all their beſt hopes.

The concert on the frontier was conſiderably affected by the tranſactions at Paris; the duke of Brunſwick had already entered the frontiers, Clairfait entered the Low Countries, and planted himſelf on the right of the Pruſſians; a ſecond column commanded by Hohenloe, one of emigrants, and another of Heſſians were in the rear of the Pruſſians.

The phrenzy of the populace did not ſubſide for ſome days after the ſtorming of the palace. It aſſumed indeed not the formidable aſpect of a general inſurrection, but it was not leſs dreadful in its effects. Several atrocious aſſaſſinations were committed, and among others the reſpectable Rochefoucault fell a victim to his attachment to the king, being implicated in the plan for his flight. After having, with the reſt of the department, been concerned in the ſuſpenſion of Petion and Manuel, he found it no longer ſafe to remain in Paris. He retired to his own eſtate, upon the alarm occaſioned by the reſtoration of Petion, and the conſequent loſs of aſcendancy of his party in the commune of Paris, but his ſteps were carefully tracked, and he was ſcarcely arrived before he was put to death,

The rage of the mob on the days ſucceeding the tenth of Auguſt, was not confined to the living objects of their reſentment; they demoliſhed every veſtige of art which had the remoteſt relation to monarchy or ariſtocracy: even the ſtatue of Henry IV. ſo long the idol of the patriotic party, was broken in pieces, merely becauſe it was the ſtatue of a king. The buſts of Necker, Lafayette, Mirabeau, and all the leading members of the conſtitutional party, were alſo ſought out and demoliſhed.

Information was given the aſſembly, of a correſpondence carried on between Lafayette, in which the princeſs of Lambelle, and Meſdames de Tourzelle, were concerned; in conſequence of which they were both arreſted; their anſwers appearing equivocatory, they were ſent to priſon, with ſome other ladies of the houſhold.

On the night of the twelfth the aſſembly, apprehenſive of a formidable oppoſition from the army of Lafayette, diſpatched three commiſſioners of their own body to counteract the movements of that general. Lafayette, however, by a ſingular accident, was previouſly appriſed of the events of the tenth. He had ſent Darblais, one of his ſtaff officers, with diſpatches to the war miniſter. On the morning of the eleventh, he advanced almoſt within ſight of Paris, when he was met by a grenadier of the national-guards, who appriſed him of his danger, and adviſed him to change horſes aud return with all poſſible ſpeed. At Sedan, on his way back, he found Lafayette, who, after ſtating the facts to the magiſtrates of that town, adviſed them, in duty to the king and conſtitution, to arreſt the commiſſioners, who accordingly, on their arrival there, were ſeized, and detained in priſon fron the fourteenth to the twentieth.

In the mean time Lafayette returned to the camp; and immediately diſtributed among the battalions the following letter:—

"Citizen ſoldiers, it is no longer time to conceal from you what is going forward: the conſtitution you ſwore to maintain is no more; a banditti from Marſeilles, and a troop of factious men, beſieged the palace of the Thuilleries; the national and Swiſs guards made a rigorous reſiſtance, and for want of ammunition they were obliged to ſurrender.

"General d'Affry, his aids-de-camp, and his whole family were murdered.

"The king, queen, and all the royal family eſcaped to the national-aſſembly; the factious ran thither, holding a ſword in one hand, and fire in the other, and forced the legiſlative body to ſuperſede the king, which was done for the ſake of ſaving his life.

"Citizens, you are no longer repreſented; the national aſſembly are in a ſtate of ſlavery; your armies are without leaders; Petion reigns: the ſavage Danton and his ſatellites are maſters. Thus, ſoldiers, it is your province to examine whether you will reſtore the hereditary repreſentative to the throne, or ſubmit to the diſgrace of having a Petion for your king."

The general, at the firſt moments when this communication to the ſoldiery was made, found their diſpoſitions not unfavourable, but he ſoon diſcovered that attachment was only to be expected from a ſmall circle of his friends. Apprehenſive therefore, that in the ſpirit of revolt, which his army manifeſted, his life would be inſecure, or that he would certainly be delivered up into the hands of his adverſaries, on the nineteenth of Auguſt he left the camp in the night, accompanied only by his ſtaff and a few ſervants. They took the route of Rochefort in Liege, which being a neutral country, they hoped to paſs unmoleſted; but an Auſtrian general, of the name of Harancourt, being ſtationed there with an advanced party, arreſted the fugitives, contrary to the law of nations, and ſent them priſoners to Namur. Theſe unfortunate exiles have ever ſince been detained the victims of tyranny, and confined in the noiſome dungeon of Olmutz, for no other crime, or rather under no other pretext, than that of having been members of the national aſſembly of France.

General Arthur Dillon, influenced by the counſel, and perhaps by the character and example of Lafayette, ſeemed at firſt inclined to imitate his conduct; and by the orders which he publiſhed to his army on the thirteenth, he excited ſo ſtrong a ſuſpicion againſt him, that a decree was actually paſſed for his ſuſpenſion. He however was ſo fortunate as to retract in time; and upon the arrival of the commiſſioners of the aſſembly at Valenciennes, he found means ſo completely to conciliate their eſteem, that the decree was repealed, and he was again reinſtated in his full authority.

The politic Dumourier, who had aſſumed the command at Maulde, ſaw from the firſt the party which it was neceſſary to embrace, and anticipated the wiſhes of the aſſembly, by applauding the new revolution even before the arrival of their commiſſioners: by this fortunate ſtep he gained the entire confidence of a great part of the republicans, which he had loſt by his conduct in the miniſtry, and in conſequence was afterwards appointed to ſucceed Lafayette in his command.

Mareſchal Luckner took the ſame decided part. In his letter to the aſſembly, he even inſinuated that it was the treachery of the court which had compelled him to retreat in the midſt of victory from the Netherlands; and added, "that now the king was depoſed, he hoped he would not be ordered to retire when he next entered the Auſtrian territories."

Generals Biron, Monteſquieu, Kellerman, and Cuſtine, all ſubmitted to the authority of the aſſembly, and of the proviſional council of ſtate, and took the republican oaths, as well as the ſoldiers of their reſpective armies.

Though the force of Lafayette had been trifling in compariſon with that of his adverſaries, as it did not exceed twenty thouſand men, ſtill he contrived to keep the Auſtrians and Pruſſians in check, and they had made but little progreſs towards the ſubjugation of France. They had advanced rapidly in the end of July and beginning of Auguſt, the confuſion terror and diſmay, however, which the tranſactions we have juſt narrated had produced, encouraged the combined armies to puſh their enterpriſes, and the firſt conqueſt atchieved was that of Longwy. On the twenty-firſt of Auguſt, general Clairfait preſented himſelf with an army of ſixty thouſand men before that fortreſs. The ſiege laſted about fifteen hours, during which time the enemy kept up a continual and heavy fire of bombs and artillery. The commandant reported, that the magiſtrates and citizens, terrified by the bombardment, had inſiſted upon a ſurrender, and that he had only complied with their requiſition; nothing leſs than treachery in a commander could compel a garriſon of two thouſand five hundred men, well appointed, in a place ſtrongly fortified, and defended with ſeventy-one pieces of cannon, and excellent caſements, to ſurrender upon ſo ſhort a ſiege. Upon further inquiry theſe ſuſpicions were confirmed, being purchaſed by a conſiderable ſum of money, for which, Lavergne the governor was ordered to be tried by a court-martial: and a decree of the aſſembly was paſſed, that whenever it ſhould be retaken, the houſes of the citizens ſhould be razed to the ground, and the magiſtrates perſecuted for high treaſon.

The capture of Verdun almoſt immediately ſucceeded that of Longwy. It was ſummoned by the duke of Brunſwick on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, nor did the example of the puniſhment to be inflicted on Longwy deter the inhabitants from becoming the dupes of their apprehenſions. As Longwy, therefore, was loſt by the treachery of the commander, Verdun was reduced by the cowardice of the citizens. Diſtruſtful of the inciviſm of the officers after the affair of Longwy, the aſſembly, by their decree, veſted power in the municipality to controul the deliberations of the council of war. Beaurepaire, the governor, was deſirous of defending the town to the laſt extremity; but the municipal officers were determined in favour of a capitulation, and there was imminent danger that the ſoldiers would be attacked by an enemy within as well as without the walls. The municipality oppoſed the commander and propoſed to capitulate, the Pruſſian troops entered on the ſecond of September; but the governor, too brave to ſuffer the ſuſpicion of not performing his duty ſought refuge from diſhonour in death.

Ambition and jealouſy had deceived the nations of Europe in the flattering expectation, that France who had been the object of hatred or fear to one or all of them, would fall an eaſy prey by her diſtractions to the rapacity of her rivals; her firſt diſtreſſes were ſubjects of ſecret exultation, her ſucceeding proceedings were heard with covetous joy, and the ſubſequent progreſs from the diſburthenment of debt to her enfranchiſement from the hoary bonds of ſervitude and error, inſpired the ſovereigns of Europe with an anxiety ſo extreme, that their views originally dictated by rapacity, ſettled in reſentment and fear; their hopes wholly perſonal and ſeparate in the firſt inſtance, were no longer flattered by the weakneſs they had vainly foreſeen, but the cauſes of their diſappointment furniſhed motives for further pretenſions and more ſanguine hopes; the projects which have been developed illuſtrate theſe remarks, and every day teſtified the watchfulneſs of the European ſovereigns, and their eagerneſs to ſeize upon the ſlighteſt pretexts for openly joining in that league of hoſtility in which they had ſecretly engaged.

The Engliſh court, had from the firſt dawn of the French diſtreſſes participated to the utmoſt in that malignant joy, and by the proceedings of the governors in her foreign poſſeſſions, ſo early as the beginning of the year 1790, deſignated the part ſhe had reſolved to act; the policy of her cabinet, however, was ſtudiouſly guarded in Europe; that hatred which had been aſſiduouſly nouriſhed to foſter the incurable reſtleſſneſs of her ambition, was counteracted in an immenſe degree by the very ſpirit of freedom ſo much the favorite ſentiment of the Engliſh people, and from whom it had in ſo conſiderable a degree extended to France. The knowlege of theſe truths, while it awakened all the fears of the Engliſh monarch, called for the circumſpection of his miniſters; the temper of the people reſtrained the court from open hoſtility, but no occaſion was left uneſſayed to promote the general combination againſt France and to convert the people to the views of the court. We ſhall in the courſe of this work have occaſion to illuſtrate theſe obſervations much at large; the ſuſpenſion of Lewis offered an opportunity for the firſt overture of that policy which they had reſolved gradually to unfold, by the recal of the Engliſh ambaſſador at Paris, which was done by a note addreſſed to the proviſional council, to this effect:

" In the abſence of lord Grenville, mr. Dundas declares, that his Britannic majeſty is afflicted with the deepeſt grief for the events which have lately taken place at Paris, both on account of the intereſt which he takes in every thing that concerns their moſt chriſtian majeſties, and of his deſire to ſee the kingdom of France tranquil and happy. As it appears that the exerciſe of the executive power has been withdrawn from the hands of the king, his majeſty thinks his ambaſſador has no occaſion to remain in Paris any longer; this ſtep being taken to manifeſt his intention of remaining neutral as to the internal government of France. He expreſſes his majeſty's ſolicitude for the king and queen; he expects their perſons will be protected from every kind of violence, the commiſſion of which would excite univerſal indignation in Europe."

To this the proviſional council expreſſed in reply, their regret at the recal of the ambaſſador, the ſatisfaction they felt at the neutral declaration, and their deſire that a mutual ſpirit of intercourſe might be preſerved; but no notice was taken of what concerned the royal family.

About the ſame period a decree was paſſed againſt Lafayette, declaring him guilty of high treaſon. Barnave, Alexander Lameth, and ſome others of the conſtituent aſſembly who had entered into the profeſſed views of the court, were committed to priſon on a charge of counter-revolutionary deſigns, founded on ſome of the ſecreted papers found in the Thuilleries. Deleſſart, the friend and confident of Necker, was beheaded at Orleans, for concealing the information poſſeſſed by the government concerning the treaty of Pilnitz from the aſſembly. Dangremont, the late paymaſter of the king's guards, ſuffered at Paris on the firſt of September, for having excited the Swiſs to fire on the people. La Porte, intendant of the civil-liſt, was executed at the ſame time, for maintaining a correſpondence with the enemy, and diſtributing money to writers in favor of monarchy, and againſt the revolution. Duroſoy and ſome others ſuffered for ſubordinate treaſons.

The capture of Longwy, and the approach of the Pruſſians, ſpread an inſtantaneous alarm through the metropolis, and even the aſſembly itſelf partook of the contagion. The rumour was, that the enemy intended to leave the fortified places behind them, and proceed immediately to Paris; and this was followed by continued reports that the duke of Brunſwick was within a few hours march of the capital. At this diſaſtrous moment, ſuſpicion lodged in every heart, and terror was depicted upon every countenance. Danton who had raiſed himſelf by his abillities and boldneſs to the ſituation of miniſter of juſtice, and certainly projected the plan of diſmiſſing the old municipality on the night of of the ninth of Auguſt, ſtood forth in the aſſembly on this memorable emergency. He obſerved, that there were more than eighty thouſand ſtand of fire arms in Paris, in the hands of private perſons: with theſe he propoſed to equip a volunteer army, who, inſtead of waiting for the approach of the enemy, ſhould ſally forth well prepared to meet the danger.

Accordingly an arret was directly publiſhed, directing the barriers to be immediately ſhut—all horſes fit for ſervice on the frontiers to be ſeized—all citizens to hold themſelves in readineſs to march againſt the enemy at a moment's warning—aged and infirm citizens to give in their arms for the uſe of the able and unprovided—ſuſpected perſons and cowards to be diſarmed—twenty-four commiſſaries to proceed to the armies and departments to announce and execute this decree—the military committee not to ſuſpend its ſittings—the alarm guns to be fired and the general beat, to announce to the ſections the danger of the country—the national aſſembly and executive power to be notified of the decree; which concludes wirh an energetic appeal to the people on the dangers that ſurround them, the treachery within and the combination without, formed to reduce them to ignominy and ſlavery; conjuring them rather than give up their towns to bury themſelves in their aſhes.

We have had but little occaſion, ſince the termination of the conſtituent aſſembly, of which he was a member, to mention Robeſpierre. He had, however, ſince that period, occupied the ſtation of public accuſer, and at the time of which we are now treating, was at the head of the Jacobin club, and had been choſen, as well as Marat, a member of the new commune, on the night of the ninth of Auguſt. Since the affair of the tenth of Auguſt, Petion had loſt part of his influence with the populace, and Robeſpierre had proportionably riſen in their eſteem. In the Jacobin club, this man had been unremittingly clamorous for the trial of the ſtate priſoners; and by his endeavours to ſatiate the barbarous revenge of the populace, he gained upon their affections.

The decree for raiſing the people and arming en-maſſe, which had been paſſed on the ſuggeſtion of Danton, had produced the moſt aſtoniſhing enthuſiaſm; the young men crowded to the depots of regiſtry, and an army was already collected at Paris, whoſe departure was fixed for the frontiers on the ſecond of September; among theſe new levies were many who had loſt friends and relatives on the tenth of Auguſt, and who were now burning with enthuſiaſm and vengeance; the popular harangues may be ſuppoſed not to have ſoothed thoſe violent paſſions, and it has been urged that Marat and Robeſpierre had excited the volunteers to avenge themſelves on the traitors in Paris, before they ſhould march againſt the Pruſſians. From whatever ſource it proceeded the ſentiment became general, and the imprudent if not worſe conduct of the commune, in ordering the troops to aſſemble in the Field of the Confederation, to march in a body againſt the enemy, gave birth and vigour to outrages that make humanity ſhudder.

The alarm guns were fired, the tocſin ſounded, and the people aſſembled in large numbers—It is a debt due to juſtice, however, to exonerate the citizens in general from the crimes of that day. The majority of the people, though greatly agitated by the alarm which was given, repaired not to the rendezvous, but, as if by inſtinct, to their reſpective ſections, and there entered their names as the ſoldiers of liberty.

A conſiderable multitude, however, was brought together, partly of the Marſellois and the remnant of the other federates, and partly of an immenſe multitude attracted to the ſcene by their curioſity. It is however uncertain, after all that has been ſaid on this fatal day, whether the maſſacre was a preconcerted meaſure, or the ſpontaneous impulſe of a part of the populace. Certain it is, that the reſolutions of the aſſembly were ſcarcely announced, when a number of voices exclaimed, "that they were ready to devote themſelves to the ſervice of their country, and to march againſt their foreign enemies; but they muſt firſt purge the nation of its domeſtic foes." Without further deliberation, a party of armed men proceeded to the Carmes, or convent of the Carmelites, where a number of the nonjuring prieſts were detained till an opportunity ſhould occur of putting in force their ſentence for baniſhment; and there, in cold blood, the remorſeleſs aſſaſſins ſacrificed every one of theſe defenceleſs and probably innocent men.

From the Carmes they proceeded to the Abbaye priſon, in which were confined the Swiſs officers and thoſe arreſted for treaſonable offences againſt the nation on the tenth of Auguſt. The murderers proceeded with a kind of method in their crimes. They impanelled a jury, nine of whom, it is ſaid, were Italians, or aſſaſſins from Avignon, and the other three French. Before theſe ſelf-conſtituted judges the wretched priſoners underwent a ſummary examination. The watch-word that pronounced the culprit guilty was "Il faut le largir," (he muſt be ſet at liberty) when the victim was precipitated from the door, to paſs through a defile of miſcreats differently armed, and he was cut to pieces with ſabres, or pierced through with innumerable pikes. Some they acquitted; and theſe were declared under the protection of the nation, and accompanied to their homes by ſome of the banditti.

The whole of the ſtaff-officers of the Swiſs guards were maſſacred, except their commander d'Affry. He had been a democrat from the firſt of the revolution, and when urged by the queen to aſſume the command in the Thuilleries on the tenth of Auguſt, had proteſted againſt it and voluntarily abſented himſelf. The aſſaſſins continued the whole night of the ſecond at the Abbaye, and the priſon of the Chatelet, whence they proceeded to the priſon La Force, where the ladies of the court, who were arreſted on the tenth of Auguſt, were confined.

In the dungeon was the beautiful and accompliſhed princeſs de Lamballe, the friend and confidante of the queen. When ſummoned to appear before the bloody tribunal, ſhe was in bed, and was informed by the perſon who delivered the meſſage, that it was only intended to remove her to the Abbaye. She begged, in return, to remain undiſturbed, ſince to her one priſon was as acceptable as another. Being informed that ſhe muſt appear directly before the tribunal, ſhe dreſſed in haſte, and obeyed the ſummons. In the courſe of her interrogation, no crimination againſt the queen and the royal family could be extorted from her, and it is ſaid it was the intention of the judge, to acquit her. As ſhe was conducted, however out of the priſon, ſtupified with horror at the mangled bodies that lay around her, ſhe received a blow on the head with a ſabre, which produced inſtantly a violent effuſion of blood. In this ſituation ſhe was ſupported by the arms by two men, who forced her to continue her progreſs over the dead bodies. As ſhe fainted every moment from loſs of blood, like Cæſar ſhe was ſolicitous to fall in a decent attitude; and when at laſt ſhe became ſo enfeebled, as to be able to proceed no further, her head was ſevered from her body. The mangled corpſe was expoſed to every kind of indignity, and the head, fixed upon a pike, was carried to the Temple and ſhewn to the unfortunate queen who fainted at the horrid ſight. It was afterwards carried in triumph round the ſtreets of Paris, and particularly to the Palais Royal, where it was recognized, by her relations. Madame de Tourzelle and her daughter, and ſome other ladies, who were confined in the ſame priſon, were ſpared, though under accuſation.

Theſe dreadful maſſacres laſted the whole of the ſecond and third of September. At the Abbaye priſon one hundred and fifty-nine were maſſacred; at the ſeminary of St. Firmin, ninety-two unfortunate victims ſuffered; at the convent of the Carmelites, one hundred and forty-one; at the Hotel de la Force, one hundred and ſixty eight; at the Chatelet, two hundred and fourteen; at the Conciergerie, eighty-five; at the Bicetre, one hundred and fifty-three; and at the cloiſter of the Bernardins, ſeventy-three; all amounting to the ſhocking number of one thouſand and eighty-five, beſides ſome others at the Saltpetriere, and on the Pont-au-Change; including however, a conſiderable number of felons, who were impriſoned for forging aſſignats, and for other crimes. Montmorin, the late mayor of Fontainbleau, though he had been acquitted by a jury, was murdered in the ſight of the deputies. During this period of general confuſion and horror, ſeveral miſcreants availed themſelves of the circumſtance, to gratify their private animoſity, and ſome individuals were aſſaſſinated in different parts of the city. The number of the aſſaſſins has been variouſly reported. They were at firſt ſuppoſed to amount to many thouſands; but the general opinion is, that they did not exceed two hundred. It is evident however, that the national aſſembly conſidered them in a formidable view, or they would have taken ſome more effective meaſures than that of ſending commiſſioners from time to time, to diſſuade them from their violence. It is probable that the number would at firſt be greatly exaggerated, by report, and that the multitude who followed, from curioſity or the hope of plunder, greatly exceeded thoſe who were actually engaged in the murders.

It was in vain that the deputies diſpatched by the aſſembly exhorted the populace. —Petion and Manuel exerted themſelves to avert this ruin—and members of the Mountain, who had been otherwiſe deemed furious, were conſpicuous in ſnatching as many victims as they could from the common and indiſcriminate ruin; among theſe were Fallien and Danton, who at the riſk of their popularity took every method to prevent theſe foul miſdeeds but in vain. Roland wrote repeatedly to Santerre; and the national-guards were all ready in their ſections, waiting the orders of the commander in chief to diſperſe the mob; but Santerre declared he could by no means whatever prevent theſe atrocities.

The ſanguinary character of Marat, has attached much of the ſuſpicion of theſe cruel ſcenes to his contrivance; a few low villains could ſcarcely have perpetrated ſuch deeds without the ſupport of ſome ſuch authority, and between him and Robeſpierre perhaps all that partook of ſyſtem in the tranſactions lay. But there can be no doubt that there exiſted the prediſpoſing cauſe to which we have alluded—the widows and orphans of the tenth of Auguſt, the parents, and brothers of thoſe cut off, attributed their death to the court and the ariſtocracy. What in foreign wars produces only ſorrow and tears, in civil broils produces wrath and fury.

The committee of Surveillance of Paris had been active in their purſuit of thoſe who had been actors or abettors on the part of the court, ſome had already undergone the laſt puniſhment. Others in vaſt numbers were arreſted, and many who had only been ſuſpected from their affinity to the ariſtocracy or other accidents. The priſons were indeed gorged with them, and the progreſs of trial was ſo ſlow that it required the labour of years to go through the proceſs of trial; the people rendered jealous by repeated plots and treachery, conceived the criminals were favoured by the judges, that "crimes had wings and the law limped over them." Unhappily the ferment occaſioned by news from the frontiers rouſed theſe feelings to fury, and concentred them all in the terrible paſſion of revenge; the repulſe of the French armies—the capture of Longwy and Verdun, were conſidered but as the preludes to that ſentence of deſolation and deſtruction pronounced by Brunſwick upon the devoted people and city of Paris—the general cry was in correſpondence with this terror, "ſhall we leave the priſons of Paris, filled with the "murderers of our friends, and our ſurviving wives and children to be butchered by the "tyrants, who are coming to their protection?"

Indeed there is a very powerful evidence to induce this opinion—M. de St. Meard, a ſuſpected perſon, was confined in the priſon of St. Germaine, he found means to ſpeak to a ſoldier, who was among the deſperadoes—"If you are a prieſt or a conſpirator of the palace of M. Veto," ſaid the ſoldier, "you may expect no mercy." I am ſure not to be accuſed of theſe things, ſaid St. Meard, but I paſs for ſomewhat of an ariſtocrat. "O that's nothing, ſaid the ſoldier, there are honeſt men of all claſſes, the preſident is an honeſt man and no fool." St. Meard avowed himſelf a royaliſt and was acquitted.

The example of Paris was fatally imitated in other places, particularly at Verſailles. The priſoners who had been confined at Orleans for ſtate offences, were ordered thither by the national aſſembly on the eighth of September. The preceding evening a party of aſſaſſins proceeded from Paris, moſt of them in poſt-chaiſes, and, as ſoon as the priſoners arrived, maſſacred them on the ſpot. The inhabitants of Verſailles ſtood ſtupified with horror, and even the detachment which had guarded the captives fron Orleans, ſtood paſſive ſpectators of the maſſacre. Thus periſhed the duke of Briſſac, the biſhop of Maudes, and about thirty others. At Lyons alſo ſome priſoners were maſſacred on the ninth.

The anarchy which ſucceeded the tenth of Auguſt was not ſoon compoſed. On the ſeventeenth of September the garde meuble, was robbed of an immenſe quantity of jewels, and other valuable effects, the greater part of which have never been recovered; it appears, however, that a great part of the jewels of this depot, were removed by other hands than the inſurgents, ſince later diſcoveries have traced ſome of the moſt valuable to Amſterdam, whither they were ſent by perſons in connection with the court.

Before we cloſe our account of the proceedings of the national aſſembly, it is proper to mention a decree which was propoſed by a diſtinguiſhed member Jean Debrie.—The ſubſtance of this ſingular propoſal was, "to levy immediately a corps of twelve hundred volunteers, whoſe particular object ſhould be to attack the commanders of the hoſtile armies, and the kings who were the authors of the war; that theſe volunteers ſhould be equipped in a manner the beſt adapted to the purpoſe, and that on each a penſion for life of two thouſand livres per annum ſhould be ſettled, with the reverſion to their deſcendants to the third generation."

The motion was oppoſed by Vergniaud and others, and a kind of previous queſtion moved upon the occaſion, viz. to refer the matter to the committee of ſafety.

The diſcuſſion was curious and important—It was obſerved by the opponents of Jean Debrie, that the propoſal was unworthy a free and enlightened nation; that aſſaſſination was an expedient againſt which all the generous feelings of humanity revolted; that it might be practiſed as well in a bad as in a virtuous cauſe, as well by the tyrant as by the moſt partiotic ſpirit; that in the preſent inſtance it would infallibly produce repriſals; that if a band of tyrannicides ſhould be formed by France, whole brigades would be formed by the enemy, for the purpoſe of exterminating her commanders.

In reply to theſe obſervations it was urged, that of all the calamities that afflict human nature, war is moſt to be deprecated and deplored; that any expedient which could be deviſed for preventing ſo great a crime and ſo dreadful an evil muſt be laudable. Kings, it was ſaid, are the ſole authors of wars; to gratify their caprice, their avarice, or ambition, they in cold blood devote millions to miſery and to death: unfeeling cowards, they repoſe at home in ſecurity and luxury, remote from the danger, and feaſt upon the miſeries they have occaſioned. Which then is the leſſer evil? To devote one man to death, or to expoſe whole nations to ruin, to devaſtation, to wretchedneſs, to ſlaughter? The guilt of war lies wholly with kings; the puniſhment falls entirely upon the innocent ſubjects: if king's were but once aſſured that puniſhment would inevitably follow their crimes, if their perſonal ſafety was as much dependant on their regard for the happineſs and peace of their ſubjects, as that of the ſubjects upon their obſervance of the laws, wars would be for ever at an end,

With reſpect to repriſals it was allowed, that ſuch a decree would certainly provoke them; but it was urged on the other hand, that the combined kings could not be more exaſperated againſt France than they already were. that they had already adopted a plan of aſſaſſination, and of the baſeſt and moſt deſpicable kind, it was not the manly open avowal of juſt vengeance for injuſtice and cruel aggreſſion, but the ſecret deadly treachery of guilt, which ſteals into the unſuſpicious boſom of domeſtic quiet and by ſowing jealouſies and hatreds, by employing religion and the name of god, employs the very precepts of morality and virtue with daggers and poiſon, that ſets neighbor at war with neighbor and converts the tenderneſs of ſocial affection into animoſity and remorſeleſs hate, that blows up thoſe reſentments into fury, and in the moment of combuſtion ſtanding aloof and out of danger enjoys the common ruin it has created; that whether the decree were paſſed or not, every means would be employed for the deſtruction, or, what would be more fatal, corruption of thoſe inveſted with authority or command; and that even the duke of Brunſwic's manifeſto was in ſubſtance a decree to that very effect, and breathed a ſpirit of ſanguinary and perfidious daring that called for retaliation. The arguments in its favor were allowed to be too fatally juſt, but it was urged, that France ſhould rather ſpurn than imitate the baſe example of tyrants, and relying on her own bravery, obtain the additional glory of overwhelming her enemies and ſecuring her liberties without employing the ſame barbarous means of offence. The propoſal was virtually rejected.

The advances of the combined army ſince the tenth of Auguſt had been rapid and formidable. On the thirtieth Dumourier called a council at Sedan, of all the general officers who were then in that diſtrict, Dillon having been ordered from Valenciennes on purpoſe to aſſiſt at it. He explained the diſtreſſed ſtate of the French army, and obſerved, that after taking poſſeſſion of Longwy, the enemy had proceeded to Verdun, and it was yet uncertain whether they would or not undertake the ſiege of Monimedi. The Pruſſian army amounted to full fifty-five thouſand choſen men; Clairfait with ſixteen thouſand had taken poſt at Chiers, to the right of the Pruſſians; and a ſecond column of Auſtrians, commanded by prince Hohenloe, advanced to their ſupport, and were followed by the Heſſians and emigrants, whoſe numbers were conſiderable.

In this council it was determined that the French were by much too weak to face ſo immenſe a force; or to prevent it from paſſing the Meuſe, which was fordable in ſixty-nine places from Verdun to Stenay. In the mean time general Dumourier had diſpatched general Galbaud with two battalions of infantry to ſupport Verdun. On the thirty-firſt the Auſtrians took Stenay, after a ſlight ſkirmiſh with the vanguard, conſiſting of five battalions of infantry and fourteen ſquadrons of cavalry, commanded by Dillon; the national-guard of Stenay made good their retreat, joined Dillon, and took poſt near the commander in chief at Mouzon.

Dumourier's whole force at this period was not equal in number to the ſingle diviſion commanded by Clairfait. With this ſmall army, the only reſource that preſented itſelf to the French generals was to take poſt in the thick foreſt of Argonne. On the third of September Dumourier fell back to Grand Pré, and Galbaud not being able to throw his force into Verdun, had retired and took poſt in a ſtrong poſition at Bieſme.

The military genius of Dumourier was here diſplayed; his army was ſmall in number, and occupied much ground, but the paſs of Bieſme was of the firſt importance, as it commanded the direct road to Paris; the force under Galbaud was not ſufficient for its maintenance, and Dillon therefore marched thither with a ſtrong detachment. This paſs ſo memorable in future hiſtory, is in the midſt of the foreſt of Argonne, which occupies a range of near fifty miles. The ſurrounding country is picturesque, and covered with gardens, orchards, and vineyards. A deep valley with hills riſing on each ſide, runs through its whole length, with defiles eaſily defended at intervals, which muſt of neceſſity be forced before an enemy could croſs the valley; and afterwards the woods muſt be penetrated, and ſteep acclevities climbed, over alternate rock and bruſh-wood, before the paſs could be gained. On the moſt important of theſe defiles, lies the great road from Clermont to Paris, and there Dillon took poſt and encamped, and on the elevated points around had conſtructed batteries which effectually commanded the paſs; from the lofty precipices the whole landſcape is ſeen ſtretching away to Clermont, where the proſpect terminates with the mountain of the Vache. Galbaud on the moment of Dillon's arrival had abandoned the paſs in deſpair. It was fortunately reſumed in ſufficient time, and upon this circumſtance the fate of the campaign depended.

The ſpace occupied by ſo inconſiderable a force now exceeded thirty miles; but reinforcements were every moment expected, and it became the firſt conſideration to maintain this important poſition till theſe ſhould arrive. On the fourteenth the enemy attacked Grand Pré, and the whole of the army under Dumourier was ſeized with ſuch a panic as obliged him after a ſhort conflict to retreat towards St. Menehould; the Auſtrians however loſt in this affair a number of men and among them the prince Charles de Ligne. On the ſeventeenth Dillon was attacked in his ſtrong poſition at Bieſme, but though the aſſault was intrepid the enemy was ſeverely repulſed, with little loſs on the part of the French. The errors of the enemy at this famous paſs, which has been pertinently denominated the Thermopylæ of France, appear to have been as extraordinary as the talents of the French were conſpicuous; the duke of Brunſwic, though he poſſeſſed Clermont, which is within two leagues of this paſs, had blindly neglected to ſeize it; nay ſuffered Dillon to take poſſeſſion of it within ſight of his videttes. When it was completely occupied, and the French troops refreſhed, he ſurveyed it with the king of Pruſſia from the adjacent heights, attacked it, and diſcovered his error. The Pruſſians next advanced againſt Chalons, and encamped on the heights of La Lune; but Dumourier in the mean time was reinforced from Pont-ſur-Sambre. Bournonville had alſo raiſed the camp at Maulde, and joined the army with thirteen thouſand men, and Kellerman ſoon after arrived with the ſouthern army. A ſecond error was committed by the enemy there, inſtead of attacking the French before they were thus reinforced, they unaccountably waited till the twentieth of September, when the French were firſt enabled to arreſt their progreſs, and commence a brilliant carreer of conqueſt.

On that day Kellerman, whoſe diviſion conſiſted of not more than ſixteen thouſand men, was attacked by a body of troops greatly ſuperior both in number and diſcipline. They repeatedly attempted to ſurround Kellerman, but Dumourier conſtantly preſented his diviſion with a ſteady front, and fruſtrated their manœuvres; the action, with a furious and inceſſant cannonade on both ſides, continued fourteen hours; at ten o'clock at night Kellerman by a maſterly operation took an advantageous poſition on the enemy's right, in the preſence of the enemy. All parties agreed in admiration of the ſteadineſs of the French line, and of that determined valour which ſtood with ſucceſs the aſſault of the beſt diſciplined troops in Europe. The artillery of the enemy made not the ſmalleſt impreſſion upon the French line, while the ſoldiers of the enemy could be kept to the guns only by the diſcipline of the cane. The troops of Kellerman's diviſion too, upon whom the whole brunt of the action lay, had encamped on their ground only the preceding night, after forced marches day and night, and through the moſt tireſome roads. The general in relating the particulars of this action to the war miniſter, ſays, —" I ſaw whole ranks ſwept away by the exploſion of three ammunition-waggons ſet on fire by a howitzer, without the leaſt confuſion or the line being broken; a part of the cavalry, and particularly the carabineers, were for a long time expoſed to the moſt galling fire, and ſhewed themſelves models of courage and firmneſs—the French nation, after what I have ſeen yeſterday, may be ſatisfied that the beſt diſciplined troops cannot excel thoſe who devote themſelves to the cauſe of civil liberty."

On the ſame day general Dillon was again attacked at Bieſme; but having poſted under cover of the wood, a long file of muſqueteers who galled the enemy's flanks ſo ſeverely on their approach, that after a ſmart diſcharge of their howitzers, they retreated with the utmoſt precipitation, without having hurt a ſingle man of the French. This and the former repulſe extremely mortified Brunſwic. and left him no alternative but to make the circuit of the foreſt by the way of Varennes.

The advantages of theſe actions were ſtriking and durable; the French troops learned to think leſs of the enemy and to confide in their own bravery; it proved to them alſo the advantages of order and military obedience, and taught them to place ſome reliance upon the ſkill of their generals, and to reſiſt thoſe diſgraceful panics, which had proved ſo fatal in the beginning of the campaign, and had been chiefly produced by traitorous emiſſaries. Their ſituation notwithſtanding was ſtill encumbered with delicacy and danger. The Auſtrians and Pruſſians were nearly thrice their numbers; and yet held both Clermont and Varennes; the Pruſſian hoſpitals were eſtabliſhed at Grand Pré, and their camp on the heighths of La Lune was ſo judiciouſly fortified as to be conſidered impregnable. Thus on every ſide but the ſouth the French were completely encloſed, and on the ſide that was open the inclemency of the weather had rendered the roads, always bad, now impaſſable. But thoſe latter evils, in any other circumſtances ſo formidable, together with the barrenneſs of the country, proved to be the moſt favourable circumſtances for the French by their effect on the enemy.

The paſs which general Dillon ſo fortunately occupied, proved an inſurmountable obſtacle to the duke of Brunſwic's penetrating by the neareſt route to Paris; and finding it impoſſible to diſlodge the French, he ſet out by the foreſt of Varrennes and Grand Pré, a circuit of about fifty miles, and in the evening the French took poſſeſſion of their ground. The length of this march and the great inclemency of the ſeaſon laid the foundation of that fatal diſeaſe, which afterwards proved more deſtructive than the ſwords of the French. To complete their misfertune, the rivers were ſo ſwollen that their ſupplies were almoſt entirely ſtopped, and the combined army was actually without bread for four days, the want of which the ſoldiers very imprudently endeavoured to ſupply by the unripe grapes of Champaigne.

During theſe important actions, the preparations at Paris were carried on with aſtoniſhing vigour to repel the enemy hourly expected; ſo confident were the enemies of the revolution of their ſucceſs, that a report which had been circulated in the Netherlands, of the entire capture of Dumourier and his army was univerſally believed. The aſſurances of the emigrants alſo, had foſtered an opinion, that the combined army would be generally joined by the people, and by ſoldiers from the army, who would deſert through the want of diſcipline, or the unſkilfulneſs of their generals, and that they never would be able to ſtand an attack from veteran troops.

It is ſomething ſingular, that the confederate kings who profeſſedly made war upon the conſtitution of 1789, ſhould now (after the loſs of ſo much blood and treaſure, after having wantonly diſturbed the peace of France, and done irreparable injury to their own ſubjects) deſire only as their ultimate object the re-eſtabliſhment of that conſtitution. It is a fact ſcarcely to be credited, that the ſame duke of Brunſwic, who in the month of July, proſtituted his name by affixing it to the diſgraceful manifeſto, in which he profeſſed his intention of reſtoring to the king of France the full exerciſe of his former functions; in which he pronounced an irrevocable ſentence of death upon all the members of the national-aſſembly, and other public functionaries acting under the conſtitution; that in the month of September he ſhould acknowledge the full authority of the French nation to give laws to itſelf; that he ſhould entreat only for the perſonal fate of the king; that he ſhould with his own lips requeſt it as a favour, that any place whatever might be aſſigned him (the king) in the new order of things; and that by his confident Manſtien he ſhould ſay to Dumourier—"Make him your king under the ſtricteſt limits. Do not content your-"ſelves with tying him up like the king of England—Make him a king of Mahrattas—"Make him a ſtadtholder—Make him the principal tax-gatherer of the country—Give "him only a place—that is all we aſk—and then we ſhall have it in our power to form
"a pretext for retiring."

Colonel Thouvenot anſwered, "that the will of the French republic would not yield to any foreign influence, and that the repreſentatives of the nation, to whom the valuable depoſit of its honor and glory were committed, would perſiſt in maintaining decrees which had been ſanctioned by the general opinion. The duke terminated the conference by ſaying he would tranſmit to general Dumourier a memorial on the ſubject. This memorial was in effect a third manifeſto worthy of the two former, and contained the imperious demand to reſtore the king. The truce was immediately broken—a new conference was requeſted by the Pruſſians, but Dumourier agreed to it only with a condition that it ſhould not delay the operations of the campaign.

Humiliating as this condition was he acceded to it, and the duke of Brunſwic ſought to effect by negociation what he had failed to atchieve by talents or valour. The Pruſſians, however, had time to bury their dead, and the French uſed every means that their high fortune favored to ſtrengthen their army by reinforcements and ſupplies of every kind. The converſations at any of the interviews of the generals have never been fully diſcloſed; certain it is that efforts were made to bring about a compromiſe for the ſafety of the king; but the national deputies Carra and Sillery having arrived with the decree which for ever aboliſhed monarchy, put a ſtop to all ſuch diſcuſſions. The aſtoniſhment of the Pruſſian chiefs was now raiſed even beyond all former admiration of the French valor, by witneſſing the enthuſiaſtic unanimity with which the decree was received by the troops under arms.

The conferences, therefore, between the generals, from which ſo much was expected, ended only in the retreat of the Pruſſians, who were ſoon after followed by the armies of Auſtria and Heſſe-Caſſel. The firſt poſt abandoned by the Pruſſians was the paſs of Grand Pré; this was on the 30th of September.

The commiſſioners of the army ſay "the enemy are retreating as faſt as they can, but they are harraſſed by our army; during the laſt two days we have taken four hundred men, beſide ſeveral waggons loaded with proviſions—the road behind them is ſtrewed with dead bodies—the camp which they have quitted reſembles a burying ground—above three hundred horſes, half eaten, have been found in it—the priſoners and deſerters all agree that they have more than fifty men ſick in each company—the ſoldiers were often ſix or ſeven days without taſting bread. Dumourier's army is in the beſt ſtate poſſible; all the officers and ſoldiers are animated with a deſire of conquering; the general by the able manœuvres he employed, and the poſition he took, has finiſhed a campaign which will form an epoch in the annals of France. One will ſcarcely believe that he dared to make a retreat with ſeventeen thouſand men in the face of an army of eighty thouſand, to take ſuch a poſition as enabled him to ſtop their progreſs, to effect a junction with the different bodies which came to his aſſiſtance, that placing himſelf directly between the Pruſſian army encamped at Liron and La Lune, oppoſite the latter, he ſhould contrive by the camp of Bieſme, which he took poſſeſſion of, at the ſame time to check twenty thouſand Heſſians encamped at Clermont. By continually harraſſing the enemy and intercepting their convoys he has been able to detain them in the moſt barren part of France, and to oblige them at length to retire ſhamefully from the country, with an army diminiſhed one third in battle, by diſeaſe, deſerters, and priſoners loſt."

The retreat of the enemy was ſlow, encumbered as they were with ſick, and waſted with hunger and fatigue. Their route was towards Verdun. Bournonville harraſſed them in the rear, and Dillon kept the Heſſians in check at the foreſt of Argonne. It has been inſinuated that, that more than once Dumourier might have interrupted their progreſs, and even poſſibly might have made priſoners of both the king and general; and it has, from this circumſtance, been ſurmiſed that a ſecret treaty exiſted between the generals. It muſt however be remembered, that the French army was ſtill inferior in number to the enemy, and the general was perhaps impreſſed with the conſideration of how much he muſt riſk by a defeat at this important criſis.

It does not appear that the Pruſſians in their retreat made any conſiderable halt at Verdun; and the garriſon which they had ſtationed there ſurrendered on capitulation to general Dillon on the twelfth of October. The Pruſſian commander at this place had ſome very free converſation with general Dillon, in which he intimated the ſtrong deſire his maſter had for peace and amity with the French nation; and in a previous converſation with the duke of Brunſwick, general Galbaud, commander of the French artillery, and ſome other officers, the ſame ſentiments were ſtrongly expreſſed by the duke, who wiſhed to extenuate and endeavored to diſavow the malevolence and ferocity of his manifeſto: but the cruelty that he had already exerciſed, on Georges a member of the aſſembly who had fallen into his hands, his barbarity to the inhabitants of the Voſges, and the rapacity which he countenanced among his troops, ſpoke more forcibly than the mean and humiliating duplicity of this prince when diſcomfiture and diſaſter had taught him the exceſs of his temerity and extravagance. Nothing could more clearly demonſtrate the weakneſs and vacillation of the court of Berlin, and its generals, than ſuch a perfidious mode of proceeding after ſuch pompous particularity in their threats, and ſuch deſpicable meaſures of terror in the firſt moments of ſucceſs. A monarch unprovoked, commencing war upon principles avowedly contrary to all that had ever been conſidered ſacred in the rights of nations, breathing denunciation and cruelty, acting upon thoſe threatenings, and in the reverſe of fortune humbly ſeeking a ſubterfuge to retract its proclaimed purpoſes, ſoliciting a ſhield from the object of its perſecution—and after all with conſiſtent baſeneſs renewing the ſame hoſtility again. Poſterity will conſign theſe monſters to the caverns of infamy with the Alvas, the Borgias, and Pizzaros. In other reſpects the policy of thoſe poliſhed barbarians was perfectly conſiſtent; in the cartel for an exchange of priſoners, the hapleſs and deluded emigrants were excepted to by the French, and given up to ſlaughter by the Pruſſian general, who had countenanced them as ſoldiers fighting in the cauſe which he had embraced as juſt, but delivered them up as rebels.

The recapture of Longwy followed that of Verdun on the twenty-ſecond of October, on which day it was taken poſſeſſion of by general Valence, though in fact the capitulation was ſigned on the eighteenth. The Pruſſian army immediately evacuated the territories of France; and the country was ſolemnly proclaimed to be no longer in danger. General Dumourier had for ſome time been abſent from his army; his active mind was occupied with ſtill bolder projects, in the execution of which we ſhall have ſpeedily to follow him.

The conduct of the Pruſſians and Auſtrians, during their invaſion of France was cruel and deſtructive as their manifeſto was barbarous. The rigid diſcipline of the cane and the ſcourge ſerved indeed to reſtrain within the boundaries of military obedience, ſome wretched and paſſive inſtruments of deſpotiſm, unhappy human machines: but the plunder of the enemies, even though unarmed and defenceleſs, is, it ſeems, no infringement of the articles of civilized war! The contributions levied by the duke of Brunſwic, upon the credit of notes payable by the king of France, when he ſhould be reinſtated in his functions, has been with juſtice characterized as royal ſwindling.

But the unfortunate villagers of Voſges were treated with a ſeverity that renders all the hypocritical declarations of thoſe perfidious invaders deteſtable. Though ſituated on a mountain and well calculated to form a poſt of ſome ſtrength, ſtill its fortifications were in ſuch a ſtate that it would be folly in the inhabtiants to have attempted to reſiſt an army. Having however been greatly harraſſed by detached marauding parties of the enemy, the villagers reſolved to defend their property againſt ſuch parties in future, though not to reſiſt a regular ſummons. The next detachment therefore which came in this irregular manner, was very bravely repulſed; but immediately returning with a ſtrong reinforcement, the peaſants, after a gallant effort were compelled to ſubmit. As they were not dreſſed in the uniform of ſoldiers, theſe brave men were judged to be exempt from the laws of war. They were dragged to the head-quarters, tied to the tails of horſes; and before they were carried away, were compelled to ſet fire to their dwellings with their own hands, by which much property and ſeveral lives were deſtroyed. A mother threw herſelf at the feet of the barbarous conquerors, and entreated permiſſion to carry with her her two infants. Her entreaties were diſregarded, and the unoffending babes periſhed in the flames.

Of all theſe tribes of plunderers, however, none were equal to the Heſſians in dexterity, adroitneſs, or in the extent of their depredations. Theſe devoted ſlaves, who are actually ſold, like the negroes on the coaſt of Africa, to the beſt bidder, by their rapacious chief, ſeemed to carry with them to the war all the diſpoſitions incident to a ſtate of ſlavery. Plunder was their ſole object, nor could any thing deter them on any occaſion from the purſuit of it. Wherever they came, like a ſwarm of locuſts, they left a barren wilderneſs behind them. Every article that could be removed, and that was of the leaſt value, was carried away—Not only the money and the plate, but even the clothes and the furniture of the inhabitants were purloined—They ſtripped without mercy the miſerable emigrants themſelves, and plundered the nobility of France who ſerved in the combined armies, with as little remorſe as thoſe whom they denominated rebels.

The conduct of the French ſoldiery was in general much more reſpectable in this inſtance; they abſtained religiouſly from plunder, and, as they endured the want of every neceſſary with fortitude, were cautious of injuring the rights of others. Their political fanaticiſm, however, ſometimes betrayed them into ſhocking exceſſes, the moſt flagrant inſtance of which occurred at Rhetel in the beginning of October. Two battalions of volunteers being ſtationed at that place, four deſerters from the Pruſſian army came to offer their ſervices, and were received by the officers. In the courſe of the day, however, ſome diſpute aroſe between theſe men and ſome of the ſoldiers, when an alarm was inſtantly ſpread among the volunteers, that they were ſpies; the reſt of the ſoldiers immediately ſeized theſe unhappy men, and in defiance of their officers, in defiance of juſtice and entreaty, cut them to pieces.

General Dumourier on this occaſion gave a ſalutary example of ſeverity. He degraded the two battalions, ſtripped them of their military accoutrements and uniforms, and obliged them to deliver up the immediate delinquents. The battalions, with a returning ſenſe of honour, acknowledged the juſtice of the ſentence; but entreated that inſtead of being broken they might be ſent upon ſome ſervice of more than ordinary danger, to expiate their crime; and of their own accord delivered up to the ſentence of the law ten of their body, who were at once the cauſes and the agents in this horrid tranſaction.

The ſieges of Thionville and Liſle are conſpicuous circumſtances in the hiſtory of this campaign. The former is a ſmall but ſtrong fortreſs, and was entruſted to the command of Generel Felix Wimpfen, whoſe reply to the ſummons of the Auſtrian general was, "You may deſtroy the fortreſs, and not leave one ſtone upon another, but you cannot burn the ramparts." It reſiſted during the whole campaign, and held in check a force which was ſaid to amount to twenty-eight thouſand men; and which in ſeveral ſucceſsful ſallies the beſieged frequently harraſſed and diſtreſſed. The town was relieved by the general retreat of the enemy; and the victorious garriſon and commander received all the honours and applauſe which a grateful country could confer.

The city of Liſle was threatened early in September, and on the twenty-third the electors of the department of the north, who were aſſembled there, tranſmitted a public act to the legiſlative body, in which they ſwear, that "they would be buried under the ruins of the town, rather than abandon their poſt." As the poſſeſſion of this city was conſidered by the Auſtrians of the utmoſt importance to their views, no expence was ſpared to effect its reduction. On the twenty-ninth the duke of Saxe-Teſchen, who was appointed by the court of Vienna to this comand, ſummoned the town to ſurrender, on pain of being delivered up to the horrors of war. The anſwer of the council general of the commons was at once modeſt and ſpirited: "We have juſt renewed our oath to be faithful to the nation, and to maintain liberty and equality, or die at our poſt. We will not perjure ourſelves." On that day the Auſtrian batteries began to play upon the town, and were directed for upwards of a week to that quarter which was inhabited by the poor claſs of citizens. The principal motive for this proceeding was evidently, that by diſtreſſing them in particular, they might be rendered mutinous and ſeditious, and induced to riſe upon the magiſtrates and commanders, in order to force them into a capitulation. In this the enemy was diſappointed; for on the contrary, inſpired with a degree of heroiſm proportioned to their danger, theſe very citizens cauſed the keys of the city to be carried into the great ſquare and hung upon the tree of liberty; and at the ſame time paſſed a reſolution, that whoever preſumed to remove them for the purpoſe of delivering up the city, ſhould be puniſhed with inſtant death. This ſpirited reſolution the citizens of Liſle ſupported with (what ſhould always acompany true patriotiſm) order and diſcipline. They formed themſelves into ſeveral companies, to each of which were aſſigned its proper functions and ſtation. Every precaution was taken to prevent the miſchievous effects from the bombardment, and a number of women and children were conſtantly employed in knocking out the fuſes to prevent the exploſion. The city, however, was ſoon reduced to a heap of ruins; and the inhabitants were compelled to take up their reſidence in temporary huts, or in vaults and cellars, which were formed into a kind of caſemates, by the immenſity of rubbiſh heaped upon them. The churches and public buildings were almoſt all deſtroyed; but the valour, patriotiſm, and virtue of the inhabitants increaſed with their diſtreſs; and as ſoon as a family was driven from its habitation by the devaſtations of the artillery, it was hoſpitably incorporated with another. To the ſixth of October at noon the fire was inceſſant; ſhells, red-hot balls, and every inſtrument of deſtruction, were ſhowered upon the devoted city. The princeſs Chriſtina, ſiſter to the duke of Saxe-Teſchen, with her whole court, attended to view the brilliant ſpectacle, and in the hope of enjoying the triumph of conqueſt. It is even ſaid that the princeſs herſelf applied the match to ſome of the engines of deſtruction. As the garriſon was too ſmall to waſte its force in ſallies, nothing of that kind was attempted but its courage and indefatigable aſſiduity are beyond encomiums; and mareſchal Rualt, the commander, deſerves to be recorded with every mark of reſpect. It is computed that the Auſtrian batteries fired upwards of thirty thouſand red-hot balls and ſix thouſand bombs upon the city, excluſive of the fire of one of the fineſt battering-trains that ever appeared in the field. Notwithſtanding this, the whole loſs of both garriſon and people did not exceed five hundred, three-fourths of whom were women and children. The Auſtrians had flattered themſelves with being able to maintain this poſt, ſhould they have ſucceeded in their plan for its reduction, notwithſtanding the retreat of the combined armies: but finding themſelves utterly deceived in their expectations, on the ſeventh and eighth of October they began to break up their camp, and the ſiege was raiſed.

The arms of France, at this period, were victorious in every quarter. The king of Sardinia had long been regarded as hoſtile to the revolution. He had been among the firſt to encourage and aſſiſt the emigrants; he had acceded to the treaty of Pilnitz; he had arreſted the French ambaſſador Semonville on the frontiers, on pretences allowed afterwards to be groundleſs; he had encreaſed his armaments in Savoy, and filled the fortreſs of Montmelian with troops; and after the affair of the tenth of Auguſt he had held a congreſs of the foreign miniſters, to deliberate on a plan for invading France. That plan was, however, deferred. It was upon theſe reaſons that the national aſſembly, on the ſixteenth of September, declared war againſt the king of Sardinia; and about the twentieth general Monteſquieu entered the territories of Savoy, preceded by the following laconic proclamation, "In the name of the French nation; war againſt deſpots; "peace and liberty to the people." He deſcribes his march as "a triumph"—He was every where received with joy, and troops flocked to his ſtandard from every part—A deputation from Chambery waited on him almoſt as ſoon as he paſſed the boundary, and on the twenty-firſt he proceeded with a detachment to take poſſeſſion of that city. The municipality waited for him at the gate in their dreſs of ceremony to deliver up the keys; and teſtified, in warm terms, the eſteem in which the people of Savoy held the French nation—At the Hotel de Ville he received the homage of all the citizens, and invited them to an entertainment he had prepared for the purpoſe—As a mark of confidence, he left the Hotel de Ville in the cuſtody of their own town guards, a circumſtance which was received with every expreſſion of ſatisfaction and regard by the citizens—after this the whole country of Savoy ſubmitted without reſiſtance; he then bent his ſteps to Geneva.

The conqueſt of Savoy had ſpread an inſtant alarm over the neighbouring ſtates, and the ariſtocratic faction in Geneva in particular felt no inconſiderable portion of uneaſineſs. From the neighbouring Swiſs cantons this party demanded a garriſon of one thouſand ſix hundred men, while a democratic party in the city were clamorous for placing the republic under the protection of the French. Monteſquieu preſented himſelf before the city; the ariſtocracy were alarmed; they extended the olive-branch to the French general, and the diſpute terminated with the diſmiſſion of the Swiſs garriſon, and the withdrawing of the French troops from the vicinity of Geneva.

The democratic party in Paris, conſidered the conduct of the general on this occaſion, as very ſuſpicious; it was alleged to be the effect of bribery, and charges of peculation were at the ſame time laid againſt him by a faction at Paris, which induced him to retire to Switzerland.

At the head of another body of troops general Anſelm, who had been bred an eccleſiaſtic, croſſed the Var, and on the twenty-ninth of September took poſſeſſion of Nice. In this enterprize he was ſupported by the co-operation of admiral Truguet with nine ſail of the line. The city was evacuated by the Piedmonteſe immediately upon the appearance of the French. Villa Franca, the fortreſs of Montalban, and the whole country of Nice immediately ſubmitted. Upon the firſt arrival of the general, his popularity among the Piedmonteſe was conſiderable, and they appeared warmly attached to the revolution; but the exceſſes of that general ſoon produced a diſaffection, which occaſioned his diſmiſſion and confinement.

An affair which took place at Onaglia, contributed alſo to injure the popularity of the French in Sardinia. On the twenty-third of October admiral Truguet arrived in that port, and iſſued a proclamation inviting the inhabitants to an union with the French nation; captain Duchayla was ſent under protection of a flag of truce to preſent it to the magiſtrates, and the admiral followed with his ſhip, ordering the other veſſels to keep well off the ſhore. The people feigned to receive the boat with friendſhip; but at the moment Duchayla was preparing to addreſs them, he was aſſailed by a volley of muſquetry, in which an aid-de-camp of mareſchal Lahoulier, two midſhipmen, and four ſeamen, in the ſame boat were killed, and the captain himſelf and the adjutant-general wounded.

The magiſtrates affected to excuſe themſelves, but the admiral reſolved to inflict ſignal puniſhment for this treachery; as ſoon as the boat was out of further danger, the troops under mareſchal Lahoulier were landed, and ordered to attack the town on one ſide, while the ſquadron dropped their anchors within piſtol-ſhot, and battered it to ruin; the place was delivered up to plunder, and ſet on fire in ſeveral places.

The conqueſts of Cuſtine in the circle of the Upper Rhine, were not leſs brilliant than thoſe of his colleagues. It was with conſiderable difficulty, from the badneſs of the roads, and the quantity of rain, that he could collect his army at Landau by the twenty-ninth of September. On that morning, however, he proceeded towards Spires, which he reached on the following day. He found the Auſtrians drawn up in order of battle before Spires, having on their right an eminence, which is above the gate that looks towards Worms, a ravine before them, and their left extended among ſome gardens ſurrounded with thick hedges. In this poſition the general did not heſitate to attack them, and ſoon forced them to retreat within the walls of the city. Having tried for a ſhort time to force the gates with cannon, and perceiving the ardor of his troops, general Cuſtine propoſed to cut them down with axes, and the propoſal was eagerly received by the ſoldiers. The gates were ſpeedily demoliſhed, and the French ruſhed into the town with their uſual impetuoſity; but the enemy, who had taken poſſeſſion of all the adjacent houſes, commenced a heavy and deſtructive fire upon them, almoſt as ſoon as they entered. Fortunately general Cuſtine had taken the precaution to place at the head of the columns ſome howitzers and eight pounders, which enabled him to rally his troops, who were in ſome degree diſordered at firſt by the violence of the diſcharge of muſquetry from the houſes. The Auſtrians had, however, apparently no intention of maintaining their ground; they immediately retreated, and left Cuſtine maſter of the city. The French on this occaſion took upwards of three thouſand priſoners, beſides a great quantity of cannon, and howitzers.

The capture of Worms by Neuvigner, with a detachment from Cuſtine's army, immediately ſucceeded that of Spires, and the movements of the French were ſo rapid, that the enemy had not found it poſſible to remove their ſtores; and an immenſe quantity therefore of every kind was found in this place. Cuſtine laid the biſhop, the chapter, and the magiſtrates under a heavy contribution; the loſs of the Auſtrians in men was alſo conſiderable.

On the nineteenth of October, in the midſt of heavy rain, general Cuſtine by forced marches arrived before Mentz. The ſtate of the fortreſſes was previouſly well known to him; and the garriſon amounted to about ſix thouſand men. On the twentieth he ſummoned the governor to ſurrender, who anſwered that he meant to defend the town, but requeſted till the twenty-firſt to conſider. In the mean time the garriſon never ceaſed their fire; but to end it, Cuſtine again wrote to the governor; a capitulation was agreed upon, the chief article of which was that the garriſon ſhould not ſerve in the war for the ſpace of one year; and on the twenty-firſt the garriſon marched out with the honors of war.

Frankfort fell into the hands of this victorious commander on the twenty-ſecond of October. In conſequence of the protection and aſſiſtance which this city gave to the emigrants, Cuſtine thought proper to impoſe on the magiſtrates a fine of one million five hundred thouſand florins; but on their repreſentation he was afterwards induced to remit the five hundred thouſand.

The enlarged and ardent ambition of the general would have penetrated to Coblentz, that noted receptacle of the enemies of French liberty: in this daring project he complained that he was diſappointed by the tardineſs and inactivity of Kellerman. He wiſhed that general to paſs the Sarre and the Moſelle, directly to Treves and Coblentz, and to leave a ſmall party to watch the motions of the Pruſſians in their retreat. Kellerman however vindicated himſelf by ſtating, that after Dumouriez left him, he had no more than fifteen thouſand men under his command, and Valence no more than fourteen thouſand; the Pruſſians amounted to upwards of fifty-five thouſand men, and conſequently he was neither able to penetrate ſuch a body, nor did he think it ſafe to leave the French territory open to their incurſions.

The general diſappointed in this favorite meaſure, ſtill proceeded to extend his conqueſts in the dominions of the prince of Heſſe. By the union of the Pruſſians with the Heſſians and Auſtrians, however, a check was put upon his career before the termination of the campaign. On the ſecond of December the Pruſſians appeared before Frankfort, a plot had been previouſly concerted between ſome of the burghers and the Pruſſian commander for the admiſſion of a body of troops to ſurprize the French garriſon, one of the gates was accordingly betrayed, and the French to the number of fifteen hundred were butchered with circumſtances of cruelty and torture unſurpaſſed; thoſe who eſcaped the firſt ſlaughter were taken in cold blood the next day, their hands chopped off with axes and ſent with the bleeding ſtumps naked to Mentz. The principal actors in this ſavage treachery were Heſſian ſoldiers purpoſely diſguiſed as peaſants and carpenters, provided with ſharp axes with which they hewed down the doors of every houſe to which the French had retired for refuge or to maintain reſiſtance; the French ſcattered and betrayed as they were ſold their lives dearly, they rallied in ſuch parties as accident threw together, and with ſuch weapons as firſt preſented themſelves, but the body of troops that ettered to ſupport the enterprize, were too powerful for effectual reſiſtance. After the ſurrender of the city the French lines were attacked, and a ſmart action took place; the gallantry of the French was highly diſtinguiſhed; for although the Pruſſians amounted to fifty thouſand men and theFrench only to twenty-three thouſand, the latter maintained their ground in a ſharp conflict of five hours, and by able and ſteady evolutions took a ſtrong poſition in a wood, where they kept the enemy completely in check.

Perhaps the whole hiſtory of mankind ſcarcely includes a picture ſo ſtriking, of the ſurpriſing effects reſulting from the enthuſiaſm of liberty, as the ſtate of France at this moment preſented. Actuated by this ſpirit, the haſty levies of undiſciplined peaſants were at once converted into regular armies. Battalions, compoſed chiefly of beardleſs boys, chaſed from the field the diſciplined legions of Germany and Pruſſia; and though checked by no military ſyſtem, no code of war, no ſtable authority, this principle alone was ſufficient to retain them in order and ſubordination. Even the female ſex partook in the general patriotiſm, and many of them proved equal in courage and conduct to ours. Not only the ſiſter of general Anſelm, and the two miſs Fernigs, who ſerved as aids-de-camp to general Dumourier, and another young woman who acted as aid-de-camp to Cuſtine; but many others of the French women, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by the moſt heroic exertions; and even the artillery was frequently ſerved by female patriots, who, regardleſs of natural or habitual weakneſs and imbecility, by their ſpirit and activity compenſated for the want of that force and vigour which has hitherto been excluſively attributed to men.

The period now approached when the aſſembly was to accompliſh its relinquiſhment to the people of the exerciſe of their power on the ſerious queſtions involving the fate of the king. Their acts ſince the tenth of Auguſt principally conſiſted of meaſures preparatory for the approaching convention, or of a defenſive kind. Among their laſt acts, however, was one in its nature deeply connected with the morals and happineſs of ſociety. It was the law concerning marriage and divorce. The abuſes which ſprung from the barbarous feudal inſtitution of hereditary deſcent by primogeniture, the vice and miſery produced by the incongruous and unequal diſtribution of property under this monſtrous regulation, the ſupport which its exiſtence had furniſhed to tyranny and injuſtice, pointed out the neceſſity of aboliſhing it at a very early ſtage of the revolutiom; but there ſtill remained to be cured evils partly originating in the ſame ſource, and ſupported by prejudices and errors of another and equally pernicious character. The amazing fabric of the Romiſh church, had in a ſeries of ages gradually combined a ſyſtem of maxims and principles of diſcipine calculated to maintain an abſolute dominion over every paſſion and feeling of man. Thoſe maxims which originally appeared but as rules of practice, had by the cunning and luſt of power that has in all ages marked the prieſthood, been converted into articles of faith; thus the civil inſtitutions of ſociety were conſtituted ſacramental rites, and the functions became neceſſarily attached to thoſe whoſe lives by being devoted to the ſervice of religion, had obtained in dark times that reverence from ſuperſtition which was due to the deity only. Thus the form of marriage from being a ſubject of civil ordination was ordained a ſacrament; and the ceremonial from being a virtuous contract entered into in the name of God and according to law, was made to aſſume the appearance of necromancy, with its ſymbolical lights, ſprinklings, and rings, emblematical of divinity, purity, and eternity. An irregular but incoherent fanaticiſm, the ordinary effect of truth breaking in upon vigorous but defective intellects, had rent the veil which for ſeveral ages had ſanctified this ſuperſtitious mummery; but though the impoſition was expoſed, and diſarrayed of its titular ſanctity, the form and practice was retained by the prieſthood even of the moſt rigid of the reformed, without any remarkable exception but that of the quakers.

America among the numerous lights which her revolution had thrown upon the theory of free governmet, furniſhed the firſt example of the civil reſtoration of the primitive marriage ordination; and as the Americans had derived much of their theory from French writers, ſo they in return appeared eager to improve upon American practice. Accordingly the marriage contract was made wholly civil, and committed to the magiſtracy, and the law was made to embrace the power of divorce and the concerns of the offspring.

The care of female children was wholly confided to the mother, as well as the males to their ſeventh year, at which period the latter were to become the particular objects of paternal care; it was provided, however, that any other diſpoſition mutually agreed upon by the parents ſhould be legal, ſo that it ſhould not be incompatible with their happineſs or the diſtributive equality of property. In diſputed caſes arbitrators were to be choſen from the neareſt kindred. The parents were to contribute equally to the maintenance of the children, in proportion to their property, whether under the father or mother. The parties divorced could neither of them contract a new marriage for one year.

The intention of this law appears to has been directed by benevolence; to nations of leſs ſenſibility, whoſe ideas and education are not regulated with the ſame regard for domeſtic happineſs, who do no like the French make every ſocial purſuit ſubordinate and inſtrumental to the freedom, chearfulneſs, and reciprocal diffuſion of happineſs and the conſtant aſſociation of the ſexes—to ſuch nations this law will appear fraught with violence to maſculine ſuperiority, and with danger to femenine weakneſs, but without reflecting that the habits of aſſumed ſuperiority, while they obſtruct ſocial enjoyment, produce that very weakneſs, which is not to be found where auſterity and diſtance is not maintained.

But it muſt be acknowleged that the hatred of abuſes, and of every thing belonging to the ancient regimen, appears in this and other inſtances to have been carried to an extreme of refinement. Perhaps that part of the law of divorce which makes incompatibility of temper a ſufficient cauſe, is liable to conſiderable abuſe, notwithſtanding the control under which it operates. Another circumſtance marks the rapid change from devotion to the rejection of cuſtoms long ſanctified in the mental lethargy of deſpotiſm. The rector of the church of St. Laurent invited the aſſembly of their ſection to attend the funeral ſervice to be performed for thoſe patriots who had fallen on the tenth of Auguſt, but the doctrine of purgatory had loſt it advocates, and the following anſwer was ſent to the rector.

"The matyrs of liberty, our brave brethren, who fell on the tenth of Auguſt, have no need of being excuſed or recommended to a juſt, good, and merciful God; the blood which they have ſhed for their country, effaces all their faults, and gives them a claim to the beneficence of the deity.

"What—ſhall we go and offer up our prayers to the divinity, that he may not condemn our brethren to the puniſhments of enternal fire? This would be offering an inſult to him—it would be telling him that he is the moſt ferocious, the moſt abſurd, and the moſt ridiculous of all beings. God, ſir is juſt: our brethren conſequently enjoy a perfect happineſs, which nothing can deſtroy: bad citizens alone can doubt it.

"Shew us upon your altar-pieces the glorious victims of liberty, crowned with flowers, and occupying the place of St. Criſpin and St. Evenfin.

"Subſtitute ſongs of liberty for the abſurd hymns aſcribed to that ferocious David—that crowned monſter—that Nero of the Hebrews, whoſe leaſt crime was his having aſſaſſinated a huſband, in order that he might ſleep more conveniently with his wife. We ſhall then unite with you in celebrating together that God, who imprinted on the heart of man that inſtinct which excites in him the love of liberty."

About this time the national aſſembly, conſidering the urgency of determining the fate of the clergy who had refuſed to take the oath preſcribed by law, decreed, "that all ſuch who do not depart the kingdom within fourteen days after the notification of the decree by the ſection, wherein they reſide, ſhall be ſent into perpitual exile, to that part of South America called Cayenne.—Each clergyman conforming to this decree, is allowed three livres for every eight leagues, and will receive a paſſport, containing his deſcription and place of deſtination. Non-compliance after receipt of the paſſport, or returning from baniſhment, to be puniſhed with ten years impriſoment. Perſons infirm and above ſixty years of age were exempted from the operation of this decree."

On the twenty-firſt of September the aſſembly met for the laſt time: Francois of Neufchateau acquainted them that as a deputation was about to wait upon them from the convention, he would move that after having cloſed their proceedings they ſhould repair to the Thuilleries and pay their reſpects to the repreſentatives of the nation. The motion was unanimouſly agreed to. The preſident ſoon after announced the attendance of twelve commiſſioners from the convention, who entered the hall with reiterated applauſe.

Gregoire, biſhop of Bloiſe, ſpoke in behalf of the commmiſſion—"Citizens, the national convention is conſtituted. We are deputed to inform you thereof." The preſident replied—"The enthuſiaſm inſpired by your preſence, is a proof of the impatience with which the legiſlative aſſembly waited for you. We are going to wait on the convention, to aſſure it of our profound reſpect and ſubmiſſion to its decrees." — The preſident then ſaid—"The legiſlative aſſembly declares that its ſittings are cloſed."

Thus terminated after a year's exiſtence, that ſtormy legiſlature, under which, ſaid Briſſot, public ſpirit made ſuch a rapid progreſs, and the French nation marched with giant ſtrides towards a republic. The character of this aſſembly has been variouſly eſtimated, but the characters have been dictated by hoſtile prejudices, and appeared rather as cariacatures than likeneſſes. By the royaliſt it has been repreſented as undermining the throne without intermiſſion—by the factious and diſorderly, as meanly obſequious to the will of the court—but the diſpaſſionate obſerver alone conſiders it as neither one nor the other, though bearing external appearances of both; in truth, like all bodies of men in unſettled times, it exhibited verſatility in its principles and meaſures; but theſe changes were not ſo much the effect of immediate weakneſs, of inſtability in the aſſembly itſelf, as of the influence of external events. Their ſituation was novel, their duties were complex, arduous and difficult; they had a conſtitution to ſupport, ſecretly oppoſed by its principal agent; an internal combination of noble and ſacerdotal diſaffection to counteract; and foreign intrigue ſecretly fomenting the fuel of ſedition and diſcord, and pervading ſociety —in league with the court, ſpreading corruption even into the aſſembly itſelf.

Its meaſures could not then be the reſult of foreſight, for they were generally expedients dictated by neceſſity; theſe expedients were alſo varied, and ſometimes oppoſite, but they were likewiſe the reſults of the variform oppoſition which they had to reſiſt. There were in it a number of members whoſe habitual ſtudies, whoſe philanthropy, whoſe energy, diſpoſed them for every ſentiment in favor of freedom, and the treachery of which they were witneſſes not only ſtrengthened their opinions but incited to their practical realization.

There were were no doubt weak men in the aſſembly, and ſome whoſe hearts glowed by the benignity of philanthropy, had contemplated the immediate perfection of ſociety, forgetful that ages of oppreſſion had rendered the nation yet incapable of an order ſo pure and ſimple. There were alſo men whoſe hot ſpirits flamed with ambition, and who thrown into active life by the convulſions of the revolution, appeared born for the perpetuation of diſorder. Of the latter however, the aſſembly did not afford ſo many as the convention which ſucceeded it; but their connection with a number of ſimilar characters in the capital, rendered their activity and power over the public paſſions, of the moſt ſerious importance in ſuch critical circumſtances.

The ſpirit of party, which had in the early progreſs of the revolution been directed by different paths to the correction of abuſes, had in the moments of ſucceſs been wrought up by contention into an emulation for power; the former diſcriminations of royaliſts, conſtitutionaliſts, and republicans gradually diſappeared beneath the encreaſing danger of the country and the machinations of the court; the conſtitution aſſailed by the executive whoſe power it limitted, and hy the republicans who ſaw in it the means of reviving and perpetuating the national evils, was abandoned to the weak ſupport of a few ſincere men and a ſmaller number of courtiers acting under the maſk of moderation.

The great majority of the aſſembly were republican; upon principle, the conduct of the court had converted many others, and the popular clubs and publications had ſo entirely engroſſed the public mind, as to leave no predominant paſſion but that of conſtituting a republic. Upon this point all diſcuſſion centered from the period when the foreign powers had unveiled their deſigns; the purpoſed flight and conſpiracy, fruſtrated by the affair of the tenth of Auguſt, opened the field to a new diviſion of parties, which greatly influenced the ſubſequent fortunes and misfortunes of France.

Many of the important tranſactions of the revolution are involved in myſtery to foreign nations, becauſe the characters and titles of parties which produced them have been conſtantly confounded, either through the artifice of opponents, or the miſappropriation of general deſcriptions to diſtinct and diſconnected perſons and claſſes of men. In ſketching the hiſtory of the Jacobins, we noticed the changes which that ſociety had frequently undergone by the retirement of ſome and the acceſſion of other members, and we have noticed that contention which took place upon the eſtabliſhment of the rival club of Feuillans, or friends of the conſtitution, compoſed principally of the earlieſt members of the Jacobins. Theſe and ſucceeding changes are highly illuſtrative of the events of the ſeveral periods, becauſe they completely eſtabliſh this great truth, that the revolutionary progreſs was not the effect of any uniform plan, nor of the union of any one body or claſs of perſons, but the inevitable effect of various efforts—of bodies variouſly compoſed—fluctuating in number and influence—oppoſed by other bodies, often compoſed of individuals who had on other occaſions ranged on that ſide to which they were now oppoſed. Thus the Jacobin club in the progreſs of the revolution had on its liſt of members almoſt every name that has been diſtinguiſhed by talents or patriotiſm. For ſome time prior to the feaſt of the confederation in 1792 its popularity had conſiderably declined. Boiſſerous declamation and artful violence had ſupplanted perſuaſive and enlightening eloquence, the paſſions were addreſſed at the expence of reaſon; ambitious and ſupple demagogues had taken the place of philoſophers and patriots. Robeſpierre who had no other field for his reſtleſs ſpirit to range in, by his excluſion from the ſecond legiſlature, had bent all his energies to the acquiſition of power by the inſtrumentality of that popular ſociety; the critical nature of the times perhaps may have given life to the black paſſions of this extraordinary character, and others who are almoſt forgotten in the ſupremacy of his crimes. His vigilance and activity, his ardor and audacity, had procured him the preeminency and guidance of this club, and at the ſame time a vaſt influence in the ſections of Paris; but whether it was from hatred of this violence, from ſuſpicion of the perſons who produced it, or from jealouſy of their power, or perhaps all together, a ſchiſm took place, by which the Jacobins loſt the great talents and reputation of thoſe members who were deſignated by the title of the Gironde party.

From the moment of the ſeparation of the Gironde from the Jacobins, the ſeeds of an unextinguiſhable jealouſy were ſown; and the emulation of party and the race for power was purſued with redoubled ardour. The call of the federates to Paris was a meaſure of the Gironde, and it put them in poſſeſſion of that power which decided the iſſues of the tenth of Auguſt. Their ſucceſs on this occaſion was aided by the co-operation of Danton and Manuel, with whom they had no intercourſe but as legiſlators; but the Jacobins, jealous of their ſucceſs had employed their utmoſt induſtry to fraternize with the federates. The name and the hall of the Jacobins were favourable to their wiſhes; the Girondiſts now held no public club; and the invaſion of the frontiers and the embodying the people en-maſſe accompliſhed the union that was deſired, and which was completely eſtabliſhed by the fatal ſecond of September.

Thoſe attrocities were in themſelves ſufficiently horrible to demand the ſevereſt ſcrutiny after the authors, and the Gironde party had been peculiarly eager to proſecute the enquiry and to denounce the perpetrators. This zeal of theirs was attributed to their reſentments againſt the Jacobins, whoſe leaders were generally believed to have contributed if not abetted the maſſacre. The hatreds of the two parties were thereby encreaſed, and produced charges of ſecret correſpondence and deſigns to reſtore the king againſt the Gironde, who retorted with accuſations of tyrannical deſigns againſt their opponents.

Thus two parties were formed inveterate in their hatred of each other, but agreeing in a common reſolution againſt the reſtoration of royalty, and for the eſtabliſhment of a republic: they concurred without preconcert in taking the power from the hands of the king, but they ſtruggled to ſecure it reſpectively in their own. But it is neceſſary to mark ſome further diſtinctions of party, which particularly in the convention have been confounded with theſe. Another party has been frequently conſidered as the ſame with the Jacobins; the mountain, ſo called from its occupying the elevated ſeats to the right hand of the preſident, at firſt by accident but afterwards from choice. This party was firſt led by Danton, whoſe powerful voice and energy of mind, gained him ſo much regard in the aſſembly. In the convention this party was compoſed of Rebeſpierre, who always attached himſelf to the moſt bold and popular characters, Camille Deſmoulins, Thuriot, Bazire, Billaud, Chabot, Fallien, Marat, and others not exceeding ſeventy members of the convention. But though theſe generally acted together, they were not all members of the Jacobins; Danton though he occaſionally viſited that club, was himſelf the leader of the Cordeliers, its rival in revolutionary energy, and ſubſequently in violence, when Marat who was alſo a member had obtained the command of a furious populace.

The left ſide of the convention has been alſo called the Gironde, although ſeveral of the moſt diſtinguiſhed members on that ſide, as Briſſot, Condorcet, Kerſaint, Louvet, Buzot, Rabaut, Laſource, Barbaroux, Carra, and others were repreſentatives of other departments; the repreſentatives of that department were Gaudet, Genſonne, Vergniaud, Ducos, Fonfrede, Duplantier, and Lacaze, and indeed all men of talent; their union appears to have been the mere effect of ſentiment, and few of that ſide ſeem to have acted on any occaſion by preconcert, for on the important tranſaction of the trial of the king, we ſhall find them very much differing from each other, and even oppoſed on very important points. The utmoſt number of thoſe who were in any caſe conſidered as of the Gironde party, did not exceed one hundred and fifty, and even among theſe were actual members of the Jacobins, as Louvet and Buzot: but it was the art of Robeſpierre when any member voted on a different ſide from himſelf and the mountain, to ſtigmatize him as a member of the Gironde, who he alleged were in league with Orleans.

It is eaſy to conceive what influence this ſtate of things muſt produce on the fate of the king. The Gironde were proud of their appellation of true republicans, and they profeſſed the moderation that belongs to that character; but ſuch was the ſtate of their circumſtances that there appeared no means to preſerve their honor but the moſt inflexible ſpirit of juſtice in the convention; for many people yet affected to diſbelieve or really doubted the ſiniſter deſigns of the court, and if he ſhould by intrigue or the treachery of their opponents be acquitted, they who had defeated the deſigns of the tenth of Auguſt, and prevented the flight, would be in the eyes of the people deemed guilty of the worſt of treaſons.

The oppoſite party ſaw the ſituation of their opponents, but equally bent on obtaining power, they dreaded the acquittal of the king more than the Gironde; whom they deſpaired not of diſcomfitting by the intrepidity and reſources which they poſſeſſed in a ſuperior degree.

It is deſerving of remark, that the ſame imputation has been attached to the Cordeliers, from the circumſtance of Laclos being a member of that club, and the unceaſing friend of Orleans. Marat and Robeſpierre have been likewiſe charged with acting under the ſame influence; but however deſerving of reproach the moral character of Philip duke of Orleans, and his vices do not appear to have been in any degree greater than thoſe of his relations, there has not yet appeared any evidence to authoriſe the remoteſt belief, that he entertained a deſign on the throne: his early vices indeed furniſh a lively warning to public men of that diſtruſt which they never fail to attach upon the character; it is more than probable that had his life been diſtinguiſhed by acts of virtue, he might ſtill have lived a proſperous citizen. But his ſituation from every circumſtance was beſet with difficulty and danger; hated by the court for his love of liberty, which he had manifeſted long before the revolution; hated by enthuſiaſts for his relation to the Bourbons; ſuſpected by the virtuous on account of his early debaucheries; ſuſpected by numbers who were aſtoniſhed at the ſacrifices he made; thus he became ſuſpected by every party, becauſe in fact he voted uniformly independent of any, and was conſequently at times oppoſed to different ſides; upon an examination of his conduct and his ſpeeches through his whole political life, their uniformity and conſiſtency are remarkable, and thoſe who have been moſt active in fixing opprobrium on his character at laſt are reduced to one point, his conduct upon the trial of the king; which after all will be examined by poſterity, and produce the enquiry, wherein did his conduct differ from that of the Gracchii? But the reſentments and jealouſies of party, and the thirſt of power, common to both of the factions, now about to conſume in their contentions every former ſource of power and every future fear of rivalry, unhappily embraced characters in whoſe fall the brighteſt powers of genius were united with the moſt exemplary virtues; and preſents to freemen the great and never to be forgotten truth, that deſpotiſm which is ſo baleful to the exiſtence of morals, in its overthrow produces alſo the deſtruction of the advocates of virtue itſelf; for among the cauſes of the fatal contentions that diſtracted France, the machinations of the external enemy and the agents of fallen royalty muſt be conſidered as the authors of many jealouſies. Every revolution has exhibited the treachery of ſtruggling deſpotiſm; the aſſaſſinations committed in the revolt of the Batavians from the yoke of Spain, and of the Helvetians by their German tyrants, are ſcarcely ever intruded on the obſervation of riſing generations, becauſe literature in its moſt flouriſhing abodes has hitherto been obliged for its exiſtence to an obſequious deference for the ſenſitive feelings of men inveſted with power, and humanity has too readily concurred in eraſing from her inſtructive pages thoſe tranſactions which reflect diſhonor on the human character. Even the American revolution ſo recently accompliſhed has exhibited the ſame ſanguinary ſpirit, the ſame ſecret and deadly treachery, oppoſed to its virtuous ſtruggles againſt tyranny; the proſcriptions, maſſacres and burnings, the remorſeleſs butcheries of Wyoming and Egg-harbour already appear as the fables of a remote and barbarous age; they excite no ſympathies they provoke no caution, they afford no moral! Nor was this revolution, ſo cloſely interknit from its example and effect, with that of France, free from that contention — that cooperation againſt deſpotiſm, and that ſtruggle to poſſeſs its power, which has characteriſed all others, and which appears to be a component part of human nature. Even before her independence was yet eſtabliſhed, this ſpirit of two factions prevailed, the one ſupporting maxims of government allied to deſpotiſm, diſſimilar in external appearance but always producing it; the other zealous for the ſimpleſt and moſt diffuſive principles. It was in the moment when the ſeal was yet warm on the bond of her independence, that this extraordinary avidity, this luſt of rule and authority was moſt conſpicuous—Ah! has it yet ceaſed to operate? Happy had it been for France, had Briſſot and his great compatriots practiſed that moderation which philoſophy taught them, and which was ſo concordant with the purity of their lives; had they like Franklin been content with the glory of overwhelming the tyrant—with the immortality they had obtained, and retiring from agitations of ambition, truſted like him to the progreſſive improvement of the human mind for the promotion and ſecurity of liberty and happineſs.

NATIONAL CONVENTION.

THE meeting of the national convention, which was to produce ſo many important events, to be the ſcene of actions the moſt extraordinary that hiſtory has hitherto had to record, at its firſt ſitting amounted to no more than two hundred members; it had proceeded at firſt to the verification of their powers, and having declared itſelf conſtituted prepared to receive the laſt act of the aſſembly. Exactly at noon on the twenty-firſt of September thoſe who had exerciſed the legiſlative power entered the hall as ſimple citizens, and were received with general acclamations. The preſident was addreſſed by Francois of Neufchateau.

"Repreſentatives of the nation, the Legiſlative aſſembly has ceaſed from its functions: The late members of it haſten to be the firſt in giving to the nation an example of ſubmiſſion to the laws which you may decree. They congratulate themſelves upon depoſiting in your hands the reins of government. They have reſolved, that their firſt act as ſimple citizens, ſhall be that of ſerving as a guard to the national convention, and of offering them the homage of their reſpect, in order to give to all the French an example of bowing before the majeſty of the people, whom you repreſent.

"We congratulate ourſelves, that, upon our voice, all the primary aſſemblies adhered to the invitation we gave them. By electing you, that have conſecrated the extraordinary meaſures, which the ſafety of twenty-four millions may require, againſt the perfidy of one man. The motives of diviſion ought to ceaſe. The entire nation is repreſented, and you are about to eſtabliſh a conſtitution upon the baſis of liberty and equality. The end of your efforts will be to give to the French liberty, laws, and peace; liberty, without which the French can no longer live; laws, the firmeſt foundation of liberty; peace, the only end of war.

"Liberty, laws, and peace; theſe three words were written by the Greeks upon the gate of the temple of Delphos; you will impreſs them upon the entire ſoil of France. You will maintain eſpecially between all the parts of the nation the unity of the government, of which you are the centre and the preſervative bond, and thus will you accumulate the benediction of your fellow-citizens."

The firſt preſident choſen was Petion, and Condorcet, vice-preſident; Briſſot, Laſource, Camus, Vergniaud, Rabaud, ſecretaries.

This body, upon whom ſo many weighty concerns devolved, was compoſed of a number of characters already diſtinguiſhed in the two preceding aſſemblies; among whom were Petion, a diſtinguiſhed advocate of the city of Chartres, and Robeſpierre the elder both of the conſtituent aſſembly; Danton, Merlin, and Chabot of the legiſlative. Thomas Paine, whoſe illuſtrious writings ſo much promoted the cauſe of freedom in the American revolution, and in his developement of the deformity of the Engliſh government, had been elected by four departments, L'Aiſne, L'Oiſe, Puy de Domme, and Pays de Calais, he choſe the latter. Dr. Prieſtly, whoſe writings and ſufferings had likewiſe obtai ned him an election for the departments of Rhone and Loire and L'Oiſe, declined the honor.

In order to preſerve government and peace, the convention proceeded to declare, "that thoſe laws which were not abrogated, and thoſe powers which have not been ſuſpended, ſhould be proviſionally preſerved and ſupported; and that the taxes ſhould be collected as formerly."

A committee was appointed to reviſe and new model the conſtitution, conſiſting of Sieyes, Thomas Paine, Briſſot, Petion, Vergniaud, Genſonne, Barrere, Danton, and Condorcet; and committees were progreſſively appointed for the ſeveral concerns of Agriculture, Finances, Colonies, Commerce, Decrees, Diplomacy, Departments, Domains, Accounts, Police, Liquidation, Military, Petitions and Correſpondence, Public Inſtruction, Supplies, and Public Security.

On the following day a ſeries of decrees were paſſed, confirming this reſolution. All public acts ſhall be dated "The firſt year of the French republic." The ſtate ſeal was to bear the inſcription of the French republic.—All citizens were declared eligible to all vacant places; and even the judges might be elected from among the ordinary citizens. The diſtinction eſtabliſhed by the conſtituent aſſembly between active and paſſive citizens, was aboliſhed,

This buſineſs was ſcarcely terminated, when Collot d'Herbois, appeared upon the tribune, and reminded the aſſembly, "that there was one declaration which could not for a moment be deferred—viz. the eternal abolition of royalty in France." It was in vain that Bazire and other members intreated the convention to proceed with more dignity and deliberation in ſo important a queſtion; it was in vain they urged the neceſſity of giving at leaſt the ſanction of a diſcuſſion.—The abolition of royalty was voted by acclamation, and the houſe adjourned.

In the courſe of the ſucceeding ſittings, the convention reſolved, "that the French republic no longer acknowledges princes; that therefore the rentes appanageres ſhould be alſo ſuppreſſed." The word "republic" was alſo ordered to be ſubſtituted in the oaths and other public acts, in the place of the word "nation."

The convention was ſcarcely aſſembled, when its peace was diſturbed by the appearance of factions, the moſt diſaſtrous to the country. On the twenty-ſixth of September, Laſource denounced Robeſpierre and Marat as aſpiring to the dictatorſhip, and they were at the ſame time charged by Roland, and upon apparently not the worſt grounds, with being indirectly at leaſt concerned in the maſſacres on the ſecond and third of September, and a wiſh to renew thoſe horrid ſcenes. It ſhould be mentioned, to the honour of the convention, that a committee was appointed to enquire into the facts relative to the maſſacres; but unfortunately the predominant influence of the Pariſian mob deterred them from proſecuting the enquiry as ſtrict juſtice demanded.

The miniſter of juſtice, Danton, gave in his reſignation on being elected a member of the convention. Roland requeſted permiſſion to do the ſame, but retained his office for ſome time longer, at the requeſt of the convention. The ſtatement of the finances by the miniſter Claviere, was clear and able. He recommended economy in the various departments, and with an honourable attention to the morals of the people reprobated lotteries.

The war miniſter, Servan, ſoon after reſigned, and was ſucceeded by Pache. The executive arrangements then ſtood as follows:—

Dominique Joſeph Garat, the younger, miniſter of juſtice, and keeper of the ſeal of the republic; Gohier ſecretary-general of this department—The other principals of the offices were, Salais of the correſpondence, De l'Aigle of the law, Rondonneau, of the archives, and Dalmaſay ſecretary to the miniſter.

Jean Maire Roland, miniſter of the interior; or ſecretary for the home department—This office was divided into ſix diviſions, the principals of which were the following perſons, viz. Champagneux, Faypoult, Coqueau, Le Camus, Guillaume, and Duterage.

Pierre-Maire-Henri Le Brun, miniſter of foreign affairs; Rouhiere ſecretary-general of this department, and Durey treaſurer—This office was alſo divided into ſix departments, the principals of which were the following perſons, viz. Muret, Boisjollin, Baudry, Colchen, Mendouze, and Geoffroy.

Etienne Claviere, miniſter of the revenues; Jacquemont, ſecretary to the miniſter—This office was divided into many departments, but the premiers commis, were, Fieux, Antoine, Cyalis de Lavaux, Bergon, Boizot, De La Roche, Deſrotours, Le Grand, Hennet, Moreau, Le Peintre, Armenaut, Leroi, and Goulard.

Gaſpard Monge, miniſter of the marine—The principal ſecretaries in this office were, Perigni, Adet, Genge, Daudibercaille, and Micoud d'Umon.

Jean-Nicolas Pache, miniſter of war; Davielle was firſt ſecretary of this department—The others were, Haſſenfrats, Dhillerin, Penote, and Chalon.

Santerre, commandant-general of Paris.

Several of the firſt ſteps of the convention were marked by raſhneſs. Lafayette, it might be fairly ſaid, had forfeited their confidence by adopting and avowing principles diametrically oppoſite to thoſe on which they thought proper to found the new edifice of government. But againſt Luckner there was no ſpecific charge. Yet Luckner was denounced as an enemy to the country; and finally, he was diſmiſſed the ſervice; his crime appears to have been duplicity and a ſilly egotiſm perhaps the effect of age, but which rendered him unfit for the military ſervice, at this period. General Dillon had agreed to an armiſtice which the prince of Heſſe, at a criſis that he might have made priſoners of the Heſſians; for which he was denounced and accuſed, though he afterwards had ſufficient addreſs to procure a reverſal of the decree. General Monteſquieu was one day diſmiſſed from his command, but the next he was reinſtated in it.

On the twenty-ſecond of September, the penſions granted by the conſtituent aſſembly to the ejected clergy were ordered to ceaſe, with an exception in favour of thoſe above fifty years of age, whoſe penſions however were not to exceed one thouſand livres per annum. On this occaſion, Manuel roſe to propoſe, that, as royalty was aboliſhed, the order of prieſts, and all religious eſtabliſhments, ſhould be aboliſhed along with it; the propoſal was rejected,

The unmeaning titles of Monſieur and Madame were relinquiſhed, and that of "citizen" ſubſtituted in their ſtead. The croſſes of St. Louis, which had been given to the knights of that order, were ordered to be ſurrendered to the ſtate, not as patriotic donations, but as a reſtitution. The ſudden diſſolution of the judicial boards was a more ſerious meaſure, and appeared ſo dangerous and raſh to all perſons in the leaſt accuſtomed to order and government, that Thomas Paine, who by the enemies of civil liberty, has been termed an anarchiſt in principle, deprecated the haſty adaption of the decree, and entreated that the tribunals might be gradually changed, inſtead of releaſing the nation at once, though for a ſhort period, from the ſalutary reſtraints of law.

The decree which renounced conqueſt, and which limited the operations of war to the ſimple principle of ſelf-defence, was worthy of an enlightened age and an enlightened people, and will be ever recorded to the honor of that body which enacted ſo juſt and politic a law. The conqueſt of Savoy occaſioned a lengthy diſcuſſion of this ſubject, in which it was urged, that having entered that country at the ſolicitation of the people, and to avenge the perfidy of their ſovereign, great delicacy was required in the conduct which ſhould be purſued. The enemies of the revolution would not fail to aſperſe the convention as violating that decree; on the other hand, the nation having acceded to the wiſh of the Savoyards, their liberties ought to be inſured, from every apprehenſion of again reverting under tyranny. To this it was anſwered, that the decree was not violated by the extenſion of freedom to the Savoyards, that out of ſix hundred and fifty-five communes, five hundred and eighty had expreſsly charged their deputies to demand an actual union, ſeventy had given unlimited powers, and one only had oppoſed the meaſure by demanding the eſtabliſhment of a ſeparate republic; that theſe facts were the beſt reply to aſperſions, and the honor of France the ſafe guarantee of that freedom which ſhe ſhould extend into the dominions of her enemies; that the treachery of the combined powers would be ſupported by ſuch a conſtruction of the decree, and by its impolicy France be deprived of the means of a juſt retaliation. In every other reſpect her decree has been preſerved inviolate. It was decreed to be incorporated into an eighty-fourth department.

On the ninth of October it was decreed, that all emigrants taken in arms ſhould be put to death in twenty-four hours after they had been declared guilty by a military committee; and that all foreigners, who, ſince the fourteenth of July, 1789, had quitted the ſervice of France, and entered into that of the enemy, ſhould be conſidered as armed emigrants. The ſeverity of this decree, was however exceeded by that of the twelfth of November, which extended the penalties of death to what they termed reputed emigrants, or thoſe not immediately engaged in hoſtilities.

By a further decree of the twenty-ſeventh, thoſe unfortunate emigrants, who had returned, in the hope of finding pardon and relief in the boſom of their country, were ordered to depart in twenty-four hours, and the penalty of death was awarded againſt ſuch as ſhould fail inſtantly to obey.

Another decree it is neceſſary to notice, as it has excited more attention than almoſt any other proceeding of the national convention, and has been made the pretext of hoſtility by the baſe hypocriſy of the enemies of freedom even after they had already commenced the war. We allude to the decree of fraternity of the nineteenth of November. The circumſtance, in which this reſolution originated, was an inſurrection in the bailliwick of Darmſtadt, in the territories of the duke of Deux Ponts, at that period at war with the French nation. The people, headed by the magiſtrates and principal inhabitants of the diſtrict, had declared their wiſhes to be united to France, and ſolicited her protection againſt their former maſter. To have acceded to the requeſt, would have been acting agreeably to the law and practice of nations; but with their uſual enthuſiaſm, and without deliberation, the convention with the applauſe of the galleries, paſſed by acclamation a decree in the following terms:

"The national convention declare, in the name of the French nation, that they will grant fraternity and aſſiſtance to all thoſe people who wiſh to procure liberty; and they charge the executive power to ſend orders to the generals to give aſſiſtance to ſuch people as have ſuffered, or are now ſuffering under the hand of tyranny, for the attainment of liberty."

A haſty error is not eaſily explained, that almoſt every government (and deſpotic governments more particularly) do actually take advantage of the diſquietudes and inſurrections of the people in other ſtates, in plain terms do fraterniſe them, is a truth that cannot be denied; but it is only the circumſtances of the caſe that can determine a free ſtate in the adoption of ſuch a meaſure. A general law upon the ſubject was, therefore liable to be, as it in fact has been, miſconſtrued. It was conſidered as no leſs than a direliction of their own principles, while the French people was ſuffering from the unjuſt principle of foreign nations preſuming to regulate its domeſtic concerns, to countenance the interference by its own example!

About this period alſo the principality and biſhopric of Porentrui, comprehending the memorable paſs of that name which commands the communication between Germany and Swiſſerland, and the paſſage of the Rhine, ſent a deputation to Paris, and was at the requeſt of the people incorporated with France.

France became at this ſeaſon more tranquil than could be expected. Happily the greateſt attrocities were confined to the vicinity of the metropolis; but in ſome inſtances the ſoldiery conducted themſelves in a diſorderly and ferocious manner. On the ninth of October the firſt diviſion of the national Gendarmerie arrived at Cambray; and they ſcarcely arrived before they proceeded to the priſons, and ſet at liberty all who were confined, except Canone d'Hercique, who was charged with a robbery; the ſecond diviſion however, who arrived on the tenth, beheaded him. The officers of the ſecond battalion of volunteers, who were in the garriſon of the citadel, cauſed the gates to be ſhut, to prevent a communication with the ſoldiers and the Gendarmerie; but the ſecond lieutenant, Beſambre, who was one of the moſt active in endeavouring to confine them to their duty, fell a victim to their fury. He was accuſed by his own ſoldiers to the Gendarmerie, who dragged him along the eſplanade, and after ſtabbing him in ſeveral places, cut off his head, as well as that of a captain Le Gros, of the ſixth ſquadron of cavalry.

We return with ſome ſatisfaction, to the brilliant triumphs of Dumourier, and the humiliation of thoſe deſpotic powers who were certainly in no ſmall degree authors of the calamities of France.—On the twelfth of October, general Dumourier repaired to Paris to concert meaſures for the winter campaign, and after a ſtay of only four days, he returned to the army to make the neceſſary arrangements, and to prepare for entering the Auſtrian Netherlands. From the period when the ſiege of Liſle was raiſed, the Auſtrians had continued to retire before the victorious French. Within their own territories, however, they determined to make a ſerious ſtand, and there they began to collect their ſcattered forces. The firſt reſiſtance which Dumourier experienced, was at the village of Boſſu, which is ſituated about a league from the ſince celebrated poſt of Gemappe. At this place the general repreſents the enemy to have taken an excellent poſition; but they were unable to withſtand the excellence of the French artillery and the ardour of the dragoons. The Auſtrians were in number from eight to ten thouſand; and they had one hundred and fifty killed, a great number wounded, and two hundred taken priſoners: the French loſt only twenty. This action took place on the fourth of November, and the Auſtrians were ſo little in expectation of an attack, at that time, that the officers had juſt prepared a very ſplendid banquet, which the French arrived juſt in time to take poſſeſſion of.

From Boſſu Dumourier proceeded, early the next morning, towards Mons, and ſoon came in ſight of the enemy, ſtrongly poſted on the heights of Gemappe, about a mile and a half from that town. The Auſtrian poſition was well choſen and highly capable of reſiſtance, their right was covered by the village of that name, and by the river which overflowed the plain; and their left by thick woods. Three rows of redoubts roſe one above another like the ſeats of an amphitheatre, upon which were mounted nearly one hundred pieces of cannon. Had the general therefore truſted to the artillery in this engagement, as he had done at La Lune, the advantage of the ground was ſo infinitely in favour of the enemy, that he muſt probably have been defeated. Here the enthuſiaſm of the French character proved an excellent auxiliary to the ſkill of the general. The army, which was principally compoſed of young men, had been long ambitious of a cloſe engagement, and the generals of the diviſions repeatedly preſſed him to lead them on to the attack. The general ſecretly favoured the deſign, but he reſtrained their ardour only in the hope of increaſing it.

The French paſſed the night within ſight of their adverſaries. At ſeven in the morning of the ſixth, a very heavy cannonade commenced on both ſides, and continued till ten without much effect on the part of the French. As he went along the bottom of the line, the troops teſtified the utmoſt impatience to charge the enemy with their bayonets. The general however contented himſelf with ordering colonel Thouvenot, adjutant-general, to attack the village of Carignon (which was neceſſary to enable him to aſſail Gemappe on that ſide), and at the ſame time approaching the batteries, to produce greater effect, while Bournonville attacked that place in front and carried it.

The number of French who formed for the cloſe attack amounted to about thirty thouſand, and the Auſtrians are computed at the loweſt to have been upward of twenty-four thouſand, three thouſand of which were cavalry. The right wing of the French, conſiſting of the van guard, was commanded by generals Bournonville and Dampierre; and the centre by generals Egalité, Stetenboffe, Deſporets, and Drouet. The infantry formed almoſt inſtantaneouſly, and the general preſenting himſelf in the front of the line, the muſic, by a ſignal previouſly appointed, began to play the celebrated Marſeillois ſong, the day was remarkably ſerene, and the muſic was diſtinctly heard—it was awful—On ending the animating chorus, the ſoldiers ruſhed impetuouſly on with ſhouts of "Vive "la nation!" The firſt line of redoubts was inſtantly carried. The cavalry of the enemy however advancing at this criſis, with a view of flanking the French, had cauſed ſome confuſion, but the general diſpatched young Egalité to repel this attack, and ſupported him moſt opportunely by a detachment of chaſſeurs and huſſars—At the ſame moment ſome diſorder appearing in Bournonville's cavalry, general Dumouriez rallied them himſelf, and in the mean time the left wing, which conſiſted chiefly of the Belgian volunteers, had obtained poſſeſſion of Gemappe, and the centre carried the ſecond line of redoubts.

After a ſhort reſiſtance on the heights, the enemy were panic ſtruck at the impetuoſity of the French; at about two o'clock they retreated with the utmoſt precipitation and diſorder to Mons. The French in this engagement experienced the moſt obſtinate reſiſtance from the Hungarians, through whoſe ranks they could only force their way by cutting down their opponents. The loſs of both parties in this action have been differently eſtimated—It muſt have been great, for there has ſeldom been a field more obſtinately conteſted; that of the Auſtrians muſt have exceeded the loſs of the French, ſince an enemy who flies in the early part of the day always ſuffers conſiderably; but Dumourier probably overrated their loſs in killed and wounded when he ſtated it at four thouſand, as he eſtimates his own at only nine hundred.

The buſineſs of this day ſerved to inſpire the Auſtrians with the ſame reſpectable opinion of French valour, which was entertained previouſly and acknowledged by the duke of Brunſwick. Some ſignal acts of bravery were performed; the young general Egalité acquired much reputation; and ſuch was the enthuſiaſm of all ranks, that Baptiſte, Dumourier's valet-de-chambre, rallied and brought up to the charge a regiment of dragoons and two battalions of national-guards, who had been repulſed; and a lieutenant of the name of Bretiche had killed ſeven Hungarians, and received forty-one ſabre wounds; he was afterwards preſented to the convention and honoured with a civic crown.

The victory of Gemappe was deciſive as to the fate of the Netherlands. The general inſtantly ſummoned the city of Mons, which on the ſucceeding morning ſurrendered, and was taken poſſeſſion of by general Bournonville. From Mons Dumourier proceeded to Bruſſels, which he entered on the fourteenth of November. On the heights of Anderlecht, adjoining to the city, the rear of the enemy, amounting to about ten thouſand men, commanded by the prince de Wirtemberg, affected to make a ſtand, but it was probably only intended to favour the retreat of the governors and civil authorities from Bruſſels. After a conteſt of ſix hours, the Auſtrians followed their main army, and the general entered Bruſſels in triumph. The moderation and wiſdom of Dumourier was equal in every reſpect to his military excellence. He informed the citizens, that it was his intention carefully to abſtain from interfering in the internal government of the country. A proviſional legiſlative aſſembly was choſen, among whom were the duc d'Urſel, baron Walkiers, and other diſtinguiſhed patriots.

It is a ſingular fact that general Dumourier had promiſed the French miniſtry that he would keep his Chriſtmas at Bruſſels. This aſſertion, which was really founded on an actual knowledge of the ſtate of the enemy, but was at the moment regarded as the extravagant boaſt of a vain-glorious man, was more than realized, for he anticipated the performance of his engagement by five weeks.

While theſe affairs were tranſacting, Tournay, Malines, Ghent, and Antwerp, opened their gates to general Labourdonnaye. Louvain and Namur, after a faint reſiſtance by the Auſtrian general, Beaulieu, were taken by general Valence; Oſtend was entered by the French fleet on the fifteenth of November; the citadels of Antwerp and Namur reſiſted for a ſhort time, but the former capitulated on the twenty-eighth of November to general Miranda, and the latter on the ſecond of December to general Valence: in a word, the whole of the Auſtrian Netherlands, Luxemburg only excepted, were ſubjected to the victorious arms of France before the concluſion of the year.

On the eighteenth of November, general Dumourier received a flag of truce from the prince de Saxe-Teſchen, conveying a propoſal on the part of general Clairfait for a ſuſpenſion of arms during the remainder of the winter ſeaſon. To have acceeded to this propoſal, and to have diſbanded a part of the army, and put up the reſt into winter quarters, would have been wiſe conduct in the French, and was that which there is reaſon to think the inclinations of the general would have led him to purſue. He however returned a verbal anſwer, "that he would only ſend general Clairfait's letter to the executive council of the republic, and in the mean time ſhould continue the operations of the campaign."

As it is probable that the determination of the executive council was in favour of a winter campaign, the active genius of Dumourier loſt no time in following up his ſucceſſes, and purſued the flying enemy into the territory of Liege. On the twenty-firſt of November he proceeded with an advanced guard of five thouſand men to Tirlemont, where the whole of the enemy's army was encamped behind the city, with an advanced guard of three or four thouſand men, on the heights of Cumptich. He attacked with his irreſiſtible artillery this advanced guard, which was reinforced by five thouſand men, but undertook nothing. At break of day on the twenty-ſecond, the whole of the Auſtrians decamped from Tirlemont, after having loſt in this action not leſs than four hundred of their braveſt troops. General Dumourier halted only one day at Tirlemont, and on the twenty ſeventh overtook again, almoſt at the gates of Liege, the rear guard of the Imperialiſts, amounting to twelve thouſand men, and commanded by general Staray. The French drove them ſucceſsfully from ſix villages, and at laſt from an entrenchment. The conflict laſted four hours, in which the Auſtrians loſt their general Staray, an immenſe train of artillery, and five or ſix hundred men killed and wounded, beſides innumerable priſoners and deſerters. On the following day the French general entered Liege.

Such was the triumphant career of this extraordinary man—but his glory had gained its zenith; and he fell ſoon after a prey to the depravity of his habits and of a faction whoſe views were like his own confined to perſonal ambition. Under the influence of this party, the war miniſter Pache is ſuppoſed to have acted; and every criminal means, appear to have been practiſed to diſtreſs and harraſs the gallant ſoldiers of liberty. While immenſe ſums were voted by the convention, the army was deſtitute of every neceſſary of life. Unprovided of mattreſſes or coverlets, or even ſtraw to repoſe on, theſe brave men, who gained thoſe immortal battles, in a rainy and inclement winter, were compelled to ſleep on the wet ground; and ſome of them to avoid the evils which muſt be conſequent from ſuch a ſituation, actually laſhed themſelves to the trunks of trees, and ſlept in a ſtanding poſition. The ſoldiers were almoſt literally naked, without coats, without ſhoes; and their arms were deſtroyed from want of cloaks to cover them from the wet. The conſequence was, that numbers of the men periſhed, and ſtill greater numbers deserted and returned home. The general's own words are strong—"To retard and crush my successes," says he, "the minister Pache, supported by the criminal faction to whom all our evils are to be ascribed, suffered the victorious army to want every thing, and succeeded in disbanding it by famine and nakedness. The consequence was, that more than fifteen thousand men were in the hospitals, more than twenty-five thousand men deserted through misery and disgust, and upwards of ten thousand horses died of hunger."

If this statement be just, it will be easy to account for the subsequent misfortunes and overthrow of the French army in Flanders. That party, however, had not failed to recriminate on the general, and have asserted that he was bribed to betray the cause of the republic—That he entered into secret and crimnal treaties with the king of Prussia, in an early stage of the contest, and solely with a view to his own advantage. He made a wanton sacrifice, it is said, of his own soldiers at Gemappe, by his injudicious disposition of the army on the attack, that the skill of the generals under him and the valour of the troops which he endeavoured to repress, gained that victory against his expectation, and that he afterwards took every means to enaich himself, and injure the public cause. Of these mutual accusations it is impossible to form a correct judgment; the testimony of the eye witnesses, shew that the army was most shamefully neglected during the winter campaign; and was certainly, as Dumourier asserts, in want of every necessary.

Dumourier describes the calamities that attended the army at this season with great force and so far we may place credit on his statements; there is much reason also to believe that Pache was instrumental to this distress, through the guidance of the Jacobin society who had conceived, from the constant practice of Dumourier as a courtier, suspicions of his principles; this jealousy encreased with the hatreds of the two parties in the convention, from the circumstance of Dumourier's intimacy with many of the members of the Gironde. Dumourier, however, appears not to have possessed the confidence of the latter; but in his visit to Paris he had associated with its members exclusively, perhaps owing to that attachment which is excited by similar acquirements, they being uniformly men of high literary endowments.

Liege is described as "the tomb of Frenchmen," the fatigues the army had undergone, the wants of every kind, had produced the most fatal distress, and the troops died not only of disease but hunger; and this all conquering affliction produced an insubordination and marauding that no other circumstances could palliate.

The cantonments of the army extended from that city to Aix-la-Chapelle, and the pressure of necessity had driven those who could leave the camps into the principal cities and towns, so that the soldiers were nearly deprived of commanders, and the villages of the line became scenes of ravage. This accumulation of evils prevented the general from pushing on to Cologne as he proposed, with a view to compel Clairfait to pass the Rhine. However he determined to secure the Meuse, and for this purpose Valence with fifteen thousand men composing the army of the Ardennes, was ordered to join him, and posted on his right at Stavelo, Malmedy, Spa, Verviers and Huy. D'Harville with eighteen thousand, occupied the Meuse from Givet to Namur; and Miranda occupied the left from Tongres to Ruremond with eighteen thousand. The reinforcements which arrived were placed in the garrisons of the Netherlands; and the whole line along the Meuse amounted to upwards of sixty five thousand men.

Dumourier was desirous of seizing Mæstricht, as with his force and the possession of that fortress he could command the whole country between the Rhine and Meuse. He had likewise been desirous of throwing a garrison into Juliers, but the executive would not permit it, lest the enemy should in consequence take possession of Manheim, also belonging to the elector palatine, which might be fatal to Custine in Alsace. To preserve the Meuse he deemed it indispensable to possess Gueldres, Venloo, Mæstricht, or Juliers, but the executive would not permit any infraction of the neutrality of those places.

Whether it was through the disgust of offended pride, through hatred against those who now opposed him and appeared to sway the fate of France, or through designs previously formed, Dumourier now first visibly displayed that temper of disaffection which plunged him from the lofty rank of glory to which had attained. Beside the obstruction of his plans of war, his reputation was tainted with imputations of peculation; the contracts which he had formed for the supply of the army, were publicly asserted to have been marked by enormous frauds, and it was even mentioned that he should be called to Paris and tried for the mal-appropriation of the public money.

The trial of the king was now approaching; the short experience which he had of the convention only displayed to him the impossibility of attaining to that consequence which his military actions taught him to expect, and his ambition to pant after; his sentiments no longer conveyed the ardor of the republican, nor the simplicity of manners that he had for some time affected; he had taken possession of the palace of the prince bishop of Liege, and frequently exulted in the reflection that his levées surpassed in number and brilliancy those of De Castries in the plenitude of the regal power; and he took every opportunity to sound the dispositions of the officers and the army towards the king. But disappointment and disgust succeeded all these efforts, his staff were so entirely adverse to any consideration of the subject, that he saw no alternative but to hasten to the capital, and attempt something there. He accordingly applied for leave to go to Paris, upon the ostensible purpose of concerting a solid plan for the campaign, and to enter into an explanation of the contracts which he had made, and obtain the repeal of the decree which rendered them null—The leave of absence was for some time refused, but was at length sent, and he arrived on the first of January.

While such were the operations of the armies and enemies of the republic, the time of the convention was employed in debates respecting the trial of Lewis XVI. An extraordinary commission was appointed of twenty-four members, who were authorised to examine and arrange the body of evidence against him. Louis was separated from his family, and the whole of the unhappy prisoners in the Temple were guarded with redoubled vigilance. On the sixth of November, Valazé, one of the commission of twenty-four, made a report of accusation against the king.

The question, which embarrassed most his accusers was, Whether the king was not invested by the constitution with perfect and legal inviolability; and whether, consistently with justice, he whom the law had solemnly pronounced to be above the reach of any legal process could be brought to trial.

It was argued that the king was inviolable so far as the execution and exercise of the legal authority extended; that even the ordinary errors of the king through a mistaken zeal for the public safety, or the exercise of private opinion, could not legally subject him to any concern or punishment. But it was not upon any of these grounds that his was liable to the juſtice of the nation, but for having violated that conſtitution, which, preſerved pure and unbroken by him, would have ſecured that inviolability—that the queſtion was not now whether that conſtitution was to be preſerved and ſupported; that had already been determined; but the queſtion was, whether the king had not in various ways, contrary to the oath, himſelf violated the conſtitution, and endeavoured to deſtroy the liberty of the nation. This therefore was a new caſe, and all that appeared now neceſſary to decide upon, was the various particulars of criminal deſigns of which he was accuſed.

The evidences of the monarch's participation in the ſchemes againſt the new order of things, were too ſtrong to be palliated, and the arguments for form, were ſoon loſt in the ſuperior weight of the facts produced, and the fatal effects which any heſitation on the exhibition of the proofs muſt cauſe on the public mind.

The principal ſource of this evidence was brought to light by the events of the tenth of Auguſt; an iron cheſt had been contrived in the wall of the Thuilleries. The workman who executed it, was alone privy to the ſituation and exiſtence of this ſecret work. The enthuſiaſm of the revolution had ſuggeſted to the artiſan that ſuch a contrivance could not be favourable to liberty, and he had communicated to Roland, when appointed miniſter of the home department, the important ſecret, and conducted him to the ſpot; upon opening it an immenſe collection of the king's private papers were found in it, and ſuch as confirmed in the ampleſt form, all the allegations that had from time to time charged upon the court. Many of theſe were in cypher, and others couched in terms of ambiguity, upon which no evidence could be reſted; among them were:—

1. A receipt from Bouillé, dated Mayence, October 15, 1791, containing an account of the expenditure of the ſum of nine hundred and ninety-three millions iſſued for the formation of a camp at Montmedy. This money had been diſtributed among the following perſons, viz. Monſieur, the comte d'Artois, the prince de Naſſau, the duc de Choiſeul, Demandell, Bon, Hamilton, Laſſale, Weyman, and ſeveral other general officers and private perſons.

2. Another ſigned Choiſſeul-Stanville, atteſting the receipt and diſtribution of ſixty thouſand livres.

3. A letter ſtating that the diamonds of madame Elizabeth had been tranſmitted on the twenty-ſecond of June, 1791, to an officer of huſſars who had carried them to the brothers of the late king.

4. A paper proving that the editor of the "Poſtillion de la Guerre" (a news-paper) had received eight thouſand livres from the civil liſt, and the "Logographe" no leſs than the ſum of ſixty thouſand livres, during the ſpace of three months only.

5. A great number of letters, &c. proving that Louis Capet was a monopolizer of corn, ſugar, and coffee; theſe monopolies were made in foreign countries; the treaſurer of the civil-liſt ſuperintended the buſineſs, and was ordered to advance to the amount of three millions.

6. A new order of chivalry introduced under the name of "Chevaliers de la Reine:" the decoration of this order conſiſted of a medal, one ſide of which was adorned with the portrait of the queen; the other had the following inſcription:—"Magnum "reginæ nomen adumbrat."—Several perſons had received this decoration, notwithſtanding an expreſs decree forbidding the creation of any new orders of chivalry.

7. A bundle of papers, which prove that a perſon of the name of Gilles had received twelve thouſand livres in order to pay a band of ſixty men, againſt the expreſs letter of the conſtitution, which forbids the king to raiſe or maintain any armed men without the permiſſion of the legiſlature.

8. A carton full of proofs that Louis Capet had continued the pay of ſuch of his body guards as had emigrated to Coblentz; that a number of conſpirators were conſtantly aſſembled at the Thuilleries: that Bouillé had the audacity to repair there ſince the invaſion projected in 1791; and that, from the day that the ci-devant comte d'Artois had been decreed to be in a ſtate of accuſation, Louis the Sixteenth had aſſigned a penſion of two hundred thouſand livres to his children.

On the eleventh of December the monarch was ordered to the bar of the convention, previouſly to the entrance of the accuſed, the preſident thus addreſſed the members: "repreſentatives, you are going to exerciſe the right of national juſtice. You are reſponſible to all the citizens of the republic, for your conduct on this occaſion. Europe obſerves you; hiſtory will collect your thoughts and actions; an incorruptible poſterity will judge with inflexible ſeverity: act therefore conſiſtently with the new functions which you are going to fill; let ſilence prevail, and let the dignity of your ſeſſion evince the majeſty of the French people. It is about to give, by you, their organ, an awful leſſon to kings, and an example for the franchiſement of nations."

He then addreſſed the galleries thus:

"The national convention confide in your abſolute devotion to your country, and your reſpect for the repreſentatives of the people. Remember the awful ſilence which prevailed on the return of Lewis from Varennes."

Lewis was then introduced to the bar, and the act of accuſation was read; and the king ſummoned was by the preſident Barrere, to anſwer to each ſeparate charge. The priſoner was permitted to ſeat himſelf at the bar, and the trial proceeded:—

Q. Louis, the French nation accuſes you of having committed a multitude of crimes to re-eſtabliſh your tyranny, and deſtroy her freedom. That you, on the twenty third of June 1789, attempted the ſovereignty of the people, by ſuſpending the aſſemblies of their repreſentatives, and expelling them with violence from the places of their ſittings. This is proved in the proces-verbal entered at the tennis-court of Verſailles, by the members of the conſtituent aſſembly. On the twenty third of June you wanted to dictate laws to the nation—you ſurrounded their repreſentatives with troops—you preſented to them two declarations, ſubverſive of all liberty, and ordered them to ſeparate. Your own declarations, and the minutes of the aſſembly prove theſe attempts—What have you to anſwer?

A. No laws were then exiſting to prevent me from it.

Q. You ordered an army to march againſt the citizens of Paris. Your ſatellites have ſhed the blood of ſeveral of them, and you would not remove this army till the taking of the Baſtile, and a general inſurrection announced to you that the people were victorious. The ſpeeches you made on the ninth, twelfth, and fourteenth of July, to the deputations of the conſtituent aſſembly, ſhew what were your intentions; and the maſſacres of the Thuilleries riſe in evidence againſt you—What have you to anſwer?

A. I was maſter at that time to order the troops to march; but I never had any intention of ſhedding blood.

Q. After these events, and in spite of the promises which you made on the fifteenth, in the constituent assembly, and on the seventeenth in the town-house of Paris, you have persisted in your projects against national liberty; you long eluded the execution of the decrees of the eleventh of August, respecting the abolition of personal servitude, the feudal government, and tythes. You long refused acknowledging the rights of man: you doubled the number of the life guards, and called the regiment of Flanders to Versailles; you permitted, in orgies held before your eyes, the national-cockade to be trampled under foot, and the white cockade to be hoisted, and the nation to be slandered. At last, you rendered necessary a fresh insurrection, occasioned the death of several citizens, and did not change your language till after your guards had been defeated, when you renewed your perfidious promises. The proofs of these facts are in your observations of the eighteenth of September, in the decrees of the eleventh of August, in the minutes of the constituent assembly, in the events of Versailles of the fifth and sixth of October, and in the conversation you had on the same day with a deputation of the constituent assembly, when you told them, You would enlighten yourself with their councils, and never recede from them—What have you to answer?

A. I have made the observations which I thought just on the two first heads. As to the cockade, it is false; it did not happen in my presence.

Q. You took an oath, at the federation of the fourteenth of July, which you did not keep—You soon tried to corrupt the public opinion, with the assistance of Talon who acted in Paris, and Mirabeau, who was to have excited counter-revolutionary movements in the provinces—What have you to answer?

A. I do not know what happened at that time, but the whole is anterior to my acceptance of the constitution.

Q. You lavished millions of money to effect this corruption, and you would even use popularity as a means of enslaving the people—These facts are the result of a memorial of Talon, on which you have made your marginal comments in your own hand-writing, and of a letter which Laporte wrote to you on the nineteenth of April, in which, recapitulating a conversation he had with Rivarol, he told you, that the millions, which you had been prevailed upon to throw away had been productive of nothing—For a long time you had meditated on a plan of escape. A memorial was delivered to you on the twenty-eight of February, which pointed out the means for you to effect it; you approve of it by marginal notes—What have you to answer?

A. I felt no greater pleasure than that of relieving the needy—This proves no design.

Q. On the twenty-eighth a great number of the nobles and military came into your apartments in the castle of the Thuilleries, to favour that escape; you wanted to quit Paris on the tenth of April, to go to St. Cloud—What have you to answer?

A. This accusation is absurd.

Q. But the resistance of the citizens made you sensible that their distrust was great; you endeavoured to discard it by communicating to the constituent assembly a letter which you addressed to the agents of the nation near foreign powers, to announce to them, that you had freely accepted the constitutional articles, which had been presented to you—and, notwithstanding, on the twenty-first you took flight with a false passport. You left behind a protest against these self-same constitutional articles; you ordered the miniſters to ſign none of the acts paſſed by the national aſſembly; and you forbade the miniſter of juſtice to deliver up the ſeals of the ſtate. The public money was laviſhed to inſure the ſucceſs of this treachery, and the public force was to protect it, under the orders of Bouille, who ſhortly before had been charged with the maſſacre of Nancy, and to whom you wrote upon this head, 'To take care of his popularity, becauſe it would be of ſervice to you.' Theſe facts are proved by the memorial of the twenty-third of February, with marginal comments in your own hand-writing; by your declaration of the twentieth of June, wholly in your own hand-writing; by your letter of the fourteenth of September 1790, to Bouille; and by a note of the latter, in which he gives you an account of the uſe he made of nine hundred and ninety-three thouſand livres, given by you, and employed partly in terpanning the troops who were to eſcort you—What have you to anſwer?

A. I have no knowledge whatever of the memorial of the twenty-third of February—As to what relates to my journey to Varennes, I appeal to my declaration to the commiſſaries of the conſtituent aſſembly at that period.

Q. After your detention at Varennes, the exerciſe of the executive power was, for a moment, ſuſpended in your hands, and you again formed a conſpiracy. On the ſeventh of July the blood of citizens was ſhed in the Champ de Mars. A letter in your own hand-writing, written in 1790, to Lafayette, proves that a criminal coalition ſubſiſted between you and Lafayette, to which Mirabeau acceded. The reviſion began under theſe cruel auſpices; all corruptious were made uſe of. You have paid for libels, pamphlets, and newſpapers, deſigned to corrupt the public opinion, to diſcredit the aſſignats, and to ſupport the cauſe of the emigrants. The regiſters of Septeuil ſhew what immenſe ſums have been made uſe of in theſe liberticide manœuvres.—What have you to anſwer?

A. What happened on the ſeventeenth of July has nothing at all to do with me—I know nothing of it.

Q. You ſeemed to accept the conſtitution on the fourteenth of September; your ſpeeches announced an intention of ſupporting it, and you were buſy in overturning it, even before it was completed. A convention was entered into at Pilnitz on the twenty-fourth of July, between Leopold of Auſtria, and Frederic-William of Brandenburgh, who pledged themſelves to re-erect in France the throne of abſolute monarchy, and you were ſilent upon this convention till the moment when it was known by all Europe—What have you to anſwer?

A. I made it known as ſoon as it came to my knowledge; beſides, every thing that refers to this ſubject concerns the miniſters.

Q. Arles had hoiſted the ſtandard of rebellion; you favoured it by ſending three civil commiſſaries, who made it their buſineſs not to repreſs the counter-revolutioniſts, but to juſtify their proceedings—What have you to anſwer?

A. The inſtructions which were given to the commiſſaries muſt prove what was their miſſion; and I knew none of them when the miniſters propoſed them to me.

Q. Avignon and the county of Venaiſſin, had been united with France; you cauſed the decree to be executed; but a month after that time civil war deſolated that country: The commiſſaries you had ſent to that part, helped to ravage it—What have you to anſwer?

A. I do not remember what delay has been caused in the execution of the decree; besides, this occurrence has no personal reference to me—it only concerns those that have been sent, not those who sent them.

Q. Nismes, Montauban, Mende, Jales, felt great shocks during the first days of freedom—You did nothing to stifle those germens of counter-revolution, till the moment when Saillant's conspiracy became manifestly notorious—What have you to answer?

A. I gave, in this respect, all the directions which were proposed to me by the ministers.

Q. You sent twenty-two battalions against the Marseillois, who marched to reduce the counter-revolutionists of Arles—What have you to answer?

A. I ought to have the pieces referring to this matter, to give a just answer.

Q. You gave the southern command to Witgenstein, who wrote to you on the twenty-first of April, 1792, after he had been recalled; "A few instants more, and I shall call around the throne of your majesty, thousands of French, who are again become worthy of the wishes you form for their happiness"—What have you to answer?

A. This letter is dated since his recall; he has not been employed since. I do not recollect this letter.

Q. You paid your late life-guards at Coblentz; the registers of Septeuil attest this; and general orders signed by you prove, that you sent considerable remittances to Bouillé, Rochefort, Vauguyon, Choiseul, Beaupré, Hamilton, and the wife of Polignac—What have you to answer?

A. When I first learnt that my life-guards assembled beyond the Rhine, I stopped their pay; as to the rest, I do not remember.

Q. Your brothers, enemies to the state, caused the emigrants to rally under their banners; they raised regiments, took up loans, and concluded alliances in your name; you did not disclaim them, but at the moment when you were fully certain that you could no longer cross their projects; your intelligence with them by a note, written by Louis Stanislaus Xavier, signed by your two brothers, was conceived in these words.

"I wrote to you, but it was by post, and I could say nothing—We are two here, who make but one; one in sentiments, one in principles, one in zeal of serving you—We keep silence; because, were we to break it too soon, it would injure you; but we shall speak as soon as we shall be certain of general support, and that moment is near. If we are spoken to on the part of those people, we shall hear nothing; but if on your part, we will listen: we shall pursue our road straight; it is therefore desired that you will enable us to say something; do not stand on ceremonies. Be easy about your safety; we only exist to serve you; we are eagerly occupied with this point, and all goes on well; even our enemies feel themselves too much interested in your preservation, to commit an useless crime which would terminate in their own destruction. Adieu.

L. S. Xavier and Charles Philippe."

What have you to answer?

A. I disowned all the proceedings of my brothers, according as the constitution prescribed me to do, and from the moment they came to my knowledge. Of this note I know nothing.

Q. The ſoldiers of the line, who were to be put on the war eſtabliſhment, conſiſted of but one hundred thouſand men at the end of December, you therefore neglected to provide for the ſafety of the ſtate from abroad. Narbonne required a levy of fifty thouſand men, but he ſtopped the recruiting at twenty-ſix thouſand men, in giving aſſurances that all was ready; yet there was no truth in theſe aſſurances. Servan propoſed after him to form a camp of twenty thouſand men near Paris; it was decreed by the legiſlative aſſembly; you refuſed your ſanction.—What have you to anſwer?

A. I had given to the miniſters all the orders for expediting the augmentation of the army: in the month of December laſt, the returns were laid before the aſſembly. If they deceived themſelves, it is not my fault.

Q. A flight of patriotiſm made the citizens repair to Paris from all quarters. You iſſued a proclamation, tending to ſtop their march; at the ſame time our camps were without ſoldiers. Dumourier, the ſucceſſor of Servan, declared, that the nation had neither arms, ammunition, nor proviſions, and that the poſts were left defenceleſs. You waited to be urged by a requeſt made to the miniſter Lajard, when the legiſlative aſſembly wiſhed to point out the means of providing for the internal ſafety of the ſtate, by propoſing the levy of forty-two battalions. You gave commiſſions to the commanders of the troops to diſband the army, to force whole regiments to deſert, and to make them paſs the Rhine to put them at the diſpoſal of your brothers, and of Leopold of Auſtria, with whom you had intelligence. This fact is proved by the letter of Toulougeon, governor of Franche Compté—What have you to anſwer?

A. I know nothing of this circumſtance; there is not a word of truth in this charge.

Q. You charged your diplomatical agents to favour the coalition of foreign powers and your brothers, againſt France, and eſpecially to cement peace between Turkey and Auſtria, and to procure thereby a greater number of troops againſt France from the latter. A letter of Choiſſeul-Gouffier, ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, verifies the fact—What have you to anſwer?

A. M. Choiſſeul did not ſpeak the truth: no ſuch thing has ever been.

Q. The Pruſſians advanced againſt our frontiers: your miniſter was ſummoned on the eighteenth of July to give an account of the ſtate of our political relations with Pruſſia; you anſwered, on the tenth that fifty thouſand Pruſſians were marching againſt us, and that you gave notice to the legiſlative body of the formal acts of the pending hoſtilities, in conformity to the conſtitution—What have you to anſwer?

A. It was only at that period I had knowlege of it: all the correſpondence paſſed between the miniſters.
